In the other lectures there is the same mixture of interesting suggestion with novelties intended to be brilliant, but which sometimes make us suspicious of the judgment which can propound them. Signor Ferrero gives a valuable sketch of the extension of the trade in Italian wines over the West. But he does not increase our confidence in him when he affirms that the foundation of the Principate was due to the extension of Italian vineyards, and that the political triumph of Rome in the west meant the triumph of Dionysos, as the taste for champagne was really due to the French Revolution! The lecture on the conquest of Gaul is injured by the same habit of sledge-hammer, paradoxical assertion. To any one who knows the previous relations of Rome with Gaul, the internal politics of the country before Cæsar appeared there, and the perpetual pressure of the tribes beyond the Rhine, the assertion that the conquest was an accident, and Gaul merely a pawn in the game of civil war is, to say the least, rather startling. The economic development of the province under Roman rule is admirably sketched by Signor Ferrero; but when he states that its hidden wealth was a discovery of the reign of Augustus, he forgets that, years before the conquest, the country was swarming with Roman merchants carrying on a lucrative trade. The lecture on social development under the Empire contains much that is sound and interesting. But it is wanting in masterly lucidity, and the author flatters himself too much on being an original discoverer. Others before him have, as far back as the rhetor Aristides, seen the unifying effect of peaceful economic development. Others have pointed out that material advance was not accompanied by intellectual aspiration and achievement. The work of spiritual unification was reserved for the Church. But the historian should not fail to pay a tribute to the genius of Julian, who saw the want, and nursed for a brief space the dream of a spiritual unity organised by Neo-platonic theology around the worship of the Sun.

LECONTE DE LISLE.*

If there be any truth in the common view that a great writer's fame sinks to its lowest in the years immediately following his death, and that we must wait for a decade before he emerges in his true proportions, then it is time for criticism to busy itself about assigning a definite place to Leconte de Lisle. It is now fifteen years since he died, and more than fifty since his early volumes won him a band of admirers who placed him little, if at all, below Victor Hugo. Since then several of the leading critics among his countrymen have attempted to estimate his achievement. Brunetière gave him a chapter in his "L'Evolution de la Poésie Lyrique," M. Bourget made him the subject of one of his analytical studies in the "Essais de Psychologie Contemporaine," and M. Lemaître painted his literary portrait in the second volume of "Les Contemporains." But the aloofness that characterises Leconte de Lisle's poetry has proved a difficult barrier to cross, and though each of those essays is full of interest and helps to a juster comprehension of the poet, none of of them is completely satisfying. And the same is true of M. Jean Dornis' painstaking work. It is founded, in part, upon material furnished by the poet himself, and as a contribution to his intellectual biography is therefore of capital importance. But it is weak on the critical side; M. Dornis can see no spots in the sun; and his attempt to show that the poet who so uncompromisingly sang the blessedness of "le divin Néant" still retained some shadow of longing for personal immortality, was foredoomed to failure. Leconte de Lisle neither believed in immortality nor hoped it might be true. For him life was but the illusion of an illusion. His famous "impassibility" was only a mask with which he covered a despairing and incurable scepticism.

Born in the island of Réunion, of mixed Creole and Breton blood, Leconte de Lisle joined a delight in the color and splendor of tropical scenery with the dreamy introspection of the Celt. If we add to these his scientific bent and resolve to make poetry the vehicle for the highest and most exact thought of his time, we shall have the chief sources of his inspiration. Baudelaire has drawn a very just comparison between him and Renan. In both, he says, there are "the same ardent, yet impartial, curiosity with reference to religions, and the same spirit of universal love, not for humanity itself, but for the various forms in which man, in every age and clime, has incarnated beauty and truth." There is something repellent in this attempt to construct a palace of art where the hopes and fears of present-day life will find no entrance, but with Leconte de Lisle the mood was, at least in some degree, one of reaction and recoil. Early in life he felt, like Hugo, that a life of action, rather than of contemplation, was the poet's proper sphere, and during the Revolution of 1848 he was an ardent Republican. But his scepticism grew, and he turned aside from every aspect of modern life. He hated the misery and ugliness which he believed inseparable from industrial conditions. All effort at improvement he regarded as striving towards an impossible ideal, and he turned to the philosophy of the Indian sages and to closer absorption in the practice of his art.

Henceforth two themes engaged his whole attention: the study of nature apart from man, and the mythologies of the past. For the latter he was qualified by erudition and a scrupulous care for exactness which did not altogether exclude pedantry. Such spellings as Akhilleus and Klytaimnestra show his passion for correctness. But it is in his nature-poems that he has won his greatest triumphs, and it is they that constitute his title to greatness. French critics have been unanimous in praising the almost absolute perfection of their form, and—though this is a matter upon which a foreign reader must touch with diffidence—it would be hard to imagine anything superior to such poems as "Le Sommeil du Condor," "La Panthère Noire," or "Le Midi." The concluding stanzas of "Le Midi" express the poet's dominant mood:—

"Homme, si le cœur plein de joie ou d'amertume,
Tu passais vers midi dans le champ radieux,
Fuis, la nature est vide, et le soleil consume,
Rien n'est vivant ici, rien n'est triste ou joyeux.

Mais si, désabusé des larmes et du rire,
Altéré de l'oubli de ce monde agité
Tu veux, ne sachant plus pardonner ni maudire,
Goûter une suprême et morne volupté,

Viens, le soleil te parle en paroles sublimes,
Dans sa flamme implacable absorbe-toi sans fin,
Et retourne à pas lents vers les cités infimes,
Le cœur trempé sept fois dans le néant divin."

The same note is repeated in that wonderful poem, "L'Illusion Suprême," where, after a magnificent description of tropical beauty, he thus asks and answers the great question:—

"Ah! tout cela, jeunesse, amour, joie et pensée,
Chants de la mer et des fôrets, souffles du ciel
Emportant à plein vol l'Espérance insensée,
Qu'est-ce que tout cela, qui n'est pas éternel?
Soit! la poussiére humaine en proie au temps rapide,
Ses voluptés, ses pleurs, ses combats, ses remords,
Les Dieux qu'elle a conçus et l'univers stupide,
Ne valent pas la paix impassible des morts."

The last number of the "Hibbert Journal" contains an article by Professor Dewey, entitled "Is Nature Good? A Conversation," in which one of the characters says: "I was watching a beautiful wave; its lines were perfect; at its crest, the light glinting through its infinitely varied and delicate curves of foam made a picture more ravishing than any dream. And now it has gone; it will never come back. So I weep." This was Leconte de Lisle's attitude to the beauty he lived for, though in his case he never told the world he wept. "The public confession of personal sorrows," he said, "is a vain and gratuitous profanation of them."

MIDDLE-CLASS FICTION.

While we can count up, to-day, a hundred or more talented story-tellers, it seems doubtful whether even a handful of the novels of this generation will stand the test of time. The scarcity of genius is not the sole explanation: if we look deeper we must recognise that the great bulk of middle-class art which reflects the indeterminate and adulterated standards of taste of an enormous audience, fails through a striking lack of the sense of style. The pace and confusion of modern life seem to be fatal to the establishment, or even the recognition, of traditional graceful forms. Each man works as he pleases, independent of example. If we have to choose between formal and formless mediocrity, we may indeed vote for the latter, but it is undeniable that not only is a great deal of talent in fiction wasted through lack of appreciation of good standards, but that the preoccupation of the middle-class audience with a writer's matter, encourages, directly, mediocrity of aesthetic form. And, as art lives by the triumph of style, it seems that the typical middle-class environment and education are as unfavorable to pure art as they are favorable to the diffusion of a superficial culture and educated feeling. In the vast majority of modern novels the appeal lies not in the artistic power or beauty of the picture, but in its mental interest as a human record. The temperamental quality of these novels rarely calls for notice, while we find the scenes, situations and characters are cleverly set forth in endless variety. Mrs. Belloc Lowndes' "Studies in Wives" (Heinemann, 6s.), is a good example of the intelligent craftsmanship characteristic of many of our clever writers whose work is without charm and not specially original in pattern. The best story, "Althea's Opportunity," which describes vividly how the hard, successful politician, Perceval Scrope. dies suddenly in the house of his confidante, Mrs. Panfillen, and how his gentle wife, Althea, summoned in haste, succeeds in smuggling his lifeless body safely home again, without anyone being the wiser, is effective, but it is lacking in those subtle turns and twists with which a master of the short story, such as Maupassant, would have thrilled us. "Mr. Jarvice's Wife" is capitally written, but the situation, novel in its character, is not carried beyond the compass of a flying sketch. Better is "A Modern Instance," in which we follow the efforts of Oliver Germaine to discover from which of his own friends and his wife's admirers it is that Bella has drawn the large sums of money which, unknown to him, have long paid for her lavish expenditure and dressmakers' bills. It turns out that Bella has not been faithless to him, but that she has led on the elderly, timid Henry Buck, nicknamed "the Rabbit," to make her gifts amounting to four thousand pounds. Most of Mrs. Belloc Lowndes' stories show our modern society in an ugly light. The weakest, "According to Meredith," is, we think, psychologically untrue, while the most human pages are to be found in an able study of married unhappiness, "Shameful Behaviour."

If "The Veil," by E. S. Stevens (Mills & Boon, 6s.), be a first novel, the author will probably have a future as a favorite of the circulating library public. In the feeling for the picturesque externals of Arab life in Tunis and the Algerian Sahara, the author shows herself quite the equal of Mr. Robert Hichens, while her study of various types of the hybrid population under French rule

CONSCIENCE AND CRITICISM

By the Rev. GEOFFREY HUGHES. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

With foreword by the BISHOP OF WINCHESTER.

[This is written mainly for those who, while agreed on the basis of Christian faith, differ on questions such as are raised by modern criticism. It puts before them as a criterion of religious truth Conscience—the developed religious consciousness "originated and inspired by the religious emotion, shaped into definite form by Thought, and energised for Action by Will." It is Conscience which must decide for us on the religious value of the Bible, and show how far we can admit error due to ignorance in the writers. Conscience recognises the Divinity of Christ; but the complete verification of the Christian faith can only be presented by "the Ideal Conscience of the Ideal Church."]

ENGLAND AND THE ENGLISH

"Mr. Collier's book on English life is more thoughtful and better expressed than anything on similar lines that we have read."

is inspired by a closer knowledge. One is always a little suspicious of European authors whose imaginations, working at double pressure to pierce the veil of "the atmosphere of mystery" in Eastern towns, fail to seize the interest of the prosaic facts of daily life, and concoct in their place a tissue of intrigues, love adventures, political plots, and other fascinating imbroglios. Even if these elements are in place, they cannot be the staple of the daily life of the people any more than a robbery in a boarding-house is characteristic of the life of Bloomsbury. Accepting "The Veil," however, as a modern romance, the figure of Mabrouka, the dancer and political spy, and of Si Ismael, the mystic and nationalist intriguer, are much better limned than is usual in novels of this class, and the author shows a good deal of insight into Oriental human nature, which, once penetrated, is less complex in its motives than, say, English human nature. The mystery, indeed, is in the veil, not behind it, and E. S. Stevens, in her next essay, would do well to eschew exciting incidents, and aim at presenting a pure study of Oriental character and environment.

"Olive in Italy," by Moray Dalton (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), is an unusually good specimen of its class. In general, our English authors' descriptions of modern Italian life, and of Anglo-Italian relations, are the product of a superficial acquaintance with the country. But Moray Dalton writes with familiarity of types in many classes, and he does not sin, as the late Marion Crawford was wont to do, by composing studio pictures of an idealised aristocratic society. Apart from the plot by which the penniless English girl, Olive Agar's, future is compromised by the scheming of the cold-blooded seducer, Prince Tor di Rocca, and apart from the theatrical ending, the atmosphere of the Sienese bourgeoisie and the Florentine pensions leaves little to be desired, and the general illusion is convincing till we are introduced into the ateliers of a little colony of cosmopolitan artists in Rome. Here the actuality of the narrative suffers from the author's scheme of bringing into collision the three men who take an active interest in the heroine. While it would be an exaggeration to say that Moray Dalton shows much artistic subtlety or any great originality in his method, the effect of his novel is of a fresh and genuine outlook, and his eye for men and manners is sufficiently keen to make us look forward with pleasure to the sequel to this well-written story, which certainly deserves its place in "The First Novel Library."

"The Wanton," by Frances Forbes-Robertson (Greening, 6s.), would take a higher rank among novels had the author known how to solve the perplexing problem of the tongue best adapted to the portrayal of thirteenth century manners. Miss Forbes-Robertson has taken the easiest way out by boldly employing ninteenth-century English, and, naturally, the artistic illusion is shattered on every fresh page. Modern phrases convey modern sentiments, and though the author has sufficient instinct to avoid patent absurdities, the atmosphere of her medieval castle life is, all too clearly, passed on to us through the refining mesh of the Victorian mind. Her two heroines, Beltis and Cecilia, are, however, far less modern in outlook than is the vehicle of their talk, and their characters are so true to feminine nature that we readily grant that their figures are not out of place against a thirteenth-century background. Her knightly heroes, Osteric and Valdemar, are rather personifications of masculine qualities than living men, but in many of her scenes the author shows considerable insight into the medieval mind, though she sentimentalises in modern fashion over the poetic and picturesque elements, and does not realise the prosaic details. The novel is, however, both spirited and fresh in color, and the author should persevere in this, her chosen, vein. In striking contrast to "The Wanton" is "The Mystery of the Myrtles," by Edgar Jepson (Hutchinson & Co., 6s.), a story which, in the ingenuity of its thrills, recalls that old favorite of fifty years ago, Wilkie Collins. The intrepid traveller, Sir George Vine, returns to his old suburban house, The Cedars, to find that the adjoining mansion, The Myrtles, with its untouched jungle of a garden, wild and overgrown with underwood, is the scene of uncanny and diabolical rites. A secret society of occultists, fashionable practitioners of the black art, Mr. Warrender, Lady Barshalton, the villainous mystic, Mr. Brown, alias Murgatroyd, the Duchesse of Morbilhan, &c., with a crew of satellites, sinister Malays, meets weekly, and incredible to say, sacrifices on a stone altar, on the lawn, the victims they have lured to the villa gates. Mr. Fotheringay, Sir Bradford Ledbury, Lord Wembley, and a humble cabman, along with a number of black kids, in turn are despatched by the occultists to the appropriate accompaniment of infernal rites, and the last victim, the fascinating Miss Crystal Warrender, is only dragged from the altar, in the nick of time, by the resourceful Sir George, who escapes with his burden while the occultists are stabbed by the Malays running amuck. To do Mr. Jepson justice, he works up to the final scene of suburban slaughter with a cunning that will gratify the taste for the gruesome. Nothing is too shocking, but everythi g is shocking enough, and there is a delightful American, Mr. Odgett, who is true to the best traditions of the American of fiction.

"Starbrace," by Sheila Kaye-Smith (George Bell & Sons, 6s.), is a novel of unusual vigor. The author has essayed to paint, with considerable success, the household life of several families of Sussex Squire Westerns, in the mid-eighteenth century. The character of the sullen, boorish, fiercely independent hero, Starbrace, half yokel and half gipsy, is a strong conception, though the heroine, Theodora, who falls in and out of love with him, is too modern in tone to be true to the period. Miss Kaye-Smith should study the women in Richardson's novels, if she would catch the fine shades of feminine sentiment of that day. But her open-air scenes are admirably wrought, and she has un doubtedly the power of drawing masculine character.

A BUDGET OF NOVELS.

In "The Pilgrim's March" (Melrose, 6s.), Mr. H. H. Bashford presents a study of a lad of genius slowly making his way, not without false starts and errant zigzags, towards his natural line of development. The construction is not faultless, and there are thin spots in the narrative, but the characterisation is good, and still better is the author's conspicuous fairness of outlook. Few, indeed, are the English writers capable of picturing impartially, from outside, the mental state of a narrowly Puritan circle. Mr. Bashford comprehends and almost sympathises with his zealously Evangelical family, attributes to them no taint of hypocrisy, but draws them sincerely religious, fervently devoted to good works, animated by real kindliness, and genuinely free from any selfish aim. Yet, in spite of all these virtues, life among them is sheer suffocation for a born artist. Robin, the "pilgrim" who has understood all their merits, has shared their enthusiasms, and even for a time lived happily among them, comes to a sharp break, involving much pain, resentment, and misunderstanding; and as we read, we know that the break was inevitable, that nobody was to blame, and that, in a sense, both sides were right. It is a triumph of impartiality—or perhaps it should rather be said of sympathetic perception—on the part of Mr. Bashford.

The author of "The Bargain: A Story of Love," by Theodora Wilson Wilson (Hutchinson, 6s.), has, it is evident, plenty of capacity, and seems to be pouring out work that is by no means up to her highest level. Now, in art, as in life, the choice of the easy way is the first step on the road to deterioration. There are literally scores of writers capable of producing as good a novel as this, and some of them are congenitally incapable of ever going a step higher. They are not to be blamed—unless, indeed, for not desisting—but Miss Wilson, who, if she chose to bestow upon her work "the real labor from which human beings have always shrunk—the labor of thinking"—could write a novel that should in some true sense mirror reality, is to be blamed for offering us "The Bargain" instead. She ought not to rest content with the poor, trite, improbable plot, the chain of coincidences, the inordinately long conversations, and the languidly flowing narrative. Stern self-criticism, ruthless excision, the casting out of every useless or banal word and phrase, these are the remedies for Miss Wilson's disease, which is the very common one of literary slackness. It is a disease of which a writer must cure himself or die; and it is certain that if the author of "The Bargain" does not take trouble to write better, she will not only quickly grow to write worse, but will eventually cease to satisfy her uncritical British public. She is not one of the dull plodders whose plane is fixed from the beginning.

"Penelope Ann" (by J. Henry Harris, Greening, 6s.), is hardly a novel, but rather a series of Cornish sketches strung upon a thin thread of story. The heroine, who is endowed with all the charm and the beauty and the wonderful singing voice that come so easily to heroines of story books, is a spoilt, mischievous, untrained girl, who has run wild all through her childhood. To the fishing village which is all her world comes a remote cousin, a fatigued, successful journalist, who sees, woos, and marries her. There, wisely, the history ends. The real novel, however, would begin afterwards; imagination dwells upon Penelope Ann in a suburban villa, trying to cope with an experienced town-bred house-parlormaid; upon Penelope Ann at the dressmaker's, or at a dinner party, or "at home" to the wives of her husband's friends. The writing is easy and pleasant, and the characteristic humors of the little port lightly touched in, but the illustrations add nothing to the volume's value.

Mr. Gerard Bendall's novel, "The Old Home" (Alston Rivers, 6s.), is mere chatter. Let not that verdict, however, be taken to imply condemnation in the highest degree; some novels are mere drivel. Some novels, also, to which the label "mere chatter" might fairly be applied are in their way treasures: those of Peacock at once occur as examples. "The Old Home," like those, consists almost entirely of conversations, and, like them, is peopled rather by types than by persons. Unfortunately, both the fantastic imagination and the felicity of phrase that belong to the older author are altogether lacking, and when these qualities are withdrawn, what remains? Little else, indeed, than the gossip over their wine of Conservative elderly gentlemen who like to quote Latin and occasionally just to hover on the brink of an impropriety, and around whom circle feminine automata, always described as lovely and charming, but never endowed with any breath of life. That remnant—Peacock modernised, minus wit, extravagance, and the poetic touch—is the substance of Mr. Bendall's volume; and it is safe to say of it that it will probably amuse some men, and will certainly bore most women.

The novelist who carries back his story into the past sails between Scylla and Charybdis. On one hand lies the danger of diminishing the differences between our forerunners and ourselves, and so merely presenting contemporaries in fancy dress, on the other that of exaggerating the differences, and so presenting personages and conditions that do not belong to actual life at all. It is on the latter rock that Miss Margaret Young has split in her not very well named story, "The Wreathed Dagger" (Cassell, 6s.), and yet she does not always steer clear of the former. While the gentlemen of her opening have neither the speech nor the decorums of the seventeenth century, but rather those of our own, her villain, her hero, her heroine, and her blind girl are creatures neither of the one nor the other, but belong purely and simply to the world of melodrama. Nor is the key of the narrative truer; it is pitched too high throughout, and the falsetto grows shriller and shriller. Apparently this is a first novel, and its failure may arise in part from immaturity and from a false literary ideal. If so, its writer may yet, with time and study, acquire good material and the art of treating it. It would be false kindness to pretend that, this time, her stuff is other than poor or her management other than erroneous.

Why is not "The Gay Paradines" (by Mrs. Stephen Batson, Stanley Paul, 6s.) a first-rate novel? The question runs parallel with perusal as page after page is turned. It has thought and construction; it faces facts as your merely "pleasant" author will never consent to do; it has a good deal of sound character drawing, and yet it never touches even the lowest place in the first class. For one thing, there is too much of it; for another the style is both bald and wordy, as may be seen from the following sentence, a fair sample, though taken almost at random:—

> "It was some three years earlier that strenuous efforts had been made to raise the militia of our English counties, so as to procure by this means recruits for the regular army, as well as to increase the forces for home defence."

Moreover, such expressions as "jolly" and "have the cheek to" strike an attentive reader as being unduly modern for speakers of the Waterloo period. If the industry bestowed upon getting so long a volume written had been directed towards careful choice of words, towards variety in the shape of sentences, and, above all, towards the exclusion of everything superfluous, "The Gay Paradines" would have been a novel that must have made its mark. As it stands, the ruck of readers who actually prefer work that lacks finish and precision will be "quite pleased" with it, but the critically minded (unless, indeed, they happen to be conscientious reviewers) will scarcely read it to the end, and will assuredly never come back to it a second time.

Mrs Tynan Hinkson's work cannot but be popular, as fairy tales are popular. Hers is the world of things as they ought to be, a sphere for which the sternest realist of us all has unconfessed hankerings. That the cousin wrongfully excluded from her inheritance, on account of a flaw in her ancestress's marriage certificate, should be beloved by the cousin in possession, and that the certificate should afterwards come to light, flawless, is not this the sort of thing we should all like to see happen? This pleasant, improbable tale holds the first place in "Cousins and Others" (by Katharine Tynan, Werner Laurie, 6s.), and is told with all the writer's own warm-hearted gusto. Most of the "others" are in the same strain, but the last of the group, "Travelling Companions," has a touch of something deeper and truer to reality, that sets the reader speculating upon the possibilities of an ending very different from the "happy" one which Mrs. Hinkson cannot bring herself to deny.

Miss Frances G. Burmester's "Davina" (Smith & Elder, 6s.), is good solid work, carefully observed, well thought out, and well executed. The persons—except, perhaps, the hero's villain brother—are real, and the situation has elements of originality. But there is one flaw. The author allows her dislike of Bertha to carry her away, and from the moment of that young woman's ill-assorted marriage she is shown steadily losing every trace of intelligence, good temper, or good manners. Now, in real life an empty-headed woman of uncertain temper who has secured a wealthy husband does not necessarily, or even generally, develop at once into either a total fool or a jealous shrew, much less into a combination of the two. If the scales had been held more evenly, if we had been made to feel that Bertha, too, had a case to plead, if Joseph himself had been torn by a sense of her false position as well as of his own, "Davina" would have come nearer to being a very fine novel. We might have pitied all the persons of the suffering trio, enmeshed alike in a tangle of circumstances, so that the tragic situation seemed inevitable. Bertha, instead of growing into a kind of monster, should have been merely the typical silly woman, souring a little as she goes on, and Joseph should have appeared rather a man who has made a fatal mistake than a man who has been entrapped, blindfold. But, when all is said, "Davina," precisely as it stands, remains well worth reading, and worth reading more than once—which is higher praise than can be given to one novel in twenty, or perhaps in fifty.

While we may admit frankly that it is not given to a score, among the many hundreds of our novelists, in any given year to produce a really admirable work of art, we should do wrong to echo the plaint of those superior persons who deplore periodically the public's growing taste for fiction. The over serious person, on matters respecting the functions of the arts in the community, is apt to show himself more myopic than the man who does not think at all. A certain percentage of modern novels may be styled educational, attracting precisely that immense body of people who escape the widespreading net of serious literature, history, biography, travel, economics, sociology, &c. We have a good example of this in "The Pools of Silence," by H. De Vere Stacpoole (Fisher Unwin, 6s.), a novel which, under the jam of an exciting romance of explorers' life on the Congo, conceals the salutary powder of many Consular reports on the atrocities of Belgian rule in the Congo Free State. It is no exaggeration to say that the scenes in "The Pools of Silence," painted in hard black and white, without any artistic subtlety of tone, though vigorously drawn, will leave a stronger and more lasting effect on the reader than would any amount of leading articles in the Press. People who are not moved by statements, arguments, and statistics, quickly succumb to the orator, the dramatist, and the story-teller. Mr. De Vere Stacpoole, who does not mince matters, has "an instinct for the truth of things," and his American hero, Doctor Adams, who accompanies the renowned explorer, Berselius, to the Congo, on an expedition after big game, typifies the Englishman's abhorrence of the Congo atrocities. In the lurid description in Chapter XV., "The Punishment," which describes how the slave-villagers of the Silent Pools are whipped to death by blows of the chicotte to satisfy the whites' mad lust of cruelty, the author has concentrated the effect of many pages to be found in English Blue Books. The reader has only to turn to Mr. Conrad's masterpiece, "The Heart of Darkness," to recognise that while Mr. Stacpoole's novel is, artistically, an elementary affair, it drives home to the general public the truth of aspects which the latter fail to grasp when presented in subtler form. Fiction, in short, is the instrument best capable of adjustment for the chronicling of modern life, and the critic will not deplore that Mr. Stacpoole, in "The Pools of Silence," has written a novel with a purpose, but that, with such a good purpose in view, there are not a hundred other novelists to write of Leopold, "he talked of sentiment and religion and humanitarianism as he pulled his victims to pieces, and he pulled his victims to pieces for the sake of gold."

Significant as a sign of the times is "Much Ado About Something," by C. E. Lawrence (John Murray, 6s.), a fantastic novel which opens with a scene in English Fairyland, when Oberon, Titania, Mab, Puck, and their followers, meeting for their May Day revels, cannot keep the impetuous young fairy June from breaking away to "the narrow world of mean streets and mistaken people," which calls to her in the lurid red glow on the northern sky, marking where London lies. With June and the faithful gnome, Bim, we penetrate into the dismal limbo of Paradise Court, and thence to a banquet at the Mansion House where, moved by fairy magic, the Lord Mayor asks the City magnates, "What is the good of our wealth if it does not bring others happiness, too?" and couples with the toast of the evening "The Commerce of London" the resolution "Let us make London fit for the fairies." The supernatural machinery once set in motion, it is easy to concede Mr. Lawrence that "the great organs of the Press, with amazing unanimity, rolled their machines, blew trumpets, and beat drums in the interests of Fairy Reform." Duchesses and millionaires are converted and work for Titania's bodyguard, the aristocracy moves first, and the plutocracy follows, eager, more or less, for good deeds. It is easy to point out that in this Utopian romance the author is trying to graft on to the old stock of the fairy tale the modern slip of the realistic novel, and that the two are of a different genus. The interesting thing to note, however, is that the author's fervor should have carried him through a task impossible for anyone not uplifted by strong moral conviction. Twenty, or even ten, years ago the particular ideal of civic service which the book enshrines was far more remote from the public conscience than it is to-day.

It is perhaps scarcely fair to label either "The Cage," by Harold Begbie (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), or "Everybody's Secret," by Dion Clayton Calthrop (Alston Rivers, 6s.), "novels written with a purpose," but both books are illustrations of the fact that any question in social morals can be better presented and analysed in fiction to-day than in any other literary medium. The novelist can state his case openly without fear of exciting the prejudice that the dramatist is told to guard against, when he addresses "a mixed audience of all ages and all standards of intelligence." Mr. Calthrop's touch is so light, his feeling for picturesque situations so strong, that many readers will fail to discover that in the middle of his story they have drifted from shallow into deep waters. Welby and Iris have had intimate relations in the past; Iris leaves Welby, and the latter brings up their child Phyllis. Years afterwards Iris turns up again, and as she is engaged to be married to Toby Quarrenden, his friend, Welby decides that the past shall lie buried, and Toby shall be told nothing. Of course, the truth comes out, and the problem for Toby is whether the deceit of his friend and the woman he loves is unforgiveable? The second heroine, Christine, an actress, who has lived her life, and whose name has been smirched by mean and little-minded men, is the means by which Toby comes finally to understand that he has "always been looking at outsides." The points of conduct in question can only be weighed in relation to the stress of compelling circumstance, and it is necessary that the whole web of character shall be unravelled in the novel before a judgment is worth delivering. In "The Cage," Mr. Begbie discusses with great wealth of detail the old thesis, "Those whom God has joined let no man put asunder," and in the case of Anne and of Richard Paton who has maltreated his wife, pronounces for the indissolubility of their marriage when Paton has "reformed," though Anne has grown to love Napier, the man worthy of her. The solution in this particular case rests on the awakening of religious emotion in the woman, and we do not find the arguments, by which Napier is finally converted to her idealistic view, very convincing. It is sufficient, however, to point out that, whether Mr. Begbie's ethical solution be spiritually sound or not, the reader who follows the story carefully must gain by being forced to test carefully for himself every link in the chain of the moral argument.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

First place in the July "Nineteenth Century and After" is given to an article on "The Unity and Defence of Empire," by Sir Charles Tupper, an ex-Prime Minister of Canada, and one of the only two delegates now living who attended the Conference for the union of the North American Colonies at Quebec in 1864. He advocates the "all-red route" between this country and Australia and New Zealand via Canada, and suggests that, as an alternative to the presentation of "Dreadnoughts" to the home country by the Colonies, the route might be kept open "by large steamships built under Admiralty supervision, commanded by naval officers, manned by trained men, and provided with suitable armament. . . The means also of transporting troops and volunteers in time of war in the most rapid manner would thus be secured to theAdmiralty." The suggestion is interesting, though, on the double ground of expense and the impossibility of effectively armoring a trading steamer, we doubt whether it would prove practicable. Sir Felix Schuster asks himself "Are the Death Duties an Economically Sound Form of Taxation?" and, of course, answers in the negative. "The whole system of death duties," he says, "apears to me a mere device for disguising and concealing the actual burdens imposed: let the future take care of itself: sufficient for the year are the taxes thereof. But the device is unsound and demoralising." However, death duties have now had a trial of fifteen years, and none of the disadvantages mentioned by Sir Felix Schuster have become evident. Mr. Walter Frewen Lord propounds "The Creed of Imperialism," which he tells us embraces the following five articles, which "hang together like the fingers of one hand," and "soundness" in regard to which should determine whether "a Cabinet ought to hold office: (1) A supreme Navy; (2) Universal military service; (3) The preservation of our Anglo-Saxon stock throughout the world; (4) A Preferential Tariff throughout the Empire; and (5) The teaching of Imperial rights and duties in every school and university throughout the Empire." tion gave a pretty good idea of the feeling of one important part of the Empire in regard to the fourth of these points, and we should be glad to see those who think with Mr. Lord test its feeling in regard to the second of them. Sir Edward Sassoon contributes an article on "'Cable' Reform." He shows much tenderness to the existing cable companies, though he recognises the benefit that would accrue from a national system, and gives cases justifying State intervention. Professor Vambéry concludes his interesting "Personal Reminiscences of Abdul Hamid II. and his Court." Canon Vaughan advocates the removal of the imprecatory Psalms from their present position in the public services of the English Church, and Mr. S. Rosenbaum, whose bias and qualifications are alike evident from his description as "Statistician to the Tariff Commission," enlarges upon "The Budget and Social Revolution."

"The Contemporary Review" opens with the address delivered at the University of Freiburg by Professor Weismann, on the occasion of Darwin's Centenary. It gives an interesting survey of Darwin's "great and many-sided" influence upon the various departments of scientific activity. Mr. G. K. Chesterton follows with a discussion of "The Moral Influence of Meredith." "He had neither the brighter nor the darker forms of spiritual inquiry or personal religion. He could neither rise to prayer nor sink to spirit-rapping. Yet he was a religious Pagan, because he had that great and central sacramental idea which is the one thing which marks religion from all imitations of religions or false definitions of it. . . . The element can only be called the materialism of the true mystic." This is where, according to Mr. Chesterton, that Meredith "differs most markedly from the ablest man whom he has left in his own line. . . Mr. Henry James has all Meredith's intellectualism and nearly all his intellect. Exactly what he lacks is his materialism." In "The Franco-German War: Its True Causes," Mr. Charles Lowe defends Bismarck's version of the Ems telegram, and urges that the present attitude of this country to Germany is dictated by "the same evil and unworthy passions as were directly responsible for the destruction of the French Empire." Mr. W. T. Stead writes on "The Editors of the Empire at Home," Professor Emery Barnes puts forward "The Case Against the Athanasian Creed," and Mr. H. Stanley Jevons continues his examination of "The Causes of Unemployment."

Starting with the determinist view of the modern scientific historian that "our history is going to be, logically, the final development of biology," Mr. J. W. Allen sets out in "The Place of History in Education" (Blackwood, 5s. net), to a clear and thoughtful examination of the characteristics and ideals of historical study. His general conclusion is that any real knowledge of history should help us in our speculations regarding social and political problems, but that any attempt to teach history with a view to throwing light on such matters must be carefully avoided. "The teaching of English history definitely from a patriotic point of view is," he says, "a thing not to be tolerated," for no procedure "could be less scientific, and perhaps no point of view is more distorting." The inculcation of patriotism, he justly points out, is a department of moral training, while history is an affair of intellectual training. The difficulty of approaching a period of history from an impartial point of view is illustrated by three chapters on the Reformation, in which the danger to thought from the presence of unrecognised assumptions is exemplified. Mr. Allen raises many questions with which it is impossible to deal in a short notice, and we must limit ourselves to saying that his book is a courageous attempt to deal with a difficult question. We recommend it to all who have anything to do with the teaching of history.

Although Canon Rawnsley has published a good deal about Cumberland and Westmoreland, his latest volume, "Round the Lake Country" (Maclehose, 5s. net), has the freshness born of a sustained enthusiasm for this locality. That enthusiasm took very practical shape in 1906, when he was among the most strenuous advocates for the retention of Gowbarrow Fell and Aira Force for the public. These beauty spots were in the market, and would undoubtedly have passed into private, and probably selfish, hands had the National Trust failed to raise the subscription necessary for their purchase. He is, therefore, entitled to gratitude for something more than having much extolled the fascination of the district in print. The pleasantly illustrated book before us opens in a somewhat guide-booky fashion, but we soon reach chapters that manifest the author's far-reaching knowledge of the locality, its lore, and its literary associations. Chief among the interesting features are a careful character sketch of the Countess Anne, the seventeenth century landowner whose memorial pillar stands in Brougham Parish, where her dole to the poor of £4 a year is still distributed; an appreciation, with copious extracts from the poems, of "Ald Hoggart o' Troutbeck," uncle to William Hogarth; and a picturesque description of a day at Brough Hill Fair. Natural history is introduced in an account of the Sandwich terns at Ravenglass, and stirring myth in the famous story of Beowulf, apropos of St. Bees; and there is not omitted a plea for the more general support of the National Trust in its work of preserving certain natural inheritances free for all time where "weary Bishops," having been deprived of their ancient hunting privileges, and weary town workers, may go and refresh themselves. The book should be very popular during the holiday season.

The five queens who figure in Mr. R. Storry Deans's "The Trials of Five Queens" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), are Katherine of Aragon, Anne Boleyn, Mary, Queen of Scots, Marie Antoinette, and Queen Caroline. The author's plan has been to give full details of each of the trials, and to attempt a summary of the law and evidence from as impartial a standpoint as possible. In this he has been very successful, and Mr. Deans's pages, besides being true to facts, are as full of romance as any novel. On the question of the divorce of Katherine of Aragon, he holds that Katherine's case was a strong one. "She never had either the justice she was entitled to by law or the justice that is called 'natural,' which, at any rate, demands a fair hearing before an impartial tribunal." On the other hand, he acquits Henry of wishing for the divorce merely because he fell in love with Anne Boleyn. "Matrimony and theology were forced upon him by the necessities of his position," and he had undoubted ground for pleading the nullity of his marriage with Catherine. So much has been written about Marie Antoinette that it is difficult to put her case from a fresh point of view. Still, the chapter on "L'Intérrogatoire Secret" is a useful help to those who wish to realise the procedure of her trial.

The fashion of writing appreciations of living artists is decidedly on the increase. Such appreciations are no longer confined to the magazines; they are exalted to the less ephemeral dignity of bound volumes. The younger generation are honored in this way, not less than the older, provided that the requisite measure of popularity has been attained. Thus, in the "Brush, Pen, and Pencil" series (A. & C. Black, 3s. 6d. net each) we have three volumes, dealing with popular draughtsmen, each of whom, we trust, has still the best part of his career before him. Mr. Tom Browne, R.I., is the subject of the work immediately under notice. The account of his artistic career has been written by Mr. A. E. Johnson, the editor of the series; and while it is by no means the first time that the originator of Tired Tim and Weary Willies has been written up, and the extent and scope of this book are not much greater than those of many magazine articles that have appeared on the same topic, Mr. Johnson's appreciation has a certain freshness and may, on the whole, be considered just. Perhaps, however, it is the pictures that lend the book its chief attraction. These are most excellently reproduced in color and monotone, and cover practically every phase of Mr. Browne's art, from the "serious" water-color drawings, made familiar to us through the Institute, to the line black-and-white contributions to comic papers. Those who wish to renew their acquaintance with Mr. Browne's humor will find this volume an excellent companion for an afternoon.

Published by the RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, 4, Bouverie Street, and 65, St. Paul's, London, E.C.

The frontispiece to "The Green Finch Cruise" (Arnold, 5s. net) filled us with pleasurable anticipations as to the contents of the volume written and illustrated by the Rev. F. Claude Kempson. It is a fanciful sketch in the Chinese manner of the author aboard his sailing-boat, with an equally fanciful sea and background representing the shores of the Isle of Wight and certain maritime objects. If the book that follows does not entirely fulfil the promise of this decorative and clever piece of work, it is doubtless due in some measure to the fact that we do not happen to be yachtsmen. Those, however, who aspire to cruise on the Solent in a fifteen-foot boat will find here plenty of practical hints on how to make "roughing it" comfortable; many of the rough pen-and-ink sketches, too, are exceedingly happy. The author started from Bembridge and had a fortnight's solitary voyaging—solitary, that is, so far as the management of the boat and his life on board were concerned—in the course of which he appears to have explored the Isle of Wight coast pretty thoroughly, and to have noted a number of objects seen and random moral reflections indulged in. Perhaps it is the number and variety of things and thoughts that makes the book a little difficult to read to a finish. Such a book is a difficult one to write in a way that the yachtsman may profit thereby and the general reader enjoy it.

The Week in the City.

| | Price Friday morning, July 2. | Price Friday morning, July 9. |

| Southern Pacific ... ... ... ... | 134½ | ... 138 |
| Rand Mines ... ... ... ... | 10 3/32 | ... 9 31/32 |

This has been a fairly dull, but quite satisfactory, week. The millionaires are still boiling over with indignation about the Budget; but those who are happy in the possession of incomes of less than £5,000 a year are beginning to see less and less reason why they should join in the outcry against Mr. Lloyd George. People in the City, including a great insurance manager, tell me they see signs now of quite a strong upward movement in trade. The continuance of peace all over the world has meant a steady accumulation of savings. Cheap money has given a stimulus to enterprise and has encouraged traders to buy more freely, and to lay in stocks of raw materials and cheap goods. The result is now shown clearly in the Board of Trade returns for June, which are much better than those for the corresponding month of last year, both as regards the imports of raw material and the exports of manufactured goods. The shipping trade remains under a cloud, but there are hopes of better things, especially if the North American harvests are large enough to permit of an exceptionally heavy movement to Europe, where stocks of grain are very low. The stock markets during the week have been quiet but firm, owing to a strong investment demand backed by abundant supplies of money. So low, indeed, have the rates for loans and discounts been that on Thursday the directors of the Bank of England seriously discussed whether the official rate should be lowered to 2 per cent. The decision not to do so may have been influenced by the publication of the Board of Trade returns, which may mean a much heavier demand for money in the autumn when the world's crops are being moved.

The Argentine Republic and its Development.

The reports from the Argentine are not altogether satisfactory, and there has been some depression in Argentine securities of all kinds. The crops, of course, are the main cause of anxiety. "When I was there in March," writes a correspondent, "the absence of rain caused some anxiety, and since then the drought has been unusually prolonged and will certainly be prejudicial to the harvest. At the same time farmers in most districts had had such an excellent season last year that they could afford to hold on to their stocks of grain, and were waiting for higher prices. It would certainly take a very long drought seriously to impair the prosperity of the country, for, apart from minerals, in which it is poor, it gives one the impression of a future United States. Although the rainfall is generally adequate, the Argentine has no need to depend upon that exclusively, for magnificent rivers run through the country, and when the Rio Negro and Rio Colorado schemes of irrigation are completed, millions of fresh acres will be brought under the plough. As the southern provinces are developed Bahia Blanca, which has now only about 40,000 inhabitants, but which is already looked upon as the future Liverpool of South America, will become an enormous port." The Argentine is rapidly supplanting the United States as our granary. The following are the figures for 1907:—

| Exports of Argentina to U. K., 1907 | £8,044,636 ... | £5,000,219 |
| Exports of United States to U. K., 1907 | £8,089,883 ... | £3,918,017 |

In 1892 the total exports of wheat from Argentina were only £2,240,000, and of maize £2,100,000. In 1907 the whole sea-borne trade of Argentina was valued at nearly 120 millions sterling. In grain, in pastoral products, in wine, in timber, possibly in the extraction of petroleum the development will continue, and the Republic only requires good government in order that the people may be contented as well as prosperous. At present the iniquities and unfairness of the official gang, while impotent to prevent the accumulation of wealth, are a perpetual irritation and leaven the bread of the people with a sense of injustice. But even the Government is probably a good deal better than it was. At all events, it is not bad enough to prevent material progress and expansion. Still investors just now should be cautious.

The British Electric Traction.

The directors of the British Electric Traction presented last week a bad report, which raises afresh the whole question of the future of English tramways The capital of the company share—share and debenture—is £4,949,969, of which £1,614,370 is in cumulative 6 per cent. preference shares, £1,333,010 in ordinary shares, and £2,002,589 in debentures. Its business is, of course, to hold the shares of subsidiary companies, though it manages a certain amount under its own direct control. The lines in which it is interested are Scotch, English, Indian, Canadian, and Welsh, and its results consequently show the condition of tramway finance in a good many parts of the world. The sum received in dividends and interest this year amounts altogether to £142,305, and with other additions the total gross income in brought up to £161,922. Deducting from this the allowance for depreciation, expenses, and interest, we get, apart from the carry forward, a net sum available for distribution of £130,725, of which £97,485 is required for debenture interest. Thus there remains to satisfy the preferences and ordinary shareholders a sum of £33,240, raised by the amount brought forward to £68,634. Clearly it is impossible even to pay the year's preference dividend, and the company has to be content to distribute only 3 per cent. As last year there was a deficiency of 3 per cent., and as the shares are cumulative, this only brings the payments down to the end of March, 1908, leaving £76,862 in arrears. How this is to be paid off it is impossible to say, for in spite of a higher scale of fares more or less successfully introduced on the various systems, there is no evidence of increasing revenue, and, strictly speaking, the profits ought to be applied to writing down the value of investments, which stand in the balance-sheet at over £5,000,000, but are apparently not worth much more than half that figure. Altogether the position is a serious one, and no one can say what will happen to these unhappy tramway companies. Of course, they are to a great extent paying the penalty of unsound finance, for it is quite clear now that neither the B.E.T. nor the London United Tramways had any right to pay the high dividends popular in former years. But that need not affect one's sympathy with the unhappy investors who bought at high prices six or seven years ago.

Diary of the Week.

Lord Ripon died on Friday week, in his eighty-second year, a few months after his retirement from the Cabinet and the office of Lord Privy Seal. The son of Lord Goderich, Canning's successor in the Premiership, he first held Cabinet office forty-six years ago. Since then he has been associated, in one capacity or another, with every Liberal Administration of our times, including all the Gladstone Governments. But his great act in politics was his connection with the policy of self-government for India, and his sponsorship of the unpopular, but momentous, Ilbert Bill. His policy failed as a whole, but much of it was carried over by later Governor-Generals of India, and his name and work are landmarks in Indian history which can never be effaced. In home politics his sympathies, awakened by contact with the Christian Socialism of Kingsley's and Maurice's days, were rather markedly in the direction of social reform, and in the Cabinet, in spite of his Whig traditions, he ranked more often with the Radicals than with the Moderates. But his great gift was his firm, simple, and sympathetic character. His powers of speech, never conspicuous, had somewhat deserted him by the time that he was chosen to lead the small Liberal sect in the House of Lords. But he remained to the last one of the handful of British aristocrats whose ambition was to be in the front rather than in the rear rank of the party of progress.

Slightly better progress has been made with the Budget during the week. On Thursday morning, after an all-night sitting, and a stormy personal scene between Lord Winterton and Mr. Thorne, Clause 5 was carried. But sixty-nine clauses remain to be discussed, twenty-three of them dealing with the taxation of land. Meanwhile, the Chancellor has made fresh concessions to the landed interests, one of them definitely exempting from the increment tax all increases of value due to any cause connected with agriculture. Agricultural land, as such, is therefore definitely cleared of the duty. Furthermore, Mr. Lloyd George has promised to exempt from the whole chain of land taxes all holdings under £500 in value. Thus the small freeholder and the market gardener disappear from Tory platforms, leaving Lord Rothschild grieving alone. Sad to say, this concession was received without a touch of gratitude by the Opposition, who had pressed for it, Mr. Balfour even complaining bitterly of the exemptions that were being continually "sprung" upon him and his friends. Finally, sums paid on account of death duties are to be deducted from the income-tax. Our only fear is lest the sum of the concessions, especially the franking of ten per cent. increments, may be so large as to nullify the immediate yield of the taxes, and give the House of Lords the excuse of saying that as the land clauses establish merely a scheme of valuation and little more, they may be separated from the rest of the Bill. This line is already threatened by Mr. Balfour, who melodramatically asked how the Government "dared" to call this a Finance Bill.

We have never in the history of politics met anything quite like the ill-bred insolence with which the landlords and their friends are conducting their alleged argument on the Budget. The insolence is of all sorts and varieties. There is the insolence of the mendicant who whines for a boon, and curses the hand that gives it. There is the schoolboy insolence of Lord Winterton to Mr. Thorne, a Labor member of singularly honest and upright character, who was falsely accused of being drunk in the House, and half re-accused under pretence of an apology, until a real withdrawal and apology were wrung from the offender. There are the ponderous insolence of Lord Balfour of Burleigh and the flippant insolence of Lord Hugh Cecil, who abused the privileges of a deputation in order to bait the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his own room, and were properly trounced for their pains. Mr. Lloyd George is the son of a Welsh peasant, but during every phase of this controversy his superiority in temper and manners to the gentlemen of England has been not less conspicuous than his advantage in brains.

Mr. Herbert Samuel was re-elected for the Cleveland Division on Friday week by a majority of 971. The seat was uncontested at the General Election, and the latest test of its opinions was the bye-election of 1902, when the Liberal majority was 2,036. Since then the Liberal vote has grown, but not in comparison with the rise in Unionist strength. The Liberals appear to have lost somewhat by the disputes which the first trial of the Eight Hours Act has brought with it in mining centres, and the opposition of "the trade," and also, we suspect, of the suffragettes, now counts for something in all constituencies, artisan or other. On the whole, the Budget commands a firm and always an enthusiastic party in its support, and its appearance has already stayed Liberal-Labor dissensions in more than one constituency.

Lord Roberts's Conscription Bill, enforcing various periods of military training on British and Irish subjects between eighteen and thirty, and aiming finally at a semi-conscript army of a million and a half men, was beaten on its second reading on Tuesday by 123 votes to 103. It was opposed by Lord Lansdowne, on behalf of the Tory Whips. In spite of this fact, 98 Unionist peers supported it, and only 75 opposed it, its rejection being due to the hostile votes of 43 Liberal or quasi-Liberal peers. The supporting speeches were as loose as the estimates of cost. Lord Roberts did not even touch the Irish difficulty or the crucial dilemma that no regular soldiers would go out of this country in time of war until the fleet had cleared the seas, and that no invading soldiers could come in till the command of the ocean had been lost, and the country thus starved and ruined. Both he and Lord Milner clearly aimed less at a home force to save invasion, than at a Continental army, designed to invade somebody else. Both depreciated the Navy, Lord Roberts speaking of Waterloo as a more significant action than Trafalgar, and Lord Milner proposing to release our fleet from mere "coast-guard" duty, and pleading for the creation of a force capable of "serving the country anywhere."

The debate showed strong currents of conflicting opinion on the Unionist side. The Duke of Northumberland declared that it would be monstrous to throw all characters and classes together in the barrack-room, and warned the country of the moral dangers of such a course, while Lord Ampthill sneered at the Duke's amendment as ignorant, equivocal, and evasive. For the War Office, Lord Lucas declared that the Roberts scheme would only give the country for immediate mobilisation 7,000 more men than the present Territorial force, so that Britishers would practically be made conscripts for nothing.

Lord Lansdowne's personal opposition was fairly uncompromising. He declined to affirm the failure of the voluntary system, and said that Lord Roberts had assumed three most unlikely conditions of invasion—that the Regular Army had gone abroad, that the Fleet had been decoyed away, and that the Territorial Force was unprepared. Lord Curzon declared for "national service," while two Bishops supported the Bill in debate on the highly Christian ground of the good moral effects of military training. These moral effects have thus been described by a French preacher: "The family in France gives to the Army a young man clean in mind and body. The Army returns that young man to the family steeped to the very lips in debauchery, suffering from disease and degrading vice."

Early on Tuesday morning the Nationalist forces entered Teheran and are now in possession of all the capital, except the Cossack barracks, where Col. Liakhoff is holding out, but is likely soon to surrender. The Nationalists were welcomed by the people of Teheran and many of the Shah's soldiers joined them. Perfect order is being maintained, and there is no danger to Europeans. The Shah is fortifying his summer palace at Sultanatabad, a few miles from Teheran, and he has sent a force to attack the city, but it is too small to do much, and reinforcements are hurrying up to join the Nationalists. The Russian troops are at Kazoin, eighty miles away, and the forward party is urging that they should be sent to Teheran. Sir Edward Grey, though severely cross-questioned, refused to promise to oppose such a measure, which is denounced by the Nationalists, or to guarantee the combatants a fair field.

The political crisis in Germany is over. On Saturday the patchwork of new taxes passed the Reichstag and was approved by the Federal Council. Nearly all the burden falls upon the poorer classes. The Government is pledged to introduce an unearned increment tax by 1911, but it gets £25,000,000 of new revenue and has to be content. The Reichstag, having done its work, was prorogued on Tuesday, and on Wednesday Prince Bülow retired and Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg was appointed Chancellor, and there was a general shuffle of Imperial and Prussian Cabinet offices. Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg is fifty-two years old. He entered the Prussian Civil Service in 1882, in 1905 became Prussian Minister of the Interior, and in 1907 succeeded Count Posadowsky, the ablest and most Liberal of living German statesmen, as Imperial Home Secretary. He is a painstaking, capable official with a good knowledge of social politics, but without much experience or interest in foreign affairs. This may mean that Herr von Schön, who remains Foreign Secretary, will have greater influence, or, perhaps, that foreign affairs may not be so much in the foreground as under Prince Bülow.

Prince Buelow has already explained matters to a Hamburg paper. He would not dissolve after the defeat of the inheritance tax because that would have strengthened the Socialists and produced an "unserviceable" Reichstag, in other words the Opposition parties would have come back stronger. He cannot understand how the Conservatives could have helped to restore the Centre to power, and he still thinks his ridiculous bloc might have proved durable. With regard to the future he has his fears. He doubts whether other men will be able to conquer the Socialists at the elections and whether the Germanising of Poland will continue, seeing that the Poles are the close allies of the Centre. Prince Bülow is apparently quite unrepentant, and has no nervousness as to the wisdom of the disastrous course he steered.

On Thursday Mr. Runciman, in the course of his statement on the Education Bill, withdrew the regulations for the training colleges, as a result of strong and united pressure brought to bear upon him by the Nonconformist Committee in the House of Commons. In doing so the Minister spoke sarcastically of the crowded state of the Liberal benches, adding that a "religious row" was able to smother up every purely educational consideration. The crowded benches were due to Liberal fears of the betrayal of a vital Liberal principle, which has happily been saved. The present Ministry were put in office not to impose religious tests on teachers but to take them off, and certainly not to set up a new State religion. One is quite enough. For the rest Mr. Runciman gave an enlightened account of the progress of education—the great expansion of the free training colleges, the really wonderful development of secondary and technical instruction (the secondary schools are growing at the rate of 10,000 pupils a year), and the extension of medical inspection and care for the health and civic morals of the children. The dark sides to the picture are such blots as the existence of 3,000 insanitary schools and of classes of sixty. Do not let us call ourselves civilised till these black spots are wiped out of the State.

The award by the Argentine President in the frontier dispute between Bolivia and Peru has created a rather serious situation in South America. Senor Alcosta's judgment divides the territory into practically equal parts. It is highly favorable to Peru, and, according to the Bolivians, it cedes to her districts which had always been recognised as belonging to Bolivia. When the award became known, rioting broke out in Bolivia, and attacks were made upon the Argentine Minister and upon Peruvian subjects. The Argentine President has had the dispute under consideration for five years, and the rights and wrongs of the case turn upon the boundary between the Viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres and the Viceroyalty of Lima in 1810, when the district in question was completely unexplored. The Bolivian Government has so far refused to accept the award. This has eased the domestic situation, but still leaves the complications with Peru and the Argentine.

There is practically no doubt now of the identity of M. Harting, the head of the Russian secret police in Paris, with a man named Landesen, who in 1890 was sentenced by the French courts in default to five years' imprisonment for a bomb conspiracy against Alexander III. M. Clemenceau has admitted that the evidence is overwhelming. Landesen was an agent provocateur, and he disappeared after the 1890 affair, to become a Russian general and a high police official and to return to Paris to do his old work on a more handsome scale. This convict had been made a member of the Legion of Honour, he was to have had charge of the Tsar's safety during the visit to Cherbourg, and it is understood that he was to be promoted to be officer of the Legion. The revelation of his real character has caused almost as much sensation as the exposure of Azeff.

Lord Gorell made an impressive statement to the House of Lords on Wednesday on the working of the law of divorce. His case was that the cost, even of undefended cases, practically shut out the poorer classes from the relief readily obtained by the rich. This meant not only widespread and sordid misery, but that the poor sought for separation orders, a great cause of immorality, or contracted bigamous marriages, here or in America. He thought bigamy was often a direct consequence of the practical denial of divorce. Lord Gorell's remedy was, in the main, a limited recourse to the County Courts. The Primate disputed Lord Gorell's conclusions as to the effect of separation orders, but hardly challenged his general case. Lord Halifax, deploring the frequency of divorce in America, told a story of two American children, one of whom said to the other: "We have a new father, and you have our old one." The Lord Chancellor was sympathetic, and promised inquiry.

We are glad to see that Free Trade retains something at least of its hold on the City, though Unionist Free Traders like Lord Avebury and Sir Felix Schuster undo by their attack on the Budget what they effect by their war on Protection. A Manifesto has been issued by a powerful body of bankers and merchants to notify the formation of a City Free Trade Association. The Association is independent of political parties, and we observe that a good many Unionists have already joined the Executive Committee. The Manifesto takes the strong ground of British prosperity under Free Trade, the crippling effect of Protection on our export business and our power of entering neutral markets, its menace to London as the world's financial centre and the clearing-house of a vast body of world-trade, and its harassing of the shipping industry by an elaborate customs service as well as by prohibitive duties on imports. The Manifesto, which recalls the Merchants' Petition in favor of Free Trade in 1820, summons the City to resist the return to the restrictive system which that famous document denounced.

The Turkish Government and Chamber, the Government under pressure from the Chamber, have agreed to drop forthwith the tax on non-Moslems in lieu of military service, and to hurry forward a Bill extending conscription to non-Moslems. The Chamber is getting into the habit of asserting itself, for a few weeks ago it rejected the Government proposal to establish Parliamentary Under-Secretaries—this was specially favored by the Committee of Union and Progress—and last week it refused to deliver over Ismail Kemal Bey, the leader of the "Liberal" Union to the Courts Martial. General von der Goltz has arrived in Constantinople, and will probably be put in charge of the reorganisation of the Turkish Army. There is no doubt whatever that Germany's influence and popularity are paramount in Turkey to-day. The military chiefs favor an alliance. Careless British diplomacy, and the reckless attacks on the Young Turks in the British Press, have greatly qualified the overwhelming authority enjoyed by this country in Turkey in the early days of the Constitution. But it is not too late to change.

The Tsar has been celebrating on the battle-field of Poltava the victory of Peter the Great over Charles XII. which ruined Swedish hegemony in Northern Europe and laid the foundations of Russia's power and influence. The battle of Poltava took place on July 8th, 1709, and the remnant of the force surrendered on July 12th. The Swedes held the Baltic shores from the southern limit of Sweden round by Finland to the Polish frontier. Russia had no access to the Baltic. The Swedish Empire, a menace to Denmark, Prussia, Poland, and Russia, and itself poor and sparsely populated, could exist only so long as its rivals were kept weak. It had no other hope of survival except by incessant war, and every Swedish king, from Gustavus Adolphus, was a soldier and waged incessant war on all his neighbors. Charles XII. followed the traditional and orthodox policy, with diminishing means against ever-increasing odds. The advance into the heart of Russia on Moscow may have been carried out recklessly. But only a blow at the heart of Russia offered the Swedish Empire the chance of a longer lease of life; and the defeat at Poltava merely hastened the collapse of an Empire the length of whose existence is the miracle, not its fall.

We record with deep regret the sudden death of Father Tyrrell, who last week and on many previous weeks contributed to these columns. We cannot do justice in a few words to the gifts and virtues of this gentle, deeply cultured, and truly religious nature. The most fitting tribute to him is perhaps that he labored to continue and extend the work of Newman in liberalising, we had almost said in liberating, modern Catholicism. That he shared Newman's gift of style will be granted by every reader of "A Much-Abused Letter," one of the most brilliant pamphlets in our language, and one of the most admirable examples of English prose. His character and mental attitude are described in a sentence he wrote on the attitude of the Modernist. "Much as he may prize the sacramental bread of life, he prizes still more the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth."

Politics and Affairs.

THE MEANNESS OF THE REACTION.

If public movements are in the long run judged by their moral intention and effect, the verdict on the present reactionary tendencies in English politics is bound, we think, to be severe. Three propositions appear to be gaining more and more strength in the Conservative Party. They are:—

1. That it is desirable to make the bulk of taxation fall on trade and labor, and particularly on the food of the people.

2. That it is desirable, in order to maintain taxation on these lines, and to prevent wealth from contributing its share, to destroy the sole power of taxation by the representatives of the people.

3. That it is desirable to force the people into military service.

A certain number of Conservatives, who accept propositions 2 and 3 faintly and half sincerely, repudiate part of proposition 1; and not all who embrace 1 and 2 are committed to 3. But the Milners and the Maxses—the energetic spirits who form opinions, pack caucuses, and force programmes upon them—are rapidly bringing the party into line on the triple ground of Protection, Conscription, and the overthrow of the Constitution It is true that as these wild men drive their three wild horses abreast, shouting and lashing them on, they overturn a friend or two. They have not yet slain the Budget, but they have certainly killed the agitation for eight "Dreadnoughts." If they have not got Conscription, they have at least brought out Lord Lansdowne as an avowed opponent. They may not yet have stoked up the peers to the pitch of a subversive act, but they have aroused Mr. Balfour to a quiet effort to stop a mad conflict on ground where the Commons would have all the right and all the power, and the Lords all the wrong and none of the power. But still they go on. Mr. Balfour resisted the early stages of Protection, just as Lord Lansdowne opposes the first steps to Conscription. But to-day the Tory mob is all Protectionist, and on Tuesday night the vote of forty Liberal peers alone averted the carrying of the principle of Lord Roberts's Bill. At least it looks as if they would so far succeed with a party, not as a rule overdone with intelligence, as to reproduce the vital error of 1906, and convince a good part of the British electorate that the Conservative Party has broken away from its old moorings, and is committed to a policy of Revolution.

And to what kind of a Revolution? What can be the imagination or the moral sense of politicians who think that they can turn back the clock the best part of a century, and restore, under appropriate modern disguises, the days of the press-gang and the "hungry forties"? Have they asked themselves what would happen if they succeeded, and convinced the mass of our people that there was nothing for it but a fight to the finish with "the classes," a fight in which every institution, not excepting the Throne, would be threatened? And how can they think to conceal the meanness of their own position? What can be the verdict of sensible, reflecting workmen and middle-class folk who witness the unexampled luxury of the age and then hear the shriek of rage that has followed the proposal to tax a trifling proportion of the enormous accumulations that sustain it, drawn, as they are, from every quarter and clime in the globe? These humbler men, out of the sweat of their brows, have already paid millions to the Exchequer in respect of the new taxes, and hardly a murmur has come from their spokesmen. The taxes which will fall upon wealth are of very gradual incidence, and those to which the rich most strongly object are not even deductions from their present possessions, but only represent a small lien on future gains, to which the property-holder himself will have contributed nothing in the shape of personal effort. But even more repellent than the selfishness, the want of public spirit and fine instinct, shown in the reception of the Budget by the classes who largely created the need for which it provides, is the hypocrisy of the plea for its rejection by the Lords. Thus the aim of the "Spectator" is to suggest that, in throwing out the land taxes, a House consisting mainly of great landlords will be doing not the base act of putting their private interests before public objects, but the noble act of preferring a dangerous national duty to the mere instinct of self-preservation. But what is to be said of the attempt of that journal to persuade itself, or the people, or both, that the exclusive control of finance by the House of Commons is a phrase and not a reality, and that three hundred years of close conflict on this matter have simply established the principle that, though the House of Lords cannot impose a single tax, it retains an effective power of directing the general course of taxation by dealing as it likes with a Money Bill embodying a number of taxes? The modern practice is to include a mass of taxes, indeed the whole financial provision for the year, in a single Bill. This, forsooth, was an enlargement of and an encroachment on the earlier custom of putting each tax into a separate Bill. Therefore, argues the "Spectator," the Money Bill really consists of a number of little Bills, any one of which the House of Lords may reject, if it pleases, without incurring the charge of amending a tax and thus exceeding its powers. In other words, if each of Mr. Lloyd George's taxes were presented in a single Bill, the Lords would have to pass every one of them, but as they are all collected, for the convenience of a complicated modern State, in a single measure, the Lords can do what they please!

It is, perhaps, a sufficient answer to such nonsense to say that if this had been the position of the Lords, they would have asserted it throughout the constitutional fight with the Commons, more especially in the controversy of 1860 and 1861, when the rejected paper duties were embodied in the Finance Bill. They advanced no such pretension. They passed the Bill the moment the rejected duties were appended to it. The distinction between single taxes and taxes embodied in a Bill does not and never did exist. The resolutions of 1671, 1678, and 1860 equally cover the two kinds of procedure, and, in the last edition of Sir William Anson's "Law and Custom of the Constitution," now hot from the press, that highly Conservative authority lays it down that the action of 1860 made even "the right of rejection nugatory." "Such legislation" (he says) "is under the entire control of the House of Commons, and a Bill relating to supply, though it needs the concurrence of the Lords, cannot be amended by them on its way to receive the Royal assent." The "Spectator" and its allies may, indeed, wish to deprive the representatives of the people of the sole right to tax them, or to remit or alter the disposition of their burdens. But it is the merest Pecksniffianism to pretend that the right does not exist, and that the Constitution is a quibble and a pretence. If the Tories want to restore the atmosphere of the Six Acts, to oppress the people by Protection, or to enslave them by Conscription, let them say so fair and square. Let them not insist that the new Protection is different from the old, hint that the laws of England yield no real protection to its people, say that they desire to force hundreds of thousands of lads of eighteen into the barracks in order to improve their morals and physique, affect to tax the foreigner when their real aim is to avoid being taxed themselves, or make-believe to arrest an invasion of these shores by Germany when they are thinking of a conscript army for service on German soil.

Take especially the case of conscription. We pass by the scandalous looseness of thought by which men like Lord Roberts and Lord Milner compare this country with nations which are not insular and do not keep up a regular voluntary army for service abroad or in tropical climes, and, while maintaining in full the country's obligations to support the Navy and the regular Army, propose to bleed the latter of a good part of its scanty supply of officers. But look at the callousness of their proposition. They are willing at once to place an immediate extra charge on the people—not on themselves and on their class—of four millions, or, as the War Office more accurately estimates, of eight millions. But they do not condescend even to reckon the cost to the manual workers and middle classes implied in dragging from the plough and the workshop and the office hundreds of thousands of youths who are coming into their full earning power, in the months when the labor market is at high tide. These boys may be destined to fall on a French or a German plain, or even in an Indian pass, for all that these gentlemen, who defend conscription by references to the Continental policy of Pitt and its consequences, care to inform us. So in body and limb, in meal and malt, the people are to pay, while a journalistic sophist is at hand to assure them that their liberties and safeguards exist only in their imagination.

It is in this power of deceiving the easily deceived, this trick of calling things by their wrong names, and falsifying the always complicated workings of class selfishness, that the danger of democracy lies. The reaction realises that if the people lose their rights, or their capacity of effective advance in civilisation, it must be not by the old machinery of naked force, but by an act, or a succession of acts, of self-surrender. Thus all kinds of spurious agents are sent out to commend Protection as a kind of patriotism in trade, and Conscription as a moral and physical training ground for a town-bred population. Newspaper and platform flattery is freely used to persuade masses of hard-worked people, unaccustomed to quiet thinking, to part with their personal freedom, or with the great boon of cheap food. No clear view of the ends to be attained is given; all this Duessa's appeal is wrapt up in delusive invocations of shadowy but malign forces, among which national pride and race hatred are conspicuous. It will, we think, be defeated, not merely by a defence of Liberal policy, but by a clear and powerful examination of its alternatives, and an unspairing attack upon the insincerity and the moral recklessness of their advocates.

NO SURRENDER ON THE BUDGET.

Mr. Lloyd George succeeded in getting the fifth clause of the Finance Bill through Committee on Thursday morning. It is the fourth week of Committee. The Bill has seventy-four pages and the House is still occupied with page 5. Captain Pretyman talks of keeping up the game till Christmas, but a simple proportion sum shows that this is only too moderate. If the Bill is to be through by Christmas, there must be an immense increase on the present rate of progress. Nor has the time already spent been unfruitful to the landlord interest. Day by day concessions are obtained. Now it is the exemption of the first ten per cent. of increment from taxation, now an exception in favor of small freeholds, now the sweeping exemption of all agricultural values whatever. For a ruined class the landlords are doing pretty well. With bankruptcy staring them in the face, they bear up politically, and it cannot be said that the star of their influence pales. Not that we complain overmuch of the concessions. We do not want to press hardly on the small man: the ten per cent. exemption will help the bonâ-fide builder who looks to some rise in values to reimburse him for the time between the purchase of land and its development during which his capital must lie idle; the case of agriculture, we have admitted, presents hardships, and though total exemption is in principle indefensible, we do not object to letting the question stand over for the time. As long as the two main principles of the Bill stand, we shall not greatly quarrel with concessions on secondary matters. These two principles are the taxation of unearned increment and the requirement of universal valuation. They are, as we have shown, complementary principles, together necessary to the setting of our land system and our fiscal system on a sound economic basis. The increment tax standing alone the landowners might accept. It is valuation as checked by the development tax which they fight and will fight without compromise. To value the land is to divulge the secret of the social system. It is to hold up to the general gaze the basis of a great part of wealth, to expose the venomous ulcer which saps urban life, to indicate the true source of municipal taxation and measure its copiousness, to bar the profitable transactions of landowners with public bodies. Let us be quite clear that no concession will avail for the speedier passing of the Budget as long as we retain valuation for the double purpose of the development duty and the increment tax. Let us also be quite clear that on our side there can be no tampering with these principles. They are the heart of the Bill; they contain the promise of a new departure in social legislation; they are the fulfilment of a pledge to the municipalities; they have put a wholly new spirit into the supporters of the Government, and have enlisted in its aid the enthusiasm of social reformers which under a series of disappointments had waxed cold. Any failure here, any weakness, is out of the question.

The position, then, is that we can make no concession in essentials, and that nothing but a surrender in essentials will shorten the course of the debate or affect the figures of that simple but alarming proportion sum with which we set out. It becomes clear, accordingly, that the Government may soon be brought face to face with the question of the systematic planning out of the Committee stage. We share the general dislike of any interference with the normal freedom of discussion. But, as Mr. Winston Churchill has pointed out, the truth is that obstruction has become such a fine art, and in more or less subtle form is so completely accepted as the order of the day, that a deliberative assembly has either to reckon with it or to reduce itself to impotence. The laying out of a regular time plan by a Committee appointed for the purpose is the method by which Mr. Churchill would meet the difficulty. We have no such Committee at present, but it would be a perfectly fair proposal for the Government to invite the leaders of the Opposition on this occasion to form such a Committee for the specific purpose of planning the discussion of the Budget in such a way as to give adequate time to those parts which the Opposition desire to discuss most fully, while securing its passage through the House in due season. It is a complicated measure. But no one can seriously pretend that it needs more than, say, four months of continued debate. There is a limit to the utility of words, though not to their flow.

It is possible, we admit, that the Opposition leaders would refuse any such invitation. They calculate on the unpopularity of the guillotine, and look to suck some small advantage out of its use. The hotheads among them are for forcing recourse to it, under the impression that it will give some color to the revolutionary proceedings to which they are hoping to stimulate the House of Lords. They may, we fear, have been encouraged by the timorous and singularly inept counsel which we see is being given in some quarters to Mr. Asquith. The Prime Minister is being advised to meet a constitutional revolution, assumed to have been engineered by Mr. Balfour, by the master stroke of resigning office and placing Mr. Balfour in power. If this were all that the revolutionists had to fear, there would indeed be no holding them back. Let us face the issue plainly. The Lords may try to amend the Bill. If they do the Speaker will merely rule the amendments out of order. They may talk of throwing it out, but they will not do so, for two reasons. The first is that by doing so they plunge the whole finance of the country into chaos; the second is that they initiate a constitutional struggle which could only end by their own destruction. But if we are mistaken, if neither of these reasons avail, and they do reject the Bill as a whole, we may be perfectly certain that Mr. Asquith will not accept the advice that he should run away. He will remain at his post till the Budget becomes law, and for that purpose he will use the well-known constitutional means by which in the last resort the will of the Commons can be made to prevail. For he will have been faced by an attempt at revolution, and in that emergency he will make use of the method of meeting such emergencies which the Constitution provides, and which has the sanction of historic precedent. Nor will he be hampered, in the opinion of the country, by the fact that to carry the Budget he has been compelled to use the closure. The country cares only too little for such considerations. We could wish it cared more. But if it did bethink itself as much of the conditions of liberty as the strictest democrat could desire, it would conclude that in discussion, as in all other matters, liberty and order are two sides of the same shield. Where there is no proportion spontaneously observed, no sincere desire to get at essentials, and so use the opportunities of discussion as to forward business, then there must be rules and regulations by which the business of government may be reconciled with the right of discussion. For this right, precious as it is, is not the right to make government impossible, it is the right to serious criticism, which has as its correlative the right and the duty of coming to a decision in due season. If this cannot be effected by goodwill and general consent, it must be made possible by mechanical devices, and we fear that for the Budget the day of these devices may not be far distant.

SOME "EXPERTS" ON LAND TAXES.

For simple sorts of misrepresentation one may turn to any amateur partisan, but a finely reticulated fallacy requires an expert. Bearing this in mind, we turned to that memorandum of the Surveyors' Association, which the "Times" described as containing "expert opinion of the Land Taxes," with a confidence which was not belied by the contents of that argumentative document. It will save trouble if we quote the opening sentences of this "expert" opinion upon the increment duty:—

> "The imposition of this duty will seriously affect the value of land of every description, agricultural and otherwise, throughout the country, as investors will naturally prefer to place their capital in securities where they will not run the risk of losing one-fifth of any increased value. The increment value in the majority of cases merely represents deferred interest on the original purchase money, and a duty on that value will tend to retard rather than assist development, for which, even on estates of moderate size, considerable capital is required in the formation of roads and erection of houses. This capital the greater number of owners and builders do not possses, and they obtain it > by means of mortgages which the imposition of a duty will make it increasingly difficult to secure. The present depression in the building trade is consequently certain to be aggravated, and unemployment increased."

For mingled mis-statement of fact and false inference, it would be difficult to find a parallel to this, even in the House of Commons itself in the small hours of the morning, when loose thinking most prevails. Let us take the utterance sentence by sentence. We are told that every sort of land, agricultural and other, will suffer loss of value, as a result of increment duty. Now most of the signatories must have followed the course of the Finance Bill sufficiently closely to know that no appreciable quantity of agricultural land would have paid any increment duty even under the original draft of the Finance Bill. The provision for basing original site value upon the highest level in the twenty years preceding 1909, and the allowance of ten per cent. were ample security for this, even in the case of large holdings. The exemption of all purely agricultural land announced last Tuesday only confirms a concession which was clearly conveyed to all who chose to see it. Investments in agricultural land will not be injuriously affected by this or other provisions of the Budget, nay, rather they will be encouraged, if Mr. George is enabled to bring to consummation those portions of his developmental policy which make for the revival of agriculture.

The next statement, to the effect that most increment is simply deferred interest, is a bold assertion, unwarranted by experience; moreover, any ordinary cost of holding ripening land is amply covered by the allowance made in Committee. So far as building land is concerned, the tax will certainly operate towards a reduction in value; but by what process of reasoning the surveyors persuade themselves that this will retard development, it is hard to imagine. Sites are a raw material for the builder, this raw material is going to be reduced in price by the increment duty, while the development duty will increase the effective supply of it at this reduced price. The builder therefore gets his raw material cheaper than before, and will be, pro tanto, encouraged to build. "Oh, but," say our surveyors, "so far as he depends upon outside sources for his capital, he will find himself in difficulty: persons with money to advance on mortgage will refuse to do so as freely as before." Now there is no warrant for any such assumption. Sites will be cheaper, and less money will be required by builders who buy land to put houses on it. "Unearned increment" is not a necessary inducement to bring the required capital into any other trade, and mortgages which are simply debenture capital will still be raised by the building trade on ordinary terms. Stability of present value, not prospect of future increment, is the determinant in securing money upon mortgages, and there is no reason to suppose that builders or any other persons wishing to improve land, or to put up suitable houses on it, will fail to get financial accommodation, or will have to pay a higher rate for it than before. If this is so, the tears which our surveyors shed over the building trade are shed in vain. The depression will not be aggravated or unemployment increased.

Perhaps the most audacious sentence has reference to the serious injury which the surveyors insist the duty on undeveloped land will inflict on building development: "If the imposition of a duty has the effect of forcing land not ripe for development into the market for building purposes, disaster will follow, as experience has shown." What disaster? What experience? How will this forcing policy enable the builders to raise the necessary money for the premature development which is predicted, money obtained "by means of mortgages which the imposition of a duty will make it increasingly difficult to secure"? To what experience can the surveyors be appealing? The over-building in the 'nineties was certainly not attributable to any forcing policy, but was merely a miscalculation of the sort to which every speculative trade is liable.

We have dwelt with some particularity upon this document because it well illustrates the abuse of pseudo-expert authority. In point of fact the sort of expertism which belongs to land surveyors and estate agents, admirable for its purpose, is no qualification for pronouncing on the delicate issues of incidence of taxes and their reactions upon industry.

As it is the policy of the opponents of the Budget to alarm separately each "interest" connected with the land, by insisting that the entire burden of the "confiscatory measure" falls upon its shoulders, we cannot affect surprise that Mr. Eve, addressing a Farmers' Club, should dilate upon the injury to farmers which issues from the impoverishment of the landowners. He put before his audience what seemed to him a fatal dilemma. Owners would either have to economise upon the maintenance of their estates, in which case the tenant farmers' interests must suffer, or else they must recoup themselves for their actual expenditure in higher rent. It did not occur to him that there was a third possibility, viz., that owners should pay the tax out of their own pockets, neither reducing the outlay on their estate which they think necessary for its upkeep or improvement (capital outlay which the Budget does not touch), nor raising a rent which in most instances is already fixed at the highest sum the farmer can afford to pay. There will, no doubt, be cases where landlords who have not exacted the full economic rent from farmers in the past may be disposed to raise the rent in order to meet the increased charges for income tax and death duties. But there exists no normal ability in owners to "take it out" in raising rent, as so many farmers are persuaded to believe. In point of fact the Budget in its general effect will be beneficial, not injurious, to farmers and other workers on the soil, helping to break up the local monopolies of land, stimulating owners to put their estates to their most advantageous use, and giving small holders improved facilities for acquiring land upon reasonable terms of price and tenure. Now that properties of less than £500 in value are to be entirely exempted from the operation of the new taxes, the endeavor of the great land monopolists to shelter themselves behind the grievances of the small holder must collapse. Henceforth his opposition to the Budget must appear for what it is, naked self-interest striving to evade contributing its fair share to the upkeep of the nation.

THE OBLIGATIONS OF ALLIANCE.

Two capital events during the past week have drawn attention to the restricted uses of the quasi-alliances in which we are involved, and the very limited obligations which they impose upon our partners. The leaders of all the more important Protestant Churches, with the two Archbishops at their head, have issued a remarkable manifesto, which is an indirect remonstrance with Sir Edward Grey on his inaction in the Congo question. A Russian army, about 2,000 strong, in addition to the 4,600 men who are already in Northern Persia, is occupying the road to Teheran. No two happenings could have a slighter apparent connection. Yet both of them illustrate the peculiar working of the two connections to which we are committed. The most plausible explanation of Sir Edward Grey's reluctance to take any strong action in the Congo question is that which Mr. Morel suggests—that he is restrained by the knowledge that any reforming policy in the Congo basin would be resented by the French financial groups allied to King Leopold and his satellites. Over the action of Russia in Northern Persia, on the other hand, our diplomacy appears to have no control, and only the slenderest influence. We are bound to suppose that any prolonged or permanent military occupation of Northern Persia by Russia, any support given to the Shah's Government, which Sir Edward Grey has described as "the worst in the world," any blow to the integrity and independence of Persia, which he has guaranteed, and any weakening of the buffer State which stands between India and the Russian Empire, would in some measure be displeasing to our Foreign Office. Yet to all these results this Russian encroachment visibly tends. In the instance of the Congo one of our quasi-allies hinders us from doing what it is at once our interest, our inclination, and our duty to do. In the instance of Persia the other quasi-ally is permitted to embark on an adventure which is a violation of international right, an offence against the spirit of the Convention, and a menace to our own interests. One might suppose that France and Russia had already placed us under some overwhelming obligation, since their wishes command in our councils a deference so absolute. The history of the connection tells a very different tale. France has acquired exclusive rights in Morocco with our aid, and twice we have been called upon to declare our readiness to support her pretensions by arms. Russia has acquired exclusive rights over the greater part of Persia, including nearly all its towns and the only regions which are populous and fertile. It might be suggested that we have to pay dear for the eventual aid of these Powers against Germany. Yet each of them is inferior, both on land and at sea, to Germany, and each of them has an exposed frontier to protect. We, on the other hand, are absolutely safe while we retain our supremacy at sea, and that depends on our own efforts and sacrifices. The inference would seem to be that we have less to gain from the Triple Entente than either of our partners, less to lose by its dissolution, and no considerable debt to pay off for past services rendered. It is only by supposing an utter absence of strategy and adroitness at the Foreign Office that we can explain its failure to bend the Triple Entente to the service of our own purposes.

It would be a mistake to suppose, as some of his critics do, that Sir Edward Grey is indifferent to the fate of Persia. Judging by his action in the Turkish question, we are quite sure that as between the Persian people and their unspeakable Shah, his sympathies are much more with the Persians than the Shah. He has pledged himself, against the judgment of able and competent observers, to the loyalty and good faith of the Russian Government; he cannot wish to be proved in the wrong. He is certainly concerned for the security of India. He cannot wish to annoy and alienate the Turks, who are alarmed by the Russian advance. From his answers to questions, it would seem that his responsibility for the present Russian march towards Teheran was slight. He was "informed" of it, but denies that he was "consulted." He defends it somewhat tepidly, and at the same time gives us to understand that he could not have prevented it. His action in Persia, he tells us, is confined to a defence of British interests. To any suggestion that he might have controlled the march of events, he replies that "Northern Persia is not British territory." In these few sentences there is implied a novel and startling reading of the Anglo-Russian Convention. We had been told that the two Powers were co-operating to maintain the integrity and independence of Persia, and incidentally to support the Persian Constitution. But co-operation is impossible, if we are not "consulted" over a measure so fateful as the despatch of a Russian army towards the Persian capital. Moreover, if Sir Edward Grey's only locus standi in Northern Persia is to defend British interests, what becomes of our solemn undertakings to maintain Persian independence? By no stretch of reasoning can it be said that the marching of large bodies of troops over Persian territory is not a menace to Persian independence. The pretext for this last incursion is hardly worth considering. There was never any ground to suppose that the Nationalists would endanger European life and property on their entry into Teheran. Their record elsewhere has been good; their leaders are relatively well-educated and civilised men, and so far from representing a "Boxer" element, they are fighting to impose European ideas of government on their Shah. They have been accused of uttering "threats." The only threat they uttered was that if Russian officers led the Royalist troops into battle against them (as they have done) they could not undertake to guarantee the safety of these officers. That is the only shadow of a pretext there is for this invasion. For the moment its worst consequences have been forestalled. The Nationalists have taken Teheran. If the Russian army continues its advance, it will be to restore the shaken power of the Shah. An intervention at Constantinople to protect Abdul Hamid against the victorious Macedonian army would not have been a more naked and flagitious intervention. But even if the Russian reaction lacks the nerve to carry out this final act of meddling, the fact remains that the main condition governing the negotiations between the Nationalists and the Shah for the restoration of the Constitution will be the presence within striking distance of the capital of a Russian army. Unless the Persians are free, if need be, to depose their Shah, and to dismiss his Russian mercenaries, their hands are tied in all their efforts to obtain solid guarantees for their future liberties.

The inability of our Foreign Office to secure any degree of support from France for its reforming policy in the Congo basin is indeed only one chapter in the curious history of the entente. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman could secure no support at the Hague for his disarmament proposals. Neither Lord Lansdowne nor Sir Edward Grey ever obtained any effectual or ungrudging support in their Macedonian policy. But in the case of the Congo, it is not merely indifference which has to be faced. King Leopold's international group of capitalists, almost as powerful in France as it is in Belgium, controls the whole Congo basin, and its influence at the French Foreign and Colonial Offices is quite strong enough to range official France on the Belgian side in this dispute. The very same Colonial group which has profited by our support for a forward French policy in Morocco, is pulling the strings to defeat British policy in the Congo. Our diplomacy does not seem to have grasped the meaning of the Bismarckian "Do ut des." It yields in one question an ungrudging, to our thinking an excessive, support to French Colonial policy; it cannot, in another question which concerns us, secure from France any sort of quid pro quo. The only hope for the Congo is, in our view, an International Conference; but it would be futile to enter into a conference unless we know how to secure the support of the various Powers, including France, Russia, and Italy, which in one way or another we have obliged. Sir Edward Grey's inaction in this question will not shake his personal ascendency over the House of Commons. But in the country, the sense that his policy has failed to execute the national will, and has failed to check the ruthless exploitation of the natives of the Congo, will move men who care nothing for the dubious successes of high politics typified by the visits to Reval and Cowes.

There are two underlying causes of the failure of the Foreign Office to derive the full advantage from our quasi-alliances. It has allowed itself to become obsessed by its suspicions of Germany. That single struggle for predominance so fills the field of its vision that it cannot see in their due perspective the importance of maintaining the independence of Persia or destroying the slave system of the Congo. To the one end of having allies at need against Germany, it is prepared to offer almost any sacrifice. The other explanation is, we think, simply a deficiency of technical diplomatic skill. Sir Edward Grey presents rather sharp and crude alternatives to his critics, friendly as they mostly are. If they ask him to use his influence to check the wrongdoing of King Leopold, he replies by brandishing some alarming phantom of war, or even by conjuring up the picture of a universal conflagration. If they demand that the wishes or scruples of this country shall count for something in Persia, he retorts that Persia is not British territory. His world is all either black or white. He seems to recognise no nuance between uncritical acquiescence and a challenge of war. It is as though one could say "No" only by delivering an ultimatum. One might suppose that we had no way of making our pressure felt upon a disloyal ally short of bombarding its capital, and that the modern devices, economic and financial, as well as diplomatic, which are the ordinary vehicles of French and German diplomacy, were a sealed book. This habit of speaking in crude and simple alternatives is something more than a manner of debating. It reveals the simplicity—in many ways the fine and honorable simplicity—of Sir Edward Grey's mind. But modern diplomacy demands a specially subtle equipment, and, above all, it requires the adroitness, the boldness, and the fineness of imagination which alone can control a difficult ally or extract from a partnership its full possibilities.

THE PERIL IN INDIA.

Many readers of the "Times" must have been struck, with Sir William Wedderburn, by the article in which its special correspondent recently summed up his impressions of the situation in India. It is not a cheerful summary; for it seems to accept as a final conclusion a permanent alienation between the people of India and its governors, deriving, not, indeed, from the badness of our rule, but from its foreign character. Now we do not quite see how Mr. Lovat Fraser reconciles this view with his belief, not too broadly and confidently expressed, that the British raj in India will endure. He thinks that the movement of nationality, of unrest, of political consciousness—what you will—is not so much Indian as Asiatic, that the tide of European conquest in the East has begun to ebb. How then does he propose to find a continuing foothold for a Government which, in effect, must remain a garrison, in which all the posts of trust are held by the officers and dependants of a tiny occupying army, surrounded by a "sea of dark men, incurably hostile," and it is clear, increasingly conscious of growing moral and material force? Without dogmatising, it seems to us that such a relationship must break down from two causes. The first is that such a rule will not stand the visible strain it imposes upon British democracy. The second is that this country will not be able to maintain an adequate supply of officials fitted in intellect and character to cope with a situation in which hundreds of millions of men, belonging to races as able as ourselves, and in some directions, such as philosophy, law, and perhaps, journalism, abler, are in determined opposition. The presumption of a permanently hostile India is, in our view, that of a lost India. We may make all the hopeful or the minimising deductions we like about the political tendencies of native India—we may allow so much discount in respect of the caste system, the divisions of races and creeds, and the difficulty of forming even a conception of what India would be apart from British rule. Still, we have to face the fact that the conception of unity, not entirely a new one in India, has taken hold of vast masses of the people, and, above all, that this conception, with the political institutions which it suggests, is continually being carried forward and made real by the influence of Western thought—by no one more conspicuously than by the present Secretary of State. The demand for self-government may not have attained a practical shape, and the Colonial model, to which Indian reformers naturally look, may be inapplicable. But the proclamations of 1858 and 1908, and the act of government of which they were the symbol, fairly opened up the general prospect of Indian Home Rule, a prospect which the Viceroyalty not only of the lamented Lord Ripon, but of Lord Dufferin and Lord Lansdowne, has brought somewhat nearer. We cannot undo the promises of fifty years ago, solemnly renewed, as they were, last year. We cannot go back in India, and we cannot stand still.

All the more important, therefore, does it seem to us to be that we should not, as the consequences of a mixed movement of fair political aspiration and wild or even violent tendencies, commit ourselves to a line of action that Liberal Ministers cannot well defend in a British Parliament. Take the case of deportations. We need not deny Lord Morley's doctrine of emergency, in order to see, as we have no doubt Lord Morley sees, the perils of a kind of repression which, while it violates all forms of English law, mixes politicians and "village ruffians," popular agitators and bomb-throwers, which removes from the governing authority most of the inducements to care and caution, and places terrible power in the hands of a police admittedly inefficient and of low morale. It is now clear that under this instrument a mistake was made in the case of Mr. Lajpat Rai. Lord Morley was informed that he had been guilty of the grave offence, an offence enough to make any Indian statesman nervous, of interfering with the loyalty of the Indian troops. Well, the statement of the Indian authorities proves to be unfounded. An Anglo-Indian newspaper, naturally thinking itself covered by the act of the Government, repeated the same charge. Mr. Lajpat Rai brought an action for libel, proved his case, and obtained damages for £1,000 from the offending paper. If such an error was made in the case of Mr. Lajpat Rai, is it not possible that wrong treatment was also meted out to men so high in personal character, and so closely identified with social and religious movements, as Aswini Kumar Dutt and Krishna Kumar Mitra? Doubtless, if it be argued that the political movement in India can best be fought by imprisoning and banishing its moral leaders without trial, there is an end to the controversy. But we are convinced that Lord Morley does not take this line, and that, as far as he can carry Anglo-Indian opinion with him, he is anxious to discover a way of common action and mutual tolerance between governing England and political India. It seems to us vital that some such accommodation should be found. Failing it, we have to face again the proposition of Mr. Lovat Fraser, that India must go on being governed by force through a handful of tired men, tied to official machines, who though just, do not come of a sympathetic race; do not for the most part mix socially with Indians; do not understand or always try to understand them; do not like them; treat as inferiors races less strong in character, but certainly not inferior in subtlety and apprehensiveness of intellect; and are more nervous of admitting them to a share of power than were the Mahommedan conquerors of admitting Hindus to their civil services. In such a rule no English Liberal, least of all Lord Morley, could take pride. And no observer of the history of States could believe that it would last.

Life and Letters.

DRAWN BATTLES.

We hear a great deal—and, for that matter, talk a great deal—about life's signal victories and its signal defeats. But, as a matter of fact, the critical experiences of life turn out, in the majority of cases, to be in the end drawn battles, neither more nor less. After the hour of exceptional stress is past, we stand, so far as character, morale, richness of soul, endowment of personality, are concerned, precisely where we were: the foe has just been kept at bay, but we have not captured any trophies from him, nor enriched ourselves with any of his spoil—still less led him home as a chained captive in our train. Our special experiences of failure, grief, temptation—all the challenges and assaults launched by adverse powers against the inner citadel—leave us, at the best, just what we were. And because this is so in the case of each particular critical experience, it comes to be so with life in its total result; and all we accomplish in the end is the avoidance of disastrous ills. Indeed, the strangest thing is that we are content with this: it is really all that we aim at or hope for. So proud are we when we compass it that we lift up over our drawn battles songs as loud as those that would suffice to hail an empire won. Our ideal is that certain catastrophes shall not happen. We aim merely at warding off misfortune, at keeping up barriers against the grosser wrongs, at saving ourselves from suffering any wounds under the thrusts of anxiety and pain. Achievement is simply negative. We entrench ourselves, but have in us no spirit of counter-attack.

Probably this mood prevails within a good many through pushing too far, or through taking as exhaustive, the conception of life as a test under which we are passed by the ultimate powers with a view of finding out, not so much what we can do, as what we can bear. We are here—so runs the underlying feeling—to prove whether, and how much, we can endure. The metaphor of gold tried in the fire is, perhaps, as frequently as any other upon our lips to indicate the method in which we conceive the significance of life; and our too exclusive use of it shows the too narrow limit of our thought. A test—but a test applied to something to see whether it be up to standard and properly made. One after another, the crises of experience come upon us to see, not what we can do with them, but what they can do with us. That is the idea. Is our breaking-point sufficiently high up on the scale? When, in the piling of burden after burden upon us, do we come to the last ounce it is possible for us to bear? It is on these lines that we conceive the supreme question to run; and the ultimate powers (so we picture it) are waiting to see what reply we give. The whole thing comes to be a matter of test upon test, and of saying, as after each test we breathe again, "One more test, at least, is safely passed." The element of truth in the conception is, of course, obvious enough; but exhaustive the conception is not. And it is easy to see that he who holds it as exhaustive will be driven, actually in proportion to his sense of moral values as he understands them, to be content with merely drawing his fiercest fights. It is on not being beaten (in terms of our original metaphor) that all his passionate ardor is set; and it is, consequently, on not being beaten that he will congratulate himself with bounding joy. It should be added, also, that together with an undue insistence upon life as a test in the narrow sense there usually goes an exaggerated reckoning of the test's severity—which again induces us to think that in merely surviving the test we have done all that could be asked. Really, we estimate, the more probable thing was that the test would prove too exacting and that we should fail! Oddly enough, it is the religious man (who, on his own theory, has the least excuse for such pessimism) who is in this respect guiltiest of all.

It might be well were we now and again to ask ourselves how we reconcile this acceptance of a merely negative ideal for the inner life with that faith in progress, and that desire for it, which are among the most prominent characteristics of our time. For it is a legitimate inquiry—how, except through positive moral gains acquired by each individual life, by a positive improvement in the moral position and condition of each personality, is progress to be achieved? There is fundamental inconsistency in declaring that life as a whole—the life of humanity in the mass—goes on, and must go on, from strength to strength, greatens, and must greaten, with the process of the suns, and at the same time holding it for the utmost triumph of the individual just to maintain the position and condition from which he begins; for life as a whole, after all, can only be what lives in detail, lives as separate units, make it. Where is evolution to come from, if we ourselves stand still? How is humanity to conquer, if we ourselves have only a drawn battle to sing pæans over at the end of the day? We must have a larger intention than the intention of mere defence, if we are to count as factors in bringing about the final victory—if, indeed, the final victory is ever to come. Undeniably, the life of drawn battles is wasted so far as any contribution to progress is concerned. Only as personality in us enriches itself from the critical experiences we go through can the general life grow in any wise the richer through us: only as we do more than simply make the enemy recoil from our defences—as we push him from his own ground and rob him of his arms—do we help to make the strategic position of the race better than it was, and hasten the proclamation of peace. The acceptance of the "drawn battle" ideal by men in general would bring things to a stand-still.

What blinds us to our inconsistency—and, incidentally, confirms us in our contentment with the purely defensive pose—may be this. We get into the way of thinking of evolution as a sort of self-acting process which carries itself through to its goal without any push or pull of ours. It would not be far from the truth to say that we have exalted the idea of progress till progress has become for us a living and working God. The word indicates, for our thought, much more than the direction in which things move if man lives worthily: it actually indicates the force that makes things move. A mistaken idea, of course, as one sees at once when one thus distils it from its customary vagueness into definite speech—but an idea that possesses us, none the less. Evolution goes on its way. In our power of hindering it we certainly believe: for us to be defeated in any one of life's supreme hours is to fling an obstacle across its path; but, so long as we save ourselves from that shame, evolution works its will. A too strong—or rather, a too blind—faith in evolution is, in fact, misleading not a few in these days, and bringing about to some extent the retarding of that very evolution on which it is set.

And it is in realising the fallacy of this that we enter the road which leads to deliverance from the simply defensive moral ideal. To keep our faith in progress is well; but we have to understand that progress does not automatically engineer itself. It follows from this that progress in the whole can only come through progress in the individual. The real test of life, therefore (so we take a further step along the road), is how far we improve our own personality's moral condition from all the experiences we go through—to what extent, after each crisis, we are positively the greater and the better for having faced it. And to say this is really to substitute a fuller conception of life (with which step of thought we reach the journey's end) for the conception of life as test. From this point of view, life is a test, indeed, but it is more. It is at any rate more than a test of what we can bear. We transfer to the world within us the conception which, as we have seen, applies to the larger world without. In that larger world there is an evolution, but an evolution that must be helped on. So in the world within, the world of personality, there is an evolution that must be helped on. Life is a matter, not of mere endurance, of going through the fire and coming out unscathed, but of making or assisting a development by means of inspirations and forces and nourishments gathered in from every side. Life, in the individual as in the whole, is an organism which is to grow, and which must be fed in order to grow, rather than a piece of metal which is to be assayed. Its business is to work up into itself, for its own greatening, whatever is brought to it by its several parts—brought to it, that is, by the successive experiences whereof it is composed. There must be a positive service of the whole by the part, and a positive using of the part by the whole, as much in the smaller as in the larger sphere. Which means, in sum, that every crisis is to mark as it were the birthday of something new for personality—that we are to wrestle with every visiting experience, refusing to let it go until it has told us its secret name and blessed us—that out of all the happenings, out of all the whirling circumstances and out of all the chance and change, we are to make ourselves morally greater than we were.

JOHN SYNGE'S ART.

In another hundred years from now this year of centenaries will be celebrated for its own events. People will be saying, "It is a hundred years to-day since Swinburne died, that exquisite lyric poet whose verses still sing themselves in every heart; a hundred years since Meredith died, that far-seeing writer who left us so fine a picture of nineteenth century life, and whose wide popularity among our forefathers is such a proof of their intellectual vigor. Ah, but those were the days of Shaw and Galsworthy and Wells! Hardy was still writing! What a galaxy of genius people lived in then! How glorious it must have been to be young in those great times of change!" So our great-grandchildren will talk, like babes to whom things are revealed now hidden from our prudence.

And perhaps among them all will be some close lover of literature who will add: "Yes, and that year, too, a hundred years ago, saw the death of a young poet named John Synge, who lived only to the age so often fatal to genius, and left behind him only a few short plays, a prose book on some desolate island off the Irish coast—at that time still subject to England—and this slim volume of verses, now very rare, which I bought for twopence on a second-hand bookstall in Park Lane." Thereon he will produce a little grey book with canvas back, under fifty pages in all, but bearing on its title page the valued mark of the "Cuala Press, Dundrum," as he will carefully point out, and containing a preface by William Yeats, with some account of the author's personality and genius.

"In a certain sense," he will go on, "the poet appears to have belonged to what we call the Irish Renaissance—that remarkable revival of the Irish literary spirit, Irish art, manufacture, and, above all, language, which is but one example of the general revival of nationalities and the emancipation of subject races during the twentieth century. In literature the historians generally connect the movement with the names of Douglas Hyde and William Yeats, but there were many more—Lady Gregory, A. E., Padraic Colum, and others besides—usually at open variance, but all converging towards the one great object. The peculiarity of John Synge appears to have been a desire to revolt, to break away from the prevailing mood of his fellows and introduce a new and a stronger note into the national literature. One observes, I think, the same desire in Colum and in the later work of Yeats, who, in fact, almost became a leader of revolt against himself.

But to Synge the rebellion was more native, more essentially a part of his nature. It would take a course of lectures at the Workpeople's University to explain exactly what the æsthetic intention and influence of the rebellion were, but one may see something of its meaning from this little poem, written after looking at a picture by A.E., whose real name I have discovered was George Russell—a man equally well-known in Ireland for his organisation of co-operative agriculture, his visionary and symbolic pictures, and his poems. The verses are called 'The Passing of the Shee'; listen:—

'Adieu, sweet Angus, Maeve, and Fand,
Ye plumed yet skinny Shee,
That poets played with hand in hand
To learn their ecstasy.

'We'll stretch in Red Dan Sully's ditch,
And drink in Tubber fair,
The badger and the hare."'

"Now," the critic of next century will continue, "the note of rebellion is plainly heard in those lines. They mark a parting of the ways, a rejection of the legendary or visionary themes that had hitherto occupied the poets of the Irish renaissance. We may call them a wilful return to common, or even brutish life. The deliberate choice of such low pleasures as lying in ditches, drinking at fairs, and poaching proves it. The extreme poverty of the imagined speaker is also established by his desire to poach a badger, which was used as an article of diet only among the very poor even a century ago. Nor can I find that the badger was strictly regarded as game even by the English landlords, though they were ready to preserve anything on their estates, excepting human life."

In Synge there was indeed that persistent note of revolt. Perhaps he felt that imagination among his band of compatriots was becoming a little thin, a little too misty and impalpable in its symbolism. Was it that sweet Angus, Maeve, and Fand were growing too sweet, a little wearisome even, in their regretful tenderness? Was the great national movement to be overwhelmed in melancholy dreaming as soft and stifling as a bog-slide? The artist will grasp at any weapon, any violence, any poison, to avert the deadly blight of prettiness. We see how painters now turn to scaffolding, iron bridges, factory chimneys, or flat wastes of mud in their loathing for the picture-postcard, and sugared verses and tales have no more to do with art than picture-postcards have. But it was not exactly prettiness that John Synge feared. It was rather a certain aloofness from the sharp reality of to-day, a habit of retiring for consolation into the lovely and cloud-swept regions of Irish myth, much as some fifty years ago English poets and artists retired into the enchanted Middle Ages of forests, bowers, and the holy bell. It is a fine thing to be borne into a far-off world by a whirlwind, with chariot of fire and horses of fire, but it is something also to remain on earth and purify springs, fill Edom with water, multiply the widow's oil, look after the Shunamite's son, and relieve the famine in Samaria.

Synge's part was to precipitate, as it were, the floating and rather formless elements around him. He brought to his country's literature "the astringent joy and hardness that was in all he did," as Mr. Yeats says in his preface. It was not that he made light of the art which he called the poetry of exaltation, but he recognised that exaltation itself can only be maintained if touch is kept with earth. In the brief preface written by himself to his few lyrics, he says:—

> "The poetry of exaltation will be always the highest, but when men lose their poetic feeling for ordinary life, and cannot write poetry of ordinary things, their exalted poetry is likely to lose its strength of exaltation, in the way men cease to build beautiful churches when they have lost happiness in building beautiful shops."

The danger of symbolic, visionary, and impalpable work is, not to be too exalted, but to become inane. As Synge says in the same preface, "The strong things of life are needed in poetry also to show that what is exalted, or tender, is not made by feeble blood. It may almost be said that before verse can be human again it must learn to be brutal." And so we bid adieu to sweet Angus, Maeve, and Fand, and stretch in ditches, drink at fairs, or poach with Red Dan Philly's bitch the badger and the hare.

How he won exaltation from ordinary life—how, with his "hunger for harsh facts," he reached the height of tragic sorrow—was best seen in his brief drama of Irish fisher people, called "Riders to the Sea":—

> "I've had a husband, and a husband's father, and six sons in this house—six fine men, though it was a hard birth I had with everyone of them, and they coming to the world——and there were some of them were found and some of them were not found, but they're gone now, the lot of them."

But in his greatest work, "The Playboy of the Western World," there is exaltation too, though its chief motive must be called brutal, and its wealth of humor is grim. To be sure, the poet was helped by the very character and language of the people among whom he worked, for in Ireland, as he said, "for a few years more, we have a popular imagination that is fiery and magnificent, and tender." Take only a few instances, almost at random, from the "Playboy" itself:—

> "That's an unkindly thing to be saying to a poor orphaned traveller, has a prison behind him, and hanging before, and hell's gap gaping below."
> "Bravery's a treasure in a lonesome place, and a lad would kill his father, I'm thinking, would face a foxy divil with a pitchpike on the flags of hell."
> "Doesn't the world know you reared a black ram at your own breast, so that the Lord Bishop of Connaught felt the elements of a Christian, and he eating it after in a kidney stew!"
> "It's queer joys the girls have, and who knows the thing they'd do, if it 'd make the green stones cry itself to think of you swaying and swiggling at the butt-end of a rope, and you with a fine, stout neck, God bless you! the way you'd be a half an hour, in great anguish, getting your death."

It's a long way we have come from sweet Angus, Maeve, and Fand, and yet, even in the "Playboy," the exaltation remains. Angus was the dear god of love, but what sweeter words could Angus himself say of love than those of the rough and murderous peasant when he cries, "Amn't I after seeing the love-light of the star of knowledge shining from her brow?" Or again:—

> "If the mitred bishops seen you that time, they'd be the like of the holy prophets, I'm thinking, do be straining the bars of Paradise to lay eyes on the Lady Helen of Troy, and she abroad, pacing backward and forward, with a nosegay in her golden shawl."

There, in the midst of ordinary life, is that gleam of exaltation, all the brighter for the commonplace, the violence, and even the brutality with which it is surrounded. We cannot call it realism, for people who talk of realism mean something squalid, and usually mechanical and uninspired, like most of Zola's work. But Synge was reaching out to an art that should keep its grip on this visible and present world, but reveal a reality exalted, in Walter Pater's phrase, by the aristocracy of passion. He was seeking for an art that might be produced and enjoyed by rich and powerful natures because it embodied all the instincts and activities and impulses of joy or sorrow in their lives, and neither dragged them for ever up and down a back street, nor carried them away to regions where, like indifferent mountaineers among Alpine precipices, they could hardly appreciate the full delight of exaltation because the foothold was so small.

THE ROSE AND THE SHOW.

The roses in the show tent are bewildering in their beauty. The impression they convey to the eye is after a while as confused as their mingled scent, and the eye, except of the keenest connoisseur, is cloyed with the eternal perfection of form and colour. The one best bloom from each of a thousand plants is there—reared with great care, selected and trained somewhat for several days before the contest, so that it could be brought up to the show bench in the nearest possible pink of condition. They are beautiful captives groomed and decked for the slave market—less perfect but more beautiful in the homes from which they have been snatched. Or say that they resemble whole roses as an artist's most successful bust resembles the living man.

Even in the garden of the rose-lover these exhibition roses are but as busts. They do not swing on the free arch that makes the rose-bush one of the most beautiful objects in nature. They stand on chopped shoots stuck in the bare earth, as though someone had put skewers in the ground and then tied on paper flowers many sizes too large. The roses on the wind-flung arches are beyond the judging capacity of a flower show as the arches are beyond the capacity of the tent. So we bring here our choicest blooms of every kind, that incipient rose-growers may know, or guess, what may be the glories of his garden when he can make up his mind which of our captives to purchase and liberate there. For we can shock the vendor by letting his "dwarf maidens" fly upward and become hamadryads; his Parisian La France fling out into something of a Marseillaise; his sadly pensive Frau Karl Drushki regain her youth and exuberance. She, at any rate, as one of the most real of modern roses, will retain in liberty even the graces that appeal to the judges here. The pale pink of Caroline Testout shall keep her in countenance with almost equal grace as they ramble in the pergola or throw kisses to one another from old-fashioned standards.

We are indebted to the shows for reminding us of the infinite variety of the roses. The very wealth there is to choose from for a long time discourages him who wants his rose garden to do him justice. Of the making of roses there seems to be no end. Every year there is some new beauty for the public to run after, and we cannot always tell whether the chase is going to be of short duration or will establish a permanent favorite. As with books, so there are many roses that have unjustly perished under the avalanche of less worthy newcomers. We could not, perhaps, take a better instance than the old Cloth of Gold which came to us over sixty years ago. Its big golden bells and the tree's pretty way of wearing them seemed to strike a new and lasting note in rose-culture, but now for all practical purposes the Cloth of Gold is as extinct as the Dodo. Yet it grows here and there on some favored south wall, and perhaps will come again as a "new" rose when we have got tired of our last batch of teas or perpetuals. Cloth of Gold is (or perhaps was) a noisette, and therefore descends from the Indian strain, mingled with that of the musk rose, from which comes ottar of roses, and which flings its petals over Omar Kháyyam's tomb. Aimée Vibert has outlived her younger sister, but the other noisettes of early Victorian days have gone. Maréchal Niel would not be recognised as a descendant by those who loved Ophirie and Celine Forestier, and to-day the noisette race is lost in the great crowd of the "tea-scented roses" with which it has mingled.

The numerous cabbage roses of our grandmothers' days are supposed to be extinct, but surely their place is well supplied by the two thousand or more hybrid perpetuals which more or less justify their name by filling our gardens with heavy color the summer and autumn through. The Indian, French, Damascus strains that supply the hybridisers with their favorite material have thus far proved wonderfully complacent. Perhaps there are new triumphs ahead. Perhaps we are being led into a cul-de-sac. Perhaps, when the varying period of these roses has worked out, our own dog roses, the Banksian, the beautiful wild Carolinan, and the tribe to which the Japanese rugosa belongs may begin to produce that "swarm of mutations" which, some evolutionists say, comes to each species once in a thousand years or so. These are wilder roses than the others. They have for the most part resisted the beginnings of the policy that would end in making them into "dwarf maidens." Perhaps a worthier fate will make some of them the parents of more beautiful roses than Gruss an Teplitz, and of equally beautiful growth.

Our own wild Rosa arvensis, parent of all the Ayrshires, and aunt of the pillar and pergola ramblers that make our gardens exquisite in the month of roses, has won its triumphs by constancy and moderation in its variations. The nieces of our field rose are the daughters of R. multiflora. The Crimson Rambler is sixteen years old, and deservedly as popular as ever, where the pillar or the pergola is a feature of the flower garden. Almost as brilliant a crimson, but with open single blossoms showing the golden stamens, Leuchstern covers itself assiduously with clusters from head to foot, and strikes the eye as powerfully as Hiawatha, not of the same strain, but aptly associated with these crimson glories. Nor must Helène be omitted, one of the best of these climbing roses neither single nor double, a cheery grower and a multitudinous bloomer. The others are well-nigh legion. Let us mention two more—Euphrosyne and Psyche, both pink, scented, prolific, Psyche yielding a little in depth of color and clearness of scent, but none in generosity of bloom. Félicité Perpétue comes of another species of the same division, and adds to the charm of its blush clusters a glossier leaf that proclaims it an evergreen. Then what if, having exhausted the crimson and pink glories of our pergola, we find a rose throwing clusters of open, pale cream, clematis-like blossoms far along its appointed sphere of influence? It is pure and simple wild Arvensis herself, more than holding her own among her brilliant descendants and collaterals.

The hand of the hybridiser has already been laid on the multiflora group. A cross with the Indian rose has given us those perpetual-flowering dwarfs, the polyantha, good for garden borders and for exhibitions where the entire tree is invited. Etoile d'Or and La Paquerette are worthy members of the class, while Claire Jaquier is a notable undwarfed hybrid with its unusual Nankeen-yellow blossoms to reward those who take good care of it. Lastly, there is at Kew a large, clear crimson single rose, the progeny of Wichuriana and that gallant hybrid perpetual, General Jaqueminot. Shortly, no doubt, we shall have ramblers as numerous as the teas and the new cabbages.

Still the most beautiful of our English roses, the pink-white rose of Devonshire lanes, stands aloof from this rush of new kinds that the others yield to the insolent gardener. Still she flings her sprays along the hedge and compels us to admit that there is an untamable beauty of the wild above that of the garden. One variety, the sweet briar, has given us the exquisite chromatic series that has made the name of Lord Penzance famous in rose gardens. They are the very stuff for hedges to guard the pampered beauties of the rose garden's inner sanctuary from too close comparison with the barbarian world of the wild garden and the outer fields. And in inner and inmost rings within the sweet briar we can plant our roses as far as they will go, down to the creamiest, frailest, most artificial exasperations of witchery that centuries of horticulture have given us.

Present-Day Problems.

THE DIRECTION OF NATIONAL ENERGY.

Practically unnoticed by the Press which was devoting its best columns to reports of Lord Charles Beresford's speech, the National Peace congress met the week before last at Cardiff, where some 500 delegates from all parts of the country assembled under the presidency of Sir William Collins. The success of the conferences and of the public meeting which was attended by nearly 2,000 people was encouraging to all those who are following the movement with sympathy and interest. The portentous expenditure on armaments was deplored, the agitation of the National Service League condemned, the spreading influence for peace of the democracies of the world was welcomed with enthusiasm, and many speakers, among whom were those who had recently returned from the Continent, came forward to expose the highly fictitious nature of the supposed hostility of Germany, with whom messages of friendship and goodwill were exchanged. Of late years there has been a very marked increase in the growth of a national desire for peace, but the movement cannot for years to come be regarded as a popular movement, though it will continue to gain support from the more intelligent and humanely disposed sections of the community who have the moral courage to stand out against the periodic gusts of jingoism. But it would be a mistake to underestimate the sweeping force of these gusts. Retired naval and military officers, who still desire to loom large in the public eye and have lost the restraining influence of responsibility, find a ready response for their preaching in the leisured class who believe Imperialism to be the only possible form of patriotism, and in the capitalist class who only regard Imperialism as a useful commercial asset. They know, too, how to make use of the Yellow Press in order to rouse the latent pugnacity in the more ignorant classes, and in response to the popular clamor thus artificially produced the nation may find itself one of these days swept off its feet. Among the many fallacies propagated by these self-constituted advocates of militarism there is none more readily accepted and yet more dangerous than the constantly reiterated statement that "to preserve peace the country must be prepared for war." Surely it stands to reason that if a nation devotes its inventive genius, its enterprise, its labor, its wealth, and the best of its manhood to the manufacture and perfecting of engines of war, whether animate in the form of navies and armies or inanimate in the form of ships, guns, rifles, explosives, &c., it is inevitable that those who compose this great machine and those who assist in producing and developing it should sooner or later want to test its efficiency. And its efficiency can only be tested and its capacity can only be measured by the number of human lives it is capable of destroying.

Powerless as the peace movement may appear to be against public opinion, once excited it would certainly gain a great acquisition of strength if in pursuit of its high ideal it could concentrate on some positively constructive policy in addition to protest and remonstrance. The most baffling problem to be confronted is the fact that every healthy people has inherent in it a great national energy, a great potential activity possessed in some degree by each individual separately and becoming immeasurably augmented in force when the community combine in some common pursuit. This energy has shown itself in wars because rulers and conquerors and Governments have known how to rouse its force and divert it into that particular channel for their own objects. The question which lovers of peace ought to study is how to find an outlet and scope for this national energy, in which it might focus its giant force not on the destruction and devastation of the social life of nations but on strengthening and stimulating the progressive and humanitarian tendencies which operate towards the enrichment of the life of man. It is essential that men should be shaken from ease, apathy, and indolence. The national fibre must be invigorated by strenuous effort and concentrated endeavor. But surely it is humiliating to have to confess in the twentieth century that there are no other fields besides battle-fields in which the national vigor can be exercised, and no other enemies against whom to turn the fury of national displeasure besides our fellow-men in foreign lands. Any pacific movement that fails to reckon with this great latent force is doomed to be fruitless. But to say that it is extravagant idealism to suppose that humanity can become sufficiently enlightened to turn its combative instinct against its real enemies, Ignorance and Poverty, and all their host of allies, is to deny that there is any hope of progressive advance in the world's history. A glance through the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission alone shows the limitless field of labor that presents itself in the work of real national defence, and in the industrial and economic fields there is great need of inventive enterprise and corporate effort.

The first step is to recognise the existence of this national energy and to appreciate its value. How to utilise it for securing a far higher degree of social well-being in our own country, for the advancement of international amity and mutual comprehension among nations, and for the extension of the best elements of civilisation throughout the world is a further question which requires careful thought and deep reflection, and one that ought not to be abandoned as hopeless before it has been fairly and completely examined. So long as the pacificist confines himself to repeated protest his cause will progress but slowly. This is only an indication of a possible line of constructive activity for him, in which he might enlist the co-operation of many new adherents.

The Drama.

THE CENSOR'S HEROISM.

In casting about for theories to account for the unaccountable suppression of Mr. Shaw's "Press Cuttings," some people have supposed the Censor to be animated by a personal grudge against a dramatist who has of late been a thorn in his flesh. This account of the matter is wholly unacceptable. It betrays a very shallow psychology in those who advance it. That the Censor, in his inmost heart, cherishes a warm affection for Mr. Shaw is, perhaps, improbable; but I am sure he is at once too honorable and too prudent to let personal resentment weigh with him for a moment in the exercise of what he believes to be his duty. He would a hundred times rather license than veto a play by Mr. Shaw. He would even, I am sure, stretch indulgence to its utmost limits in Mr. Shaw's favor, with the feeling that he was thereby manifesting a Christian spirit and securing, for the nonce, a quiet life. Nothing but an imperative sense of duty could have driven him, poor harassed gentleman, to veto "Press Cuttings." His act was not one of petty malice, but of conscience and of courage.

On the other hand, no human being save the Censor has been able to discover the ghost of a reason why this hotch-potch of topical tomfoolery should have been refused a licence. It is an absolutely harmless effusion in Mr. Shaw's happiest vein of thoughtful and stimulating whimsicality. Perhaps there is a little too much of it; I fancy the audience began to feel, towards the end, that its capacity for laughter was somewhat overtaxed; but who would seriously complain of being fatigued with merriment? When Mr. Shaw plays the irresponsible jester, he is always delightful; and here he is no less irresponsible than irresistible. He leaps upon the stage, armed, not with the rapier of satire, but with the bladder-flail of banter; and he deals sounding but quite innocuous thwacks to everyone and everything for a full hour by Shrewsbury clock. An undercurrent of sense, no doubt, runs through his nonsense; there are shreds of irony in his motley, and patches of serious purpose. But laughter is the be-all and end-all of his endeavor. He is a philosophic Pelissier presenting a clever little troupe of Follies (Mr. Loraine was admirable and Miss Agnes Thomas delightful) in a "revue" of things in general and the suffrage agitation in particular. He might have called the entertainment "Press Cuttings: or Shaw's Potted Politics."

Why, then, did the Censor feel it his duty to interfere? It was, we are told, because of actual or potential personalities contained in the play. I shall presently look into the general merits of the "personality" argument; in the meantime, let me point out that in this particular case Mr. Shaw had ingeniously taken the best and only way to avoid being personal. He had fixed as the date of his fantasy the first of April—as who should say the Greek Kalends—three years hence. Under these circumstances, if he had given his politician and his soldier purely imaginary names—such, for instance, as the Right Hon. Fusbos and General Bombastes—he would assuredly have been suspected of aiming at this or that individual, at an actual or possible Prime Minister and Commander-in-Chief. People would have sought for and discovered all sorts of personal jibes, innuendoes, and insults. But by calling his Premier "Balsquith" and his General "Mitchener," and by making them utterly and entirely unlike Mr. Balfour and Mr. Asquith, Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener, he took the very best way of showing that it was no individual he had in mind, but a politician in the abstract, and an allegorical soldier. I do not mean to say that soldiers in general are likely to be pleased by Mr. Shaw's allegorical representation of militarism, any more than doctors in general are flattered by his Sir Bloomfield Bonnington, or Liberal politicians by his immortal Broadbent. But no one supposes it to be the Censor's business to protect whole classes and professions from banter, or even from satire. The "personality" theory means, in its very terms, that individual withers must not be wrung; and, in this case, Mr. Shaw has taken the utmost care to prevent his persiflage from going to any particular address. The one actual personality in the piece is a passing allusion to a certain episode of "tea and chiffons" in Downing Street. The allusion casts ridicule upon the outcry raised by that incident, and, in so far as it can be taken seriously at all, can only be gratifying to the lady concerned. Why, then, has the Censor screwed himself up to veto an entertainment at which Mr. Balfour and Mr. Asquith, Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener, might all sit in the front row of the stalls, and laugh heartily (if they have any sense of humor) without experiencing the smallest personal discomfort? There is only one explanation that I can suggest—namely, that the Censor himself has no sense of humor. This explanation, indeed, is all the more plausible as, if he had any perception of the ludicrous, he could not hold his office for a day. At the spectacle of Mr. George Alexander Redford wielding the rod over Sophocles and Shelley, Ibsen and Maeterlinck, Brieux and Shaw, he would resign in a burst of inextinguishable laughter.

And now, having seen that the "personality" theory—the doctrine that individuals must at all costs be protected from stage-criticism and ridicule—does not apply to "Press Cuttings," let us look for a moment on the intrinsic value of the principle.

For anything really defamatory or injurious uttered on the stage the common law provides a remedy. If we require a censorship of the stage to suppress libels before publication, there is equal, and, indeed, far greater, need of a censorship of the Press for the same purpose. Libels do constantly occur in the Press; whereas the Censor cannot, and, I am sure, does not, pretend that he has constantly to suppress personal libels, in the legal sense of the term. That is not the contention of the Lord Chamberlain's office; its argument is that the freedom of personal caricature, satire, banter, and general allusion, which is practically unlimited in the Press, cannot possibly be permitted on the stage. And why? There seems to be a vague idea that stage caricature gives more personal annoyance than caricature in "Punch" or the "Westminster"; but for this there is no evidence, nor is the argument insisted on. The real contention of the Censorists is that stage caricature has a tendency to lead to breaches of the peace. To this there are two answers. In the first place, owing to the inconsistent and (necessarily) ineffectual exercise of the Censorship, numerous personal caricatures of a sufficiently pointed nature have in our days been presented on the stage without leading to the smallest breach of the peace. But, in the second place, supposing the tendency to inflame party feeling were very much stronger than we find it to be, what harm would be done if a given performance were hissed off the stage, and even if some personal altercation took place between, say, "wholehoggers" and "free-fooders" in the audience, such as frequently occurs at political meetings? No bones would be broken, either literal or metaphorical. The one result would be that the manager would be particularly careful to suppress the inflammatory passage, and not to admit such passages in other plays; for no manager has any more liking than the Lord Chamberlain himself for breaches of the peace in his theatre. The idea that an autocratic official is required to obviate the danger of the theatre becoming a bear-garden is a monstrous absurdity. Such trifling disturbances as might possibly arise under a system of freedom would instantly and automatically correct themselves. To hear the Censorist arguments on this point, one would imagine that the theatre was, indeed, a "temple" of the drama, and that any difference of opinion within its sacred walls was as shocking as brawling in church. This is sheer nonsense. In regard to the public peace, as in regard to morals, the Censorship reverses the jesuitical principle, "To do a great right do a little wrong." Its existence is a great wrong which secures, if anything at all, only an infinitesimal right.

It would take too long to catalogue the glaring inconsistencies in the application of the no-personality rule—to show how some playrights may steal the horse while others may not look over the hedge. The cases of Mr. Barrie's "Josephine" and "Super-Punch" are recent and flagrant—pieces in which several leading politicians, to say nothing of Mr. Shaw himself, were presented by name and exhibited in various ridiculous situations. No one, so far as I know, blamed the Censor for licensing these plays, and they certainly led to no breach of the peace. But then, Mr. Barrie is a playright of the highest propriety, whose name does not, like Mr. Shaw's, set up a panic in the Censor's bosom, and make him feel that something desperately heroic must be done. I should like, moreover, to point to two still more recent and more flagrant cases of personal satire and invective, to which the Censor has made no objection. Only a few weeks ago, two plays were running in London (one of them is running still), the leading characters of which were unmistakably and undeniably intended to represent a prominent individual. I am far from saying that the Censor ought to have vetoed either of these plays; but I do say emphatically that in licensing them he conspicuously ignored the alleged rule of his office against personalities. How incredible is the in-equity of permitting two scathing—lampoons, shall we say?—upon "Sir Charles Worgan" and "Sir Felix Janion," and vetoing a little harmless banter of a fantastic politician and soldier whom the author has done his best to prevent people from identifying with any individual soldier or politician!

The performance of "Press Cuttings" was preluded by a very bright and clever one-act play, "The Fair Arabian," by Sydonie Colton. Also Mr. Forbes Robertson gave a reading of "The Ancient Mariner," which was highly appreciated. It was generally felt, however, that, under the circumstances, "Christabel" would have been a more appropriate selection.

THE "TIMES" ON INDIA'S FUTURE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—For a large section of the British public the "Times" newspaper is the chief instructor regarding Indian affairs. The man in the street finds time to peruse the telegrams from Reuter and the special correspondence which appear in its columns; and if his interest in the subject carries him further he may read the expert articles on India which have been a feature of the "Times" since, many years ago, the late Sir W. W. Hunter began his brilliant series of weekly essays on "Indian Affairs." Recently the British public, being more or less alarmed by the reports of unrest, has demanded more specific information about India; and accordingly the "Times" sent out Mr. Lovat Fraser, an experienced Anglo-Indian journalist, to visit important centres and report on the situation, as a special correspondent. Mr. Lovat Fraser has now returned from his tour, and has summarised his conclusions in an elaborate report, which occupies 3½ columns in the issue of June 28th. In a leader, the "Times," without any expression of dissent, commends these conclusions to the careful consideration of its readers.

I have accordingly studied the report with care. The conclusions are remarkable, and even surprising, when we remember that hitherto the "Times" has shown itself so unqualified an admirer of our official administration. For this report is a gloomy one, as regards both the contentment of the ruled and the capacity of the rulers. It is true that Mr. Lovat Fraser is not alarmed by the aspirations of the Constitutional reformers, which he considers "neither unreasonable nor unnatural from their point of view." But, on the other hand, his diagnosis of Indian feeling towards our rule is ominous: he tells us that there is a widening gulf between the ruled and their alien rulers; that this gulf cannot be bridged; that we must reckon with "the permanent irreconcilable antagonism" of a large proportion of the population; and he gives his emphatic approval to the lurid metaphor according to which, "beneath the small film of white men who make up the Indian Empire boils or sleeps away a sea of dark men, incurably hostile, who await with patience the day when the ice shall break and the ocean regain its power of restless movement under its own laws." He believes that the anarchist organisation will continue to spread, and fears that a conflagration will break out when Britain is entangled in difficulties elsewhere.

I do not at all agree with this diagnosis. The Indian people are a law-abiding race, heirs of an ancient and stable civilisation; also, they are of a tolerant, placable disposition, naturally inclined to respect authority; and, as regards their rulers, they have little race prejudice: if the ruler is just and sympathetic, as Lord Ripon was, they will regard him with enthusiastic affection, whether he comes to them from the East or from the West. Moreover, they are well aware of the advantages of the British connection, provided always that it is placed on the proper footing of an equitable partnership; and they have no desire either for Russian rule or for the anarchy which would follow severance from the British Empire. The present antagonism to British rule is neither permanent nor irremediable. Resentment has been produced by definite causes, by disregard of Indian feelings and wishes. Remove the causes of the resentment, and the resentment will disappear.

Of course, there is danger if a course of irritation and repression is persisted in, but such danger will be of our own creation. Will the authorities rise to the occasion, putting aside Russian methods and returning to the sympathetic and conciliating policy which bore good fruit under Lord Lawrence, Lord Mayo, and Lord Ripon? Our special correspondent does not seem to be hopeful. For if he is inclined to despair as regards the attitude of the Indian people, he is no less pessimistic as regards the capacity of their rulers, whether he turns his searchlight upon the Indian Civil Service, or upon the Secretary of State, or upon Parliament, or upon the British public. What are his conclusions under this heading? The British public is ignorant and indifferent. In current discussions "the name of India is rarely mentioned"; there is no proper "recognition of the realities of the situation." Then there is little to be hoped for from Parliamentary control, which "contains very serious possibilities of future danger." And the reforms of the Secretary of State are not likely to bring peace to a troubled land. These reforms have not abated the menace to British rule; on the contrary, "their ultimate and inevitable effect must be to accentuate it." According, therefore, to Mr. Lovat Fraser, we must not expect much healing virtue to emanate from this country. He considers that India should be ruled more on the spot, and less from the India Office. We come, therefore, to the Indian Civil Service, as the actual administrators on the spot, and here we might expect from the critic a blessing on our rule. But no such blessing is accorded. For he has little good to say of the group of prominent civilians who dominate the administration from the heights of Simla. He reports a fatal want of touch with the people. The high officials "live in little worlds of their own"; and he tells them that "they must come down from their hill-tops, and remain among the toiling millions." Further, compensation for this lack of practical aptitude is not to be found in any special excellence of temper or morale. It appears that the official attitude towards Indian politicians needs to be rectified. Indian officials are inclined to resent criticism. "They should school themselves to recognise that the Indian politician has every right to speak his mind boldly"; "the time is long past in India for the silent ignoring of the wishes and aspirations of the ruled"; "it will not do to continue to treat these aspirations with ridicule and contempt." "Argument must be met with argument, and not with petulant contumacy." Then as regards morale, a fear is expressed that the present race of civilians have fallen away from the higher ideal of independence maintained by their predecessors. They lack moral courage. While disapproving the policy prescribed from home, they are "afraid to speak out"; they are too ready to "come to heel"; they show an eagerness to crush private convictions in order to please master, and sit "silent and cowering on the mountain tops."

This is a pitiful account of "the man on the spot" to whom, according to some advisers, we should surrender our judgment and our principles. But while sadly admitting the element of truth in this description, we must be careful not unduly to blame the members of the Service on account of the vices of the system under which they serve. Taken as as a whole, the Indian Civil Service is probably the most clean-handed, industrious, and self-denying body of officials that the world has ever seen; but they work under a system which in its essence is that of the Russian or Chinese bureaucracy, aggravated by the fact that the officials are of a different race, language, and religion from the people over whom they exercise authority. It is creditable to them that things are not worse than they are.

Moreover there is reason to hope that Lord Morley's reforms will tend to cure the specific defects of our official rule. Co-operation is the key-note of the new dispensation. I have known the advantage and the pleasure of co-operating with such men as Mr. Justice Ranade, Mr. Justice Telang, and Mr. Justice Tyabji. They have passed away, but there are many now living who follow in their footsteps. Working with such men, the British official, though a foreigner, may gain touch with the people; and the race antagonism, bred of autocratic methods, will disappear. Then, again, we may have hopes from the sympathy of the British people. They may appear ignorant and indifferent; it may be true that, "as a nation, we do not possess the faculty of clear thinking"; but we generally get through in the end, though it may be in a muddling way. For my own part, I believe that the British democracy desires to act towards India, not only with justice, but generosity: in the judgment and temper of the English people as the court of final appeal we may put our trust, as did India's great advocate, Edmund Burke: "I have," he said, "absolute faith in the ancient and inbred integrity, piety, good nature, and good humor of the English people."

While I write these lines the grievous word comes that Lord Ripon has passed away, and I have no heart to go on: so good a friend lost at this time of India's sore need! I cannot express the deep veneration I have always felt for his personality. His noble life is quenched, but his example lives. His work in India, the love the people bore him, will remain a beacon of hope to those who trust that the connection between India and England will continue, to the welfare of both countries. His good and just actions will blossom in the dust.—Yours, &c.,

W. Wedderburn.

Letters to the Editor.

FAITH AND CONDUCT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir—My article on this subject has aroused a wider interest than I expected. It has brought you valuable letters from persons far more competent than I am to deal with the question. The discussion has ranged and rather widely. My own point was simple enough. Given a man, who believes sincerely in a religious code and acts up to it in his individual life, how comes he to ignore or contravene it in his social, public, or commercial activities? Without raising the deeper issues I make a modest attempt to explain the contradiction by suggesting that his religion is only one of many influences that determine a man's conduct, and affect his practice of the Art of Living. That is why a good Christian—or, for that matter, a good Moslem or Jew or Buddhist—may be a bad citizen, or a bad father: meaning by bad not so much sinful as ineffective or mischievous.

Some of your correspondents say that in putting the case this way I mix up religion and ethics. The one deals with spiritual experiences and the illumination of the individual soul; the other with a man's relations towards his fellow-beings on this earth. Religion is the bond that links man to God and to the spiritual forces that inform the Universe. It penetrates the whole nature of the worshipper, and cannot leave him unaffected in any moment of his existence or in any act that he performs. If I produce a person who does not act in a truly Christian spirit towards the associates he is trying to "scoop" in business, or to the rivals who are trying to "scoop" him, I have no right to call him religious, however kindly, moral, and generous he may be in private. Perhaps not; but this limitation or specialisation of the religious function rather considerably supports my own humble attempt to elucidate the enigma. Religion affects the character, it affects the soul. But the character and soul do not alone direct your path in a tangled, ill-lighted world; they do not always keep you on the right road or warn you from the wrong one. You may have a fine character, a noble soul, and yet drive your motor car,or your family coach, or your chariot of state, hopelessly amiss.

But other distinguished commentators take quite the opposite view. If the religious man acts badly, that, say Canon Scott-Holland and Mr. Chesterton, is because he has a bad religion. Mr. Chesterton calls the suggestion that creeds do not greatly affect conduct obscurantist, and oppressive in the worst degree. It is dealing a deadly blow at human reason to say "that even if we find the truth it will make no difference; that a man in a triangular world will behave just like a man in a square world; and a man in a good universe exactly like a man in a bad one." I will not question the truth of this any more than its wit; and I am the last person to maintain that it makes no difference what you believe or whether you believe anything. But here it is not a question of finding the truth, but of following it. We have men who have settled that it is a square universe and act daily as if it were triangular. We have, for instance, tens of millions of people who devoutly believe in the Teacher of a religion which is altruistic and communistic, and who, in their daily practice, are egoists and individualists. In a general, abstract, impersonal fashion that belief makes them respect certain virtues, dislike certain vices, cherish certain ideals. One creed inculcates a higher standard of temperance, another of justice, another of self-sacrifice. In that sense, of course, religious faiths affect the ethical conceptions of races and nations. But when you come to the application of the principle to individuals, you are again brought up by the concurrent, or, perhaps, dominating, influences of temperament, education, and social sentiment. Mr. Chesterton says that the pious American millionaire who can teach in a Sunday School while he is organising a rapacious Trust acts in this fashion, not in spite of his creed, but because of it. The world to him is triangular. His type of "Protestant individualism" makes virtues of pride and avarice, regards riches as a sign of Divine approval, and glorifies the plutocrat. Mr. Chesterton is far better read in "Puritan" theology and philosophy than I can pretend to be; but I cannot help wondering whether he could produce a single sentence from any "Protestant" divine or preacher of authority in support of this contention. Surely the Protestant form of the Christian religion has not, any more than the Catholic, given its sanction to covetousness and selfish greed. But the form of society in which the Protestant individualist lives may have done so. So Canon Scott-Holland holds as well as Mr. Chesterton. And if they are right, what are we to infer from the contradictory proceedings of our pious plutocrats? Obviously that an irreligious or an anti-religious social doctrine may cause them to act in a manner which their religious creed condemns.

But it condemns it only in that vague indeterminate fashion which produces little direct effect. When I say that conduct is not determined by religion, I do not say that it ought not to be so determined. I do not see how anybody who looks at the facts before his eyes can deny the separation between religion and conduct in modern life. In most periods and most countries religion and practical ethics were so closely connected as to be indistinguishable; and the Sacred Books were less occupied with telling a man how to obtain a future life than in straightly admonishing him how to behave in this. A creed which says that our religio, our tie with the Omnipotent, is weakened if we eat pork or drink wine or do not fast on Fridays, or fail to wash adequately—such a creed may be unscientific or unphilosophical, but it has, at least, a direct and practical bearing on conduct. And unless our religious teaching can be brought into a similar close relation with the problems that assail modern men and women at every turn, it is likely to become a spiritual luxury for the few, and mere formalism for the many. I come back to it that the conduct of life in society is an art, and, like other arts, it cannot be prosecuted successfully without a well-understood body of rules, without training and expert knowledge.

The efficient religions have been those which came home to "the business and bosoms" of men so intimately that they could not be ignored, though they might be defied.—Yours, &c.,

July 13th, 1909.

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am much interested in Mr. Sidney Low's suggestive article upon Mr. J. D. Rockefeller and the subsequent correspondence in your columns. Some years ago a friend of mine from America was discoursing to me about American business methods and commercial men—great and small—of the Rockefeller type. Upon his remarking that business men in America were far more devoted churchgoers than Englishmen, I was tempted to reply: "It seems to me that on Sundays Americans pray on their knees, and on week-days they prey on their neighbors."

The simplest explanation of the glaring contrast between the business and private lives of so many men to-day may be found in the fact that unconscious hypocrisy is, and always has been, one of the commonest characteristics of civilised man. It is inevitable that this quasi-moral infirmity must spread and intensify during the gradual evolution towards higher ethical standards, and towards a nobler conception of God. For it is a truism that the social customs and conditions existing at any given time in a state or community lag centuries behind accepted moral and religious ideals entirely opposed to such social customs and conditions. It is unquestionable that, even in the most highly civilised countries, custom so blinds us that we condone, and even sanction, a vast amount of gratuitous cruelty and quite needless suffering. In the hurry and pressure of this restless age few trouble to test their every-day lives by the ethical standard which they tacitly accept—it sufficeth for them to conform to the customs and conventionalities of the society in which they move. Still fewer realise how hopelessly at variance with the traditional teaching and social philosophy of the Jesus-God whom they worship are the conditions prevailing in the chief Christian countries, with their Multi-millionaires, Privileged Classes, and Smart Sets at one end of the social scale, and virtual slavery and "submerged tenths" at the other.

Mr. Rockefeller is but a typical product of a fierce, commercially competitive and gold-crazy age, just as the "guid religious drunken body" of a century ago was a typical product of Calvinistic Scotland.

The time may come when it will be the rule, and not the exception, for educated men to face fairly and squarely the why and the wherefore of the appalling discrepancy between the realities of human existence and even the lowest of our ideals; when men will be ashamed to encourage, either actively or tacitly, the propagation of religious beliefs which they themselves do not share. When, if ever, that time comes, there will be far less unconscious hypocrisy and far more intellectual honesty.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE HICKS.

Upper Colwyn Bay,
July 12th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The thought revolved over and over again in this discussion—How can Mr. Rockefeller reconcile his religious principles with his practice as a man of business?—admits, I think, of an answer at once simple and sufficient. It has become customary to represent this individual, in relation to his methods of business, in a luridly odious guise. Is there not, I ask, something very unreal about all this talk of the "man-eating tiger of commerce"? Who, in reality, regards Mr. Rockefeller in the same sense which should ordinarily attach to these words? I venture to say, nobody does. If he had actually been the trickster represented, he could never have induced men to deal with him on the scale which has enabled his vast fortune to be built up, for, let it be remembered, business life is essentially ethical.

Who amongst your readers would not, if engaged in trade, feel himself highly honored by having business relations with the great Trust of which Mr. Rockefeller was the chief? On the plane which, relatively to matters religious and moral, is lowest and least—namely, that of commercial integrity—who amongst Mr. Rockefeller's rivals or competitors could be indicated as standing higher? Why should crocodile tears be shed for those of his rivals, who, having the will, failed to match him in the use of that faculty which resides in the brain of the great captain of modern industry, and which Spencer calls "the ability to apprehend assembled propositions in their totality"?

It is no use appealing to the halting reconciliation of ambiguous or opposing Scripture texts, as, if these are referred to as a principle of decision, those quoted by Mr. Lee and others of your correspondents can easily be matched.

Such expressions as that of "men being reduced to beggary by the subtle machinations of the Standard Oil Trust" merely suggest a sickly sentimentality, and people only delude themselves if they imagine that they mean anything beyond the fact that some men have not been able to pose and flaunt around as Trust magnates while others have.

It is admitted, by friend and foe alike, that Mr. Rockefeller's private life is a pattern of all the sober and domestic virtues, and there is absolutely no evidence that these, which express themselves as ethics or morality, have not received that higher consecration, which is called religion, in the true sense, and when operative in the life of the individual in full and balanced harmony, represent the relationships to man and to God.

It is time that the theory which is developed with detailed application by the rabid Socialist, and has, in fact, become an obsession with that individual, namely, that a man can only get rich at the expense of some other man, should be discouraged, and the fact recognised that, as men are not all equal in the sense of industrial efficiency, they cannot hope to be equally rewarded as the result of their efforts in that region.—Yours, &c., J. M.

THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW.

SIR,—The discussion continued in your issue of the 3rd inst. by Mrs. Rackham on this subject is wholly to the good. Especially with regard to the new machinery suggested for Charge and Recovery there is room, as the Minority Report itself stated, for much useful inquiry. In fact, failing any Governmental investigation, the National Committee to Promote the Break-Up of the Poor Law is forming little unofficial "departmental committees" to work out such questions as the limits of Charge and Recovery for the various services, the best method of co-ordinating the various branches of municipal work with the Guilds of Help and Councils of Social Welfare, and the relation between the several branches of local work and the different central governmental departments. This new crusade against destitution needs all possible help. Will not Mrs. Rackham, and other persons of special experience, join us in the work, without committing themselves to details, and assist in preparing the Bill?

Let me say, however, that the proposal to place the work of recovering whatever charges Parliament orders to be made (as for maintenance in lunatic asylums, industrial schools, &c.) in the hands of a special municipal or county officer, in no way involves any extension of any of the municipal services; and, in particular, implies no supersession of provident medical insurance by universal municipal doctoring, which is quite another issue. At present the whole business of charge and recovery is a demoralising chaos of laxity and caprice. We think that, extensive or restricted, it should be made systematic and uniform.

Let me also point out that Mrs. Rackham is not "up-to-date" in saying that, "at present, the Education Authority, Health Authority," and the rest, are not "distributing any relief in the homes of the poor, but (are) only granting institutional relief." This is to miss the very point of the problem of to-day. This year, in a hundred towns (comprising half England and Wales), more than a hundred thousand children living in their own homes are actually being supplied with food and many with medical treatment by the Local Education Authority; in dozens of towns the Local Health Authority is, by means of its milk dispensaries, its health visitors, its free supply of certain medicines, its occasional allowances to the families of men taken to hospital and to "contacts," its domiciliary nursing staffs and the out-patients departments of its hospitals, giving in the homes of its patients what would, if given by the Board of Guardians, be styled out-door relief; in many other towns the Distress Committee is, winter after winter, helping the able-bodied unemployed and their families, sometimes actually paying "home aliment" in cash; whilst everywhere the Local Pension Authority (which is, of course, exclusively domiciliary in its operations) is giving "public assistance" to the extent of a hundred and fifty thousand pounds a week to a much larger number of the aged than are helped by the Poor Law. In an uncounted number of these cases the Poor Law Authority is simultaneously assisting the same families, often unaware of what the other authorities are dong. How is it proposed to stop the existing overlap without some official machinery of co-ordination, such as the Registrar? The present state of things will very soon make him inevitable, even without the proposals of the Minority Report.

But the essential point of difference between Mrs. Rackham's letter and the Minority Report is that she is thinking only of doing good to the family which has actually sunk into destitution, and of which, therefore, every member has necessarily to be simultaneously considered. This is the attitude of the present Poor Law, as it is of most private charity. What the Minority Report urges is the paramount importance of preventing the oncoming of destitution. This means a systematic attempt to arrest each of the principal causes of eventual destitution at the very outset, in the most incipient stage of their attack (which, be it noted, is always an attack on an individual, not on a family as a whole), long before their ravages in that individual have reduced the whole family to destitution. Hence it is vital that the Local Health Authority should be empowered and required to search out and ensure proper treatment for the incipient stages of all diseases. (If there is any disease which is not infectious, does not lead to eventual destitution, or is not a public nuisance, I am prepared to exclude it!) It is vital that the Local Lunacy Authority should be empowered and required to search out and ensure proper care and control for all persons certifiable as mentally defective, long before the family to which they belong is reduced to destitution. It is vital that the Local Education Authority should be empowered and required to search out and ensure, quite irrespective of the family's destitution, whatever Parliament may prescribe as the national minimum of nurture and training for all children, the neglect of which will otherwise bring these children, when they grow up, themselves to a state of destitution. It is becoming no less clear that some authority—we say a National Authority—must register and deal with the man who is unemployed, long before extended unemployment has demoralised him and reduced his family to destitution. If Mrs. Rackham concurs in this campaign for the prevention of the occurrence of destitution, by grappling with its principal causes at the incipient stage, when they are just beginning to affect one or other members of a family only, long before the family as a whole has sunk into the morass of destitution, we can join hands. If, however, she believes that no public authority ought to intervene, and that no public assistance should be given, until the family as a whole has been actually reduced to destitution, then—like the Majority of the Commissioners and (as I must admit) the majority of Poor Law Guardians, as at present advised, and of the Charity Organisation Society—she is against us.

But the explanation, I fancy, is that Mrs. Rackham is thinking only of the families now actually in destitution, who must continue to be dealt with; and of those, in the future, who, as "missed cases," will have slipped into destitution, without having had their descent arrested by the preventive action above described. We think that each member of such a family requires, for restoration, specialised treatment, according to his or her need. The infant, the child of school age, the mentally defective, the sick, the infirm or incapacitated, the boy or girl above school age, and, finally, the able-bodied and able-minded adult, each requires that something different should be done for him or her, if that individual is to be properly dealt with. The alternative, namely, to treat the family as a whole, means to place it in the general mixed workhouse, or merely to give it a dole of outdoor relief. This, indeed, is to-day the dominant practice; and, as such, has been condemned by Majority and Minority alike. I do not think that Mrs. Rackham means to advocate this. She will, I think, admit the several members of the family, with their very different needs, cannot be wisely treated without calling in the public authorities specialising on those needs, such as the Education, Health, Lunacy, Pensions, and Unemployment Authorities. This does not mean that the needs of the other members of the family will escape consideration. Assuming that the cause of the destitution in which the family is plunged is the sickness of the breadwinner, and that the other members of the family are all normal, the Health Authority will, if it thinks domiciliary treatment desirable, not only give the necessary medical attendance, and look after the whole family environment by its health visitor, but, if there is no income, will grant (subject to satisfying the Registrar that the case comes within the Council's own by-laws) the home aliment that is requisite for the family maintenance. Would Mrs. Rackham suggest that the Health Committee, with its medical officer and its health visitor, should be excluded from this case? If there is a mentally defective person in such a family, can the Asylums Committee be kept out? If there are children of school age in it, is it wise to prevent the intervention of the Education Committee and the school attendance officer? We suggest that it is the business of the Registrar and his department to see (a) that these authorities do not overlap, and (b) that they are all consulted as regards such members of the family as come within their respective spheres of treatment. We see no need for any general "Public Assistance Committee" at all. But if other people prefer to leave this work of co-ordination and allocation to a committee of representatives, rather than to a salaried officer specialised to the function and giving to it his whole time, let them elaborate this alternative. On such a point there may be ample room for more than one compromise. What is vital is that each of the several preventive authorities (the Education, Health, Lunacy, and Unemployment Authorities) should be empowered and required to deal with the cases in which it can arrest, at the incipient stage, its own particular cause of eventual destitution; and, therefore, that it should treat all cases falling within its own category. What this negatives is the idea of relegating all distressed persons, whether children or adults, sick or well, to a Poor Law Authority, whatever its designation, having its own system of domiciliary relief and its own array of institutions for treating all the several sections; but necessarily limited to dealing with families as wholes, and with those families only in which destitution has already set in. A Poor Law Authority, even if you call it a Public Assistance Authority, can, in fact, only relieve destitution. We want to abolish it.—Yours, &c., BEATRICE WEBB.

THE POLICY OF DEPORTATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The triumphant vindication of Mr. Lajpat Rai at the hands of the High Court of Calcutta from the grave charge brought against him in Parliament in June, 1907, of endeavoring to sap the loyalty of native troops, brings into clear relief the terrible danger of allowing men's liberty to depend upon the secret evidence of the police in India. Lord Morley, in deporting Mr. Lajpat Rai without charge or trial, acted in perfect good faith on the advice of the late Sir Denzil Ibbetson, and he, in turn, upon the advice of police informers. If the natural step had been taken of asking Mr. Lajpat Rai, before he was deported, for an explanation of the charge brought against him by the police, he would never have been deported, and the proprietors of the "Englishman" in Calcutta would not have been mulcted in £1,000 damages for maliciously libelling him by repeating the charges made in Parliament. Nor would he have rested for two years under the suspicion of being a dangerously seditious citizen. But what can be expected when deportations are carried out as they now are in India?

The whole procedure connected with this reactionary policy has been laid bare by the admissions, painfully extracted from Ministers, by questions in Parliament, and here it is in a few words.

It means arbitrary banishment and imprisonment in a common jail, founded upon no judicial proceeding and backed by no magisterial warrant. It is preceded by no warning of any kind to the victim. It is neither accompanied nor followed by any charge of any offence. There is no prospect of an inquiry or trial. However blameless may be a man's record, however long he may be kept in exile and prison, he is never told what he has done to make him an object of suspicion to the Government. He is refused the names of his accusers. He is prohibited from taking proceedings by way of Habeas Corpus for his liberation. He is debarred from bringing an action for false imprisonment or malicious prosecution against those responsible for his imprisonment. If he ever obtains his liberty—which, like his arrest, depends absolutely upon the will of the Executive—he goes down to his grave with the stigma upon him of some mysterious offence which it is impossible for him to disprove, because he is never told what it is. At every stage of his career, if he is allowed a career, he may find this untoward incident brought up against him to obstruct his progress and mar his success. His one hope is a libel action, if some newspaper is foolish enough to repeat any charges made against him in Parliament. All this takes place, not in a time of war or insurrection, or under a system of martial law, but in time of peace, in the oldest province in India, when all the Courts of Justice are open and active for the punishment of crime, and when the law for that purpose has been made more drastic and more summary than at any former period.

It was upon secret police evidence that, as Mr. Buchanan told us, the nine deportations were carried out in Bengal in December last, though it may be true, as Lord Morley has subsequently said, that the evidence was examined by the Viceroy in Council. But the point is that the most experienced officials appointed by Lord Curzon five years ago to investigate the condition of the police, reported them to be not only incompetent, but corrupt, and not only terrorists, but frequently torturers of the people whom they ought to protect. And the moment their proceedings are subjected to the searching tests of qualified judges, it is proved that their methods are to-day the same as those exposed by Lord Curzon's Commission. Evidence for the prosecution is manufactured. Evidence for the defence is kept back or destroyed. Witnesses are habitually "tutored" and terrorised. Confessions of guilt are extorted by gross cruelty and torture. It is in a part of the British Empire where these things are common that British subjects of unblemished character are deported thousands of miles from their wives and families without charge or trial upon secret police evidence.

Sir, has not the time come for Liberals to insist that arbitrary deportations in India should cease? Ought not a thorough reform of the police to be carried out at once? I urge this, not merely because of the flagrant injustice and dangerous discontent provoked in India, but also because of the demoralisation of political standards which takes place when a great party is persuaded to sanction a violation of its most cherished principles. And in the whole creed of Liberalism, there is no more sacred rule than that a man ought to be heard before he is condemned.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC MACKARNESS.

THE "REVOLUTION IN EDUCATION."

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—There are at least two, perhaps three, questions in the issue that Mr. Graham Wallas raises under the above title, which, in the interest of the clear thinking which he rightly demands in the relations between the State and the Universities, it is well to keep distinct. There is the question of the requirement of the Education Department of a course of training which shall prepare students to give instruction in Biblical teaching, and there is the question of the manner, time, and other conditions under which the requirement has been made. Beyond these there is the further question of inspection and method of enforcement.

1. With regard to the time and manner, I think that there can be no doubt that the Board of Education would have done well to take the principals and teachers in training colleges, and of the Universities or University Colleges to which they are attached, into its confidence, explaining precisely what is wanted, and consulting them as to the best way of achieving it. More particularly we should have a right to expect ample time for re-adjustment of curricula and preparation on the part of those who are to be made responsible for this new form of instruction. If the matter is so important as to justify the new departure, it surely demands the utmost care in its initiation. As there is still time, it is to be hoped that the mistake that has here been made may still be rectified, in the interest of the logic of good feeling, which Mr. Runciman respects, if not of the syllogism which he despises.

2. The requirement itself is, as Mr. Wallas sees, a question of a larger logic. This is not the place to enter into a general discussion of the place of religious ideas in education. In view of the inevitableness of the present discussion, I have taken occasion to write of it elsewhere. What I here desire is to draw attention to a further distinction, which is somewhat obscured in Mr. Wallas's article, the distinction between what might be logical and desirable under other circumstances, e.g., a national system of secular education, and what is logical and desirable under present conditions. I hold no brief for the present system, but merely accept the fact that, in the great majority of elementary, as well as secondary, schools, Biblical instruction is an obtrusive fact. It not only exists as a fact, but by far the most important fact of the time-table, whether for good or evil. This being so, what is to be said for a system of training which prepares, or tries to prepare, the student for every other subject and leaves this to chance—that takes every care that its students shall be adequate teachers of singing and sewing and cooking, but bestows no thought on their power of touching the deeper ethical and religious feelings? What I wish to submit is that there is no logic of any kind in such a system, and that only two alternatives are open to those who would seek to mend it: either the abolition of all attempt at direct ethical and religious teaching in the schools, or the courageous effort to meet the difficulty on the best available lines by the directors of our training colleges. I have no particular opinion as to the comparative eligibility of these two alternatives. I should merely like to add that it will be a great mistake to assume, as is usually done, that the first of them will make an end of the religious difficulty as far as training colleges are concerned. If the religious lesson is abolished, it will be all the more incumbent on those who are responsible for the training of teachers to see that they go forward to their work with some clear and constructive ideas as to the end that the old religious lesson sought to accomplish, and this will involve the treatment in their class-rooms of the great ideas that underlie the most inspired portions of Scripture. From this point of view I cannot think that Mr. Wallas would regard it as an adequate definition of the function of the State with regard to our Universities: "to abolish restrictions and provide adequate material resources." On the contrary it seems to me wholly in accordance with modern ideas that it should add to these the function of constructive suggestion as to the best means of realising the larger human ends of education. This, indeed, is the point of view from which the new departure may be most helpfully regarded, viz., as a call to the Universities to make prominent in their teaching the ideas as to the relation of human souls to one another, and to the eternal verities of life that underlie all the great religions, and thus to prepare the way for a better understanding between rival creeds and rival sects under the same nominal creed. In no other way could proper effect be given to the minute, and I can conceive no better effect.

3. With regard to the question of inspection, I have always been an uncompromising advocate of the freedom of the teacher, and would extend to the schoolmaster in this department the same liberty that I claim for the University lecturer. From this point of view Mr. Wallas seems to me to be entirely right in calling attention to the danger of subjecting the teaching which the Universities under this clause may decide to give, to the official control of inspectors who may have little or no insight into its aims and methods.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—When a man of Mr. Graham Wallas's great experience writes of "a revolution in education," readers of THE NATION may well be alarmed at his words. I sincerely trust that just respect for Mr. Wallas may not lead them to be carried away by the force of his invective and to misunderstand Mr. Runciman's most recent administrative act, which should prove of the greatest utility to education. For, indeed, the new Regulations on the Training of Teachers may be said to mark a stage in the development of a happier relationship between the State and the problems of religious education with which it has to deal. To the entrance arrangements of denominational training colleges I do not propose to refer: the particular compromise embodied in the Regulations may well give way before long to something better. Mr. Wallas centres his attack on the provision which requires that, in the future, all training colleges shall provide a course of religious instruction in their curriculum, accordingly making this a duty for all local education authorities which have established training colleges of their own. It should be pointed out that this course is not to be compulsory upon the students, and that the Government Inspector is merely directed to see that such a course is provided, and that the instruction is given in a suitable way, without inquiring further into the subject matter. There is every latitude left to the different college authorities to adopt various courses of instruction, nor is it in the least likely that any monotonous uniform system will result.

On the other hand the gain to college life and to the majority of students will be enormous. As Mr. Wallas says, very few local education authorities at present make any provision for such teaching in their colleges. It is obviously unsatisfactory that one school subject only, and that the most important of all, should be omitted from the curriculum of the young men and women who are being trained as teachers. The vast majority of these future teachers, in the ordinary course of their work, will give daily lessons on the Bible to their classes. Why may they not have the benefit, while they are being trained, of teaching which may help to make these lessons not only more interesting, but truer, less conventional, and far more useful to the children? If it is desired to omit the Bible entirely from the school programme, it is, of course, quite logical to object to Mr. Runciman's new Regulations. But, if the Bible is to be maintained in the schools at all, it is surely necessary that the teacher should receive the best possible equipment for teaching it. One of the best ways to make religious and biblical teaching unprofitable, unreal, and insincere, is to prevent the teachers from having opportunities during their training of coming into touch with the most recent research, and learning themselves (as henceforth they may), from the example of the greatest modern biblical scholars, how reverence and sincere regard for truth may be combined in the study of a history and a literature to which Christian and Agnostic agree in according a unique place of importance.

Mr. Wallas is rightly jealous of the freedom of University teaching. But surely the day of obscurantist intolerance is past. Can he imagine the principal of the London Day Training College being forbidden to allude to higher criticism in a course of Biblical Study? It is a very significant fact that Manchester University, which no one can suspect of clerical domination, has recently sanctioned the inclusion of classes on religious instruction in the course for the training of teachers. And here is seen the importance of the step just taken by Mr. Runciman. We are developing to a wider and more tolerant view of the relation of the State to religious life than that held in the negative liberalism, the child of the French Revolution, which was a protest against the intolerant claims which were made by the ecclesiasticism of a byegone age. The liberal state of the future will not simply cut out from its purview all the highest aspects of life and all its deepest problems by refusing to recognise the existence of religious communities and religious questions. Recognising that religion (whether it be Positivism or Christianity) is an integral part of the lives of its citizens, it cannot simply ignore its existence, but its educational system will allow, within the national framework, the utmost possible freedom of development, of religious conviction. In the hope of such a fruitful synthesis of the varying forms of religious belief which go to make up our national life, we may surely welcome most warmly the action of Mr. Runciman.—Yours, &c.,

T. Edmund Harvey.

"THE POWER TO SUPPRESS OPINION."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Many of your readers must have wondered, as they read the article under this title in your last issue, how it could be that such sane reflections should find a place in pages usually so strongly colored with the fallacies of non-resistance? Can it be that Liberals, who do not wish to insult the Tsar one day and invite him to limit his armaments the next, are at last to find a supporter among your contributors? True, the writer does not draw the obvious deduction and show how the instances where tyranny has triumphed over truth and those brighter pages of history which tell the Victories of Light over Darkness all point to the same political moral, to wit, that he who wills the end must will the means. If we aim at spiritual greatness only, and have no wish for national glory, we should, to be consistent, covet the agony and bloody sweat, the scourgings and crucifixions of the patriots of Russia. If, on the other hand, our Kingdom of Heaven is of this World, then must the Servants of Truth fight, and fight as Cromwell fought, as Hoche and Lafayette fought, as Washington and Lincoln fought, as Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi fought, and as, in these last days, the Young Turks have fought. Mill's "Melancholy note of disillusionment' may sound a call to arms and not the funeral dirge of freedom if Liberals hear its warning, and are not tempted to despair, but nerved to action. As a free nation it is excellent to have a giant's strength, a supreme sea-power, an effective army of the Empire. It is the use of that giant's strength to bully, instead of to protect, that Liberals are by their principles pledged to protest against, and if, sir, the sad reflections on the power of force to suppress opinion, voiced in your recent article, lead some of us to direct our energies to the denunciation of oppression, rather than of armaments, our national prestige and imperial power may, in the future, as in the past, do something to ensure that Truth in the day of Trial shall prevail even in the Darkest places of the Earth.—Yours, &c.,

THE CHINESE AND MILITARISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your fascinating article under the title "How Ah Sin Sang" in the issue of April 10th, are one or two statements that need slight qualification. "The Chinese honor the man of peace and despise the soldier" is in danger of becoming obsolete, however true it may have been in the past. Military drill is being rapidly introduced into the Chinese Government Schools, and even into many Mission Schools. The Chinese are as keen on a big navy as some of the nations of the West, and are only held back by lack of money from building a strong fleet. Further, quite recently an edict has been issued favoring conscription, and proposing four years' compulsory service under arms.

A month ago we threw open our school playground for a combined display, on the part of all the schools in this city, of athletic sports, and one, at least, of the Chinese schools wished to give an exhibition of rifle drill, but receiving from us an expression of opinion that this was not in accordance with our principles as Quakers, they very courteously substituted something more peaceful for it. Their drill instructors, however, were all dressed in military garb, which is far from having the appearance of "rags or anything." In fact, many of the military officers whom I have seen are dressed almost as neatly as, though somewhat more quietly than, a European officer.

In view of all these preparations for war, it can no longer be said of the Chinese, as it can be said of their poets of old, that "their songs are of peace, and war is mentioned only with abhorrence."—Yours, &c.,

WILD-ROSE TIME.

O no one, no one knows
Why I wear a wild-rose:
Not even I who wear it
Could tell you all it shows.

Surely it shows the thorn
On which my life is torn;
Surely it hints the sweetness
Too bitter to be borne.

Love's handwriting, I think,
Scribbled its blossom pink;
Your white soul was his paper,
And my life-blood his ink.

And in a childish tongue
He wrote a magic song;
And only I may sing it,
Who cannot live for long.

Yet would to God I might Perfect one pure delight;
And not go empty-hearted
Into the outer night.

O no one, no one knows
Why I wear the wild-rose.

HOW TO READ THE BIBLE.*

THE standpoint of this book is what is called the "New Theology," a theology to which little but its name can be objected, and to the author's conclusion that "the Bible will always keep its place as the most precious treasure ever inherited by any 'people of the Book,' and will vindicate more and more against its ignorant, misled, or wilful misinterpreters of the past its claim to be a still living record of the struggle of man towards purity, freedom, and light," few will take exception. The reasoning by which it is reached may not always command assent. Whatever was the case with Puritanism, it cannot be said that the Reformation "laid hold of the soul" of the English people with any great "thoroughness of penetration": the Papacy, indeed, was never popular in this country—Englishmen dislike foreigners—but up to the accession of James I. half the nation inclined rather to the unreformed than to the reformed religion. The reason why the Medieval Church withheld the Bible from the people was not "reverence for the Word" carried to "fetichistic superstition," but a reluctance to invite a test of its teaching and practice by Scripture; while to class the Church of England with the "Greek and Roman Churches" as holding the ecclesiastical as opposed to the Evangelical view of Christianity, and as teaching that "one essential condition of communion with God is union with the Church, access to her sacraments, and obedience to her behests," is at least in contradiction to Articles 6, 18, 19, and 20. We have no doubt that what Mr. Picton means is that there are many English Churchmen who hold the opinions to which he refers, and he might fairly add that it was the teaching of the dominant party in the Anglican Communion. But such teaching is not yet established as that of the English Church. The sacerdotalism which underlies it was deliberately rejected by our Reformers. Hooker is classed as a "High" Churchman. But his contention against the Puritans was not that Episcopacy is necessary, but that it is not unlawful; while, of the Ordinal in the Book of Common Prayer, Article 36 declares, not that those otherwise ordained are not lawful ministers—for what constitutes a lawful minister, see Article 23—but that it contains nothing "that of itself is superstitious or ungodly." Mr. Picton identifies the Pauline gospel of the Resurrection of Christ with the belief held by the writers, or editors, of the Canonical Gospels in the resuscitation of His body and its coming forth from the tomb. "In him—Paul—a sincere belief that a questionable event has happened is a sure passport to salvation." Whatever its place in later theology, this surely was not the position of St. Paul, for whom the Resurrection of Christ meant the fact of His risen life, and faith the conviction of this fact; who did not know Christ "after the flesh." Mr. Picton adopts the opinion of certain scholars, mainly Dutch, of whom Professor van Manen is the best known, who deny the Pauline authorship of the Epistle to the Romans. This opinion has not found much favor in Germany, even with the advanced school. Writing in Joannes Weiss's "Schriften des Neuen Testaments" (1908), Professor Jülicher says, "The authenticity of the Epistle to the Romans can be questioned only by those who are prepared to take the personality of Paul out of history." With regard to the content of this epistle, the assertion of the Augustinian-Calvinist interpretation of Chapters IX., X., and XI. should not pass without question. The argument of the writer has to do not with the eternal destiny of souls, but with the vocation of the Jews to the acceptance of the Gospel. By those who approach the letter without preconceived opinions—a difficult thing to do—this can scarcely be doubted; the best corrective to the traditional commentary is the text. In urging the Jewish origin of the Christian sacraments, again, Mr. Picton is opposed by Pfleiderer, Bousset, and Loisy: and, as regards the Eucharist at least, their conclusion seems the more probable.

Mr. Picton is alive, and very rightly, to the mischief that has been done to religion by taking the Bible statically and as a fixed quantity; by reading the history of the Hebrew Patriarchs, according to an unfortunate phrase of St. Jerome, "for example of life and instruction of manners." This is pre-eminently not the reason why they should be read. Admiranda potius quam imitanda: times, men, manners—all have changed. The Christian of to-day who proposed to sacrifice his son in obedience to a revelation would find himself in a lunatic asylum; if he carried out his intention, he would, very properly, be hanged. But it is the survival of primitive standards that is mischievous, not their existence in their own time. They were an advance on previous custom; slavery is better than massacre or cannibalism; and in the legend referred to the opportune appearance and substitution of the ram show that the practice of human sacrifice was repugnant to the mind of the writer, and, if not extinct, on the way to extinction. To speak of the story as "demoralising," to see in the records of primitive usage "the coarse recitals of a barbarous age," is to miss the point. These records were meant for a wider public than that of England in the twentieth century. The morality with which they present us is relative: so, we may remind ourselves, is our own. It is probable that the men of the future will regard certain features of our civilisation—our wars, our prisons, our workhouses—in much the same light as we do the barbarism of the Middle Ages or the savagery of primitive times. "The times of this ignorance God winked at." It is the part of modesty for us to do so also; for we too are men.

How flat, how untrue to life would be a Bible which represented the man of "the antique world" as occupying the standpoint of a modern philanthropist! For this standpoint, excellent as it is in its place, is particular, not universal; it does not exhibit life. The Bible is a very old book: it reflects the mind of many generations, and depicts the slow, often at the time imperceptible, but unbroken development of mankind. The thoughts of the prophets and warriors of Israel were not our thoughts: "the time of figs" was not yet. Morality and knowledge are progressive; but in each case, the past conditions the present, which cannot be reached or understood unless the intermediate steps have been taken; it is impossible to pass per saltum to the goal. There are passages in the Old Testament which, in themselves, are disedifying reading: few, left to their own discretion, would include them in a lectionary meant for public use. Yet their omission leaves the history a blur: the Old Theology was the more truthful; it showed us the men and women of the Bible as they were. An Elijah was not built on the lines of an evangelical curate; a Paul would have been ill at ease in the University pulpit, or even in the City Temple: to criticise them on this account is to confuse standards; they were of another age.

The root of this confusion is that those who make it read scripture with "the veil upon their heart," forgetting that, if there is one fact clearly brought out in its pages and in history as a whole, it is this: that God loves a man who is a man. The resolute will, the strong head, the clear purpose—these things are after His heart.

> "For still the Lord is Lord of might;
> In deeds, in deeds, he takes delight;
> The plough, the spear, the laden barks,
> The field, the founded city marks."

The Old Testament worthies are not types of humanitarianism. They were men who struck hard, and were not over scrupulous. Their ethics were probably neither much above nor much below those of their contemporaries. We should find their counterparts to-day in the Bedouin camp or the Arab village; in the Emir, the Mahdi, the Dervish of the East. So, too, in the Christian Church. Its great figures—a Theodosius, a Pepin, a Charles the Great—were not pietists. Loud-voiced rather, and choleric; men of blood and thunder, used rather to the camp and the battle-axe than the cloister and the pen. Power meant much to them; ideas little. They moulded abstract theory, undisguisedly enough, according to the exigencies of concrete fact. And so throughout. An Elizabeth, a Cromwell, a Cavour, a Bismarck—such are the men who uproot tyrannies, disperse darkness, diffuse light. Not professional religionists, but men cast in a big mould, ruthless often enough and high-handed, who loved and hated, purposed and accomplished, who, doing and daring, lived life out to the full. To criticise them from a standpoint which was not theirs is easy, but beside the point. The question is: Did they stand for light or darkness; for truth or falsehood; for right or wrong? If for the former—well, a man's life is to be judged as a whole.

It is because the Bible is, in this sense, in touch with life and with the kernel of things that it is invulnerable. "Jerusalem est sortie plus brilliante et plus belle du travail en apparence destructeur de la science moderne; les pieux récits dont on a berçé notre enfance sont devenus grâce à une saine interpretation de hautes vérités, et c'est à nous qui voyons Israel dans sa réelle beauté, c'est à nous autres critiques qu'il appartient vraiment de dire, Stantes erunt pedes nostri in atriis tuis, Jerusalem." Its unequalled and inexhaustible power over men comes not from its harmony with later science and morality. In vain do we attempt to reconcile it with either: a gulf divides the two. Its secret is that we have in it what the early Church called "the word of prophecy"; that the religious instinct at its strongest and purest is there. And—Digitus Dei est hic. As Mr. Picton well puts it,

> "We must accept as a fact proved by the experience of three thousand years that the Jews had what we can only describe as a special genius for religion. . . . For Mahommedanism is at best but a pale plagiarism of undeveloped Hebrew religion. And though the Christian Church, an offshoot of Judaism, can boast great saints, theosophists and preachers, its Origens and Augustines and Luthers and Calvins are mere spiritual pygmies when contrasted with the Isaiahs, the Psalmists, the Evangelists, or St. Paul. Why it should be so is simply an unanswerable question. We might as well ask why Greece was so pre-eminent in literature, art or philosophy, and Republican Rome, on the other hand, in war, jurisprudence, and polity. The characteristics were in the soul of the people. But why they were so is a question the solution of which requires a greater knowledge of the interaction between them and the Universe than is ever likely to be attained."

A FRIEND OF BYRON.*

The material out of which these two volumes have been composed consists partly of extracts from the five volumes of Recollections which Lord Broughton printed, but did not publish, and from diaries that he left, and partly of extracts from his published works, such as his "Letters from Paris during the last Reign of Napoleon." Lady Dorchester has woven these extracts into a narrative. The volume now published ends at 1822; there is, therefore, reason to hope that more "Recollections" are to be given to the world later.

Lord Rosebery, in his brief and happy preface to these volumes, says that John Cam Hobhouse was the high priest of the Byron mystery. "Those who saw him in his old age—and he lived to be eighty-three—regarded him with unspeakable interest as one who knew all and could tell all if he chose. But he did not choose to tell." The volumes now published do not break that silence, though they contain, in full, the detailed account of the history of the separation, which Hobhouse prepared as a defence of Byron and of Byron's friends. That account cannot be said to throw much further light on the questions raised by Lord Lovelace, though it helps to show the kind of impression that Byron's temper and conversation might be expected to produce in a circle where they were not familiar or congenial. Throughout these painful proceedings Hobhouse was at Byron's elbow, sparing himself no trouble or unpleasantness. A year earlier he had stood by Byron's side in the quiet and unemotional wedding which ended with this explosion, and we have a full account of his experiences. Here is a characteristic entry on their journey to Seaham: "Off at twelve. Went as far as Newark in snow and rain. . . . Read the new Gibbon—delightful. The bridegroom more and more less impatient. . . . Never was lover less in haste." Hobhouse's friendship with Byron was honorable alike to his spirit and his constancy. He was no flatterer, and his criticisms of "Don Juan" nearly ended in its suppression. His loyalty stood every test, even a harder test than the odium that every associate of Byron's had to face at one time in his life. In 1819 Hobhouse got into prison for a breach of privilege, due, as he explains, to a misunderstanding of a sentence in his pamphlet replying to Erskine's "Defence of the Whigs." Byron chose his friend's misfortune as the opportunity for making merry at his expense in a malicious ballad. Hobhouse remarks of this incident, "I am exceedingly unwilling to record this proof of the nature of my friend. He thought me in prison; he knew me attacked by all parties and pens; he resolved to give his kick too. . . . Yet for a man to give way to such a mere itch of writing against one who has stood by him in all his battles, and never refused a single friendly office, is a melancholy proof of want of feeling. It has, at any rate, affected the mirage through which I have long looked at this singular man, and I know not that it is in the power of any suite of circumstances hereafter to make me think of him again exactly as I thought of him before." Byron had written to Murray, "Give the enclosed song to Hobhouse. I know he will never forgive me, but I cannot help it. I have no patience with him and his ragamuffins for getting him into quod." But the breach was repaired, and Hobhouse contented himself with telling Byron that he was "a shabby fellow." So the friendship that had begun at Cambridge, and was developed in the travels of 1809, which are here described with some lifelike touches, such as Byron's sulking over questions of precedence, or the scratching of their names by Byron and Hobhouse on marble pillars at Delphi, goes on to the end of the chapter.

Besides being Byron's chief friend, Hobhouse is an interesting figure in the politics of the first half of the nineteenth century, and many would have hoped to find in these volumes some glimpses into the Radical movement. In this respect the "Recollections" are disappointing. There is a great deal of introspection in the book, for Hobhouse could rarely let his birthday pass without lecturing himself on his shyness and his failures ("I have read nothing and done nothing"), but we never see into the play of feeling and reason that made him a Radical. It is true that he describes in 1820 the reforms to which he devoted himself: Parliamentary Reform, a Factory Bill, Vestry Reform, and the modification of the Quarantine Laws, but though we get occasionally a remark like this in the Diary, "Dined in Trinity College. Heard they have been throwing a collector of the Property Tax out of the window at St. Ives," the book says singularly little about domestic politics. It says more about foreign politics, and this is natural, seeing that his enthusiasm for Napoleon took Hobhouse to Paris for the last flash of the Hundred Days. "Regarding Napoleon and his warriors as the partisan of the cause of peoples against the conspiracy of kings," he wrote in the "Last Reign," "whatever may be my regret that that cause has not fallen into hands so pure as to command unqualified support, I cannot help wishing that the French may meet with as much success as will not compromise the military character of my own countrymen. But, as an Englishman, I will not be witness to their triumphs: as a lover of liberty I would not be a spectator of their reverses." His case, like that of Chateaubriand on the other side, forms a curious study in the difficulties that face a patriot when his country seems to him to fight under the wrong flag on a gigantic issue.

The chief interest of the book, apart from Byron, consists in its descriptions and stories of Hobhouse's contemporaries. His journal is, in this respect, something like Rogers' Table Talk. It is less racy than the Creevey Papers, but it contains some good sketches and anecdotes. Here is a good story of Erskine. The Emperor Alexander, when Erskine was introduced to him, said that he had read every word of Erskine's great defence of Hardy. Erskine was about to describe the scene, a task he would have greatly enjoyed, when he noticed that his nearest neighbor was Grenville, who could hardly be expected to share his enjoyment. There are several stories to illustrate Erskine's vanity and eccentricities, and one—relating how he induced Madame Tallien to allow him to release a tame stag that was to be hunted, by telling her she could not possibly enjoy such cruel sport—to illustrate his well-known tenderness for animals. There is a gruesome story of the visit of Lady Bessborough to Sheridan three days before his death, and of the terror which she felt of him. "He took her hand and gripped it hard, then he told her that he gave her that token to assure her that, if possible, he would come to her after he was dead. Lady Bessborough was frightened, and said that he had persecuted her all his life, and would now carry his persecution into death. Why should he do so? 'Because,' said Sheridan, 'I am resolved you shall remember me.'" Sheridan told Hobhouse that the whole plan of the "Rolliad" was the work of Lawrence, who also wrote some of the poetry, that Fitzpatrick was the poet of the concern, and that he (Sheridan) never wrote a line but gave hints. There are some descriptions of Grattan's mimicry of orators. Grattan said that Pitt the younger was "a better rhetorician than his father . . that Chatham's manner, except when he was roused, was colloquial." But the best story in the book was told by Lady Byron's father, Sir Ralph Milbanke, when Hobhouse was staying at his house for the unlucky wedding. The hero was a sycophantic bishop, who, when a tutor at Oxford, thus began a remark to Lord Hampden, "The friendship which I have for my Lord, your father; my respect for my Lord, the Bishop, your uncle; and the peculiar situation in which I stand with my Lord God."

THE BEGINNINGS OF BELIEF.*

THE heresy from which deliverance should be sought is the denial of continuity in human thought and action, since this is to import discord into a universe of unbroken order. Man, at the core of him, is the same everywhere, and observation of what seems to us his vagaries brings home how superficial are the changes which time has wrought since he expressed, in outward and visible signs, his philosophy of things—for such it was in the making. He remains a creature of instinctive impulses inherited from the lower animals; as an emotional being, his antiquity is dateless; as a reasoning being, he is a late product. And whatever he has evolved in thought, and put into practice, has justified its existence wherever his needs have responded thereto.

Such reflections are suggested by the reading of a book, slim only in bulk, as becomes an expanded lecture, wherein its learned and indefatigable author essays "Psyche's Task" in the sorting out of the seeds of good from the seeds of evil. Packed with examples in proof of its thesis, it shows what a necessary and useful place superstition has filled in the history of institutions. Dismissing those which are purely ecclesiastical, as foreign to his present purpose, Dr. Frazer selects government, private property, marriage, and regard for human life as the fundamental bases of society, and demonstrates what "soul of goodness" lies in these substructures. As to the first of the four, there is no difficulty in showing that the awe in which the lower races hold their chiefs has its source mainly in the belief that the latter possess magical or other occult powers, whereby they can influence the unseen, and, therefore, the dreaded—a belief which, crediting them with power to heal diseases, survived for centuries in this country in the custom of being touched by royalty for scrofula, or the "King's evil," and which had further and more remarkable development in the deification of Oriental monarchs, and, copying them, of Roman emperors. But what Dr. Frazer is concerned to show is the effect of such a belief in consolidating an institution on the strength of which depends the enforcement of order necessary to the existence of every State, large or small, savage or civilised.

His more elaborate studies have familiarised us with the often intricate tabus hedging a King's divinity, and the security which these afford to the retention of land and chattels has abundant example in his second chapter. Curses and charms and all other apparatus of the sorcerer are more effective than the prosaic "Trespassers will be prosecuted," because the punishment which may follow the thief or usurper is more terrible than the payment of a fine for damages or "doing time." He is kept in check by the fear that some horrible disease will follow the stealing of his neighbor's yams, or that he may go hag-ridden for the rest of his life if he stealthily removes his neighbor's landmark. The element of tabu was probably not absent from the conception of the god Terminus, to whom, as protector of boundaries, a place by the side of Jupiter was accorded on the Capitol. The examples of sympathetic magic in the shape of belief that irregular sexual relations will disastrously affect the success of the crops, with which Dr. Frazer fills many pages of "The Golden Bough," have their significance focussed in the chapter on marriage. Therein are explained the punishments with which incontinence is visited, and the consequent encouragement of orderly connections, although, contrasted with the complex restrictions on marriage which savage codes embody, the table of degrees in our Prayer Book is simplicity itself.

Only hints of the significance of Dr. Frazer's researches are given in the first edition of "The Golden Bough"; a larger courage has expression in the later issues; and this has example in the qualifying paragraph which precedes his argument on the enormous value of the belief in a future life as a protection against murder.

> "It might be maintained that no belief has done so much to retard the economic, and thereby the social, progress of Mankind as the belief in the immortality of the soul, for this belief has led race after race, generation after generation, to sacrifice the real wants of the living to the imaginary wants of the dead. The waste and destruction of life and property which this faith has entailed are enormous and incalculable. But I am not here concerned with the disastrous and deplorable consequences, the unspeakable follies and crimes and miseries, which have flowed in practice from the theory of a future life."

What stands to the undoubted credit of that belief is its deterrent influence on the would-be murderer, not because he is reluctant to kill any one, but because he is afraid of the dead man's ghost. And the belief that the ghost may wreak vengeance on the tribe to which the murderer belongs creates a feeling shaping primitive criminal codes embodying ideas of the sanctity of human life. In this connection Dr. Frazer aptly cites the story of Orestes, who was driven from one land to another, not so much because he had killed his mother, but because of the peril to others brought by him who was pursued by her Erinnyes. "The fear of ghosts is widespread, perhaps universal, among savages; it is hardly extinct among ourselves. If it were extinct, some learned societies might put up their shutters." Wherein lies a moral which the more credulous among psychical researchers may ponder over.

COLLECTED AND NEW POEMS.*

WHEN a poet arrives at the dignity of "collected poems," it may, as a rule, be taken as a verdict in itself; and in these hasty days the reviewer will, perhaps, more conveniently take up his space with close considerations of new work. Two poetesses come before us here in collected editions, Dora Sigerson Shorter and Louise Chandler Moulton, and in both cases we can easily say that the implied verdict is deserved. The lover of poetry will be glad to possess, in single volumes, the work of two such genuine singers. Of the two, we should say that the acid of Time will prove Mrs. Shorter's work to contain the more insoluble stuff. At her best, when she is singing Irish legend and specifically Irish sentiment, she gives us something that is not easy to parallel, not even in the more elaborate art of her island's more famous poets. Her lyric is often a wonderfully musical and poignant cry. Mrs. Moulton, however, for all her charm, shares her qualities with many singers. And she does not often force her womanly emotion sufficiently into the rigor of poetic style; and there is little art where there is little rigor. Neither of these poetesses, indeed, ever achieved a very notable style; but Mrs. Moulton, being more universal in her matter than Mrs. Shorter, was much more in need of a style. However, though our grandsons may not know the names of Dora Sigerson Shorter and Louise Chandler Moulton, that is no reason why we should not take what pleasure we may from their works; and the pleasure is considerable. And, as regards Dora Sigerson, if we were in the mood to prophesy, we should be inclined to say that our sons will forget her, but that our grandsons will rediscover her with surprise and delight. But this is risky work. We cannot object to Mr. Laurence Housman's poems that they are lacking in rigor of style; indeed, this volume of his "Selected Poems" confirms an impression that his poetry is, on the whole, too ingenious. But that is vastly better than a slack craftsmanship. Rhyme occasionally becomes with Mr. Housman more a puzzle than an instrument of music; but poetry so subtle, so fastidiously worded, and at times of such exquisite simplicity, could carry, without being overburdened, a good many more faults than the most scrupulous critic can find in it. The series of lyrics called "Rue" is among the purest poesy that our generation has heard; it is much deeper in emotion, though, on the whole, perhaps less felicitous in expression, than that other, more famous, lyric series which also bears the name of Housman. There are many songs from "Rue" we should like to quote, especially that one which begins:—

"If you must do the thing you fear,
I would I were the sin,
To knock against your heart, my dear,
Until you let me in."

But, after all, Mr. Laurence Housman's work is known to all who love poetry; we need say no more than that the best of his work is to be found in these "Selected Poems."

We now come to a volume that is, at any rate, exciting. "Betelguese," by Mr. Louis De Esque, is described as "A Trip Through Hell"; and certainly the poem would make an admirable hell for a philologist. Never, we suppose, has a book contained so many misprints—we hope they are misprints; but we have some suspicion that the author does not perfectly understand English, or, indeed, grammar at large, as when he says in his introduction, "its nebulæ is slowly but surely disappearing." The poem is dedicated to

"Those that felt the wand of Muse—Queen Posy's shaft of subtle art," and also to those that have "shed dim tears in Sorrow's pew."

Owing to the unusual richness of Mr. De Esque's vocabulary, we cannot always reckon ourselves susceptible to Queen Poesy's shaft as Mr. De Esque shoots it. The reader shall judge for himself. Thus it opens:—

"Caressed by crystal dew and light,
Beyond the realm of scale and fin,
Incarian Thought flits Fancy wings,
To hazards where a crimson win
Makes scarlet this eternal height."

Incarian Thought, flitting Fancy wings, soon perceives (we are already in hell) that

"Where pixies dance on wind-blown strands, Lurke gyte incubi in a hall."

And, perceiving this, Incarian Thought exclaims:—

"Here, then, reigns gyving, batter'd Doom!
Where shadows vague and coffined light
Spit broths from splintered wracks and domes."

The fun now increases, and it is not long before we reach a person called Figgum (afterwards, no doubt justly, called "strange Figgum"); and round this gentleman

"Medeas in this vast plain,
Who blink at yon dysodile lamps,
Slap thenars and each bifurcous
As javels drink from scyphus' bright."

We pass "an immarcescible peak," and after shouldering our way amid "faffling gawks," "gangrel imps," "gyving hoodlums," and "skinless nudes," where, moreover, "afreets prance on blister'd sand," and "jarbling gumps ride hydras green," and another party "sweats cesspools" (a vigorous phrase), we come to a place

"Where syrt sucks jargling javels mad,
And carcants cast a luring light
From mildewed screes and mounts that scyle
Veiled angueries of battling Hell,
A charnel shard assails the damned
Thro' vapours green and siffling night;
Monastic caverns rasp each isle;
A poisoned skink croaks from a well."

In fact, as the author says,

"In vain we seek an isle of peace
Beyond the pale of siffling Doom!"

The only agreeable thing about this hell seems to be that

"Here Pat McCarrens filch no vote,
A Grady eats no mellow pea,
A Murphy owns no City Hall."

But against that there are "wowed witches with a gorce's lust," "noctivagous lepers," and "figent gawks," that "sken at a gnome":—

"Whilst scarn assails the morning light
And gumps haste to the Dawn's first show."

But enough; we should not laugh in Bedlam.

We are thankful to turn to Mr. John Garth's "Psyche." Here there are gentleness and quiet music, an unstrained beauty of phrase, and sane conception. "Psyche" is not a great poem, but it is a pleasant one; there are few memorable images or similes in it, no astonishing thought. It is rather like William Morris's narrative poetry, without Morris's frequent leaps into lyric. We shall hardly read the poem again; but we shall remember that we have read it. Mr. Garth's miscellaneous poems are not so good, but the serious ones have some solemnity of diction. There is much keener fragrance of poetry in the lyrics of Miss Cunnington's "Roses and Shamrock." The title would seem to imply that we must look for some blending of English and Celtic spirit in these poems; and unless we mistake it is noticeable. This, called "England," is surely a charming piece of fantasy:—

"Give me a book, and let it be
All lustrous-leaved and silver-writ;
Its binding fair the restless sea;
Let wild birds o'er its edges flit.
Let there be townships pictured there,
Drawn in their daily home-spun dress;
And moorlands in their purple fair,
Vast pleasant halls of idleness."

Miss Lawrence Alma Tadema is another lyricist who has something more than skill. In these "Few Lyrics" she sings of children, of "The Earth's Face," and of "The Heart." The nature-pieces are the best. There is in them that vivid observation of small things which the earth demands of her singers, as in this couplet:—

"The lapwings quiver in the sky,
Their breasts are stars as they turn on high."

But here is a delightfully playful verse:—

"Dame Hedge has got her mantle green
With never a speck upon it,
Her ferny feet show flowers between,
Her arms are filled with nests unseen,
And a thrush sings in her bonnet."

Mr. Morley Steynor is not, we think, well advised to write tragedies on "The Idylls of The King." It would seem that he has read up his subject in Malory, but the spirit of his play is Tennysonian. Only a poet of consummate ability should dare to handle Arthurian legend; and this Mr. Steynor is not. His touch is uncertain; indeed, the words seldom acknowledge him for master. Yet he has some power of presenting character, and might write a tolerable play if he would break away from the five-act form, which his talent cannot fill, and choose some unambitious subject.

We are now arrived at a music more stirring than delicate lutings, a grave melody sustained by elaborate harmony—Mrs. Edith Wharton's poems. The title, "Artemis to Actaeon," sounds as if it might be classicism; but it is no such thing. The book is modernity; and to be properly modern is perhaps the best thing that poetry can be. Here we have the perplexities and assurances of modern thought put into music—into a music, however, which is constructed after the unchanging traditional manner. Mrs. Wharton has the insight into words, the swift startling visualisation, the power to form thought as well as speech, and the rest of the poet's needments. Two of the poems in the volume deal in the often-used pieces of Greek mythology, the tale of Actaeon and the tale of Orpheus. But Mrs. Wharton pours a new blood into them. As she handles them, these events happened but yesterday, and have a significance for us which subsists not only in their beauty. The best things, however, in the book, are a sonnet-series called "The Mortal Lease" and a magnificent rhapsody called "Life." The eight sonnets of "The Mortal Lease" describe the confused war between the elemental passion of love and the modern "sad self-knowledge"—with its obstinate questionings and acute perception of the "unintelligible world's" weight. The poetry all through is admirable. The second sonnet seems to contain the essence of the matter; here is the octet:—

> "Because our kiss is as the moon to draw
> The mounting waters of that red-lit sea
> That circles brain with sense, and bids us be
> The playthings of an elemental law,
> Shall we forego the deeper touch of awe
> On love's extremest pinnacle, where we,
> Winging the vistas of infinity,
> Gigantic on the mist our shadows saw?"

But the lover also feels the perplexities of human history in her soul:—

> "How can I be to you the nymph who danced > Smooth by Ilissus as the plane-tree's bole,
> Or how the Nereid whose drenched lashes glanced
> Like sea-flowers through the summer sea's long roll—
> I that have also been the nun entranced
> Who night-long held the Bridegroom in her soul?"

The whole poem, however, with its feverish doubts and raptures, ends on a chord of serene beauty:—

> "But other hearts a long, long road doth span,
> From some far region of old works and wars,
> And the weary armies of the thoughts of man
> Have trampled it and furrowed it with scars,
> And sometimes, husht, a sacred caravan > Moves over it alone, beneath the stars."

"The Mortal Lease" is one of the most vital things that English poetry has had of recent years. The quotations we have given will show the reader how rich and well-languaged Mrs. Wharton's thought is. And sometimes she achieves one of those rare phrases which are as vivid as a sensuous image, but yet are above the sensuous:—

> "And that deliberate rashness which beepeaks
> The pondered action passed into the blood."

To quote from the rhapsody "Life" would be to mutilate it. The poem shows how personality is first an instrument for life to play on, but at a supreme moment the positions are reversed, and personality plays music on life. It is a fine poem, which reaches to a noble height of vision and diction. We advise our readers not to miss Mrs. Wharton's poems.

We look for good poetry from Mr. St. John Lucas, and we are seldom disappointed. "Gallio" is a dignified, almost a majestic, poem, owing something of its form to Browning, but full of Mr. Lucas's own inspiration. It tells how before the weary-minded Roman Gallio came the face of Paul the Christian:—

> "His face, his face, beneath whose light my soul
> Saw herself judged; her philosophic robe
> Shrivelled; her dismal weed of self-esteem
> Burnt in the steady flame of those great eyes.
> The man was fire, all fire!"

Mr. Lucas would have been wiser not to have paraphrased St. Paul's own golden speech, but he has seized the topmost moment of Gallio's life with a dramatist's assurance:—

> "Is it not strange, O brother,
> That in this feverish moment men call life,
> This narrow ray betwixt the dark and dark,
> A thousand features that we love or loathe
> Shine, pass, and are forgotten, or remain
> Blurred in the soul's false mirror, till there comes,
> Terrible, without warning, like a fierce
> Amazing star that changes night to noon,
> The Master-face! This Paul the Christian,
> This sword-blade man worn lean and dark with strife,
> . . . . . .
> He was my star!"

Mr. Lucas's blank verse is so good that we wish he would use the medium more often.

UNKNOWN TUSCANY.*

THERE seems to be some law of contraries by which we set out to accomplish a certain thing and usually end in accomplishing something else. Glowing with the enthusiasm that Italy evokes in the breast of most Englishmen, Mr. Edward Hutton has set out to give the "atmosphere" of unknown Tuscany. What he has really done is to illustrate with unusual forcefulness the point of view of the Victorians who went to Italy, were overwhelmed with its beauty, and wrote about their visit in the grand manner. In these days of staccato literature, "fine writing" is so nearly a thing of the past that examples of it strike us as stilted, even affected. But the reader has only to turn to writers of the 'fifties and 'sixties, to Disraeli, Lytton, to Ruskin himself, to see that, in spite of his not over-successful attempt, Mr. Hutton is perfectly sincere. Writing in an English that is now Biblical, now suggestive of a foreign idiom, Mr. Hutton is perhaps least successful in his attempt to convey his own emotions to the reader. Perhaps he is over-anxious; perhaps he leaves too little to the imagination; in any case, his is the art that reveals art. Of far more interest are such chapters as the "History of Abbadia S. Salvatore" and "The New Messiah." In both he gives the spirit of Tuscany old and new, a spirit which has changed but little with the centuries.

Siena and its neighborhood have been explored so thoroughly by devotees of St. Catherine, that there would seem but little material left to a latest enthusiast on the subject. Hitherto, however, history and description have been written from the point of view of Siena herself. We have heard time and again of the factions of Guelph and Ghibelline, of the struggle of Siena with Florence, with Orvieto, with the Pope, of her persistent attempts to crush the power of the nobles, to acquire territory. But from the point of view of the "signerotti," or of the people themselves, practically nothing has been written.

Mont' Amiata, the subject of Mr. Hutton's book, was the southern outpost of the contado of Siena. Here feudalism lingered longer perhaps than in any part of Italy. In Mont' Amiata was the eyrie of the Visconti of Campiglia, the great ecclesiastical "feud" of the Abbots of S. Salvatore, the well-nigh impregnable fortress of Santa Fiora, the capital of the Contea Aldobrandesca. Abbadia S. Salvatore is the most ancient and the most populous of all the villages of Mont' Amiata. The abbey, says the legend, was founded by Rachis, Duke of Friuli, and owed its origin to a belief that shepherds had seen a symbol of the Unity in Trinity high in the branches of a great pine-tree. This happened, said the legend, in May, 742. Whatever its true origin, from the days of the Carlovingians, Popes and Emperors vied with each other in conferring privileges upon the monks. One of the Imperial grants is as early as 816. The Emperor Henry II. took the monastery under his special protection, and decreed that not even a duke should wrong, beat, or oppress its dependents. Such good treatment did not improve the character of the monks, and in 1228 they were expelled from the monastery, and their place was filled by Cistercians.

Near the Abbey rose the Castello or walled village of which the inhabitants were originally the serfs and dependents of the monks. From this dependence they assumed rights of their own, which, three years before Runnymede, were recognised by Pope and Emperor.

This history, together with that of Radicofani, shows Mr. Hutton at his best. At Radicofani may be seen beautiful examples of Della Robbia ware; also a centenarian, steeped in sin, was carried off thence by the devil with concomitant tempest, thunder, and lightning. The next morning the road taken by the couple was covered with toads for seven miles. The country folk tell you that Ghino di Tacco still haunts the place. Ghino was a sort of Robin Hood. It was an injustice of fate which, having preserved him throughout his evil deeds, allowed him to be slain when he had made his peace with Holy Church.

"The New Messiah" is one of those characters which belong to all time. Actually, David Lazzaretti died as late as August, 1878. He was only thirteen when he first heard the voices that later became so insistent, but he was thirty-five before he left his trade and went to Rome. He, too, withdrew to the desert, whence the spirit sent him forth again to preach what he had seen. While despised of some, David had a large following. Those who were incredulous paid him the homage of hatred. He promised his followers a kingdom, by which they understood that they would have a larger share of crops and harvests even than the masters themselves. It was at the head of a great procession that he met an end he had himself foreseen. Nowhere is Mr. Hutton so successful as in his account of this man—the New Messiah. Nowhere does he show so clearly that between myth and fact there is but an invisible borderline.

MR. MASEFIELD'S NEW NOVEL.*

Of all our novelists to-day Mr. Masefield is, perhaps, the most interesting. Others are surer, richer in creative force, but Mr. Masefield's books have the attraction of the unforeseen. As an artist he feeds on the surface of life, but as a poet he lives in the depths, and one can neither predict his point of view nor his development. "Multitude and Solitude," as brilliantly written as "Captain Margaret," deals with the problem that so often vexes the artist's soul—how if the man of action's work, in battling with realities, is far more real than mine in creating visions of life? This old question, put by Mr. Masefield in its modern aspect, "What if Science, so cleanly and fearless, is doing the poet's work, and poetry is a mere antique survival in an age whose revelation is scientific, not artistic?" is one that haunts Roger Naldrett, in the hour of spiritual crisis, when "the old world of the beauty of external image, well-defined, and richly colored, was shattered for him." The answer is double-edged. Roger Naldrett, who finds out "the insufficiency of his soul," abandons the life of a man of letters and sets out for the heart of Africa to study the sleeping sickness; while Mr. Masefield's success in "Multitude and Solitude" proves that to do away with the mirrors of art would be to destroy the most delicate instruments we have for apprehending life's character, for assessing wherefore we succeed or fail in our endeavors.

We are introduced to Roger Naldrett at the moment when his play, "The Roman Matron," is being hissed off the boards of the King's Theatre by a typical London audience of "first nighters." The tension in the heated atmosphere, the nerve of the struggling actors in face of the increasing hostility of the house, the vacuous chatter of smart people, languid people, and stupid people, between the acts, the absurd touch and go-ness of "the failure," precipitated by the cockney humor of a voice from the gallery and the huskiness of an actress, the closing storm of catcalls, whistles, and booings, with the vulgar insensibility of the wreckers angry with "a new mind," all this is rendered with an unerring touch. Equally brilliantly painted are Naldrett's sensations in the next twenty-four hours, when, after struggling in the yeasty tide of friendly commiserations and the omniscient critiques of Messrs. A—Z on the New Drama, which, it seems, like "The Roman Matron," is dull and occasionally disgusting, he misses, by a chapter of accidents, his meeting with Ottilie, the woman he loves, on her passage through London back to her home in Ireland. The feverish triviality of the true Londoner's days, his jaded appetite, the confused stream of his perceptions, and his spiritual cheapness and weariness, this is the mental background against which Naldrett's absorption in his own work of creating beautiful images is hinted at to prepare us for his discovery—that he himself does not know the purifying fires of deep or passionate emotion. The blow falls when, after pursuing Ottilie to Ireland, he learns that she is dead. The packet-boat, "The Lord Ullin," has been run down in a fog, and Ottilie is one of the eleven passengers missing. The stupid accidental irony of life, the meaninglessness of the tragic waste of a rare, beautiful, and gentle character, who is extinguished, while her cousin Agatha, hard and selfish, is saved, is touched upon very lightly, since Roger Naldrett passes swiftly into a mood of spiritual awe and acceptation. So sensitively and beautifully wrought are the passages describing Roger's stay at Ottilie's home, that many readers may fail to account for a puzzling sense as of something lacking. Is it a psychological flaw in the analysis that Mr. Masefield has treated the scene so subjectively that we should scarcely have divined, had we not been told, that Ottilie was really Roger's beloved? On the day of her funeral we find Roger gravely discussing with Ottilie's brother, Leslie, the question of the morality of the life of art and Ottilie's views. Temperamental differences count for much, but we submit that the argument here does not seem natural to the occasion, and that Roger's sense of loss must have passed into active agony. Ottilie's death, however, is the turning point in Roger's career. Chance now throws into his way a new acquaintance, Lionel Heseltine, a young doctor, who has been invalided home after studying the disease of sleeping sickness in the Congo, and Roger, who "wants to rebuild his life for Ottilie," to be worthy of her example, and who has discovered that "writing alone is not enough for a man," proposes that he shall join Lionel as his "sub.," and that the two shall start on a fresh expedition to Africa, in the hope of doing useful work, if not discovering a remedy for the sleeping sickness.

There is, perhaps, an artistic weakness in the structure of the narrative at this stage. We do not mean that the psychological analysis is untrue to life, but that behind its brilliant impressionism there is not enough sense of the cumulative force of nature. Roger's sudden action makes prominent the central thesis of the book, viz., that the artistic life "does not bring out the best in him," "use enough of him, or let him grow up evenly." And though there is no visible planning or dovetailing of the thesis (which would have destroyed the living illusion), at the close one feels that the central situation is episodic, and has not the force of an irresistible growth of character. Mr. Masefield is, however, one of those rare authors whose active sense of beauty is really a spiritual apperception of life as a whole. And, like nearly all our great writers, his æsthetic moral and intellectual perceptions are fused in a philosophy of life, in a struggle to wrest a meaning from life, to find and fit to it a master-key. The author is not afraid of discussing life, the conduct of life, and of pursuing stimulating trains of thought:—

> "Will," said Roger, moved, "I want to be quite sure of certain elements in myself before I settle down to a literary life. That life, if it be in the least worthy, is consecrated to the creation of the age's moral consciousness. In the old time a writer was proved by the world before he could begin to create his "ideas of good and evil." Homer never existed, of course, but the old idea of a poet's being blind is very significant. Poets must have been men of action, like the other men of their race. They only became poets when they lost their sight, or ceased, through some wound or sickness, to be efficient in the musters, when, in fact, their lives were turned inwards. Nowadays that is changed, Heseltine. A man writes because he has read, or because he is idle, or greedy, or vicious, or vain, for a dozen different reasons; but very seldom because his whole life has been turned inwards by the discipline of action, thought, or suffering. I am not sure of myself. Miss Fawcett's death has brought a lot into my life which I never suspected. I begin to think that a writer without character, without high and austere character, in himself, and in the written image of himself, is a panderer, a bawd, a seller of Christ." He rose from his chair. He paced the room once or twice. "Jacob Boehme was right," he went on. "We are watery people. Without action we are stagnant. If you sit down to write, day after day, for months on end, you can feel the scum growing on your mind." He sat down again, staring at the Correggio. "There," he said. "that is all it is—I sometimes feel that all the thoroughly good artists, like Dürer, Shakespeare, Michael Angelo, Dante, all of them sit in judgment on the lesser artists when they die. I think they forgive bad art, because they know how jolly difficult art of any kind is. I don't believe that art was ever easy to anybody, except, perhaps, to women, whose whole lives are art. But they would never forgive faults of character or of life. They would exact a high strain of conduct, mercilessly. Good God, Heseltine, it seems to me terrible that a man should be permitted to write a play before he has risked his life for another, or for the State."

In the earnestness of his thought the author is led here to negate the whole basis of our modern practice. The special value of "Multitude and Solitude" lies in its conjunction of a poet's insight and an intelligence freed from acquiescence in superstitions, modern or ancient. In the second half of the novel Mr. Masefield gives us a most brilliantly realistic narrative of the sufferings of his two white men in their struggle against death and disease in the African forest. The description of the hallucinations of a man in acute stages of fever has probably never been better done, and the sharp actuality of the details of the process of doctoring the victims of sleeping sickness, details which are of fascinating interest because "science is here doing the poet's work," are set off against admirable vignettes of savage and untamed Africa, "the black and cruel continent, the lustful old queen, smeared with bloody oils." The power of Mr. Masefield's imagination has never been better shown than in this triumphant visualisation of tropical scenes. His book is in itself an answer to the problem it raises, for in every page we find evidence of the man of action's working familiarity with things at first hand, conjoined with the poet's power of shaping the living word.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

We still have a few real conservatives in art matters among us, and Mr. C. E. Hallé has long shown by his method of painting that he is one of them. In "Notes from a Painter's Life" (Murray, 6s. net), he gives us the frankest possible expression of his views; that is to say, he declares war on modernism and all its apologists in the first few pages of the volume, and continues the battle intermittently throughout its 245 pages, never losing an opportunity—and often making one—of fulminating against "recent developments of insanity." While we admire plain speech and courageous convictions, whatever else they may be, we must confess that the diatribe grows a trifle wearisome; and this is not because Mr. Hallé's views are wholly unsympathetic, since we find ourselves in agreement with him on many points, but because they are so often unreasoning. Take, for instance, this passage from p. 42: "An axiom gravely put forward by one of the leaders of the new school, and widely accepted, is that 'the principal personage in a picture is the light.' The light, therefore, falling on a man is of more importance than the man himself, and, lest there should be any rivalry, the man selected should be a nonentity, and had better be employed in eating a potato than represented as doing anything which might detract attention from the lights on his boots." This interpretation of the passage is simply silly. A picture, as Mr. Hallé must know as well as anybody else, is no picture without unity, and, since light is the great unifying element, its importance can hardly be emphasised too forcibly. We turn with some relief from Mr. Hallé's art convictions to his narrative. Herein there is genuine interest. From the days of his youthful apprenticeship to Richard Doyle and Baron Marochetti to the end of his directorship of the New Gallery he was singularly fortunate in the people he was associated with, and his reminiscences of them are thoroughly entertaining. He has much to say of Ingres and others he encountered during his studentship in Paris; George Sand and Saint Saens, Thackeray and Landseer, were among these earlier acquaintances; and, of course, Burne-Jones, and the rest of the group who so staunchly supported the "Grosvenor" and the "New" Galleries are the subjects of many a personal touch. The origin and the career of the Grosvenor Gallery are intimately described, and the progress of its successor, the New Gallery, is traced up to the recent date on which it passed out of Mr. Hallé's control. The reader may derive considerable entertainment from the recital of the financial difficulties that beset the building up of these two institutions, and the younger generation of artists and art critics should study the appendix, giving a list of the winter exhibitions held at both galleries, in order to realise the really good work they did. The notes, too, on sundry journeys in Italy during the 'sixties are calculated to make one appreciate the facilities and the safety of modern travel.

"Richard Savage: A Romance in Biography," by Mr. Stanley V. Makower (Hutchinson, 16s. net), attempts, by blending fact with imagination, to bring before the reader a vivid picture of Savage's personality and of the time in which he lived. When noticing Mr. Makower's book on Mary Robinson, we expressed the view that this method of biography is on wrong lines, and can rarely succeed. While still adhering to our opinion, we must admit that Mr. Makower has produced a very interesting book, that goes some way to justify his method. Of course, Savage's case was a peculiar one. So little is known for certain about him that even the most careful biographer is continually thrown back upon conjecture. Mr. Makower invents no incident and no conversation, and though at first the reader may feel a little suspicious that authorities are made to say more than may rightly be asked of them, as the narrative proceeds he comes to think that Mr. Makower is right in his sympathetic interpretation of Savage's character. The advocatus diaboli in the case of Savage is Mr. Moy Thomas, who, in a series of articles published fifty years ago, in "Notes and Queries," reached the conclusion that he was a mere imposter. Mr. Makower, following Johnson, inclines to the belief that the poet was the illegitimate son of Mrs. Brett and Lord Rivers, and he certainly makes out a good case. But the chief interest of the book is to be found in the picture it gives of Savage's character and temperament. From this point of view Mr. Makower's work is undoubtedly successful, and makes a useful supplement to Johnson's "Life of Savage."

While the northern and central parts of the Indian Empire have received quite their share of notice at the hands of literary travellers, the south-west of the peninsula has been comparatively neglected. Pierre Loti, it is true, included the Malabar States in his Indian travels, and has left some attractive studies of these parts and of the peoples who inhabit them; but his sojourn therein was not very long, and he hardly attempted to fathom the peculiarities of a native race whose character and institutions are distinct from those of other Indians, and whose "elusiveness" is quite as pronounced. We are not sure that Mr. Henry Bruce's impressions of the land and life, as contained in "Letters from Malabar" (Routledge, 6s. net), penetrate the surface much deeper, but he has, at any rate, penned a pleasantly enthusiastic record of a rather delectable land. These letters, which are reprinted from the "Times of India" and the "Madras Mail," describe a leisurely tour through the principalities of Malabar, Cochin, and Travancore. They are written in a decidedly fresh style, are an adroit mixture of light and shade, the light predominating, and, while objective in their outlook—as all European literature on Indian life must be—are more sympathetic than most. The "matriarchal" customs of Malabar itself come in for a good deal of attention, and the author also discourses pleasantly on the scenery and buildings, the accommodation, the sects, certain potentates and officials, and such local horrors as elephantiasis, belonging to the places he visited. Loti's literary influence is, perhaps, a trifle too obvious in parts of the narrative, and the three concluding chapters on the administrations of Mysore, Cochin, and Travancore are too slight to be of much value; but the volume in no way pretends to be more than it is, namely, a good and very readable piece of journalism by a traveller who can use his eyes. The photographic illustrations, mostly of feminine types, are quite excellent. Mr. J. D. Rees, M.P., contributes an introduction, and the book is dedicated to "V. P. Madhava Rao, C.I.E., Prime Minister of Travancore during the two best years of its history."

Mr. Edgcumbe Staley does something less than justice to a fine subject in his "Famous Women of Florence" (Constable, 10s. 6d. net). He has undoubted knowledge of his subject, and a description of some typical women of the Florentine Renaissance could hardly fail of interest to readers unversed in Italian memoirs. But Mr. Staley writes in a style that often reaches the last degree of extravagance, and his tumid phrases repel. The seven women he has chosen as representative of Florence are Beatrice de'Portinari, Lucrezia de' Tornabuoni, Simonetta de' Cattanei, Giovanna delgi Albizzi, Alessandra de' Gherardini, and Bianca de' Cappelli. Their lives afford material for a collection of essays which would be of real value in lighting up some of the by-paths of Renaissance

More than one writer has contributed to the making of the brief memoir of the late "Colonel Kenyon-Slaney, M.P." (Murray, 3s. 6d. net), issued under the editorship of Mr. Walter Durnford; Miss Violet Kenyon-Slaney and Mr. William Bridgeman, M.P., are co-authors with the latter. It is a pleasing enough sketch of a rather pleasing personality that they present. William Kenyon-Slaney was a Tory of the Old School and all that it implies in views of Church and State and tariff reform. Yet it was chiefly in connection with a clause in the Education Act of 1902, which was considered obnoxious—as was the Cowper-Temple clause—by many clericals, that he became politically notable. Concerning his earlier life, we are reminded that he received the orthodox Tory education at Eton and Oxford, that he served in the Egyptian campaign against Arabi Pasha, and was present at Tel-el-Kebir, and that as a Shropshire landlord he was a model, as landlords go. He entered Parliament in 1886 as member for the Newport Division of Shropshire, and, being returned again in 1892, retained the seat until his death in April of last year.

Louise Renee de Kerouaille, Duchess of Portsmouth, whose biography Mrs. Colquhoun Grant writes in "Brittany to Whitehall" (John Long, 12s. 6d. net), has been painted in dark colours by most English historians. She was sent from France by Louis XIV. with the direct object of attracting Charles II.'s fancy, and when she became the king's mistress she lost no opportunity of supporting the diplomatic schemes of the French Court. Both Louis and the Regent Orleans recognised her services in keeping Charles faithful to the French alliance. In spite of the fierce popular hatred which she excited, Louise de Kérouaille seems to have been rather better than most of Charles II.'s mistresses. She helped and advised Queen Catherine on more than one occasion, and though she cannot be defended from the charge of rapacity—when she returned to France several ships had to be chartered to convey the booty she had acquired—she was, at least, good-natured and, compared with her rivals, of a refined disposition. As the means of fetching Father Hudlestone, the priest who received Charles II. into the Roman Catholic Church, she won a certain regard among Roman Catholics. Voltaire thought her still handsome when she was seventy, but Evelyn said that she had "a mere baby face." Macaulay himself calls her "handsome," though he adds that she was "licentious" and "crafty."

Inasmuch as "The Philosophy of Self-Help" (Putnam's, 6s.) embodies a protest against the materialism in modern medicine and religion, it has much in sympathy with the doctrine of Christian Science; for which doctrine, indeed, it has no worse phrase than "an extreme idealism." We hasten, however, to add that it does not condone the more objectionable phases of Christian Science—such as that which contents itself with the attempted faith-healing of sick babies—but is merely in agreement with the saner theories, relating to the interdependence of mind and body, as already put forward by some enlightened intellects. The author, Mr. Stanton Davis Kirkham, sets out to show how mental health and physical well-being can be achieved through the training of the mind. The first part of the book is devoted to a discussion of "First Principles," and includes chapters headed God, Metaphysics, and the Personal Self; the second, and by far the most interesting, is styled "Practical Psychology"; and the third is a "Philosophy of Life," which is very much like the philosophy of any other reasonable being who can boast of a philosophy at all. However, the train of thought throughout is philosophic, and the lessons of self-reliance, harmony, will-power, &c., that Mr. Kirkham teaches are of such a nature that they are not beyond the power of the plain man to grasp and apply to practical use. We like the style also; in places it has that buoyant quality which one inevitably associates with the "good manner" of a successful doctor.

No one is likely to deny that the American genius has not, so far, expressed itself in music to any marked extent. There has certainly been nothing in what America has produced in this direction, that corresponds to, or equals, her literature. In Edward Macdowell, however, a study of whose life and art has been written with much insight and feeling by Mr. Lawrence Gilman (John Lane, 5s. net), she was possessed of a composer who, whatever his "national" qualities, had a very unique talent. Macdowell paid one visit to London, and several of his songs are known to the music-lovers of this country. He enjoyed, too, a cosmopolitan reputation which, had he lived longer—he died last year before he was fifty—would probably have increased. A serious appreciation, therefore, of his gifts is only a fitting tribute to his memory. His musical personality is not altogether an easy one to express in words. He can be claimed by no particular school, either national or musical. "His style," says Mr. Gilman, "was a subtle blend of opposing tendencies"; he must be dissociated equally from Wagner and Strauss, from the classics and from the modern school of Debussy and others, the while he owes a little to each and all. In plain words his music was of the eclectic order, but he was of Irish-Scotch extraction, though American born, and the Celtic blood in his veins was responsible for a romantic tinge that made his work colorful instead of cold. Mr. Gilman, indeed, goes so far as to claim that Macdowell's music did more to revive the spirit of the Gaelic legends than all the literary Celtic revivalists put together. Besides this, he was, unlike most thorough musicians, an intellectual; a man of wide literary and artistic sympathies, who might have succeeded as a painter or a writer had circumstances conspired to make him one. Indeed, it was urged at one time of his early career, in consequence of a display of precocious talent in drawing, that he should leave music and take to painting. This critical study of his art, and description of his life in Germany, the States and elsewhere, is eloquent and interesting. Many of his lucid and rational opinions are quoted; the essential dignity of his compositions and the limits of the field in which he worked are well brought out; and his success as a teacher of others is fully vindicated. His biographer has brought musical knowledge and literary skill to the performance of an obviously congenial task.

"A Summer Garden," by Annette Furness (Elkin Mathews, 3s. 6d. net), is written in the first person, and consists of the author's recorded observations of her husband, called Peter; of Finella, a relative; of Sir Anthony, a neighbor; and of less personal matters, such as "Courtyards" and "Finalities." Over all there broods the comfortable air of an English country house, where a literary lady has plenty of time for self-communion and for the indulgence of cacoethes scribendi. In the written result, which has now been given to a presumably interested outside world, a little vein of romance is provided by a love affair betwixt Sir Anthony and Finella; and the chapter "Concerning Peter" gives that worthy away with the intimate detail characteristic of a treatise on a zoological specimen. Lest, however, the reader should imagine the book to be wholly concerned with trivialities, we give a sample of the dialogue. "Tell me, Dorothy (says Finella), why we are born with such a wrong notion of time, why our sense of its proportion should be so utterly out of gear?" "I have often wondered (replies Dorothy). I think, perhaps, our universal instinct of permanence is our divine spark of eternity, which defies all limits of time. That is probably why the long, long thoughts of our youth are too great to be accomplished within the narrow space of our earthly time." "I understand what you mean" (says Finella, giving her arm "an affectionate little squeeze"). Finella, perhaps, is a person of rare perspicacity, as well as of a forgiving disposition—but they can all talk like that.

of fame, and the very detailed account of Haileybury institutions, will find eager appreciators among old Haileyburians. The ridiculous incident of Ladysmith Day—a mild revolt of the boys against the decision of the head master not to grant a half-holiday then and there, which led to an outcry in the Yellow Press, and the denunciation of Canon Lyttelton as a "pro-Boer"—is detailed with due solemnity. Apart from this reminiscence, there is perhaps not much that can be considered to be of public interest.

Strahn & Kenyon's "Digest of Equity," second edition (Messrs. Butterworth, 17s. 6d.), is an excellent manual, written with care and lucidity. It is an admirable text-book for students, but the practising lawyer will also find it exceedingly useful as a concise statement of principles, with sufficient illustrative cases.

The Bank Reserve, at 29½ millions, is nearly three millions stronger than at this time last year; but discounts hardened a trifle on Thursday, owing to a rumor of heavy gold exports to Argentina. Easy money, however, is confidently expected for some weeks longer, unless the trade revival quickens its pace. Some improvement is at last definitely reported in Lancashire, and it is obvious, from the Bank return, that more money is being employed in the country. On the Stock Exchange the American market has been strong, and United States Steel still maintains an extraordinarily high price. Generally speaking, speculation is dull, but a lot of investment purchases are proceeding, especially in the foreign market. Quite a number of dishonest plutocrats are still buying foreign bonds payable in Paris, or other Continental centres, in the hope of evading the income tax. It is to be hoped they will be heavily dropped upon. The Bolivian apology to Argentina brought some relief, but there is still anxiety about the friction and bad feeling that evidently exists between Chile, Peru, and Bolivia. None of them can afford to go to war; but the Spanish-Americans are a very quarrelsome race. Reports from Argentina show that the drought has done a good deal of mischief, but rain has fallen in the district round Buenos Ayres. Brazilian politics are more reassuring, as the chances of the warlike Marshal de Fonsecas for the Presidency seem to be dwindling.

Canada's Debt.

Canada has just made up its figures to the end of the financial year, March 31st last. The ordinary revenue was eight-five million dollars, and the ordinary expenditure eighty-four millions. But the capital expenditure on the new transcontinental railway, &c., was actually forty-six millions. The debt, therefore, rose by forty-five million dollars, or more than half the total revenue. The figures are rather alarming in themselves, and fully justify Mr. Fielding's efforts to enforce retrenchment. Luckily—though there has been both waste and corruption—the Canadian debt has been incurred on public works which have helped in the development of the country.

Colombia and Colombian Bonds.

Alarmist rumors have lately come from Colombia, and investors have feared a revolution. I have been officially informed that the reports were greatly exaggerated, and that the real incident was little more than a riot. A band of disaffected persons seized a small town on the coast, but they were quickly defeated. Order has been restored, and the affair is stated to have been in no way connected with the absence of General Reyes. It is, of course, apprehension of political trouble that is the chief hindrance to the fine country of Colombia. General Reyes remarked a few years ago: "Everyone in the country is now convinced that Colombia owes it to her civil wars that, in progress, she has fallen behind such countries as Brazil, the Argentine, and Chile. Our country requires not only peace, but repose: and believes that, with twenty years of peace, its progress and wealth will astonish the world." If this happy condition was to prevail, Colombia's numerous advantages would certainly secure prosperity. Larger than France and Spain combined, she has a smaller population than Holland; but she is not as under-populated as Peru, Bolivia, or Venezuela. She is the only northern State on the Continent with a sea-board both on the Atlantic and Pacific, and this circumstance is of increasing importance. She is rich in gold, silver, emeralds, iron, and salt. In bananas Santa Marta is becoming a serious rival to Port Limon, and hides, coffee, and tobacco are largely exported. Scarcity of labor and communications retard development, but these evils will disappear if and when the great evil of political insecurity can be removed. It may be necessary to follow the example of Panama and import colored labor, but all material difficulties could be overcome under healthy political conditions, and the President has done much in that direction, and seems determined to do more. In that case Colombia might be a promising field for the investor. At present the investor is naturally shy; and, in fact, a week or two ago some of the Colombia railway securities were practically unsaleable. Some severe losses have fallen upon holders of Colombia bonds which fell from 50 to 45, and some of the sufferers complain that the whole story of the revolution was manufactured by unscrupulous operators.

The Joint Stock Banks.

The banking dividends are proving very much what they were expected to be, and a few even of the larger banks have had to reduce their rates while the majority remain at the old level. The money market was so sluggish all the six months, and the margin of profit was so narrow, that profits were certain to fall, and the only question was how far the dividends would be affected. In one point, of course, the banks are gainers by cheap money, for low rates mean higher prices on the Stock Exchange, and higher prices obviate the need for writing down investments. This relief has been the salvation of bank shareholders in the last eighteen months, and we may devoutly hope that, now most of the Consols held have been written down to 80, they will stay there for many years to come. The banks whose dividends are lower than at this time last year include Lloyds, the London and Westminster, the Capital and Counties, the Union of London and Smith's and the United Counties, which used to be called the Birmingham and District. In several of these cases, however, the dividend, though lower than in last July, is as high as last January, the reduction having been made after the bad six months of July-December, 1908. Most of the reports still remain to be issued, but one or two of importance are out and show some interesting changes. The London, City, and Midland, for instance, which now includes the North and South Wales, has increased its deposits as against last year by about £15,000,000, its cash in hand and at the bank by £3,500,000, and its money at call and short notice by only £1,500,000. It has been pointed out more than once recently that the large banks are far more free with information about the state of their accounts than the small banks, and that with every amalgamation we get at a truer knowledge of the bank's position. This has occurred in the case of the London, City, and Midland, as the old North and South Wales Bank did not separate its cash in hand from its money at short notice. In the arguments for and against banking amalgamations, the advantage of greater publicity has scarcely been appreciated at its full worth.

THE TRIUMPH OF

"THE VEIL"

(MILLS & BOON).

Messrs. MILLS & BOON have the greatest pleasure in announcing the wonderful success of that brilliant novel of Tunis and Morocco, by E. S. STEVENS, entitled "THE VEIL." 6s.

Published on June 15th, and received with remarkable enthusiasm by the critics, "THE VEIL" has been selling better than any 6/- novel of recent years. Within one month of publication three large editions have been sold, and a fourth edition is nearly exhausted. The fifth edition is in the press. The whole trade reports that no first novel of recent years has been received with such instantaneous approval. The success of "THE VEIL" proves once and for all that the 6/- novel is not dead, but that the really brilliant novel will always rise superior, and sell just as well as in the past.

Spectator.—"Mr. Stevens has contrived to bring home with quite extraordinary skill and mingled elements of fatalism, savagery, and fascination that unite in this strange woman" (Mobrouka). "The book abounds in remarkable passages: word-pictures of the glamour of Tunis and the magic of the African night; scenes of terror and stories of demoniacal possession. An immense amount of study and faithful observation is embodied in this singular and engrossing picture of the Arab in transition, of the clash of Eastern and Western ideals. Mr. Stevens never intrudes his own views. His self-effacement is complete and his impartiality almost inhuman. 'The Veil' is not only a considerable literary achievement and an elaborate study in exotic characterisation; indirectly it throws a good deal of light on the domestic problems which confront the party of reform in Turkey. This brilliant novel is much more than a tour de force."

Times.—"Part I., an effective and tragic story in itself, leads on to the main romance nineteen years after. It is a moving and picturesque story conveying throughout its busy incidents an impressive picture of life in Eastern towns."

Standard.—"A very striking and arresting piece of work. It is apparently a first novel, and it is extremely promising. It is, perhaps, with her atmosphere that Miss Stevens has been most successful. Her book speaks for itself, and we like her dispassionate attitude. This picture of Tunis is one of the best things that the present literary year has seen."

Daily Graphic.—"There is power, there is imagination, there is insight in Mr. E. S. Stevens' story, 'The Veil,' (Mills and Boon). It has also a quality which may stand it in even better stead with the novel reading public; it has novelty. . . . There is no writer, except perhaps Pierre Loti, who has so deeply penetrated the emotions and ideals of the followers of the Prophet as Mr. Stevens; and he writes without sentimentality. The story has brilliant passages and moments of great emotion."

Daily Mail.—"'The Veil' is by a new writer, E. S. Stevens, a writer of insight and subtle sympathy. A story of fierce Oriental loves and hates, and languorous perfume-laden nights."

Globe.—"She has the right 'flair" for romance, and her powers of description are of no mean order. Her pages glow with the warm colouring of the East, and she conveys to us much of the languor and mysticism of the native. It is a pleasure to hronicle the successful début of this young and already adept writer of romance."

World.—"'The Veil' is altogether a promising work, and Miss Stevens will assuredly go far as a writer of this class of fiction.'

Truth.—"Much of the atmosphere of the 'Thousand and One Nights.' In a first novel one is usually grateful if it shows promise; this is a novel of performance."

Morning Leader.—"'The Veil' is one of the most effective and interesting novels we have read for a long time."

Glasgow News.—"Egypt, Arabia, and Morocco have laid bare their secrets at the bidding of Messrs. Hichens, Mason, and others, but it has been left to a girl, and that, too, in her first novel, to utilise the possibilities of Tunis. It is no detraction from Miss Stevens' book to say that in its passages of vivid exotic description it reminds one of Robert Hichens at his best, and that its plot recalls Mr. Seton Merriman. Miss Stevens deserves to be heartily congratulated."

Dundee Advertiser.—"Greeting and goodwill! Here is a romance—of Tunisia—in the grand manner, elaborate, persuasive, memorable. The writer is remote from the ordinary. She will go far, and in any case she has written one of the most remarkable romances of recent years."

A Souvenir Chapter of "THE VEIL" will be sent post free to any address. Also write for Mills & Boon's Catalogues regularly, for many interesting Books of Sport, Biography, Travel, &c., &c., are in preparation.

MILLS & BOON'S SUMMER FICTION is enjoying remarkable success. Most of the Novels have been reprinted, and no finer list will be published this year. The following can be highly recommended for holiday reading, 6/- each:

Diary of the Week.

The series of bye-elections caused by Ministerial changes is over, and every one of the new Ministers—Mr. Samuel, Mr. Gulland, and Mr. Partington—and a new Labor representative, Mr. Hancock, have been returned. The elections have all been fought on the Budget, so that one hope of the Opposition, the Tariff Reformers, and the Lords has utterly withered. The best result has been that in Mid-Derbyshire, where a magnificent joint Liberal and Labor majority of 2,348 was secured. Mr. Partington's, Mr. Gulland's, and Mr. Samuel's majorities have been reduced, and, indeed, no one dreamt that the results of 1906 could be sustained. But the Liberal polls have generally increased, and the returning Liberal members all declare that the Budget has strengthened the party, and that the only formidable opposition is that of the liquor trade.

Nine clauses of the Budget—covering the increment and reversion duties—have now been passed, largely by means of all-night sittings, but nineteen more clauses dealing with land remain for discussion. Their defence has been conducted by the Chancellor with brilliant ability and complete success, emphasised by admirable temper and self-control. The Liberal Party in the House remains enthusiastic and practically solid, if we except a few useful criticisms on points of detail, the furtive objections of a handful of personally aggrieved or very timid members, and such openly disloyal and grossly inaccurate attacks as those of Sir Robert Perks. Again, a series of handsome abatements and concessions have been made. It is now understood that the land valuation, which will and must be universal, will be conducted at the cost of the State, that the scale of duties on grocers' licences will be lightened, that the licence duties in London will be levied on the basis of sales, not on rateable value, and that no duty will be payable on reversions purchased before April 30th of this year, and determining within forty years of the date of purchase. The original term of exemption was thirty years. The future conduct of the Bill will be expedited by the proposal to give a power of closure to Mr. Caldwell, the Deputy Chairman of Committees, as well as to Mr. Emmott, the Chairman, and to give the Chairman the power of selecting amendments for debate. But the Government must see to it that the land clauses are passed in their full strength, and that the attempt to break the back of the Bill is defeated. The country will stand no weakness.

The Constitutional issue has been dealt with during the week both by Lord Lansdowne and by Mr. Churchill. Lord Lansdowne, speaking to the National Union of Conservative Associations, in the midst of a bitter criticism of the Budget from the landowners' point of view, used a phrase which has led to much controversy. Stating that though he could not tell his audience what the House of Lords would do, he would tell them what they would not do, he added that he did not think that they were at all likely to proclaim that they "had no responsibility for the Bill," or that, because it dealt with the "financial affairs of the nation, we were obliged to swallow it whole, and without wincing." Most of the reports of Lord Lansdowne's speech contained the word "mincing," whereon Mr. Churchill properly retorted in Edinburgh that the Government would stand no mincing, and Lord Lansdowne and his friends would have to eat their mince again. Lord Lansdowne then stated to the Press Association that his word was not *m*incing, but *w*incing, and he wrote to the "Times" explaining that he accepted its report as correct, and also the "Times's" interpretation of his speech. The word in the "Times's" report was "hesitation." The "Times's" comment was that Lord Lansdowne had proclaimed the right of the Lords to deal with the Budget, but had not announced their intention of exercising their right. It is only necessary to say that the Lords are free to *w*ince as much as they like over the Budget. But there must be no *m*incing it.

Mr. Churchill's Edinburgh speech was, in the main, a powerful exposition and defence of the land clauses. On the question of the right of the Lords, its language was uncompromisingly direct. "When the Finance Bill leaves the House of Commons, it ought to leave it in its final form," and the Government would agree to "no amendment, excision, modifying, or mutilating." But he added that if Lord Lansdowne did not swallow his *m*ince, Parliament would be dissolved. This phrase has been criticised, and probably misconstrued. On Wednesday Mr. Asquith, questioned upon it, explained that Mr. Churchill had said nothing of immediate dissolution, and only meant that a Constitutional conflict between the two Houses must ultimately be settled by an appeal to the country. Meanwhile, the Government could not, of course, tell the country what advice it would offer the King under circumstances which might never occur. We may add that if the Liberal Party and its organs stand to their guns, they never will occur.

Meanwhile, the "Westminster Gazette," recurring to its virile practice of throwing up the sponge in the middle of the first round, calls on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to drop valuation so far as purely agricultural land is concerned, and hints that if this is not done the Bill in its present form may give the House of Lords an excuse for meddling with it. We cannot imagine a more uncalled-for intervention. It obviously gives a handle to the Peers, and also proceeds from the fact that the "Westminster" has not understood the Bill. No valuation under it will be made except for the sake of the taxes which it imposes. Individuals can, of course, claim exemption from these taxes as a man may now claim exemption or abatement from income-tax. But it is impossible to set up a fixed category of land and call it agricultural land, because all over England and all the time land will be passing from one category into another. Valuation as the Bill proposes will, as has now been hinted, cause no expense to the individual, and it is the regular and scientific method of giving the nation the benefit of the land taxes. Does the "Westminster" mean that if it is adhered to the Lords will have the Constitutional right to throw out a money Bill? And, if it does not, what does it mean?

A well-informed correspondent writes:—"Up to the present, the operations of the Budget Protest League have been an almost complete failure. Their meetings are dull and lifeless, speakers and organisers are a mere stage army, the same faces appearing on the platforms again and again. In the North the breakdown has been conspicuous. Hostile resolutions have been carried at several meetings, and the promoters' hope of a popular rally against the Budget has quite disappeared."

On Thursday, on the Foreign Office vote, Sir Charles Dilke made an interesting critical examination of our recent foreign policy. His main point was that its tendencies, notably in last year's controversy with Austria on her action in Bosnia-Herzegovina, were to convert our ententes with France and Russia into a new Triple Alliance, with an anti-German intention. This tendency was fostered by the "Homeric rumor" of the Continental and British Press. Sir Edward Grey's most reassuring answer on this point, coupled with a stout defence of our rally to the cause of the Young Turks, was that understandings with one set of Powers were only meant to improve our relations with them, not to spoil our association with other Powers. This, of course, is the right theory; but in effect, with France calling for a British Continental army to back a British Continental policy, we are tending to the Alliance which Sir Charles Dilke describes. England has come out from her "ivory tower," as the "Temps" calls it, and now she is being pressed to arm herself for her new rôle in European politics.

The other two points of criticism were the Congo and the Tsar's visit to Cowes. On the Congo question the Foreign Secretary made no new declaration. So long as forced labor remained, we could not recognise the Belgian annexation; but, on the other hand, Belgium must have time to set her new house in order, and forcible action on the Congo, an international stream, would excite not merely Belgian but European resentment. The situation was to be revised at the end of the year, when, perhaps, we shall insist on the removal of our subjects from Belgian law and authority.

More serious was the encounter between Sir Edward Grey and Radical and Labor opinion on the Tsar's visit. On this point the estrangement between the Foreign Secretary and the old Gladstonian and the new democratic feeling on foreign policy was marked, and his able defensive speech was received almost in silence by the Liberal benches. The chief points of its rejoinder to Mr. Henderson's moderately worded attack were that it was "an impossible position" for a Foreign Minister either to defend or to repudiate attacks on the inner concerns of another State, that the Tsar's visit was in the nature of a "courtesy" journey to us and other European neighbors, and that we could not refuse to receive him without offending not only the Russian Government but the Russian people, with whom it was our interest to be on good terms. Sir Edward Grey's view almost denies the right of moral judgment, and is far removed in tone and purpose from Cobden's theory of non-intervention.

In effect, however, Sir Edward enlarged on this position, and assumed the defence of the Tsar, stating that he had established Constitutional government, and that the executions were an answer to 6,000 assasinations by Russian terrorists. Much the same defence could be made for the late Sultan, but Liberal England was unanimous in disapproving German association with him. The expression of Liberal opinion was divided; some members, like Mr. Atherley Jones, Mr. Belloc, and Mr. J. M. Robertson, suggesting that the visit was part of the informal terms of peace settled between Russia and Great Britain, while Mr. Ponsonby insisted that the way to friendliness with the Russian people was not through patronising their oppressor, and stated the obvious truth that the Tsar's reception would be official, not national. The division strongly reflected this view. 187 members, Liberal and Conservative, opposed the reduction of the vote, and 97 Radicals, Irishmen, and Labor men, supported it.

The Prime Minister, addressing the Eighty Club on Thursday night, gave an interesting definition of Liberalism, claiming that it stood between Conservative and Socialist tendencies, and that it had never lost ground save when it "ceased to keep abreast of its best traditions and to be true to itself." On finance he claimed that its later forward policy had been to reduce both the National Debt and taxes on necessaries, to apportion burdens to the "strength and breadth of the shoulders" on which they were laid, to graduate and differentiate the income tax, and finally to tax social values, for which individual owners had little or no responsibility.

M. Clemenceau's Government, after triumphantly surviving a comprehensive attack last week, went to pieces quite unexpectedly on Tuesday. The Chamber was discussing the report of the Naval Commission, but with no anti-ministerial bias. M. Delcassé, however, the Chairman of the Commission, made a fierce attack on the Government, to which M. Clemenceau retorted bitterly on the man "whose vast schemes of European policy" had led to Algeciras and humiliated France. M. Delcassé replied with equal warmth, and had the Chamber with him, for, on a vote, the Government was defeated by forty-six votes, and at once resigned. The Clemenceau Cabinet had lasted thirty-three months, longer than any other Cabinet in the history of the Republic, and it had fallen when everybody expected it to ride out the elections of next year. The defeat of M. Clemenceau is generally taken to be personal, the result of a duel with M. Delcassé, rather than a condemnation of his policy. Failing M. Bourgeois, whose health is weak, M. Briand has consented to form a Cabinet, which will be almost a replica of its predecessor. M. Briand, the former organiser of Parliamentary Socialism, and the author of the Church Separation Bill, is probably the ablest living French Parliamentary statesman. His temper is colder and more equable than M. Clemenceau's, and his powers of constructive statesmanship are far greater. He is also an orator.

The Persian Nationalists have triumphed. On Friday last the Shah fled to the Russian Legation, and the assistance of the Cossacks at once ceased. The Nationalists pronounced the Shah deposed, and declared his infant son his successor. The Shah and the Russian and English Legations accepted this decision, and it was arranged that the Cossacks under the command of Col. Liakhoff should be taken over by the new Government to preserve order, but be in future under the direct control of the War Office. The Sipahdar has become War Minister and the Sardar-as-Sad Minister of the Interior, while Nasr-ul-Mulk has been summoned home to become Premier and Foreign Secretary. The new Shah has been brought to Teheran, and the ex-Shah will go to Russia. The Russian troops remain at Kazvin, and there is no intention now of sending them to Teheran. On the other hand, there is a most untimely desire to send a force of British bluejackets to Shiraz, a step which would encourage Russia to push forward troops, or at least to maintain those she has.

The Home Secretary has been compelled to release a dozen of the imprisoned Suffragettes, who have carried on a "hunger strike," as a protest against their treatment as second-class misdemeanants. Wrong on some points of tactics, in this respect the Suffragettes have been absolutely right, and we are astonished that a humane and enlightened Home Secretary like Mr. Gladstone has not long ago admitted their case. Even on the point of tactics, the Government has made a mistake. With the crowd, the physical courage of Suffragettes has gone far to redeem their violence; and when this courage is exercised in the just cause of the rights of political prisoners a Liberal Government is disarmed.

The Belgian Cabinet has suffered a serious defeat in connection with its Army Bill. The Belgian Army is fixed by law at 42,000 men, recruited so far as possible by volunteers; any deficiency is made up by means of the ballot, tempered by the right to hire a substitute. This arrangement has failed to preserve the legal strength, and it obviously gives wealth a huge advantage. It is therefore opposed by all parties of the Left, who favor general compulsory service. Some of the Young Clericals take the same line, but the backbone of the Clericals is the Flemish peasant, who will not have conscription, so that the majority of the Clerical members are opposed to general compulsory service. The Government brought in a compromise, exacting one recruit from each family, and retaining the principle of substitution. This scheme has been rejected in Committee, and it will probably be rejected by the Chamber. The Government will have to resign or drop the Bill; the Old Clericals favor the latter course. They anticipate an Opposition victory at the next elections, and would prefer to leave to the Opposition the odium of imposing conscription on the peasantry.

The fighting strength of the British Fleet in battleships has been shown to the people of London and the counties that line the reaches of the lower Thames. The pageant of ships stretched from Southend to Westminster Bridge, beginning with the "Dreadnoughts" and the greater of the battleships, twenty-four in all, and ending with destroyers, torpedo-boats, and submarines, two of which were anchored opposite the terrace of the House of Commons. The Lord Mayor paid a State visit to the Southend fleet, and on Wednesday 1,200 men from the battleships were feasted at the Guildhall after a triumphal march through the streets. The enthusiasm shown has been remarkable, the crowds lining the Embankment having made a continual picnic of the visit. It is noteworthy that the Conservative County Council, by selling the last of its fleet of steamers at enormous loss, has done much to curtail London's view of the Fleet.

An attempt is being made to satisfy the claims of American capitalists to a share in the financing of the Canton-Hankau railway. Under an agreement made in 1903, English and American capitalists have a preferential right to provide each one-half the capital. The Germans, however, made arrangements to furnish the whole, but, after a good deal of squabbling, consented to divide equally with French and English financiers. When everything seemed settled, the Americans, whose rights had been completely ignored, stepped in. It is understood that this is part of Mr. Taft's scheme of an active Chinese policy. The Americans insisted on their full rights, and refused to take a quarter share. It is hoped to satisfy them by raising the loan in amount by one-third, but it is not yet known whether this compromise will suit America.

Don Carlos, the pretender to the Spanish throne, died at Varese on Sunday, at the age of 61. He had neither talent nor character, though he managed to maintain an irregular campaign on Spanish soil from 1873 to 1876. Since then he merely existed, with brief intervals of self-assertion.—On Monday Mr. Latham's attempt to cross the Channel from Sangatte in an aeroplane failed, after the voyager had accomplished only seven miles of his journey, and had attained a height of 1,000 feet. The engine then stopped, and he glided into the sea, and was rescued by a French destroyer.—The false charge of drunkenness against Mr. Thorne, a Labor member, brought by Lord Winterton, having been completely disproved, the record of his expulsion from the House for calling his accuser a liar, has been expunged from its journals, on the motion of the Prime Minister, generously supported by Mr. Balfour.—The Lord Chancellor has foreshadowed the appointment of a Royal Commission to examine into the appointment of justices of the peace. The difficulties of partisan nominations are considerable, the more so as one party has contrived to pack the majority of benches with its friends. But we doubt whether the system works as badly as it looks.

Politics and Affairs.

THE PRIVILEGE OF THE COMMONS.

We observe with considerable interest that the most effective blow at the revolutionary Constitutional doctrine which a section of the Tory Party is endeavoring to thrust upon the House of Lords comes from an historic authority on Toryism, the "Quarterly Review." The "Quarterly" has no doubts or reservations on the subject. Politically it declares that the suggestion of the rejection or amendment of the Finance Bill—the two forms would, in effect, be identical, for the Commons would treat all amendments as questions of privilege, and would refuse them—would expose the party to "the risk of irretrievable disaster." It insists that no sufficient cause for such action exists in the character of the Budget itself. It is, says the "Quarterly," an "exaggeration" to call the Budget revolutionary in the sense in which the Reform Bill of 1832, and the Home Rule Bills of 1886 and 1892, were revolutionary. It adds that such "mischief" as it threatens is not irremediable by ordinary political means, i.e. it may be modified in the House of Commons or by the later action of a Conservative Government. And it adds an unqualified protest against the attempt to revive the obsolete veto of the Lords. It admits that the action of 1860 and 1861 settled the question of amendment, and, reversing the childish argument of the "Spectator," points out that the difficulty of dealing with a Bill imposing a single tax is as nothing compared with the difficulty of touching a Bill embracing the whole financial proposals of a year. "When," it says, "all the financial proposals were grouped in a single Bill, the rejection of an item became a privilege amendment to that Bill, and was accordingly refused. Thus the policy of 1861 practically took away, not, indeed, the right, but the power of exercising the right of amendment which the Lords had hitherto possessed, however sparingly it might be used. We may and do regret this, but we can hardly evade the fact." Amendment being barred, rejection, nominally permitted, would, in fact, be a mere gambler's throw. If it failed, a stronger Budget, followed by Home Rule and the reduction of the Upper Chamber to impotence, would be the consequence. The Budget does, in the view of the "Quarterly," inflict "injustice": but injustice would be preferable to "a fatal blow dealt at the foundations of the State."

We may, therefore, gather that a pause will take place in the revolutionary counsels of the Tory Party, and that its leader will hesitate before adding to its official programme the overthrow of the British Constitution. For our part, we believe that these distracted advices are watched by our own side with the utmost calmness and confidence. The House of Lords may do exactly as it pleases. It may pass the Budget. It may try and amend it by the omission of the land taxes or of the machinery necessary to their assignment and collection. It will then beat itself to pieces on the rock of privilege. Or it may reject the Bill, and in that case to-morrow's sun will not rise more surely than that the things foreseen by the "Quarterly" will come to pass. Let the House of Lords assume, with Lord Lansdowne, any "responsibility" for the Budget beyond that of passing it into law, with or without "wincing," and straightway the foundations of the deep are broken up, and every existing relationship between the three governing Powers in the Constitution is changed. Whether the Lords were immediately beaten, whether the Budget were reinstated or temporarily lost, the destruction of the House of Lords, which would by that act have claimed the supreme authority in these realms, would become not merely an object of Liberalism, but the only object for which it could exist, and subject to which its chiefs could offer the King or his successor any further service to the Throne and the country. It is not for a Radical to declare that he would regret such a position. It is enough for him to say that it opens up totally new political territory, the inevitable scene of a revolutionary struggle.

Meanwhile, we have a word to say on the immediate consequences of an attempt on the part of the Lords to interfere with the sole power of taxation by the representatives of the British people, who alone present Money Bills as a "gift" to the Crown, and alone determine the incidence and methods of taxation. We need not waste a moment's time in discussing imaginary distinctions between the imposition of a tax and the rejection of a tax, between one tax and another, between one-tax Bills and many-tax Bills, or between a tax and the machinery for imposing it. All are so many parts of the great instrument of democratic privilege forged and shaped by our ancestors, and perfected by our last great democratic statesman. The only doubt which seems to arise in the minds of Liberals is as to the precise weapon which the Government and the House of Commons would conjointly use in resisting the encroachment of the Lords. We have no doubt that the Prime Minister correctly interpreted the meaning of Mr. Churchill's reference, in his brilliant speech at Edinburgh, to the method of a dissolution. Clearly such a step would come, not as the answer to the action of the Lords, but as the last of a series of efforts by which the people of this country would be made to realise the character and scope of that action. If we decline to recognise the Lords' claim to force the dissolution of the House of Commons by the rejection of an ordinary Bill, and thus place every Liberal Government at their mercy, far less should we recognise it in the case of finance. Consider the situation which would arise on the excision by the Lords of the land clauses, which is the most probable form of an attempt to tamper with the Budget. The wrong done by the Lords would be a wrong done to the House of Commons in its most intimate function and exclusive privilege. Money Bills originate only in the House of Commons, in whose taxing powers the nation believes so entirely that it is willing to pay over millions of money to the tax-gatherer solely on the faith of resolutions which its representatives pass without even going through the form of consulting the Upper Chamber. The disturbance of this process, the attempt to get rid of that part of the taxing machinery which happened to be distasteful to great landlords, must, as Lord Salisbury said in 1894, create a "deadlock." Who is to end it? The House of Commons, thus vitally attacked, would have to defend itself before it went to the people for aid, and when it did so, it must either be to celebrate a victory or to call for a new Constitution. Meanwhile the country would see the Speaker—whom we believe to be a thoroughly loyal servant of the House—acting for the Commons, and putting his impartial authority against the selfish, audaciously partisan, and utterly irregular and unconstitutional action of the Lords. It would also feel all the embarrassment consequent on the fact that, the sole taxing authority having been held up in the discharge of its duty, the finances were in confusion, and no man knew whether his payments were regular or no. But it would not be driven far on such a course. The House of Lords, having no power to impose a farthing of taxes, no power to force the Government or the House of Commons to accept its rejection of any part of the Budget, no power to end or heal the confusion it had caused, would have to yield. The Government, as the "British Weekly" well says, has only one thing to do—now and at every phase of this controversy—to be firm. On this matter of the Constitutional rights of the House of Commons, it stands on impregnable ground, and there is not a power in the land, high or low, that dares shake it.

THE WORKING OF THE LAND TAXES.

The debates on the Land Increment taxes in the House of Commons are complicated and prolonged, and we note that any variation or even explanation of the original clauses is taken as a "concession," and exaggerated or distorted by one set of extremists or the other. It is important, therefore, that those who have been accepting these taxes as the most desirable division of the Budget, who recognise the essential justice of their principles, and have the foresight to appreciate their enormous future effect upon the National Revenues, should clearly understand what alterations have been made in their passage through Committee.

The Increment Tax—at once the most fruitful for the future and the most far-reaching in its effects—has practically passed through Committee. There are later Clauses, dealing with the machinery of valuation necessary for its imposition, and with the questions of definitions and appeals. But in effect its substance is laid down in the first six clauses; and various announcements and modifications of later clauses, already indicated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if not yet embodied in the Bill, are sufficiently definite as to be reckonable in a general review. The principle of the Increment Tax remains unchanged and unchallenged since the first day it was unfolded. That principle is one of extreme simplicity. The Land of the British Isles is to be valued as on the 30th of April of this year. In case of any subsequent increase of value of any portion of that land, which is not due to the industry and exertion of the individual owning that land, one-fifth of such increase goes to the services of the State. Half is to be allotted to purposes recognised as national, half to purposes recognised as local. From this broad principle certain exemptions and abatements have been granted. These abatements in part consist of boons designed to meet hardships which may be due to the sudden and unexpected imposition of the tax. In part they are designed permanently to exclude (a) certain classes of taxpayers, or (b) certain classes of increments, from the obligation of making this payment. The increment attaches to the land, not to the persons. A normal or basal line is drawn across the value of the land in April, 1909. Below that line no increment tax is paid. Above that line increment is paid to the extent of one-fifth of any rise in the site value on any piece of land. That piece of land is then "franked" up to that value by the Government, and no more increment will ever be demanded from that particular piece until it rises again above the value upon which increment has been paid. The "franking" process will be performed by the Commissioners and their representatives at Somerset House or its branch offices, and will take the form of a stamp placed on the instrument of transfer, the deed which already has to be stamped for conveyancing.

The only important exemptions at the start are two. The first (which was in the Bill as drafted) makes allowances for those who have actually bought land during the past twenty years at a higher price than its value to-day. In such cases they are allowed to substitute the site value of the land when they bought it for the site value as it exists to-day. This will secure them from payment of a fifth of money subsequently received, which may, in fact, be merely a recovery of their original expenditure, and no real increment at all. The second, which is a concession in Committee, is that in these and all other cases the rise of the first ten per cent. in the site value shall not be subjected to increment duty.

We pass now to the exemptions of certain classes of taxpayers or of increment. Occupying owners of small holdings in the country or of small freeholds in the town will not be subject to the increment tax so long as they remain occupying owners. The limit of the small houses appears to be that of the limit of "working-class houses" in the new Housing Bill—those with rents of under £40 in London, £26 in the big towns, £16 in rural districts. The limit of the small holder appears to be a total value of £500. As to the exemption of certain kinds of increment, the only important class exempted (in addition to increment which is the product of individual industry) is agricultural increment. Land whose value for any purposes other than agriculture is less than that for agriculture will pay no increment value duty so long as this condition remains. Immediately, however, its value for building, business, or any non-agricultural purpose rises higher than its agricultural value, it will pay its tax, upon the increment calculated from its original site value. A concrete example may illustrate what is really a simple proposition, though difficult to express in words. Land exists (for example) in the neighborhood of a village. Its agricultural value is, say, £50 an acre. Through a rise in prices it goes up to £100 an acre. Meantime its value for building remains small—there being no demand for building expansion—say £40 an acre. That is its site value—a value for prospective building purposes quite apart from its agricultural value—which the "site" would sell for, quite independent of its agricultural uses. It pays no increment. But suppose the demand for building sites in that village increases, and the value of this piece of land goes up for building purposes beyond the agricultural value—say to £150. It would then pay—on its non-agricultural value—the difference between its present site value for building (£150) and its previous site value for building (£40). An increment of £110—an increment duty of £22. A further general exemption has been given to cover small variations, loss of possible interest, expenses of sale and transfer. That is a general abatement of increments of less than ten per cent. of the site value on each transaction so long as the total amount of these abatements does not exceed (within a period of five years) twenty-five per cent. of that value. Any increase above that amount is to pay increment about the twenty-five per cent. This 10 per cent. will be deducted from all increments, however large.

It will be seen that the main scheme of the Bill remains untouched by any of these explanations and abatements. Every acre of the land of England must be valued for the starting line, because every acre of the land of this country may find increment accruing to it which may be subject to the tax. Every acre of this country must, on sale or lease (for more than fourteen years), come under the auspices of the Commissioners, who alone can decide whether it is taxable or whether it is exempt from taxation. And each acre, with the instrument of conveyance as stamped at present, will be also stamped by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, to show that it is clear (up to the amount of the value on passing) of any obligation to pay increment.

The practical machinery is really the simplest which can be devised. The particulars of the sale will be furnished to Somerset House or its branch offices in the big towns. With the deed the owner will claim his exemptions—as being a purely agricultural value, as being the site of a small freehold, as being an increment of under ten per cent. of the site value at the last transaction, or as being an increment under the definition of the kinds which are attributable to the industry and expenditure of the owner. Such claims will be made on forms and according to rules supplied by the Commissioners. Immediately a stamp may be fixed on the deed, denoting that, as these particulars have been supplied, the title is clear, and the complete transfer effected. Payment due on the transfer may subsequently be made, on the Commissioners accepting or criticising the statement furnished. Against the decision of the Commissioners there is (in the Bill) an appeal to one of a panel of Referees—and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has promised (in deference to requests advanced from all quarters of the House) to consider an appeal to the Court of Justice. If obviously no increment value is due on any transaction, the Commissioners may affix a stamp signifying that no duty is payable.

To sum up. The "concessions" given have been almost entirely in the direction of simplifying machinery, of exempting small increments and poor men, of protecting the taxpayer against possible grievances. The statement that the Bill is being turned into a valuation Bill is as absurd as the statement that its possible revenue has been wasted away in boons and limitations. There is no valuation in the Bill except that which is absolutely essential to its future smooth working—to ensure that those who should pay shall pay, that those who are not under the legal obligation to pay shall escape that obligation. The alternative to the scrutiny by the State of every transaction which is an occasion for taking increment duty, is to allow the whim or caprice of each particular landowner to declare whether or no there had been increments payable—a system which would convert future land purchase in this country into a gigantic gamble. No single purchaser could be guaranteed by the only guarantee worth having—that is, the guarantee of the State—that his land did not carry a still undischarged obligation of increment duty which he might be compelled at any time to pay. The alternative to the universal present valuation would be a random system of harpooning pieces of land here and there by the Commissioners, with the assertion that these had some building value above the agricultural worth and those had none. The present system, after the first novelty of the change, will settle down as much a part of the integral system of taxation as the conveyancing duty or the valuation of estates at death.

"All this fuss," gasps the critic, "for a few thousand pounds a year—this year estimated at but fifty thousand!" So said the critics of Sir William Harcourt's Budget of 1894. Lord Goschen then accused the Liberal Chancellor of spreading confusion and inextricable complexity in the British land system for the sake of a "few hundred thousand pounds a year." To-day the "few hundred thousands" mean a reckonable and definite income of some twenty millions. If the increment tax, with all its exemptions and abatements, had been imposed fifty years ago, it would to-day be contributing at least a similar annual revenue without imposing a penny on commerce, industry, or labor. In fifty years' time that revenue may be even greater. For the spreading of towns beyond their present boundaries, the development of entirely new centres of industry where now are green fields, the expansion and partial repopulation of the countryside due to improved locomotion, will all mean the creation of increments, unforeseen and unearned, in unexpected quarters of rural England. And of these unexpected and unearned increments the community which has created them will take a modest toll of 20 per cent. for public expenditure on national defence and social reform.

M. CLEMENCEAU'S FALL.

The best that can be said of Parliaments is that they sometimes are human. For months on end the organised machine works with its tedious and irrational regularity. The party chief masses the party votes as steadily and as inevitably as a clerk manipulates his mechanical calculator. Reputations are made, ideas are launched, policies set in motion, but the average party man never rises amid it all to the dignity of an individual who dares to give effect to a spontaneous emotion. But there comes the exceptional moment, and in the French

Chamber it arrives rather more often than with us. It was such a moment in which M. Clemenceau fell from power. One seeks in vain for any colder or more prosaic explanation. There was no elaborately planned lobby plot. There was no new phase in the political situation. M. Delcassé, it is true, had made a powerful speech to expose the really scandalous condition of the French Navy. But the facts were dismally familiar. A scathing report had been for some weeks before the country. It was not the first of its kind. There was, however, no reason to blame M. Clemenceau or his present colleagues for this state of affairs. The real culprits are MM. Pelletan and Thomson. M. Clemenceau had got rid of the latter of these Ministers. He had put in his place a mediocre but energetic man, M. Picard, of whose general capacity and good intentions no fair-minded critic entertains a doubt. He had already done something; he promised to do much more. It was not the navy scandal that proved fatal to the fallen Premier, but simply and solely his personal recklessness. He turned on M. Delcassé with bitter taunts. And in overwhelming M. Delcassé he flung to the winds every vestige of restraint. He talked of the unpreparedness of France for war in 1905, publicly and in the face of Europe, as few of the unofficial extremists in the Chamber would have dared to talk. He spoke of the "humiliation" to France involved in the Algeciras Conference in a way that must have made her enemies rejoice and her allies shudder. The Chamber, in a flash of clear perception, saw before it in the tribune a powerful but vindictive man in a rage. It did not depose him. It took note of his fall.

Such a retribution cannot be called unjust. For it is this intensely personal note which is the key to the man, and the only clue to the "incoherence" of his policy. A more daring and effective combatant one could hardly find in Europe. But it is for his own hand that he has always fought. To no principle, to no party, to no ally, has he been constant. One cannot read his speeches without detecting in every sentence the sense that his opponents are, for him, largely private enemies. Be they the Germans or the Pope, the Socialists or the Royalists, his former comrades or his life-long antagonists, revolted postmen or miners on strike, he seems invariably to face them as though in a mortal duel. The sense of himself colors every pose and every argument, and every quarrel is fought with unbuttoned swords. There lies the man's strength. He is so emphatically a person, so invariably dramatic, that he is always exciting, always interesting. In forty years of public life he has never, even by inadvertence, succeeded in boring France. He is the personification of courage. He shrinks from no risk, and carries his forlorn hopes with an epigram. But Charles Lamb would have found him the aptest illustration of his thesis that brave men are often bullies. The tactless assault on M. Delcassé was, morally, no worse than a dozen of his earlier personal encounters. We remember nothing meaner in recent politics than his aspersions on the personal honor and courage of his old friend, Francis de Pressensé, one of the bravest and most disinterested personalities in the politics of our time. He had the habit of turning, with distorted versions of half-forgotten facts, dragged from some inaccurate dossier of delation, on working-men deputies, on members making their maiden speeches, on every antagonist a little less adroit or less assured than himself. He ruled by fear, in the Chamber and outside it. His critics dreaded his tongue. For laborers who had got out of hand in some desperate strike he had usually his dragoons. His own party followed him with apprehensive loyalty, trusting to his skill and nerve to save them from the situations into which his passions hurried them. The governing class were coldly grateful to any man who would face unpopularity in their service. But with it all one may doubt whether he had left himself anywhere a sincere or disinterested friend. The Chamber may have felt that his personal encounters with Socialists were not in good taste. But it was quite another matter when he fell upon M. Delcassé, a man whose resolute, though highly dangerous, diplomacy at one time achieved brilliant results for France.

How little the vote which overthrew M. Clemenceau was political seems to be generally recognised. No one has thought of a Premier chosen from any of the Opposition groups. M. Briand, his coming successor, is more advanced than M. Clemenceau, and far more of a constructive statesman. Nor is there a suggestion that M. Delcassé should return to his old office. The chances are that a change of men may facilitate a return to the more fruitful Radicalism of the Combes period. M. Clemenceau had fought so hard and raised such redoubtable enmities that in the end he could do nothing but fight. Even a temporary reconciliation with the Socialists was hardly thinkable. Yet without Socialist support he must have failed to carry either of the two central reforms which Radicalism has striven throughout these years of turmoil to achieve—the old age pensions scheme and the income-tax. It would as certainly have been fatal to the party to go to the country next May with empty hands. A re-arrangement of personalities may effect some democratic concentration, and bring a truce to the furious conflicts which seem to have condemned French Radicalism to legislative sterility. M. Clemenceau's career is not at its end. He will live to overthrow more Ministries, to fight more duels, to wield one of the fiercest pens in Europe. But we shall be surprised if he again controls the destinies of France. He was born a century too late. His courage came of the time when the guillotine kept statesmen young, when the Republic met a Continent in arms, and France went out to seek the Tsar at Moscow.

THE CASE OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN PROTECTORATES.

The Act for the Union of the South African Colonies, which will be introduced next week into the House of Lords, has been discussed this week in conference between the delegates of the Colonial Parliaments which have endorsed the Act and the Colonial Secretary. Upon the merits of the Act in establishing a strong central government, to undertake most of the important functions hitherto vested in the four Colonial Governments, a happy unanimity prevails. Dutch and British South Africans are prepared to enter upon their new and large career in a spirit of harmony, and the difficulties raised by the greed and perversity of Natal have been overcome by the conciliatory policy of the statesmen of the other Colonies. So far as the general structure of the new instrument of government is concerned, the work of the Imperial Government is very light. These white self-governing communities understand their interests and the best methods of attaining them far better than the Parliament or people of the Mother Country, thousands of miles away, can pretend to do. Even as regards the interests of the black and colored subjects who form five-sixths of the population of South Africa, it will be at once admitted that their safety, prosperity, and progress must in the long run depend upon the success of the new Union Government. But in the initiation of this great experiment it is equally clear that the Imperial Government cannot divest itself of the responsibility of seeing that the new powers which it confers are such as are not easily abused.

Two issues have been raised regarding the native policy of the Union Act which deserve consideration. One has reference to the proposed safeguards of the native franchise in Cape Colony. It is no secret that the majority of the delegates from the other Colonies, where a less liberal native policy prevails, would have liked to level down the Cape franchise, so as to debar all natives from exercising any voice in the election of the Union Parliament. To such suggestions the Cape delegates, aided by a Liberal minority from the other Colonies, offered a successful resistance, and the Constitution provides that the repeal of the native franchise can only be attained by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members of the two Houses in the Union Parliament. A sharp division has arisen upon the degree of security attaching to this "safeguard." Mr. W. P. Schreiner and a small number of influential white politicians and philanthropists are vehement in denouncing its inadequacy, and there can be no question that a widespread fear exists among the educated Kaffirs and colored men lest an organised attempt should be made in the Union Parliament to take away their vote. The reality of this danger is, however, as stoutly denied by the entire body of the Union delegates, among whom are to be ranked men who, like Mr. Sauer and Mr. Merriman, have pursued a strong pro-native policy throughout a long political career. Much as we dislike the failure of the South African Act to provide political equality of opportunity independently of race or color, we recognise that no equal franchise forced upon the South African nation by the Imperial Government could be accepted, or, if accepted, would be fairly administered. Nor are we in a position to pronounce upon the adequacy of the protection accorded by the Constitution to the native franchise in Cape Colony.

A more critical issue for the judgment of the Imperial Parliament is raised by the terms provided in the Schedule of the Constitution for the transfer of Basutoland, Swaziland, and the Bechuanaland Protectorate from the Imperial charge to the South African Union. There is no reason why at the very opening of a necessarily arduous career the new Union Government should be saddled with this new burden. Their statesmen did not initiate the proposal or the terms of the transfer. Though they naturally expected in the future to have under their single Government the whole of the British territories south of the Zambesi, they were not in a hurry to enlarge their sphere of operation. Lord Selborne appears to have been responsible for pressing forward this proposal to shuffle off Imperial control of the protectorates, and to hand over the government to the virtually unchecked autocracy of the party politician who may happen at any time to be Prime Minister. For a careful reading of the Schedules shows that complete legislative and administrative power is placed in the hands of the Premier and the Ministry, with no real control by Parliament. The Premier appoints Commissioners to assist him with advice in administration; if he acts contrary to their advice, they can bring the matter before the Governor-in-Council, that is to say, before the Premier and his Ministers; should they still be dissatisfied, they can call upon the Premier to refer the issue to Parliament, and he can refuse this at his discretion. All checks verbally furnished in the provisions of the Schedule are quite illusory. No power is vested in the Union Parliament either to legislate or to influence legislation in those territories which are nominally incorporated in the Union. No wonder the natives of Basutoland are alarmed; no wonder the South African Parliamentarians resent this extraordinary restriction upon Parliamentary government. If these territories are to be brought into the Union, the laws imposed upon them and the taxation imposed upon them should be sanctioned by Parliament, and not placed at the arbitrary disposal of the Premier and his Commission. Unless we are prepared to place full confidence in the ability of the Union Parliament to govern these territories in a wise and disinterested manner, it would be better to maintain them in their present status of Imperial charges. Lord Selborne, in the very speech in which he foreshadowed this injurious policy which now, through the unwise pressure of the Colonial Office, is urged upon South Africa, bore striking testimony to the good government of Basutoland: "I say deliberately that the King has no more loyal subjects than the Basutos; that if the Basutos are justly and wisely governed, they will cause no serious trouble; and that the one thing they desire is to be left alone. They know perfectly well that no change could take place in their position except for the worse, and they will never wilfully give cause for making a change necessary."

Why then force on them a change which will be "for the worse"? The South African delegates do not ask it; the Basutos, by their Press and public meetings, have testified extreme alarm at the proposed transfer. The deletion of this Schedule will cause no dissatisfaction in South Africa; on the other hand, our insistence on their acceptance of terms of transfer so derogatory to the dignity of the Union Parliament may rouse resentment when it is understood, and will be a source of constant friction in the working of the Constitution. We hope that the House of Commons, when the Act comes before it, will take the view that it is wiser to retain these Protectorates under the Imperial control until proposals are made on the part of the South African Government for their admission into the Union upon terms acceptable alike to the Union Parliament and to the natives.

THE FUTURE OF COWPER-TEMPLEISM.

Mr. Runciman's withdrawal of the new Training College Regulations gives us all an opportunity of considering, without heat or haste, the difficulty which they were intended to meet. What we have to deal with is, broadly, the effect of the Higher Criticism on that undenominational Biblical instruction which has been given since 1870 under the Cowper-Temple clause. The main conclusions of the Higher Criticism are not, of course, new. A century ago Thomas Paine put the gist of them into his "Age of Reason." What is new is the manner and degree of their acceptance. When I was a boy at school we learnt from each other that some people denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, and others, say, the ascription to St. Paul of the Pastoral Epistles. This knowledge strengthened the "doubts" against which we were warned in the school chapel. We all fought against our doubts; those who succeeded in the fight mostly became clergymen; those who failed became agnostics. Nowadays submission to the rapidly growing evidence for the "critical" position does not necessarily involve a violent break with the past. The majority, one supposes, of the clergy go already much further in that respect than did Bishop Colenso.

But the evidence which has so transformed the position of those who still believe in the supernatural origin of Christianity has also altered that of the believer in its natural origin. Many of those who thirty years ago were anti-Biblical undergraduates of the most combative type must be surprised, as I am now, to find how interesting a book the Bible has become. We follow, with almost as much sympathy as the supernaturalists, the stirring of a spiritual religion in Amos and Hosea, the triumph-song over the victories of Cyrus in the Second Isaiah, and on through the story till the prophetic organisation of the early Christian Church was superseded by episcopacy, and the unknown author of the Third Epistle of John found that "Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them, receiveth us not."

The new evidence, however, though it is so widely accepted by students both inside and outside the churches, has had, as yet, little effect upon the teaching in the elementary schools. Clergymen, indeed, and ministers have actually complained to me of the crude orthodoxy taught both in the "non-provided" and the provided schools. Many elementary teachers are ignorant of the critical literature. Practically none would think of implying any acceptance of it in their teaching.

It is under these circumstances that a group of religious philosophers, including Professor Sadler, Professor Muirhead, Dr. T. B. Napier, and Mr. T. E. Harvey, supported, and perhaps originated, Mr. Runciman's requirement that every Training College should prepare teachers to give "instruction in and explanations of the Bible." They hoped thereby (if I may quote their letters of last week) to produce a race of teachers "instructed in the broad results of modern Biblical research and thought," who would make the religious lessons "not only more interesting, but truer, less conventional, and far more useful to the children."

They were, I myself think, grievously mistaken in their expectation that a system of compulsion applied to local authorities and universities would produce the end which they desired. Compulsory religion would, I believe, have been, in most places, as formal and insincere as it is, say, in Prussia. They forgot also that the conflict for the control of the religious teaching in the schools, which politicians try to think so unimportant and feel to be so important, is still going on. Denominationalists and Secularists are both waiting, in the hope that they will some day have an effective majority in Parliament, and will not tolerate that the "claim" should be "jumped" by the instruction of compulsory Undenominationalism through administrative regulations.

But the evil to which attention has been called by Mr. Runciman's proposal—the growing divergence between the traditional Cowper-Temple teaching and instructed opinion—is very real; and it is worth while to ask whether there is any change in existing methods which the three bodies of secularists, undenominationalists, and denominationalists can accept as an improvement, and which does not inflict, as Mr. Runciman's Regulations did, an open defeat upon any one of them. The decision now depends upon the local authorities, and I believe that at least one such change would be widely accepted by them, if only they would go behind the false simplicity of words, and examine the infinite complexity of existing and possible facts.

I have been myself led by hard experience into advocating the "secular solution"; but I group under that name an enormous variety of possible expedients, including in some cases "facilities" for such denominational instruction as parents may demand, and perhaps ten years hence, in a freer atmosphere, the study of the Bible "as literature," or as part of a course of "moral instruction." A Broad Church denominationalist might be equally ready to discuss possible variations of "denominationalism," and I think that we two might agree on improvements in detail, without abandonment by either of us of his main policy.

On the other hand, the Liberal Education Ministers who have succeeded Mr. Birrell seem quite unable to conceive of "undenominationalism" as including any other possibility than the teaching for three quarters of an hour every day of that London County Council syllabus which they imagine to be an unchanging fact. Mr. McKenna proposed in 1908 to put the London syllabus which happened to be in force in 1906 into a permanent Act of Parliament; and Mr. Runciman attempted last December to closure, three days after its introduction, a clause which required exactly three-quarters of an hour's religious instruction to be offered on five days a week to every child in attendance throughout England and Wales, from the baby of three, who cannot hold his little mind on anything for more than ten minutes, to the Lancashire "half-timer," who would be giving about a third of his school hours to the subject, or the girl who would otherwise be attending the weekly cooking class a mile away.

It is therefore the undenominationalists whom I ask to consider possible variations in their system, and the particular expedient on which I should lay most stress is the adoption by local authorities of the arrangement which is universal in secondary schools, by which the religious instruction is confined every week to one, or at most two, lessons, varying in length with the age of the children.

The immediate effect of this would be that the instruction would be specialised. Much of the unreality of the existing teaching is due to the fact that, if the school is to be carried on at all, practically every teacher must give it to his class every day, whether he is interested or instructed in the subject or not. If my suggestion were carried out, some one or more teachers specially interested in the subject could in the course of the week teach all the classes. For the moment the teaching might become even more orthodox than it is now, but I should, as a "secularist," be prepared to risk that, if it became more real. And if better results could be obtained in less time the gain to other subjects of the curriculum would, of course, be important.

The teachers of Scripture might then be encouraged to form "reading circles" of their own on lines which are already familiar in other subjects. In the University Training Colleges, if not in those of the local authorities, the extraordinarily difficult experiment might be further developed, which is now going on under London University, of providing Biblical instruction of an "academic" kind, to be withdrawn if, as would certainly happen in some places, it produced insuperable friction.

That is my main proposal, but I would add to it the suggestion that local authorities might free themselves from the bondage, not only of the daily forty-five minutes, but also of the typical London County Council syllabus, and adopt a more vital selection of passages from the Bible itself. We had before us the other day, on a County Council Committee, a suggestion that Amos should be omitted from the syllabus, and that there should be substituted the Book of Esther! It is a sign of the times that Esther was rejected on the ground, apparently (which had never been admitted into such a discussion before), that the events therein described were neither edifying nor historical.

Such are my suggestions. I put them forward with a full recognition of the difficulty of the subject, but at any rate I neither propose that they should be closured through the House of Commons next Tuesday, like Mr. Runciman's Bill of 1908, nor that they should be "in force from August 1st," like his Regulations of 1909.

A DOUBLE STANDARD OF MORAL CURRENCY.

DOGMATIC Socialists find no difficulty in reconciling the unscrupulous business career of Mr. Rockefeller with his religious character and the austerity of his private morals. With them it is no case of watertight compartments, still less of mere hypocrisy. The prevailing mode of production or of exploitation moulds the moral and religious ideas of a people, as it determines the course of their politics and the forms of all their social institutions. It appears to them inevitable that the economic struggle for subsistence and wealth which absorbs the bulk of the time and energy of a people should "exploit" all the other interests and activities. So Protestantism and its creeds, Puritanism with its virtues and its abstinences, have come into being, survived, and flourished as spiritual and intellectual adjuncts of that energy of individual business enterprise which is the dominant spirit of the age. Wanted, a religion of enlightened self-interest, which, by throwing the whole stress of spirituality upon the quality and career of the individual soul, shall evoke certain hardy virtues of self-respect, temperance, forethought, industry, and individual responsibility, while subordinating and well-nigh extinguishing that enthusiasm for an organic spiritual society, with its common fund of spiritual life and its single centralised authority, which was the Catholic Church. A new type of Christian conformable to the needs of our more complex industrial age was evoked to realise the Pauline ideal, "not slothful in business, fearing the Lord." Mr. Rockefeller is that man. His success is the success of Puritan individualism.

But there is danger of misapprehension in paying too much attention to his case, or even to that of the crop of trust-making and financial millionaires which grows around him. In all the straiter sects of Puritanism, as also in that great perennial Puritan Church, the Hebrew people, the ideals and practices of individual and of domestic life, which have absorbed the very name morality, have been pre-eminently favorable to business success, in a period when individual initiative, industry, and enterprise have for the first time in the history of the world had free play among a large section of the people as economic instruments. To the dogmatic Socialist, we repeat, the whole process means the selection and elevation of a class morality of successful exploitation, the temperance, self-command, domestic purity, and all the other personal excellences, ranking as mere by-products or accessories in a distinctively economic process. Even the generosity of Mr. Rockefeller and of many of his fellow millionaires in the endowment of colleges, churches, libraries, &c., is imputed, on this theory, to the instinct of self-protection, itself an economic method, by which the edge of public envy is turned and the apparatus of education engaged in the support of ethics and a sociology which shall regard benevolent rich men as trustees of the commonwealth.

To this economic interpretation of "ideology" the culminating triumph of this moral individualism consists in gaining a general acceptance for itself as a complete system of morals. If every man looks after himself and his family, makes the best of every advantage he can seize, works hard, saves hard, invests his savings as profitably as he can, a society of such men, each minding his own business, will prosper and progress. This is the familiar Smith-Smilesian doctrine by which the selfish individual is "led as by an invisible hand" along a narrow line of self-seeking which, by a pre-established harmony, compels him to contribute his best to the good of society. The naïve reflections of Mr. Rockefeller compel us to believe that he adheres to the view that he has been providentially entrusted with great riches as a reward for his public services. It is the simple sociology of Jack Horner, who "put in his thumb and pulled out a plum, and said 'What a good boy am I!'" arguing his moral excellence from his personal success.

Excessive, often perverse, as is this economic determinism, it contains an important half-truth, the neglect of which has been a real barrier to moral progress. For though sobriety, chastity, thrift, honesty, are not mere by-products of the play of economic forces, but have independent spiritual sources, the monopoly of morality accorded to the private virtues and the individualistic conception of society which competitive business life has fostered, has obscured the clear vision of a true society, and weakened the emotional incentives for attaining it. Even those business men who are concerned at the wide prevalence of dishonest practices in commercial life commonly shirk the deeper scrutiny into valuations that is demanded. We have before us a little volume entitled, "Morals in Modern Business" (Frowde), containing essays read by leading business men and economists before the students of Yale University, professing to confront the problem we are considering. But the very setting of the issues renders solution impracticable. Everywhere the note of individual initiative alone is sounded, everywhere the appeal is made to the personal honesty of the employer, the financier, the trader, a sole supreme reliance on the very Puritan morality which has been distorted into conniving at the practices it is now invited to condemn. Now, there are certain malpractices in the business world which are amenable to this moral treatment. Illicit bargains for rebates with railroads, bribery of inspectors, "tax-dodging," secret commissions, evasions of Factory Acts, gambling with trust money, and a score of other profitable sorts of illegality, fall under this category. Moreover, there are certain sorts of crude brutality in crushing weaker trade competitors, certain infamies of sweating labour, certain injuries to the consumers in raising prices or in withholding supplies, which are such flagrant violations of humanity that no reputable firm will openly commit them. So many charges under both these heads, illegality and cruelty, are brought against the great industrial and financial trusts in America as to engender in large sections of the people a genuine sentiment of moral indignation against all wealthy and powerful corporations as criminal and tyrannical bodies. If the sentiment is fainter in this country, it is because the evolution of this type of capitalistic monster is less advanced, and its claws are pared by Free Trade.

Now, even in America, much of this virtuous indignation of the people is wasted. The morality, the humanity of the big, successful trust in its treatment of the trade, the consuming public, and its employees, is certainly no lower, and in some respects is usually higher, than those prevalent in smaller and less flourishing concerns. The moral crux of modern business is made manifest in the fact that half the immorality is charged against competition, the other half against its opposite, monopoly. One of the most interesting essays in this

American volume resolves this paradox. "Yet there is a consistency pervading all these seemingly paradoxical conditions; each man tries to get rid of competition in what he sells, and secure it in what he buys. The working man sells labor, and wants no competition in it; so he forms his labor trust, and tolerates all the other labor trusts. But he buys commodities, and wants all possible competition in this; so he attacks the capitalist trust. The captain of industry buys labor; so he wants all possible competition in it, and therefore disapproves the labor trusts. But he sells commodities, and therefore wants no competition in them; so he forms his own trust, and tolerates the other capitalists' trusts. The legislator, administrator, jurist, sells neither labor nor commodities, and buys both; so he favors competition in both, but tempers his advocacy of it in labor by a tenderness for the labor vote."

In other words, the unconscious hypocrisy, or contrast between religious professions and business practices, charged against Mr. Rockefeller, is all-pervasive in the business world. Only by ignoring the nicer analysis of business operations is it possible to find "an entirely honest merchant." John Ruskin, in thus describing his father, doubtless meant that he sold sound sherry at reasonable prices. But when we ask for any reliable standard for reasonable prices, fair profits, or living wages, we find ourselves at sea. A business man, struggling in the trough of competition, can only keep his head above water by "taking advantage" of his neighbors, i.e., by paying lower wages than he would like to pay, by ousting his competitors from the market, by cheapening the quality of his goods while preserving false appearances of excellence. A business man, outside of effective competition, can run his business on more philanthropic lines, so far as treatment of his employees is concerned: he can sell a good article at a price which in his eyes is at once reasonable and remunerative. His conscience may seem to be at rest, undisturbed by any qualms. But he soon comes to realise the precariousness of his position. In the determination of fair conditions for labor and reasonable prices he is a law unto himself: he has no social standard of fairness and reason. A moral autocrat in the business world, he sets an example which others cannot follow: he can furnish no social solution of any social problem. No merely personal acceptance of the Golden Rule can really reconcile the business life with Christianity. So long as the structure and operation of industry and commerce are such as to enable or require one man to take advantage of the poverty, weakness, or ignorance of his neighbor, whether as employee, competitor, or customer, it is idle to select this or that millionaire in order to accuse him of an inconsistency between his weekday and his Sunday ethics which is equally applicable to his less successful neighbors. Not until we can reform the social structure of our business world so as to substitute a direct sense of social service for enlightened self-interest as the commercial spirit, so getting the Golden Rule into business practice, shall we get rid of the double standard of moral currency which runs through Mr. Rockefeller's conduct, and through yours and mine.

VANISHING NAVIES.

The return of the British Fleet to its ancient quarters in the Thames has given the greatest city multitude the world has ever known the kind of pageant which it most enjoys. Keen as was the pleasure, the intellectual directors of our nation have contributed little enough to the more refined and reflective aspects of it. We, who almost bar out English history from our schools and universities, and when we teach its literature present the tongue that Shakespeare spoke as a puzzle in Anglo-Saxon philology, cannot complain if the mass of the people who went to see the fleet took their main view of its story and development from the street hawkers. Not a great number, we suspect, could recall the name of Blake; not many schoolboys of the upper and middle classes, fully instructed on the tactics of Themistocles at Salamis, could describe those of Nelson at Aboukir. For a people so self-centred, so full of the pride of achievement as our own, we are singularly lacking in the historic sense. This is the reason why, when the Englishman's past is recalled to him through some striking symbol of his present power, he misses the thrill that comes from the knowledge of who sowed the seed and how the flower was raised. To-day that thrill is especially hard to capture. Nothing, or very little, of our famous sea history belongs to the period of the modern navy. None of these great shooting platforms, practically devoid of masts or sails, divided into self-contained steel castles, and worked, not by sailors so much as by engineers and skilled mechanics, almost blindly obeying the call of the "fire-control" from above, have ever figured in a great naval fight. They are the children of modern science, of engineering and mathematics, of carefully thought out theories of warfare which leave little initiative to the fighting chieftains. Every British war-ship within two thousand miles of London, says Mr. Arnold White, is hung by invisible threads on to its strategic master in Whitehall, and in time of war would come and go, fight or fly, in obedience to the war-director's commands, much as if it were a piece on a chessboard. But all these conditions are untried, and their working can only be dimly guessed. The wooden hulks, whose still beautiful shapes adorn the mouths and lower reaches of our English rivers, recall all the substantial glories of the British Navy—glories sustained, not merely in years, but in centuries of warfare. Yet a single modern second-class cruiser could sink every ship that fought at Trafalgar.

And what will happen twenty or thirty years hence to the fleet that occupies forty miles of Thames water? Will it ever see a naval war? Will there ever be a naval war as we imagine it? The development is already rapid beyond all previous experience. There is less difference between the ships that hung on the skirts of the Armada and those which fought at Navarino than between the ironclads which bombarded Alexandria and the new Temeraire. Already the critics of the fleet talk of the "Dreadnought" as a "back number." What will be its successor? Mr. Wells's airships? Or some shapeless mass of floating iron pouring out, not 850 lb. shells, but explosives powerful enough to destroy a "Dreadnought" or a dozen "Dreadnoughts" with one impact? Already one type of ship succeeds another so rapidly that the "tail" of a big fleet of war-vessels like our own is always being cut off because the head has outgrown it and destroyed or greatly qualified its usefulness. From "Majestics" to "King Edwards," from "King Edwards" to "Dreadnoughts," from "Dreadnoughts" to "Super-Dreadnoughts"—each new step has been taken more quickly than its predecessor, until the eye of the naval sensationalist is now fixed not so much on something fresh in ships as on the possibilities of an engine of death and destruction, able to make all ships obsolete, and to involve attackers and defenders, experts, admirals, and mere common lives in universal ruin. Thus, in the very hour of seeming stability and overpowering mechanical force, the increasing volatility and subtlety of the mind of man create an atmosphere of complete uncertainty. Who can talk confidently of the balance of power when it may be possible for a clever chemist to alter it decisively in the interest of this Power or that, even to destroy or largely to modify the distinction between Powers that can defend themselves and those that rely more or less on the good graces or the written covenants of their neighbors? What may be the result of the next daring "bore" into the innermost depths of Nature's secrets? So, like an unsubstantial pageant faded, the solid marvels of the Thames may pass away within the vision of a single generation, as the eye of faith presumes even greater wonders to pass before the unchanging gaze of the Eternal.

An outlook like this clearly confuses merely material calculations, and brings us back almost by necessity to the rule of spiritual and intellectual forces. In a world of rapidly shifting physical values, the only safe national ground is the average individual's reliance on character as his last and surest refuge against the assaults of fortune and circumstance. Whatever happens to British ships, British men and women will remain. If science should be so fortunate as to light upon the means to ensure an enormous release of human effort for human ends, they will not only be relieved of an immense strain on their physical resources, but will be enriched by a hitherto undreamt of capacity to advance civilisation, instead of keeping it merely in being, with a constant tendency to relapse. Probably what attracts most men to admire war-ships and sailors is the thought and the actual vision, which thousands of us have realised this week, of the high degree of skill, training, physical well-being, and cheerful acceptance of great dangers, which a well-conducted naval service involves. The soldier is also popular; but he does not embody the idea of adaptability, of nimble, all-round capacity and practical sense, which we identify with the "handy man." It is consoling to think of this power of creating fine character even out of unpromising material. But the process gets more costly and less remunerative every year. Methods and machinery are changed every few weeks, till the national scrap-heap mounts heaven-high.

Equally wasteful is the dealing with the human element. Some of it is demoralised or thrown away in peace, and much of the rest the nation is bound to devote to death and oblivion in war. In civil life, on the other hand, the net gain is far greater, the waste much less serious. The aims, moral in themselves, stimulate all the good qualities excited by war, where the aims are immoral. Civil life on dry land makes almost as much demand on physical courage as life on a war-ship, and the merchant service and the fishing industry exact a greater toll of their workers than the Navy, whose normal functions are mainly peaceful. Horse-keepers, engine-drivers and guards, miners, chauffeurs, all pursue more or less dangerous lives, and usually meet accidents and sudden perils with calm. Men will die in stopping a runaway horse, or in rescuing a brother-worker from fire-damp, or in sucking poison from a diphtheritic throat, from a truer voluntary impulse than drives them to die on a battle-ground or be roasted in a gun-turret on a "Dreadnought." In support of the first kind of action society has the immense advantage that all the force of its accepted religions and pieties freely rallies to it and applauds it, and is joined by the instinctive voice within. Whereas, in support of the latter only man's sophisticated conscience can yield full approval, while a state of strife is set up between his ideals and his passions, which depraves the one and gives a furious and uncontrolled power to the other.

THE YOUNG CUCKOO.

As the month of June wanes and July rises to its climax a natural drama is every year in progress throughout the land, references to which fill the folk-lore of European peoples. Its actual details have to be closely followed and observed first-hand to understand what an interest they are calculated to inspire, even in these prosaic days of science—an interest which, indeed, probably exceeds that attaching to anything else of the kind in nature. When the cuckoo comes amongst us towards the end of the month of April, a certain air of mystery attaches to it. It arrives in fresh plumage, fully and beautifully dressed, having changed its feathers in other lands during our winter. The migrations of the bird are unusually extensive. The cuckoo of Western Europe is said to travel far south into Africa, and even across the Equator into the sub-continent. The young cuckoo, which leaves us at the approach of winter, has ingratiating habits, which are probably the result of its dependent position. But the mating cuckoo, which arrives in the spring, is a peculiarly unsociable bird, shy, passionate, and restless, and possessed of a series of habits which, though suggested and rudimentary in some other birds, are nowhere else in life so consistently adapted to attain their malign end with such precision and inevitableness.

When a female cuckoo has settled down in any locality, it thoroughly explores the whole neighborhood for suitable nests, and, moreover, pursues this business with systematic and unexpected thoroughness. In early days it used to be thought that the cuckoo possibly laid only one egg, or, at the most, a few eggs each season. It is now established that this is incorrect, and that the bird lays an unusually large number of eggs, seldom less than ten, and probably often as many as twenty or more. The eggs, however, are not actually laid in the nest chosen, but on the ground. They are then carried by the mother cuckoo in her bill and carefully placed in the nest of the selected victim, which is nearly always a bird feeding its young on caterpillars or similar soft food, which is alone suitable to the young cuckoo. It is one of the most interesting facts established that a particular cuckoo lays her eggs each season in the nest of the same species of bird. The writer, during the present season, was fortunate enough to find as many as four cuckoo's eggs in the same locality, all obviously placed by the same bird, and all in hedge sparrow's nests. This is in agreement with a number of similar observations, two or more eggs evidently laid by the same cuckoo being not uncommonly found in nests of the same species of bird in the immediate vicinity, the sedge warbler and meadow pipit being favorite victims in other parts of the country. That in the case mentioned there had been no random placing of the eggs, but that the mother cuckoo had gone to work in a most systematic manner, was proved. A thorough exploration was made of all the hedges and bushes in the district. No other hedge-sparrow's nest beside the four in question was discovered. A great number of nests of other small birds were, however, found, but in none of them had a cuckoo's egg been placed. It was plain, therefore, that the cuckoo must have gone to work on an exhaustive method, in that she had thus discovered and utilised all the nests of the same species in the neighborhood, and had neglected all the others. This tendency of particular cuckoos to place their eggs in nests of the same kind of bird is possibly hereditary. It is a well-known fact that the cuckoo's egg varies in a surprising manner in size and markings, and, although always slightly larger, it has been observed to resemble, generally in size, and sometimes roughly in appearance, the eggs of the bird chosen. It is obviously a necessity that this should be so, for there would be no young cuckoo if the egg differed sufficiently to attract the hostile notice of the owner of the nest.

It is within the first few days after it is hatched out that the young cuckoo begins to exhibit the peculiar train of instincts which have made it proverbial. But for the fact that these instincts have been observed again and again in every detail in action, many of the results would appear to be incredible. As the little creature which has been hatched out from an egg hardly bigger than that of a hedge-sparrow, but destined to grow into a bird almost as large as a pigeon, lies at the bottom of the nest, it is a striking object to look at. It is nearly black in color, and peculiarly imp-like in appearance, even when newly hatched. A feature which strikes the eye immediately is the peculiar broad, flat back. About the second day it begins to exhibit extraordinary restlessness. It matters not at what stage the cuckoo's egg has been dropped in amongst the others in the nest, for the result is the same in all circumstances. If the young cuckoo is hatched out first it begins to eject the eggs. In one of the nests which the writer had under observation this year the little cuckoo had put one of four hedge-sparrow's eggs over the side on the second day of its existence. In another nest under observation at the same time, the young hedge-sparrows were hatched out so long before that soon after the cuckoo was hatched its nest mates were at least four times its size. But at this stage the young cuckoo was seen to put the hedge-sparrows, one after another, over the side of the nest till it was the sole occupant. No one who has not actually seen the process of ejection of the other young birds can fully realise the uncanniness and almost incredible purposiveness of the whole series of actions. At the time when the bird's instinct is at its maximum the young cuckoo is only a few days old. It is blind and naked, without the vestige of even the beginnings of a feather, so that it presents the very image of weakness and helplessness. Yet in such circumstances it sidles up to the other occupants of the nest, using as feelers the long and bare wing processes, which have an appearance strangely suggestive of the arms of an ape. Getting gradually under its fellow nestling, it lifts it on to the flat back; then, using the ape-like arms as props and the strong legs as levers, it partly raises and partly pushes the victim upwards, clambering backwards up the side of the nest. When it reaches the edge the victim is hitched over, and the last scene of all almost takes one's breath away, for the blind little creature, before returning to the bottom of the nest, feels round as if to assure itself that the difficult business had been in all respects successfully accomplished. After its efforts the cuckoo appears completely exhausted. But it resumes its attempts when rested, and it will continue for days to eject any other birds or eggs that may be placed with it in the nest. It is usually stated in books on the cuckoo that the young bird is aided by a circular depression in the back. The writer has observed that this is a mistake. There is only the broad, flat back, but, in the process of straining, the thighs are lifted, and this gives the appearance, and possibly assists the bird in the manner of the supposed depression.

The instincts and actions that follow the ejection of its fellow nestling are scarcely less remarkable. The young bird, as the sole occupant of the nest, appears to exercise an exceptional power of fascination on the foster-parents. It sits at the bottom of the nest with its mouth opened expectantly, and showing a deep orange gape at the slightest rustle. It utters the while a series of soft, twittering notes, resembling, not one young bird, but a whole nestful of young birds. The foster-parents feed it continually, for it is always hungry and always clamoring to be fed, the unusual distance between its small size at the beginning and the adult stage necessitating rapid growth, and consequently making the claim for food incessant. No less remarkable are the ingratiating habits of the young bird as it grows older. There is no doubt that the foster-parents become devoted to it with a degree of affection far beyond that which their own offspring would have awakened. The attendant hedge-sparrow sits on the young cuckoo with extreme solicitude to protect it at times from the weather. The writer has even seen it in a rainstorm sitting on the cuckoo when the latter was four times its size and almost fully fledged, the appearance being quite ludicrous. Every movement of the cuckoo at this stage is that of a creature which expects to be provided for and helped and taken care of. If it be brought up by hand, it exercises a fascination scarcely less on human beings. It becomes a bird absolutely without fear or distrust. Almost every movement and gesture is an invitation which cannot be resisted to those about it to take care of it. All the bird's actions, indeed, suggest it to be what it actually is—one of the most extraordinary instances of parasitism in nature.

FATHER GEORGE TYRRELL.

In Father George Tyrrell a figure of exceptional charm and distinction disappears. To literature, to religion, to his many friends, and to those, a still wider circle, to whom his writings and his personality were an inspiration the loss is irreparable.

> "Quis desiderio sit pudor aut modus > Tam cari capitis?"

It is not easy to class him either as a thinker or as a religious teacher; he united gifts seldom found in combination, and appealed to men of various and widely differing types. His personality was the key both to his position and to his influence; it was the man who spoke to men. A Celt by blood, he was essentially a Celt by temperament; his fire, his humor, his unexpectedness were those of his race. Racial, too, was what was perhaps his most characteristic quality—his unworldliness. Not only was he detached from material things; the shadows cast by them—reputation, influence, the praise of man—left him indifferent; he lived on another plane. He possessed in a singular degree what Renan called "le discernement des nuances." But his mind, subtle as it was, was direct; and his speech was as unequivocal as his thought was clear. He could be silent; but, if he spoke, he made his meaning unmistakably, sometimes disconcertingly, plain. To Moderates of the political type he was an incalculable element; and his movements were those of an erratic, often highly inconvenient, star. He was built on lines too different from theirs to make understanding possible. His nature was conservative; no one was more sensible of the fallacy of intellectualism or of the onesidedness of extremes. But he was intolerant of the moderation which comes of loose thinking and timidity. He preferred a fanatic to an opportunist. He had little reason to love the Vatican of Pius X., to approve the measures, or to respect the men. But he resented violence less than hypocrisy. The tyranny of the present Pontificate was less distasteful to him than the diplomacy of the last years of Leo XIII. With the former one knew what to expect; the latter was hybrid: "the more educated temporising ultramontanism that shrinks from an inopportune pressing of principles which the world has unfortunately outgrown; that loves to rub shoulders with democracy and science; that would make a change of circumstances and opportunities pass for a more tolerant spirit," was not to his mind. Injustice and falsehood roused his indignation; his fierceness against clericalism was less intellectual than moral. For him, as for Gambetta, it was "the enemy": he saw that it was unscrupulous, and he believed it to be insincere. Those who crossed swords with him in controversy—Cardinal Mercier is an example—had reason to regret it. Impar congressus Achilli. Since Newman there has been no such master of the craft as he. He had something of the Irishman's love of a fight. But his battles were impersonal. He fought not for his own hand, but for larger interests compromised, he believed, by that "all-permeating mendacity which is the most alarming and desperate symptom of the present ecclesiastical crisis." For him the Modernist controversy was not one of correct as against incorrect opinion; but of right against wrong, of the truth against a lie. The contention is strong; but the facts are stubborn, and no one had better means of knowing them than he.

> "Those Modernists who put their trust in the spread of truth will labor in vain unless they first labor for the spread of truthfulness; nor are they faithful to the 'method of immanentism' if they hope for an intellectual before a moral reform. What would it avail to sweep the accumulated dust and cobwebs of centuries out of the House of God; to purge our liturgy of fables and legends; to make a bonfire of our falsified histories, our forged decretals, our spurious relics; to clear off the mountainous debts to truth and candor incurred by our ancestors in the supposed interests of edification; what would it avail to exterminate those swarming legions of lies, if we still keep the spirit that breeds them? The only infallible guardian of truth is the spirit of truthfulness. Not till the world learns to look to Rome as the home of truthfulness and straight dealing will it ever look to her as the citadel of truth."

How a man who felt and thought in this way ever found himself in the Church of Rome is inexplicable; that he should have gone into it of his own free will is more inexplicable still. The Celticism of his nature is the key. To a man of his temperament the Protestantism in which he was brought up was not inspiring; its outlook was narrow, its atmosphere cold. A born mystic, he was cramped and chilled. The spacious horizons, the unique spiritual life of Catholicism presented themselves as an escape from the particular to the universal, from a somewhat narrow provincialism to the freedom of the great world. Leanness of soul followed; the mirage proved sand. Rome was world-wide, venerable, picturesque, consoling. But—it was not true. To the sentimentalist or the sceptic this is matter of indifference. He was neither. The question of truth was vital to him; neither his heart nor his understanding could rest till it had been solved. He was too honest to sophisticate; the sum did not and would not work out.

He did not conceal this either from himself or others. "Le cri de réforme contre les abus du sanctuaire part toujours du sanctuaire." He framed argument after argument to justify the position in which he found himself; argument after argument broke down. As each in succession failed, he was driven further from his moorings; he launched out from the landlocked waters of Catholicism upon the great deep. This was what differentiated his attitude from that of Newman. The great Cardinal has been called the Father of Modernism. He was so; but the legitimacy of the child is doubtful; Newman was a medieval, not a modern man. Tyrrell, on the other hand, was radically emancipated. If he endeavored to bring about a synthesis between the old and the new, it was by no compromise or confusion of issues; he hoped rather than believed that this synthesis could be effected in the Roman, perhaps in any existing, Church. But in religion, he knew, search is more than achievement. His work was preparatory; it looked beyond itself, and to the larger days to come.

From one point of view—it was the most obvious—his was a drifting, a broken life; the original false step was neither retraced nor overcome. But it was, in fact, the key to his activity, the condition without which its best results could not have been obtained. It made his platform not English, but European; it associated his name with a world-wide and abiding work. For, whatever the future of Modernism in the Roman Church, Modernism, as a tendency of life and thought, is indestructible; it is in the movement of things. Pioneers fall. That he was broken against the opposing forces is true. But he would have held it immaterial. He fell face forward, as soldiers fall.

For England the Vatican has ceased to be a danger; between them, happily, "there is a great gulf fixed." But the stream of secessions, if thin, is persistent, and to those, an increasing number, who find Rome impossible, Protestantism seldom suggests itself as an alternative. Is it entirely without our own fault that this is so? "Have we not in part ourselves to blame if men of the high type of Loisy and Tyrrell feel themselves repelled by Protestantism?" asks a German critic. "Is their charge against it of being stiff and narrow, wholly without foundation in fact?" ("Modernismus." Professor Karl Holl, p. 47).

> "The very paganisms with which the Church is reproached assure me that all the streams of religious tradition from the most ancient times and the most distant quarters of the earth have met in her bosom, to be mingled with and purified by the living waters of the Gospel of Christ. Profoundly as I venerate the great truths and principles for which Protestantism stands, I am somewhat chilled by its inhumanity, its naked severity, its relentless rationality. If it feeds one half, perhaps the better half, of the soul, it starves the other. The religion of all men must be the religion of the whole man."

Forgetfulness of this is at once the weakness of reform and the strength of reaction, which lives, not on its own merits, but on its opponents' defects.

THE NEW CHANCELLOR AND THE OLD GAME.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A versatile diplomatist has gone and a cultured bureaucrat has come—this is almost all that can be said of the political situation created by the retirement of Prince Bülow into private life. The change of persons in the Governments of Prussia and the Empire has no political significance at all. It is neither a concession to the Clerico-Conservative majority nor is it an open defiance of this new Parliamentary combination. The right word to characterise it has already been used by THE NATION—it is a shuffle, and nothing else.

Can anything more clearly demonstrate the deficiencies of German Parliamentary life than the proceedings in regard to the change of the Chancellor of the Empire? After the rejection of the new succession duty by a small majority of the Reichstag, Prince Bülow travels to Kiel to see the Kaiser—who enjoys himself yachting—and tenders his resignation. It is accepted, but no official communication is made to the elected representatives of the nation. Only by semi-official communiqués and back-door blab do they hear of what is going on. They do not even know whether the session will be prorogued or closed. At last some members are given to understand who the successor will be, but no official intimation reaches the Reichstag or the parties. Then, on July 13th, without the Reichstag being asked, the session is closed by Imperial decree, and, only the day after, is it made known by the "Reichs-Anzeiger" who is the new Chancellor. The unparliamentary character of his office, his rôle as the mandatory of the Kaiser, could hardly be more impressively emphasised. And the parties concerned are quite content. The Liberals, because they detect in the new Chancellor some faint leanings to some Liberalism, and the Conservatives because they have gained a Parliamentary victory, without true Parliamentarism advancing one step. It is mock Parliamentarism which serves their interests best, and the persistence of mock Parliamentarism has been confirmed anew.

Some democratic papers have described the acceptance of Bülow's resignation by the Kaiser as the "revenge" of the latter on Bülow for the scenes of November last in connection with the so-called interview of the "Daily Telegraph." But that is pure imagination. It is revenge, but revenge on the nation. All the clamor, all the protests against personal government have been forgotten. Unable or unwilling to achieve self-government, the nation submits without a murmur to the re-affirmation of personal rule.

This is the one fact to be realised at this juncture. Only outsiders or dreamers, enthusiasts, can detect a step forward to self-government in the fact that Bülow ceded to a parliamentary majority. Bülow did not go simply because a majority of the Reichstag voted against him. He went because the one partner of the majority, the Conservative Party, is a party he does not seriously want to fight. He goes because he does not want to appeal to the nation against that party. And why not? Because it is the declared party of unparliamentary monarchism, the pillar of resistance to democracy. In his confessions to the editor of the "Hamburger Korrespondent," Bülow says frankly and bluntly: "I could not warm myself up for an electoral fight that would have had to be fought against the Right, and have as a necessary result an immeasurable strengthening of Radicalism, and particularly of Social Democracy." This is the key to the whole situation.

For Bülow's sentiment in this respect is also the sentiment of his successor.

Herr Theobald von Bethmann-Hollweg, the new Chancellor, is the scion of an old lineage of wealthy merchants and bankers. Whether the pedigree of the Bethmanns rests on Jewish ancestors, as was first hinted, is doubtful, and is vehemently disputed. For centuries the family has been Protestant Christian. At the beginning of the nineteenth century the then head of the house, a protector of arts and literature, was ennobled. His partner and brother-in-law, Johann Hollweg, put the family name of his wife in front of his own name, and called himself Bethmann-Hollweg. This was the great-grandfather of the present Chancellor. His grandfather, who adopted a legal career, was in 1870 ennobled, and from 1858 to 1862 was Minister of Education and Religion in the first Ministry of William I., then Prince Regent of Prussia. The second son of this man became the owner of a large country estate some forty miles from Berlin, and by this a member of the rural squirearchy of the province of Brandenburg. He had married a daughter of the aristocratic house of the De Rougemonts, a family of nobles of the Swiss Canton Neuchatel, which, till 1848, was a principality under the sway of the Kings of Prussia. Hence the traditions of the De Rougemonts have always been strongly Prussian and Royalist. One of them had in the 18th century been the financial agent of Frederic II. in Paris.

The son of the ruralised descendant of bankers is the Chancellor, Theobald von Bethmann-Hollweg. Born on his father's estate, he, like his grandfather, studied law. He then entered that section of the Prussian Civil Service which is practically the preserve of the squirearchy of that State, became president of a county, and afterwards—in 1900—High President of the Province of Brandenburg, in which capacity he had dealings with Berlin, still an administrative part of that province. A scheme elaborated by him for the realisation of the old idea of making Berlin a province of its own would have curtailed the already restricted self-governing powers of the town, and had to be dropped; otherwise he has, with some skill, avoided friction with the Berlin municipality.

Only a few years older than William II., Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg was his fellow student at the Bonn University, and also his fellow in the aristocratic student korps of the Borussen, in Bonn, one of those corps which are reputed to offer the first step to high position in the State. Even in 1899 William II. wanted to make his Korpsbruder Home Secretary of Prussia. But the other cautiously declined, because the question of the canal from the West to the East of Prussia, the reason of the revolt of the Junkers in the 'nineties, was not quite settled. And a good dose of caution seems to be one of the main characteristics of the new Chancellor. He is polite, but without the geniality which for many years made Bülow popular with the great public. He is more of an official softened by culture. People speak of him as a man of great knowledge and a painstaking worker. But if he is a good worker, he has hitherto been a small doer, unless temporisings and adjournments are regarded as achievements. In March, 1905, he became Home Minister in Prussia, and in 1907 Home Secretary of the Empire. But his record is, so far, almost empty of political and social reform. And the Bills brought forward by him had very objectionable features.

As Home Minister of Prussia, Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg, in 1906, brought a slight alteration in the three-class franchise for the Diet of that State. It is, in substance, a very insignificant measure, and would hardly be recalled at all but for the fact that it was avowedly made for the purpose of preserving all the bad features of the Prussian franchise, and was accompanied by a speech which gave the new Chancellor the name of a philosopher, but showed him a determined enemy of the democracy. He declared the adoption of the Reichstag franchise as "inacceptable" for Prussia, declared against the "tendencies to democratic levelling," and to "flattening down" the political life of the nation. He appealed to the "uplifting forces" in science and art, in agriculture and trade, and conjured up Kant, the "great intellectual aristocrat." Divested of its modern varnish, it was the usual philosophising apology for the maintenance of privilege. And the sworn parties of privilege, the Junkers loudest of all, cheered the Minister, whilst even the Freisinnige hissed his speech. Ten days afterwards—April 2nd, 1906—he repeated, amid the cheers of the Conservatives and the Catholics, that "universal, equal, direct, and secret vote is the demand of a time that lies far behind us. The ideals which guide us to-day are very different."

It is, then, more probable that Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg will at a given moment be a willing hand in the anti-Democratic revision of the Reichstag franchise than that a Democratic reform of the Prussian franchise can be expected from him. The reform will be patchwork at best, if there is to be reform at all; for through the mouth of one of their few eloquent spokesmen, Herr von Heydebrand, the Junkers have, three days before the closing of the session, made it known that their opposition to Bülow was due much more to the announcement of a reform of the Prussian franchise than to the proposed succession duty. And, together with the Catholic Centre, the Conservatives have a clear majority in the Landtag. Combined, they can obstruct any change in the distribution of seats which the Minister may propose as a concession to industry and commerce, now badly under-represented. Any reform, however trifling, will mean a fight with the Conservatives.

Thus far the new Chancellor's plans are absolutely unknown. It may be that at some future date he will be driven to risk a passage-at-arms with those whose opposition caused Bülow to resign. There is no doubt that William II., who more than ever shows his tenderness for the captains of industry and commerce, is discontented with the behaviour of the Conservatives, and Herr von Bethmann-Hollweg is, before all, the tool of the Kaiser. They have certainly come to some understanding between them in regard to the next steps in home politics, as it is well known that in foreign politics the new Chancellor will be the mere mouthpiece of his sovereign.

Of the other Ministers, the new Home Secretary, Herr Delbrueck, has, as a Minister of Trade and Commerce in Prussia, shown some unconventionality in action. When the new mining law was in preparation he went so far as to invite the Christian, and even the Social Democratic leaders of the miners to state their wishes, and in a speech to the magnates of industry he advised them not to show their workers too much overlordship, but to treat them in the spirit of elder comrades. This may in practice mean very little real progress, but it betrays some insight into modern conditions. The new Chancellor of the Exchequer, Herr Wermuth, is at least a well-informed official, particularly conversant with questions of international trade and commercial treaties, but the shuffling of Herr von Sydow from the Imperial Exchequer to the Prussian Ministry of Commerce can only be described as a bad practical joke. For if conceived as a punishment—the post is worse paid and altogether inferior to that previously held by this unprincipled inventor of taxes—it is doubtful whether trade or the man will be punished the more severely.

Altogether the revirement changes very little in the real condition of things. It indicates no tangible progress and no palpable reaction. The parties are split up as before, and consequently incapable of forming a responsible government. There has been much noise, and the cry has been given out: "Down with the blue-black bloc, down with the SCHNAPSBLOCK of squire and priest!" But it is all idle clamor. The parties whose entente would be necessary to bring about a genuine reaction—the Social Democrats and the Freisinnige—stand in hostile attitudes, and the Democrats of the group founded by that brave man, the lamented Theodore Barth, are so angry with their old party that, far from promoting an understanding between the two forces, they act as a wedge that drives them still farther asunder. We have still to look to the silent but effective action of industrial competition and the economic organisation of the workers as the most vigorous forces for progress. Party politics are paralysed.—Yours, &c.,

THE FIRST YEAR OF THE TURKISH CONSTITUTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The first year of the Turkish Constitution is now passed. The Young Turks have safely brought the ship of State through two revolutions and various minor storms, into calmer waters, though once or twice destruction seemed inevitable. But perhaps the hardest time is yet to come. Danger from foreign interference is generally averted by the intervention of other Powers, equally interested: but home perils can only be complicated from outside, never warded off. Looming large on the Turkish horizon are difficulties which are by nature peculiar to the Empire, and so do not appear to those outside. The writer has lived in Palestine for over twenty years, and the extraordinary changes in that part of the Turkish Empire may well claim some consideration on this first anniversary of the Constitution.

All must admit that the Constitution is a splendid movement: also that it is one of progress. It is, then, strange that so many brand it as useless because it did not immediately result in complete order. Ottomans themselves are less impatient than some English people, who forget what centuries of stern discipline and struggle have secured to our generation its prosperity. Brought face to face with exposure of corruption of every kind, they say: "So much for this vaunted Constitution! Look at all this going on!" True; but "this" has been going on quietly for years, and no notice was taken of it. That scandals are now being exposed every day should be counted for righteousness to our reformers.

The most extraordinary reform of all was the declaration of religious freedom. When we consider the intolerance of some Christian Powers (and our own Catholic Emancipation Bill only dates from 1829), it is astonishing that such an act was amongst the first carried through. Naturally, a section of the Moslems greatly disapproves: the ignorant dislike sharing their privileges with Christians and Jews; the fanatical think it lessens the power of the "State religion." But nothing else would have bound non-Moslem subjects to a Moslem Government as this has done. The mutual distrust between Moslems and Christians will be almost the greatest obstacle in the way of reform. It will probably take many generations of fair treatment on one side, and fair response on the other, to overcome it; though the fact that there are Christian members of the Committee of Union and Progress may go far to break down the barrier.

The inclusion of Christians and Jews in the army has long been desired by them, and when the permission was granted the Christians were delighted. That military service is to be compulsory was something of a damper. It is one thing to offer yourself for the service of your country, but quite another to have the offering exacted. Nor is it certain that men so devoid of the soldier spirit as they must be at first will raise the army.

The first-fruit of the Constitution was a strong national feeling; its existence was not suspected even by those who had lived long in the country, and knew the people well. It was most disheartening in former days to hear them say, "The country belongs to the Turks; what share have we in it?" "We must emigrate, for there is nothing for us under the Turkish Government." But with the Constitution a full-grown national spirit sprang suddenly to light. On every side were heard the triumphant words, "Our country," "Our Government," even "Our Sultan." Had Abdul Hamid only kept faith with his people, they would certainly have been true to him. The feeling that now they have part and share in the Empire, that they are no longer Turks, or Arabs, or Syrians, but Ottomans, heirs to a great past, and architects of a great future—this will greatly steady them. For years emigration has bled the country. There was no place for enterprise or energy, and those in whom lay the chief hope for the future had no choice but to emigrate.

Naturally the people do not yet understand what liberty is. The iron yoke of oppression has been suddenly broken, and the victims of long injustice count freedom as licence. Men will stare at and jostle you in the street; the fellah will answer back and behave with an impudence that would have been impossible even three years ago. "What do you mean by liberty?" a lawyer asked a soldier. Without hesitation the answer came, "It means that if my officer strikes me, I can hit him back!" The small police force is at a discount. "You dare not touch me—it is houriyeh" (Constitution), is the challenge to any attempt of theirs to exert authority. Were it not that the people are really tractable and orderly, despite their quick Eastern blood, matters would be decidedly uncomfortable. A schoolmaster in one of the provinces was explaining to a country audience the blessings of the new Parliament. He was hustled out. "We know the Sultan, and we know the Constitution," they shouted, "but who is Parliament? You are a traitor!" The element of danger is there, though not uppermost. The people have seen the power of their will in a revolution, complete and almost bloodless, and the deposition of the sovereign; the wine of success is strong and sweet. Everywhere is found the same spirit of resistance to authority—amongst the native Christians, expressed in the late remarkable movement in the Greek Church, and the steadily growing opposition of the Latin Arabs to monkish rule; in the bearing of the lower classes towards the upper; in the very schoolboy to his master. This was bound to follow in an undisciplined people suddenly freed from crushing oppression. But not for this should the Constitution be banned: movement is life, and when the excitement has abated the real authority will be felt. To expect an Eastern people to settle calmly down at once, after a complete subversion of the life and traditions of centuries, is merely to prove oneself absurd.

Taxes will now be fairly imposed. Of late years they had become so cruel that all heart was crushed out of the people. Case after case of horrible extortion occurred; I choose one at random. The small plot of a fellah yielded him one year exactly 20 francs (16s.) profit; he was taxed 30 francs because it could have yielded that in a good harvest. Doubtless under the new régime, foreigners, till now exempt, will have to take their share. Money is badly needed; it must be raised by fair means. One fruitful source of income may be tried. The Jews (already so strong financially) may be invited to colonise and finance the country. This is still only a conjecture, though many people think it is more. Already the Jews are buying up land and houses; this, with the feeling that property is now secure, is raising the prices everywhere. A narrow strip of land between two houses, perfectly bare, was worth £100 last year; it was bought by Jews this year for £550.

The compulsory teaching of Turkish in the schools presents many difficulties. Before the Constitution a knowledge of Turkish was necessary to obtain a Government post; now, as well as being compulsory, it may possibly be made the language of all schools. This means disaster. It will neutralise the foreign schools, in which the whole educational hope of the country lies; and it will cramp national growth in the limits of a minor language. Turkey has never been great in literature or in commerce, nor has she ever forced her language and customs on those she has conquered. Is she now going to try the experiment of treating her provinces as colonies? The Romans enforced their customs and language only in the towns, and rode the countryman with a loose rein.

We English may be proud of the high regard of Ottomans for our King and country. The strict justice of England's attitude before and since the Constitution is acknowledged by all. She alone did not wrench privileges from Turkey in her weakness, or use the time of national peril to further her own ends. The Arabic newspapers waxed enthusiastic over the King and England; and a rumor that he would visit Constantinople, Egypt, and Palestine was received with delight. Were he to come now, he would have a welcome far beyond that accorded to any royal visitor before.

Turkey is now well started, we may hope, on the path of progress. The effects of generations of misrule have to be remedied; the temper of a once conquering race, accustomed to Eastern despotism, to be moulded to modern service; the lack of population and revenue to be supplied. The task before the reformers is stupendous, but surely the very fact of the revolution is a guarantee for its ultimate success. One word to lookers-on. Let not our very sympathy with these workers make us impatient of slow progress, even of occasional reverses. These things must be. England was not set in order in one year after Magna Carta or the Constitutions of Clarendon. We have seen the tree planted; we can hardly hope to see its fruit. Let us watch in sympathy and hope, not withholding our tribute of admiration from one of the most wonderful exhibitions of energy and self-restraint the world has ever seen.—Yours, &c.,

ESTELLE BLYTH.

THE BACHELOR BLUE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The financiers and politicians who calculate the cost of our Navy have to leave out of their reckoning the personal factor. But there is a greater expense entailed in the support of armaments than that which can be measured in balance-sheets. Life is more than gold, and insurance against war swallows up a premium of manly strength and vigor immeasurable by the ordinary actuaries' tables.

Those who know the bluejacket on intimate terms of friendship, and have studied his nature and environment, are often saddened by the thought of this great bachelor community, who remain celibate so that England may be peaceful and prosperous. For what chance has the "Blue" of marrying? Owing to the necessary isolation of men on a ship, and the long periods of absence on foreign stations, they cannot enjoy the opportunities of the soldier for settling down into married life. The very terms of service give them no chance or help to do so. As mere boys at the age of fifteen to seventeen they join the Royal Navy, often fascinated by the glamour of the sea, and soon bitterly disappointed in the reality. For, despite the great improvements in feeding and barrack life made recently by a wise and thoughtful Admiralty, the "Blue" is seldom contented with his lot. As mere boys, then, they go into the barracks at Shotley. At eighteen they become men. The significance of this change is that now they can obtain all-night leave, with the privileges of smoking in public and drinking beer. At the age of eighteen they sign on for the first period of twelve years, and begin to specialise in their respective departments. At thirty they can go out without a pension into the world of which they are practically ignorant, and certainly incapable of competing with landsmen, the masters of a trade. For only the ships' artificers know a trade, and the able-bodied seaman has no qualification for earning his bread and butter, except in some unskilled employment like that of a night watchman. The other alternative is to sign on for a second period of ten years; then at the age of forty he can retire with a pension. In short, the terms of service are such that marriage is not economically justified before the age of forty, and then only if the men have reached warrant rank, or succeeded in finding a good berth in the world.

The writer has known various men, who disregarded this obvious economic situation. They had reached the age when the glance of two bright eyes works a revolution in the heart; their sweethearts were waiting; everything except the economic standpoint urged them to marry, especially the warning of comrades, who trusted too well to feminine faithfulness. For with many it is the old story. Jack goes off on a long commission and says goodbye to Poll. She is lonely. In time parental foresight, which fears the uncertainties of a sailor's life, and Poll's yearning as a woman, combine to attract her to an immediate marriage with some artisan of her native town. Jack returns. The sea and isolation from feminine society have developed the sentimental side of his nature. The result of the disappointment is often that a steady young fellow is transformed into a taciturn blackguard. So some will not risk losing by delay the girl whom they love. There is no rule against marrying, and for youth to wait till forty is to wait a lifetime. They marry. An analysis of the result is instructive. Last year there was a mess on a battleship stationed in the Mediterranean, in which two men were unmarried, two married. On an average each man may be said to have received fifteen shillings a week, and, of course, his food, and an allowance of grog and tobacco. The bachelor does very well indeed on this. The married man has to send home at least ten shillings on remittance allowance. Moreover, the Admiralty rightly does not waste the public's money on luxuries of food, and there is always a man, cunning in housekeeping, who acts as caterer to every mess. This entails an extra expense, which is inevitable, if the man is to share the social life of those around him. This distinction between the sailor and the townsman must be kept clear in any comparison of expenses. The latter can live without much male society; the former has to live with other men and share their expenses. The average mess account for a month is roughly ten shillings. This leaves the married man 2s. 6d. a week to spend in the canteen and on stamps. But soon the little Jackies and Pollies begin to appear at home, and the wife needs more than ten shillings to keep them properly clothed and fed. The result is that the married man is always at a great disadvantage to the bachelor on board. The visitor finds him in a corner making "diddy-boxes," or washing other men's shirts and stockings in order to increase his income. When the ship stops at Crete, his messmates get up an excursion, but he cannot afford to join, for prices have a knack of doubling when a "Blue" approaches. No doubt this enforced thrift is excellent as a discipline of character, but it is a warning to his comrades not to go and do likewise. To make a broad generalisation: in the Navy the few fools marry; the many wise avoid matrimony.

A heavy price is paid in consequence. The "Blue" is, on the whole, as fine a man physically and morally as can be found in Great Britain. He is selected usually from a country stock, or from respectable townsfolk. (In this analysis the stoker class is excluded.) According to eugenic teaching the "Blues" above all are best fitted to become the fathers of the next generation. Their open-air work has kept them hard and fit, but strength and health are not the only qualities to be desired. There are the more important considerations of mind and character and soul. What a noble man the average "Blue" is, for all his obvious faults! He is strong, tactful, loving, simple, true, and loyal, and forms a refreshing contrast to the shifty, weakly, putty-faced fathers who flock in suburban men's clubs. Nature, aided by environment and training, have produced a noble race on our battleships. But this race can have no children, unless either an unwise marriage is risked, or parental responsibility is totally avoided. The streets in our naval ports are significant of the balance-sheet which might there be drawn in figures of flesh and blood. The Service man often finds himself in a dilemma between vice with many, or a foolish marriage with one.

This is the problem which has always had to be faced by a Naval Power, and no Admiralty can be blamed in the least for conditions out of its power. A short service system considering the complexities of naval machinery is impossible, for it takes a man some years to learn his work. If the state of the Exchequer allowed, there are two courses which might relieve the difficulty. When a man has reached a certain rank, if he wished to marry, he might be granted a special marrying allowance, or else, on the analogy of the Army, wives' quarters might be instituted. At present the expense takes both suggestions out of the range of practical politics. Yet the taxpayer should realise the great price paid by modern nations both in the loss to the future breed and in the disease and vice produced by naval conditions.

Possibly a sailor cannot be at the same time both a handy man and a family man. But now he is but a cog in the national machine; his personality is often forgotten, since he has to stand aside from the life of the ordinary citizen. However there is a virtue flowing from the ideal of a European peace, which tends to elevate men above the mere interests of commerce or the necessities of self-defence. We must work for an unseen future in this world as in another. The Bluejacket will gain his place in the life of citizenship, when Peace Conferences have done their work, and the great nations do not need to insure so expensively against the horrors of modern warfare.—Yours, &c.,

LORD LANSDOWNE'S DOCTRINE OF COMMON SENSE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I offer the following observations with reference to Lord Lansdowne's remarks on the relations of the Lords and the Budget—as reported in the "Times" of July 17th? He is reported as saying: "I do not think you will find that when the time comes the House of Lords is at all likely to proclaim that it has no responsibility for the Bill, and that because it is mixed up with the financial affairs of the nation we are obliged to swallow it whole and without hesitation. That, to my mind, would be not only a mistake, but an unconstitutional proposition. I could easily supply you with authorities from text-books, but I am not going to do anything of the kind." It is a pity that the noble marquis did not do so, because it is difficult to know on what text-books he relies, and from a certain acquaintance with the subject I confess myself at a loss to discover them. Did he derive them from the text-books of Bagehot, of Erskine May, of Sir William Anson—his colleague—from the verbal commentary of his colleague, Lord Salisbury. or from his organ—the "Times"—with its array of precedents against him, on July 5th? Let me, however, quote two opinions against him, from two very recent publications, by two men whose knowledge of the Constitution even he is not likely to question. Sir Spencer Walpole's account of the disputes of 1860-1 (pp. 334-5, "Cambridge Modern History," Vol. XI., Cambridge, 1909), leaves the clear implication behind it that they established the principle that the Lords can neither amend nor reject Finance Bills. Turn to another authority—Mr. A. L. Lowell—who, being an American, has every claim to impartiality, and who has derived his information from English politicians of every school. His work (published at the end of 1908), and universally acknowledged as the most valuable of recent text-books, says, II., pp. 400-1: "Although the Lords have never expressly admitted the claim (right of the Commons to control finance), they have, in fact, submitted to it. . . . It is now the regular practice to include all the taxation in one Bill, and, as the Peers never venture to reject as a whole either this or any of the great measures granting supplies, it is truly said that the House of Lords cannot initiate or amend, and practically cannot reject, any money Bill."

I think these statements make it clear why Lord Lansdowne goes on: "In cases of this kind I prefer to rely not only upon text-books, but upon common sense." The appeal here is even more dangerous. On what principle of common sense are a hundred of our constitutional customs justified? Why should the King's assent be in French, why should the House of Commons go into full committee, why should the King be legally permitted a veto and practically forbidden to use it? But there is a still more practical question—why should legislators be hereditary? None of these things can be justified—if precedents are to give way to common sense. The application of common sense, irrespective of tradition and precedent, to the Constitution—especially to the constitution of the Upper House—is about the most revolutionary doctrine which could be proclaimed. In a Constitution—depending almost wholly upon custom—everything is to be revised according to common sense. No Democratic or Socialist orator could wish for more; the only difference between them and Lord Lansdowne is that, in the one case, the people, and, in the other case, the Lords are to judge what is common sense.

Let us follow out Lord Lansdowne's conclusion. That House (whose only defence in its existing condition is that it is a security against revolution) is now to inaugurate a revolution, to tear up precedents, to curtail the powers of the Lower House, to increase those of heredity, to alter the Constitution—in the name of what?—of common sense! These are the results of common sense, and they seem to me quite as startling as the noble Marquis's knowledge of textbooks. Let me address to him the following counsel from Shakespeare's "Love's Labor Lost":—

"BIRON: What is the end of study? Let me know.

"KING: Why, that to know, which else we should not know.

"BIRON: Things hid and barred, you mean, from common sense?

"KING: Ay, that is study's godlike recompense."

—Yours, &c.,

H. W. V. TEMPERLEY.

THE CASE OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—By the mail steamer which will carry this the latest of the South African delegates will reach England. Their work will be that of advising the Imperial Government from the South African point of view on the passing of the draft Act of Union through Parliament. It is understood that they have powers from their respective Governments to agree to alterations which do not involve any new principle. The schedule to the Act wherein the question of the native protectorates is dealt with stands, however, in a special category. Admittedly it is at present incomplete. Modifications of its wording are as much expected by the delegates as they will be inclined to demur to any re-shaping of the body of the Act. Several, if not most, of the clauses in the schedule have been purposely left vague with a view to close definition of the ideas they convey. So much is to be gathered from the published letter of the Chief Justice of the Cape, Sir Henry de Villiers, to Lord Selborne. I would like to point out that there is here afforded an opportunity to the Imperial Government to secure at least a part solution of the native problem in this country. Probably the concession in the draft Act in regard to the Cape native vote represents the farthest which the northern Colonies will be willing to make for some years to come. To them it is a real concession to agree to send their representatives to a Parliament in which they will meet other representatives who depend largely on native constituents. The native vote at the Cape is so far entrenched that it can only be removed by a two-thirds majority of the two Houses sitting together. There are some who read this provision to imply that the Imperial Government will not veto the decision of such a majority. Unless that view is dispelled by the Secretary for the Colonies from his place in Parliament there can be little doubt that the adverse two-thirds majority will speedily be got together, and that the natives will become throughout South Africa a disfranchised class. I write as knowing personally the average sentiment of three out of the four South African legislatures, and I have reason to believe that in the fourth legislature, that of Natal, the feeling is still more adverse to the granting of votes to natives. There will exist no security for the native vote at the Cape unless it is understood that its withdrawal, even by the vote of a two-thirds majority, will be subject to the Imperial veto. It would be still better if any alteration of the Cape franchise could be reserved, like the principle of equal vote values, for the signification of the King's pleasure.

If the future Union Government know beforehand that the Imperial Government retain their right of veto on any alteration in the status of native voters at the Cape and that such veto would probably be exercised, they will be led the more earnestly to try to devise some form of representation which shall include all the natives in South Africa, and not those of one colony alone. It is clear that we cannot continue to deny citizen rights to the majority of our civilised natives merely because they live on a particular side of a certain river, while their kinsmen on the other side are in receipt of the privilege I have named. All the Imperial Government need to do is to block any withdrawal of the native vote at the Cape, and they may leave it to the South African Government to decide how they will remedy a situation which will become more impossible year after year.

Meanwhile, the Imperial Government can secure the future of the tribes who dwell outside the white areas. There are the great protectorates which embrace about one-fourth of the whole area of South Africa, and there are the native reserves scattered over the country—some of them, like Pondoland, the Transki, Zululand, and Swaziland, of considerable size. If these are secured to their present native inhabitants and to such other natives as may in future find room to dwell there, the black race will possess a country of their own, pending such time as it may be considered safe and wise in the interests of both races to throw the reserves open and create for the whole of British South Africa a franchise which knows no distinction of color. Such a day, it may confidently be said, will not dawn during the lifetime of anybody yet born. Meanwhile, the reservation to the natives of the lands they at present possess will enable them to assimilate our situation in such of its elements as they may find helpful, and to attain to a development of their own. They may thus finally be able to enter into political partnership with the whites on a more equal footing than is possible for them to-day. If the territories and reserves are firmly secured there will be a favorable reaction on the position of the natives in the European areas. Such natives, if ill-treated, either by their employers or the Government, will have a home to which they can flee, and the knowledge of that fact will act as a restraint on the Europeans. For one thing, it will probably lead to the general creation of native councils, perhaps on the Glen Grey model, wherein the natives can voice their wants and views, the European Government retaining, of course, the last word. A safety valve of this kind would ease matters for some years, until the natives became as a mass more fit for a vote, and the whites, on the other hand, more educated to the advisability of granting it.

The crux of the whole problem is to preserve the entrenchment of the veto for (1) the native vote at the Cape; (2) the native reserves throughout South Africa. And it would be better still if the veto in both cases could be converted into a reservation.—Yours, &c.,

DEWDNEY W. DREW,

THE SUFFRAGETTES AT BYE-ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been a member of the Women's Social and Political Union for little more than a week, and the impressions I have received of its bye-election work are, to myself, so interesting that I hope they may be equally so to others.

Every woman who sets out on a railway journey from London, wearing for the first time the colors of this organisation, and perhaps carrying some of its literature, probably prepares herself to hear a certain amount of ridicule and unpleasantness. She has in her ears the phrases of London journalists. She has read that the country regards her with "apathy or disgust," if not as a "howling dervish." But what does she find? Up and down the country, from London to Buxton, from Buxton to Dumfries and back again, nothing but courtesy, interest, and real kindness await the suffragette. Everybody knows the colors, and, apparently, everybody likes them. Best of all, everybody begins to discuss the suffrage. Men in railway carriages borrow "Votes for Women," and then ask questions on points they don't understand. People on platforms come up with hurried questions, station-masters wish you luck, and the guard will come to tell you how he is trying to get off early one night in order to hear Mrs. Pankhurst. "Why oppose the Liberal Government?" is the question asked oftenest; but when the absolutely reasonable position of the W.S.P.U. is put before them, they have no argument to set against it. We found in Dumfries that the "canny" and logical Scot was particularly quick to grasp our position, and particularly troubled by it. One speaker said to me: "I like to see that worried look on the men's faces. It's better for us than applause." Electors are beginning to see that Liberalism ought to be more than a fancy name, and to accept our distinction between Liberal principle and the Liberal Party. Our outdoor meetings in Dumfries were mostly composed of men, but women flocked to those held indoors. We had women of every class, and this is remarkable, because before the bye-elections Dumfries had never seen a suffragette. "My!" said a young married woman to me at the close of one meeting, "I never got such a surprise in my life as when you folk cam' here. Ye'd never think the things we'd heard about ye. It was awfu'." I pressed her to tell me, and she blurted out, "Well, we had only the papers to go by, and we thocht ye was jist a lot o' bad wimmen, oot for the fun o' the thing." This woman and her mother are now members. The W.S.P.U. has every form of calumny to fight against, and yet, wherever it goes, it wins adherents at once.

A woman who keeps a restaurant in Buxton said much the same. "Oh, you know what the Press is, mum; but we knew nothing of these ladies except what the papers told us. When they held their first meeting here the hall was packed; all the young men of the place had gone for a lark. Well, the lady who spoke there held everybody spellbound. People were astonished; and now you'll not find anyone in Buxton to say a word against the suffragettes."

I asked if she thought they were turning votes.

"As to that I can't say," she said; "but whether you do that or not, you're educating the people, making them think." I don't know to what political party this woman belonged. People have grasped the fact that members of the W.S.P.U. belong to no party.

I give these instances to show the popularity of the Union. This was to me a great surprise, and as a new member, almost an outsider, I think I may say frankly what is the reason for it. The Union commands immediate attention because of the excellence of its speakers; it commands respect by the perfection of its organisation in which everyone is always busy, but no departments over-lap; but, above all, it commands admiration because of the character of its workers. I have been in many communities and concerned in various philanthropic works, but I have not before been in touch with a body of people so entirely self-less as the members of the Women's Social and Political Union. This absolute devotion to their cause, a devotion that stops at nothing, and fears nothing—is acting like a magnet, drawing supporters slowly and steadily from all over the country. Nothing can stop this movement. It is beyond the control of any Government with all its backing of police and punishment cells. And it is because we feel this that it is possible to face the knowledge that comrades are starving in prison, hunger-striking for the dignity of their cause, while not a newspaper in the country will raise its voice for them, not a member of Parliament take up their wrongs.

But I should like to ask members of the great Liberal Party if they have ever thought of the effect on the minds of, say, a group of quarry-men, when some refined womanly woman who is addressing them suddenly begins to tell them about her arrest and imprisonment as a common criminal with the consent of a Liberal Government; or when they are told about the hunger-strikes. Working-men understand about hunger and about strikes. That goes home to them. But between a well-fed Cabinet, daily sacrificing its principles on a full diet, and a group of women facing starvation and maybe death for their principles, no mental link is possible.

Votes are being turned. Mr. Arthur E. Piggott, who has votes in Manchester, Stratford, and High Peak, sent Mrs. Pankhurst a copy of a letter he addressed to Mr. Par tington, stating that he would refrain from voting at this election on account of the question of women's votes. The letter appears to-day in the "Sheffield Telegraph." In the course of it he says: "I am a life-long Liberal . . . but I place principle before party, and have felt for some time that our present attitude on the votes for women question was totally unworthy of the party of progress. The Prime Minister's action in refusing even to receive a deputation from the Women's Social and Political Union is, in my opinion, detestable, and I will no longer be a party by implication to the Government's taboo of the women's cry for justice and fair dealing."

Again, a doctor, well-known in Buxton, tells us that many Liberals are, for similar reasons, abstaining from voting, and also that many men who never troubled to use their vote at all are so stimulated by the Suffragist campaign that they are coming forward at this election.

Surely self-interest alone will induce the Government to take its head out of the sand and see for itself that it will soon be in danger of being destroyed as it is already being humiliated by this just and truly Liberal movement.

I fear, sir, that I have already written too much. My excuse must be the importance of the subject.—Yours, &c.,

J. E. M. BRAILSFORD.

FATHER TYRRELL'S POSITION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Father Tyrrell's review of the Italian version of Mr. Lloyd Thomas's book suggests some questions to which one would like some answers. Father Tyrrell speaks of "a religion that is one and catholic" (catholic with a small c) as necessary to those who desire contentment. At the end of his review he speaks of this religion as recognising "as its supreme authority the freely formed and freely criticised mind of the whole body of the Church—lay and cleric."

Now, does this whole body of the Church, lay and cleric, embrace only those at present within the Roman Catholic communion? Or, if not, is it to embrace only those at present within the Christian fold?

If either of these questions be answered in the affirmative, then "the whole body" of Father Tyrrell's Church will still be only a fraction of humanity. There will be no place in it for the millions of Buddhists, of Moslems, of Shintoists, and all the other millions of the human family. In that case this religion, that is to be "one and catholic," would only, strictly speaking, be one more sect.

If, on the other hand, the Mohammedans, Buddhists, Jews, &c., are to be regarded as belonging to the real body of the Church, are equally sincere and high-minded Positivists, Agnostics, and Atheists to be similarly embraced?

If the answer is in the negative, then the religion that is one and catholic will still exclude some of the highest and noblest servants of humanity, like Comte and Mill and Spencer, and it will still be faced with almost insoluble difficulties for those who desire contentment.

Lastly, if Father Tyrrell would desire to include either all sincere religionists of every kind, or all sincere men, whether religionist or not, then the Church of his dream will have no more relationship to the idea of the present Roman Catholic Church than to the present idea of Islam.

In short, as one who has read a couple of Father Tyrrell's books, I would like to know whether he is concerned merely with a domestic readjustment or with a human problem?—Yours, &c.,

"WILD MEN."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article on "Wild Men" you go out of the way to speak of people with whom I am associated in the following language: "Your anti-vaccination monomaniac is a faddist." You are perfectly at liberty to call me and my friends any names you like, if you think it advisable, but in the interests of accuracy I should like you to define a "monomaniac" and a "faddist." If, for instance, one-half of the parents in this country strongly object to vaccination, would you call the advocate of their cause a "faddist"? Thanks to the accident of the ballot, and for other reasons, I was able, in the years 1906 and 1907, to bring great pressure on the Government, and with the aid of a requisition signed by, I think, about 180 Members of Parliament, I got the President of the Local Government Board to bring in a Bill, which became an Act, dealing with vaccination exemptions. In 1908, the first year in which this Act came into effect, 160,000 people made use of it to claim exemptions. Do you characterise the whole of those people as "anti-vaccination monomaniacs"? I believe—but I have not got the statistics by me, as I am writing this letter from my country house—that at least another 160,000 do not have their children vaccinated, but omit to obtain the legal exemption. Therefore we have something like 300,000 parents in one year, out of a total of, say, 800,000, who strongly object to vaccination. Are they "anti-vaccination monomaniac faddists"? Or would you reserve the term "monomaniac faddist" for the man who thinks it is right to compel his fellow-creatures to undergo a process which they think is not only useless and injurious, but disgusting? In addition to those who get exemptions and to those who defy the law, there is a very great number who submit to vaccination to avoid the annoyance and cost of a prosecution. So I am probably within the mark in saying that at least half the parents in England object to vaccination.—Yours, &c.,

ARNOLD LUPTON.

THE DESTRUCTION OF DIALECT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. T. Maben, in his letter in this week's issue, makes the statement that in Roxburghshire the purest form of Scotch is spoken.

I know not whether Mr. Maben is himself a native of that county, but from his statement I should imagine so.

Now, I know Roxburghshire fairly well, but in no part of it have I heard the soft, mellow tone of the pure Inverness-shire accent. There is a cadence in the pronounciation of his words which gives to the "Invernesian's" conversation a musical sweetness possessed by the native of no other district in Great Britain.

I have heard comparisons made as to the merits and demerits of the various dialects at representative gatherings of Scotchmen in London, and cannot recollect a single instance in which it was not admitted that for purity of diction and sweetness of tone, our language, as spoken in Inverness-shire, is the most perfect form in use in any part of the country.

However much we may dislike it, we cannot but admit that Mr. D. H. Kemp is right in his assertion that dialect cannot be fostered by artificial means. The diction of the English language—and the term English includes, of course, modern Scotch—is undoubtedly deteriorating, and our present educational system seems powerless to prevent this deterioration. Throughout Essex, Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, in all the larger towns, one finds the "Cockney" accent in its vilest form prevailing in nearly all the middle and lower class families, and except in a few of the smaller villages, the dialect of these counties is now simply that of the Mile End Road. Even in the North of Scotland there is a growing tendency to "mince" words in imitation of what the inhabitants imagine to be the manner of the upper classes.

Those of us who are exiled for the greater part of the year from—as Mr. David Wilson quotes—"that secluded valley which to us is home," cannot but lament this tendency. Which of us does not delight to lapse into the broad mother tongue of his particular district on his—alas!—too short visits to the old country-side; and which of us does not feel his heart throb responsive at the sound of the old words and phrases spoken in the old way.

I fear there is little likelihood of the education authorities adopting any scheme for the preservation of dialect, but if we cannot save our dialects, we can, at least, impress upon the instructors of the young the necessity of their teaching in theory and in practice the purest English; so that if the day which sees our tongue universally used ever dawns, we shall have given to the world a language of which we may be justly proud.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is one English dialect (that of Yorkshire) which is noteworthy, not only on account of its vocabulary, but of its pronunciation. Now there is no more reason why the vocabulary peculiar to the Yorkshire dialect should be preserved than that of any other county; but I do wish to put in a plea, not only for the retention, but for the extension of the pronunciation, which, as regards the stressed vowels, is closely akin to that of the great Continental languages, and far preferable to that of regulation English.

Our pronunciation of Latin has at last been reformed on rational lines, and the pronunciation of Greek will, to all appearance, soon follow suit. Is it too much to ask that the pronunciation of English should now be taken in hand, with the view of adopting the values, or something like the values, which we have now determined to attach to the vowel symbols in Latin, which they still have, for the most part, in the Yorkshire dialect, and which they had in standard English up to about three centuries ago; so that it may be as easy, phonetically, for foreigners to understand us when we speak our mother tongue as when we speak Latin?

If their Majesties would graciously set the fashion of talking Yorkshire from above, and the sub-almighty Board of Education would issue edicts from below, the thing would very soon be done.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondents in favor of the maintenance of dialect will presumably approve of the course events are taking in Norway, where the "Maal" has become a solemnly authorised national language. This Norwegian "Maal" is not only dialect, but it is a conglomeration, so to speak, of dialects, an essence of sundry isolated and more or less antiquated rural dialects, lest any part of the country should feel neglected. It is consequently, to some extent at least, an artificial product, with the manufacture and blending of which politics have had more to do than is desirable from a linguistic point of view. A storm of opposition has been raised against the new language, if one may so term it, and no one denounces it more powerfully or more vehemently than Björnstjerne Björnson, whose words in this matter carry more weight than the sum total of the "Maal" supporters.

It is interesting to note several words of Danish extraction amongst those examples of Cumberland dialect mentioned by Mr. Slater in his letter in your issue of July 3rd. Thus low (flame) is Lue in Danish; reek (smoke) is Rög, buse (box in stable) is Boos, and whye (female calf) is Koie; stye (ladder) is Stige, and to lake (to play, I take it) is lege, the Danish pronunciation greatly enhancing the phonetic similarity of most of these words.

Whilst on the subject of dialects I may, perhaps, be allowed to draw attention to a most peculiar Anglo-Scandinavian similarity in dialect, to be found in the old historic province of Dalecarlia, where dialects still abound, as do many old customs. The Dalecarlians of the Eastern parishes not only drop their h's, but they also stick them on in the wrong place, just as in Cockneyland—and elsewhere, both in talking and writing. This, to my knowledge, is an isolated case, at least, as far as the whole of Scandinavia goes. Can any of your readers explain this peculiarity, or, perhaps, record similar instances?—Yours, &c.,

GEORG BROCHNER.

"REVOLUTION IN EDUCATION."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have read with interest and some consternation the article by Mr. Graham Wallas in last week's NATION, called a "Revolution in Education." As I have no special and practical, but only a general and indirect, acquaintance with the national scheme of elementary education, I was one of those to whom the new regulations, so vigorously attacked by Mr. Graham Wallas, brought an agreeable surprise. I had for a long time realised the absurdity of the situation with regard to religious education and general biblical knowledge, both in our secondary and in our primary schools. There is, on the one hand, the demand on the part of the educated public that the Bible and the leading principles of the Christian religion should have some place in general education. On the other hand, the instruction of the teachers of those subjects has been, as a rule, utterly neglected. Neither in the preparation for a degree nor in the training of the teaching is there, as a rule, any time or opportunity allowed to the hard-worked student for acquiring an intelligent acquaintance with one of the subjects which he or she may be required or may specially desire to teach. During the last few years a good many leading head mistresses of secondary schools for girls have been coming to recognise the fact, and to afford opportunities for young assistant teachers to become a little less incompetent and out-of-date in biblical and religious study. But the case has not been adequately met. To some of us who read the new regulations, it seemed that in the elementary schools, at least, the anomaly was to cease, and that teachers were to be required to be equipped in this as in other subjects, and to be responsible for the soundness of the teaching they undertook to give.

It is not easy to see the ground on which Mr. Graham Wallas objects to putting this kind of instruction under the ordinary inspector. The inspector is supposed to be a man of liberal education, and it is religious and biblical knowledge as a branch of liberal education—not as the traditions authorised by any church. He may remember that when Matthew Arnold was a school inspector, he regretted that the teaching of the Bible was outside his sphere. If he had had to inspect it, would he have countenanced anything superficial and unsatisfactory?

As Mr. Graham Wallas most clearly shows, it is for the universities to help us in the present difficulties, and even the newer universities have given hope of rising to the occasion. I need only refer to the Manchester School of Theology, and to the lately-started Certificate Examination of the University of London. There is yet some hope that if the training colleges have to furnish a modest equipment of knowledge to such as have no conscientious scruples against receiving it, the universities will find both teachers and tests (tests of knowledge and not of opinion). If, through shortness of time, some of the colleges have to begin before there has been much university discussion of the subject, cannot they reform their methods in the light of experience?

Again I apologise for giving the views of a non-specialist. I desired that Mr. Graham Wallas, who is behind no one in his hatred of shams, should discern how it is that some people hoped, from the new regulations, the death-blow to a piece of arrant hypocrisy—the demand for teaching without any care for a competent teacher.—Yours, &c.,

ALICE GARDNER,
Lecturer of Newnham College, Cambridge.

"WHAT THE PUBLIC WANTS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. William Archer, in your issue of the 17th, said: "Only a few weeks ago, two plays were running in London (one of them is running still), the leading characters of which were unmistakably and undeniably intended to represent a prominent individual." Mr. Archer, of course, refers to Lord Northcliffe. I wish to say positively that the leading character in my play, "What the Public Wants," was not intended to represent Lord Northcliffe. I have no acquaintance whatever with Lord Northcliffe, and there was no portraiture in my principal character. My endeavor was simply to create a suitable person as the head of an enterprise of a class which is peculiar to the modern epoch. The leading actual example of this class of enterprise is undoubtedly the Harmsworth Press, of which Lord Northcliffe is the head. But surely one may criticise a class of enterprise without producing a "scathing lampoon" (Mr. Archer's phrase) of a particular individual. I object to Mr. Archer's statement on two grounds: First, I should regard a scathing lampoon of an existing individual as basely unworthy of a serious artist. Second, I am quite sure that my Sir Charles Worgan bears no resemblance to Lord Northcliffe the individual, and to call the one an intended portrait of the other is to accuse me of gross incapacity in my craft. Further, I venture to think that Mr. Archer's description, "flagrant case of personal satire and invective," as applied to my play, is ill-considered.

An artist whose aim is creatively to criticise the institutions, habits, and tendencies of his age has no time to squander in the facile game of copying individuals.—Yours, &c.,

THE ASSESSMENT OF LAND IN THE UNITED STATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A brief statement of American habits of taxation may not be without interest at this time in Great Britain.

In every one of the forty-six states, so far as I am aware, all land and all personal property is at the same time and by the same local officers periodically assessed for the purposes of taxation at a conservative market value. This includes equally occupied and used and unoccupied and unused land.

Upon this single assessed value is based a percentage which covers the requirements of the State, and differing other percentages for the county, city, township, school district, &c., respectively. The system is very simple, and, doubtless, as just in its operation as any taxing system is likely to be. An income tax upon rents would obviously be double taxation and is therefore not in use.

The theory is that all values are approximately equally protected or benefited by the State and its Government.

In the city of about half-a-million population from which this is written the aggregate of all these taxes is now about one and eight-tenths per cent. upon this valuation. (This has no relation to the Federal system of taxation for national purposes).

This State system in its effect easily disposes, substantially, of "The unearned increment" question. The greater the saleable value becomes the greater is the sum of the taxes paid upon the land for the benefit of the public which has been the principal cause of the increment.

The payment of these taxes and the loss of interest and income upon the investment amount to a considerable reduction from accumulating increment and in practice cause rapid gravitation of the land into hands that will beneficially use it, obviously a desirable result.—Yours, &c.,

FAITH AND CONDUCT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—For the benefit of those of your readers who have not yet had the good fortune to make the acquaintance of that most delightful of philosophers and critics, M. Bergeret, the principal character in M. Anatole France's remarkable series of books, entitled "L'Histoire Contemporaine," may I quote a passage from one of M. Bergeret's discourses on the above subject?—Yours, &c.,

W. J. B.

"Il y a, dans chaque temps, des habitudes de vie qui déterminent une manière de penser commune à tous les hommes. Nos idées morales ne sont pas le produit de la réflexion mais la suite de l'usage. Comme à l'adoption de ces idées sont attachées des notes d'honneur et à leur répudiation des notes d'infamie, personne n'ose les remuer ouvertement. Elles sont admises sans examen par la communauté tout entière, indépendamment des croyances religieuses et des opinions philosophiques, et elles ne sont pas plus fortement soutenues par ceux qui s'astreignent à les mettre en pratique que par ceux qui n'y conforment pas leur actes. L'origine des ces idées est seule en discussion. Tandis que les esprits qui se disent libres croient retrouver dans la nature les règles de leur conduite, les âmes pieuses tirent de la religion les règles de la leur, et ces règles se trouvent être les mêmes, à peu de chose près, non parce qu'elles sont universelles, à la fois divines et naturelles, comme on se plaît à le dire, mais, au contraire, parce qu'elles sont propres au temps et au lieu, tirées des mêmes habitudes, déduites des mêmes préjugés. Chaque époque a sa morale dominante, qui ne résulte ni de la religion ni de la philosophie, mais de l'habitude, seule force capable de réunir les hommes dans un même sentiment, car tout ce qui est sujet au raissonnement les divise; et l'humanité ne subsiste qu'à la condition de ne point réfléchir sur ce qui est essential à son existence. La morale domine les croyances, qui sont sujettes à dispute, tandis qu'elle n'est jamais examinée.

"Et précisément parce que la morale est la somme des préjugés de la communauté, il ne saurait exister deux morales rivales en un même temps et dans un même lieu."

A SUSSEX CHURCHYARD.

BEAUTIFUL home of the dead,
Lit by a sunset of May,
Even thy sepulchres gay!
Spring-blossom laughing above
Dead men sleeping below,
Redthorn exultingly red,
Whitethorn enrobed in its snow,
Lilac as lovely as love,
Irises blue in their bed,
Blue as the sea in the bay,
Blue as the sky overhead,—
Life out of dust of the dead!

2.

Dead! Is there anywhere death?
Earth given back to the earth
Nurses the blossom to birth
Spicing the air with its breath,
Yea, though abased to the worm,
Out of the innermost germ
Aiding to fashion again
New generations of men.

3.

Twain are we?—body and soul—
Or but a multiform, one,
Interdiffusible Whole,
Ending not, neither begun,
Now but an atom, and now,
After the sleep of the tomb,
Moving, a babe of the womb,
Waking, we know not when,
Living, we know not how,
Woven by Time's vast loom
Into the pattern of men?

4.

Beautiful home of the dead,
Fitly from such a prison
(Shrouded at first and dark,
Then, as the centuries passed,
Warmed to an animate spark)
Life has been built at last,
Fancy and intellect fed,
Love of the lovely arisen,
Very perception of thee
Out of thyself being born,
Soul from the bloom of the thorn,
Sense from the sap of the tree,
So, from the coffin awoke,
Thrilled through the air and the flower,
Moulded by might of the oak,
Blent with the blood of the rose,
Fused into passion and power,
Lord of his life for an hour
Man to man's heritage grows.

Scorned is the thought for a dream?
Were it then wiser to deem Souls re-embodied shall rise
Swift, when the trumpet shall call,
Souls re-invested in all
Olden humanity's guise,
Human, for human assize?

We but believe, as we see Infinite sequences ranged Kin to the dust and the dew,
Mortal, immortally new;
Not altogether man dies,
Not in a moment is changed;
Slowly, and out of a deep
Peace of impalpable sleep
His resurrection shall be.
So saith the churchyard to me.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

WE learn that at the time of his death Father Tyrrell had practically completed an important work bearing the title "Christianity at the Cross-roads," which his literary executors will at once prepare for publication. The book is an outspoken statement of Father Tyrrell's views and a denunciation of the rule of cast-iron dogma, against which his later career was so great a protest.

FOR publishers, at least, the great event of the coming autumn season will be the experiment in issuing novels at a cheaper rate. The general view is that the step will be successful, though some of the libraries and a number of authors are bent upon a vigorous opposition. Of other aspects of the season it is as yet premature to form an opinion. One fact, however, may be safely predicted. Biography is sure to hold its pride of place, and many biographies of special promise are already in the press. Mr. G. W. E. Russell's "Memoir of Sir Wilfrid Lawson," which was announced some time ago, will be one of the early autumn books. It has been based on a volume of reminiscences which Sir Wilfrid Lawson had written towards the end of his life. The authoritative biography of the late Duke of Devonshire may be expected by the end of the year, and is sure to contain a good deal relating to the inner political history of the latter half of Queen Victoria's reign. The Duke's association with Gladstone, Bright, Lord Granville, W. E. Forster, and Lord Salisbury, and his correpondence with these statesmen, provides an abundance of material. The work has been entrusted to Mr. Bernard Holland, who was at one time the Duke's private secretary.

OF greater literary interest will be "A Memoir of the Right Hon. W. E. H. Lecky," by Mrs. Lecky, which Messrs. Longmans have in the press. It will contain a large number of unpublished letters, as well as Lecky's recollections of the men of letters whose friendship he enjoyed, chief among them being Carlyle and Froude. It is noteworthy, by the way, that several recent English historians—S. R. Gardiner, Stubbs, Acton, and Maitland—have not as yet received the biographical honors they deserve. Something has been written about each of them, and Mr. Herbert Paul's introduction to the "Letters of Lord Acton to Mary Gladstone" is excellent, but it is a pity in these days, when so many nobodies are thought worthy of bulky memoirs, that the lives of these great men have not been presented in fuller detail.

THE Crusade of Children which began in France in the early years of the thirteenth century furnishes such attractive material for the novelist that it is surprising no book on the subject has as yet appeared in English. The crusade seems to have been instigated by the Old Man of the Mountain, the head of the sect of assassins in Syria, who, desiring to recruit his bands, made use of the religious feeling in France and sent two emissaries—William the Swine (Guglielmus Porcus) and Iron Hugo (Hugo Ferreus)—to induce the children to enter upon the crusade. The theme has been treated by Marcel Schwob in his charming "La Croisade des Enfants," and a coming volume by Mr. Henry Baerlein also deals with it. Mr. Baerlein puts his narrative into the mouth of the father of Stephen, the boy leader of the crusade, and though his book is in part imaginative all the incidents are based upon historical documents. Its title is "On the Forgotten Road," and Mr. Murray will be the publisher.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL is, we understand, engaged upon a work called "A Century of Empire," the aim of which is to present the events of English history during the nineteenth century from a Conservative point of view. We should have thought that Mr. Fletcher's recent volumes had almost made such a work superfluous, and if Sir Herbert Maxwell, usually a moderate writer, proves more of a partisan than Mr. Fletcher, his history will be a remarkable production. We have no great liking for the modern "scientific" historians. As a rule their writing is dull and colorless, and this is a high price to pay for impartiality. But there are clear limits within which historical bias should be confined if the writer wishes to avoid making his work a political pamphlet instead of history, and of late these limits have not always been observed. Sir Herbert Maxwell's book will be issued by Messrs. Arnold.

UNDER the title, "The Last Years of the Protectorate," Professor C. H. Firth has written a continuation of S. R. Gardiner's unfinished "History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate." The volumes announced cover the period from Cromwell's second Parliament in September, 1656, to his death in September, 1658, and among the subjects treated are Cromwell's refusal of the Crown, the victory of Santa Cruz, the campaign in Flanders, and the condition of Ireland and Scotland during the Protectorate. Professor Firth is one of our foremost authorities on the period. Besides his "Oliver Cromwell," "Cromwell's Army," and "Scotland and the Protectorate," he has produced admirable editions of "The Life of Colonel Hutchinson," "Ludlow's Memoirs," and other works bearing on the epoch.

A VOLUME of letters written by Lady Burghersh, afterwards Lady Westmoreland, has been edited by her daughter, Lady Rose Weigall, and is announced for publication by Mr. Murray. Lady Westmoreland was a niece of the Duke of Wellington and numbered among her friends King Leopold of Belgium, Talleyrand, Brougham, Melbourne, Madame de Staël, and others famous either in politics or literature. Her husband, Lord Burghersh, was British Ambassador at Florence, Berlin, and Vienna, and as she made a habit of relating in her letters all that was passing in the social and political world in England, the coming volume promises to be of unusual interest and value.

MR. E. V. LUCAS has written a book on Paris, which will appear in the autumn. It is on somewhat similar lines to his entertaining volume, "A Wanderer in London," special attention being given to places and buildings that call to mind the famous names and deeds of the past.

MR. BENJAMIN RAND, who, a year or two ago, published a volume of selections from "Modern Classical Philosophers," is now preparing a companion work called "The Classical Moralists," intended as a text-book for those who wish to study ethics from original sources. It is divided into three sections—Ancient, Medieval, and Modern. In the last section special notice is given to English writers upon ethics. It ends with extracts from T. H. Green and Dr. Martineau.

Two books of poetry to be published during the autumn are a collection of verses by Mr. William Watson, which will contain a considerable body of new and important work, and a volume of Mrs. Rachel Annand Taylor, which Mr. Elkin Mathews has in the press. Mrs. Taylor's "Poems," published some years ago, was highly praised, and among those who have encouraged her to issue the new collection are Professor Gilbert Murray, Sir W. M. Ramsay, and Professor Patrick Geddes.

PROFESSOR JAMES, of Harvard, has written a sequel to his book on "Pragmatism," which Messrs. Longmans will publish under the title "The Nature of Truth."

THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.*

In the admirable volume which he contributes to the "Political History of England" Mr. Leadam covers the period of the great Whig supremacy. Mr. Lecky has remarked that the political history of England in the eighteenth century falls naturally into two divisions. On the accession of George the First the Whigs acquired an absolute ascendancy that lasted for forty-five years. The accession of George the Third put an end to that supremacy, and from 1770 to 1830 the Tory Party was in power with only one brief interruption in 1782. Mr. Leadam takes up this series before the balance of parties had been determined, for his first twelve chapters are occupied with the military triumphs and the political intrigues of the reign of Queen Anne. England was suffering from the confusion and difficulties due to a divided movement and a disputed throne, and Defoe, in a paper that was published two years ago in the "English Historical Review," urged Harley to provide an escape from this situation by making himself into a Minister of the type of Richelieu or Mazarin. He saw that there were many obstacles to be overcome, and that Englishmen would not take kindly to this form of government, but he thought that his ideal might be realised if Harley employed all the means Defoe could suggest to him. As a matter of fact, there was one fact alone that made it impossible to set up a Richelieu Government, and that was, of course, the power of the English aristocracy.

With the accession of George the First began the long Whig ascendancy, and it was marked by the growth of the Cabinet system which Defoe wanted to see abolished. Bolingbroke had hoped that the absolutist tendencies of the new King would provoke a rising, but, as Mr. Leadam says, he forgot to take account of the sterling common sense and natural moderation of George the First. The new sovereign was, in fact, pre-eminently qualified for his position, and the Whig ascendancy owed a great deal both to his deficiencies and to his virtues. "The king himself, surrounded by his English Ministers, was often like a man in a fog. . . . Not one of them spoke German; not all of them spoke French. Walpole was reduced to Latin. To sit in Council with them as Queen Anne had done was mere wearisomeness. He speedily came to prefer leaving them to discuss affairs without him and receiving reports from one or other of them as to their conclusions. Such deliberations, unattended by the Sovereign, had been common enough, and had gone by the name of sittings of the Committee of Council as distinguished from the sittings of the Cabinet Council itself. When the absence of the monarch became normal, this distinction gradually disappeared and the Committee of Council and the Cabinet became a separate entity playing an increasingly important part in political life. With this development was associated that of the Minister who replaced the sovereign as chairman." If the special situation of George the First was one full of good fortune for the Whigs, the special situation of the French Regent was another. For Orleans, like George the First, had to fear a rival. If his ward, Louis XV., had died, as was not unlikely, he was to succeed to the French throne, but there were grave reasons for thinking that Philip V. of Spain would make a fight for the succession, and the Regent was well aware of his own unpopularity in France. Spanish policy was largely in the hands of the brilliant and daring priest Alberoni, whose head was price of ambitious designs. The Regent was consequently inclined to an alliance with England, in the form of a reciprocal guarantee between the two rulers. England, for her part, had good reasons, national as well as dynastic, for desiring peace with France. She had also, in Stanhope, one of the Whig leaders, an extremely accomplished diplomatist with a great knowledge of foreign affairs. It was said of him that he always deceived foreign Ministers by the simple device of speaking the truth. An interview between Dubois, the Regent's Minister, and Stanhope, at The Hague, gradually led up to the formation of the Quadruple Alliance. M. Casimir Stryienski gives us in his vivid sketch of the history of the eighteenth century in France an interesting picture of these transactions, and of Dubois's long period of patient waiting in different disguises for the opportunity of an interview with Stanhope. The new policy was not congenial to Englishmen, for whom Frenchmen were natural enemies, but its consequences were all important. It enabled Walpole to give the country twenty years of peace, and to use that time for laying the foundations of its prosperity and its Parliamentary system. That system represented the government of a class, but it was not until later that the interests of that class and the interests of the poorer classes of England came into violent conflict.

It would have been well for France if she had had a Walpole during this period. M. Casimir Stryienski's volume opens with the dying words of Louis XIV. to his great grandson. "Vous allez être un grand roi; ne m'imitez pas dans le goût j'ai eu pour les bâtiments, ni dans celui que j'ai eu pour la guerre. . . Tâchez de soulager vos peuples, ce que je suis assez malheureux pour n'avoir pu faire." There is an echo of these words in the dying message of Louis XV. sixty years later. "Messieurs, sa Majesté me charge de vous dire qu'il demande pardon à Dieu de l'avoir offensé, et du scandale qu'il a donné à son peuple; que, si Dieu lui rend la santé, il s'occupera de faire pénitence, du soutien de la religion et du soulagement de ses peuples." Unhappily it was only on the deathbed of their kings that the miseries of the people were remembered. At other times the only classes that obtained relief were the classes that had already shirked their share of the public burdens. De Tocqueville lamented that the French aristocracy had had privileges and no power. The Regent tried during his first year of power to give effect to the ideas of Fénelon, and assign to the aristocracy some part in the work of government. He substituted for his predecessor's system of secretaries a system of committees, composed of aristocrats. The idea had been favored by Saint-Pierre as well as by Fénelon. But, as M. Casimir Stryienski says, the experiment only justified the decision of Louis XIV. to keep the "grand seigneurs" out of administration: "They showed themselves unable to forget their interests, their privileges, and their futile pretensions, or to take their public duties seriously." The committees were dissolved in 1718, and France reverted to the old system. Louis XIV. had indeed given its final form to the French monarchy. He may be said also to have given it its final and mortal disease. If Louis XV. had been governed by a Walpole, the monarchy might have recovered. He began his reign in great popularity, but by 1749 public feeling had turned. He was the target of lampoons and Philippics. "Louis, si tu fus un temps l'objet de notre amour, c'est que tous tes vices ne nous etaient pas encore connus; dans ce royaume, dépeuplé par ton faute et livré comme une proie aux histrions qui règnent avec toi, c'est pour t'abhorrer qu'il reste des Français." A Whig journalist said in 1820 that of all monarchs since the Revolution the successor of George the Third would have the finest opportunity of becoming nobly popular. No king was more happily situated in this respect than the successor of Louis XV. For one moment it looked as if that opportunity might not be wasted. M. Casimir Stryienski quotes from Mdlle. de L'Epinasse's letter to Guibert the account of Turgot's first interview with Louis XVI.

"Vous ne vouliez donc pas être contrôleur général?"

"Sire, j'avoue que j'aurais préféré conserver le Ministère de la Marine. . . Mais ce n'est pas au roi que je me donne, c'est à l'honnête homme."

"Vous ne serez pas trompé," répondit le roi en lui prenant les deux mains.

"Sire, je dois recommander à Votre Majesté la nécessité de l'économie et Elle doit la première donner l'exemple. M. l'Abbé Terray l'a sans doute déjà dit à Votre Majesté."

"Oui, il me l'a dit, mais il ne me l'a pas dit comme vous."

But the honest man was no match for a frivolous woman and her intriguing friends, and Turgot disappeared. M. Casimir Stryienski criticises his methods, quoting the epigram contrasting him and Terray: "He does the right thing badly and the abbé does the wrong thing well." But he admits that he was the only Minister who could have saved the throne.

MR. HEWLETT'S NEW POEMS.*

This book is an ample justification for those who have protested they could perceive poetry always implicit in Mr. Hewlett's prose. Here his poetic faculty has put off all its masquerade; and, graceful and charming as it was in its disguises of essay and romance, it is a very much more radiant and winning creature in its own proper habiliments. We must not, of course, forget "Pan and the Young Shepherd"; that delicious fantasy has been, for all these years, the top of Mr. Hewlett's achievement. It has always seemed to us the one book of his that was almost certain to endure; indeed, were we to visit this earth a hundred years hence, we should not be surprised to find "Pan and the Young Shepherd" reckoned alongside of "The Faithful Shepherdess" and "The Sad Shepherd." But here, also, in "Artemision," we have stuff that looks like lasting, fine metal mastered by beauty. The book is all worship of an idea, of chastity. These are pagan times, Mr. Hewlett thinks, for those who would bend their minds in such worship:—

> "We give no crown where love may not be sped.
> We think not sacrosanct a maidenhead;
> We bid such seek their master in a man;
> Woman we say's no woman till she wed.
> But she that roams the wood is of such plan
> No love could woo her to a bridal bed."

Accordingly, Mr. Hewlett sings "Chastity going arm'd, yet quick to take Cold pleasure or hot rage." Our quotation is enough to show that he has here no dealings with the ideal that served for Milton, with "married chastity"; nothing less than vestal purity does for Mr. Hewlett. It may well be that, ethically, this is a barbarous and inhuman ideal; but we have nothing to do with that just now. Certainly this chastity, as Mr. Hewlett instances it, is a cruel, a ruthless, yes, and a savage thing; but then so are most of the vehement and exhilarating ideas that supply the mind with its clearest, hottest fires of thought. The three most important poems in "Artemision" are re-tellings of the myths of Callisto, Niobe, and Endymion. In the first two, as every one knows, Artemis appears as a goddess very far from soft-hearted. In the last we are accustomed to think of her as in a milder mood; but Mr. Hewlett does not tolerate this. He will have no thawing of Diana's heart; and, though she amuses herself with Endymion, it is but her "cold pleasure." In fact, the way Mr. Hewlett takes the myth results, for all his skill of handling and fierce partisanship, in a goddess behaving perilously like a baggage. But it must not be thought that Mr. Hewlett's adoration of chastity is a mere idolatry. Artemis, or, as Mr. Hewlett prefers to call her, Hymnia, is the image of his idea, and is perhaps not always a completely satisfactory image. But also the idea, this chastity, is itself an image, the image of a spirit; and it is this spirit, under this two-fold imagery, that is Mr. Hewlett's worship. And the spirit which he praises in the exquisite poesy of "Artemision" is the spirit sacred to all poets—maiden, inviolable Beauty. Thus, at the end of "Leto's Child," Callisto's fearful doom is justified in these words:—

> "And thus sink they who serve Beauty
> Otherwise than on bending knee,
> Or dare to quench their fleshly dreams
> At holy wells, in holy streams
> To bathe their bodies. Beauty is rare
> And delicate withal, so fair,
> So thin a fabric, 't is a breath
> Of God's, whose prisoning is death."

Again, when Artemis, after her flirtation with Endymion, rebukes him for his very natural passion and deserts him, the poet adds:—

> "With that her pure throat let a little moan
> That she was made so fair, that all alone
> Her way must be, until in mortal man
> That grace of God be given to look upon > Beauty for what it is, not what it can > Give unto us for sop to batten on."

There we have the essence of Mr. Hewlett's adoration; Beauty must be loved for itself, not for the pleasure it can give us. A high creed, truly, but the creed which is demanded of poets.

The way Mr. Hewlett has made imagery of the spirit he worships extorts the highest admiration from us. The idea, the primary image, chastity, is a rigid one; but that is necessary, and we are not to make common applications of a poet's thought. But the secondary image, the goddess Hymnia, is exquisitely wrought, full of subtleties and changes. Mr. Hewlett has a quite personal love for her; he often calls her "my Hymnia." For all her divinity, she has womanly heart and brain, and we feel a real personality as we read of her, fearful of her own godhead, but accepting it almost as a doom, "envying our lives of love, perhaps our death." Indeed, it is remarkable all through with what reality of psychology Mr. Hewlett treats these classical myths. The early relations of Hymnia and Callisto are unfolded with a wonderfully daring analysis of their mutual feelings. So that to the mere beauty of the tales themselves is added the interest of drama. But perhaps most people read poetry for the diction, and it is time to say something of this. Here again Mr. Hewlett shows fine courage; he does not shrink from oddity or queerness. He means to express all his thought, and he means us to feel the same wonder in words that he feels. The two intentions result in a diction which is continuously interesting and stimulating. Whether he be describing sensuous or mental things, he has our attention, for the exertions of his thought are tireless. There are few passages which are of sheer verbal beauty, but there are no feeble or thoughtless passages. Beauty indeed is never far from his poetry, but it is more often an almost athletic vigor that we have to admire. These verses from his story of Endymion will give some notion of his diction:—

> "Beardless he was and tender, yet he had
> The nervy look of something swift and glad,
> A mountain look of merlin or spar-hawk:
> Strain'd sharp his lips were; peasant-like yclad
> In sheepskin and white linen, his light walk
> On sprinting toes show'd him no peasant lad.
> "Below him as he lay the muffled sheep
> Like tombs adown the hillside seemed to creep.
> On that blue silence the far dog-wolf's bark
> Came moaningly, as if one in his sleep
> Mutter'd and turn'd round to watch out the dark:
> The air was thick with moon-dust, golden, deep,
> All the night tense for witch-craft."

It is almost too Elizabethan; and we are dubious of the "sprinting toes." But it is, beyond question, admirable language. We have not left ourselves room to speak of the shorter poems in the book; they are not so good as the legends, but they are very good. One of them indeed, "In a Church," is perhaps the most perfect poetry of all, but this is the only one we set above the longer poems. But there is nothing in the whole of "Artemision" that is not to be read with gratitude.

THE CHARACTER OF BEETHOVEN.*

While Thayer's life of Beethoven was always more of a biographical compilation than a critical study—the critical level of it being below that of Spitta's "Bach" or Jahn's "Mozart"—as a purely biographical work it is a masterpiece of accuracy and fulness of research. Thayer himself, though he devoted his life to the task, brought out only three volumes, in 1866, 1872, and 1879 respectively. He died in 1897, leaving a mass of material for the rest of the work, which was completed by Dr. Hermann Deiters by the publication of the fourth volume in 1907, and the fifth a little time ago. Before this last appeared Deiters himself died, and the volume has been edited by the learned and indefatigable Dr. Hugo Riemann. It deals only with the last three years of the composer's life, from 1824 to 1827—the period of the completion of the ninth symphony and the last great quartetts. Dr. Deiters analyses and discusses these with great acumen, but refrains from any attempt at a complete critical estimate of Beethoven's art. This seems the one thing lacking in the voluminous biography. Beethoven is surely distant enough from us now in time for us to be able to see him steadily and see him whole. But perhaps, after all, the work of research and the work of criticism are better done by different hands. No critic of imagination, tingling with the desire to see to the centre of Beethoven's soul, could devote his life to the patient accumulation of mere documentary detail. Now that we know probably all that is to be known about Beethoven's outward existence, perhaps some genuinely constructive critical mind will give us a new study of the man and his music, looking back at him and his epoch as Dr. Schweitzer and M. Pirro have recently done in the case of Bach, through a temperament that has assimilated all the new culture-elements of the music of the past hundred years.

It will be a task for a consummate artist in criticism—one who is psychologist as well as musician—for the outward record of Beethoven's life gives comparatively few clues to the soul of the man. This is evident from the complete collection of his letters which Mr. Shedlock has now translated into English from the edition of Dr. Kalischer. It is amazing how little these nine hundred pages tell us of the inner mental world of Beethoven. There is any number of details of his various bodily ailments, of his negotiations with publishers, of his troubles with servants, of his rough jokes with his friends; but little that lets us into the real mind of the composer. The one thing we can be really sure of is his susceptibility to the charm of women; he was always in love with one "unsterbliche Geliebte" or other. But this is a trait in him that, however important to Beethoven the man, counts for comparatively little in the output of Beethoven the artist. What we should like to know is how the world around him mirrored itself in his eyes, what he read and thought, what he saw, what he cherished from the past of man's history, what he learned from or felt about the troubled movements of European life in his own day. About all this we still know astonishingly little. The history of the Eroica symphony shows that, for a time at least, he was conscious of the vastness of some of the political and social changes that were going on around him; afterwards his sole concern with the great European upheaval seems to be its lowering of the value of his pension, and the poverty and suffering it wrought in the neighborhood of Vienna. He admired Goethe, but otherwise seems to have had no particular taste for or interest in modern literature. Of the plastic arts he seems never to have spoken. Even upon music he rarely utters an opinion that tells us anything of himself, of his aims, of the influences that worked upon him. He had no friends of striking intellectual power; good fellows there were in abundance among them, but among the kindly aristocrats, the jovial quartett players, the amiable professional men like von Breuning, or the commonplace hangers-on like Schindler, was there one man capable of understanding Beethoven's deepest artistic confidences, even had he been inclined to bestow them? Among all the life-stories of modern musicians there is no such record of mental isolation and spiritual reserve.

It is quite possible that Beethoven had no ideas to express upon all these things, that art and literature and the greater movements of humanity affected him consciously very little. He fled, indeed, from men to nature. "I love a tree better than a man," he once said; and, again, speaking of the fields and the woods, "Here is no envy, no deceit." The keynote of the man's mind, in its relation to the outer world, was its simplicity—a simplicity that may easily have shown up, in some circumstances, almost as lack of intelligence. He did not need cultivated intellects to associate with; his own level of general thinking being probably no higher than that of the Schuppanzighs and Holzes of his acquaintance, he was quite content to live his outward life on their mental plane, satisfied with their chatter and their fiddling and their man-in-the-street humor, and ready to meet them gleefully on their own ground. What they saw, for all their admiration for him, was only the surface of the man; the real soul of Beethoven flowed on in a rich current deep below his outward life, silent and invisible. He touched the great world, indeed, mainly through his sufferings; touched it seemingly without even understanding it, conscious only that it had smitten him with poverty and distressing sickness, and laid upon him heavier burdens than he could bear. This simplicity of soul is evident in his earlier portraits, with their open gaze, their serious, but unsubtle, mouth, and their wondering, child-like eyes; even in the well-known mask of him in later life the lower part of the face carries the same suggestion of ingenuousness. The whole record of his dealings with the ungrateful rascal of a nephew shows a unique simplicity of soul, a unique inability to see men and things as they really were. It was this simplicity and the boundless goodness of his will towards men that brought him so much disillusion, so much suffering. In Dr. Deiters's volume are collected a number of reminiscences of men who met Beethoven during the last year or two of his life; almost all were moved to tears by the tragic intensity of sorrow that his face revealed. One of them, Rellstab, was particularly struck by the benevolence and tenderness of expression in his mouth. Surely, in all the history of art, no man has ever turned such ignoble sufferings into such noble philosophy. We can understand experiences like those of Wagner turning easily into great stuff; even to himself Wagner must have seemed like a Titan struggling for life against an evil world, and the greatness of the things for which he fought, and the vastness of the stage upon which the fight was set, must have been a splendid exhilaration. But in poor Beethoven's struggle there was no romance. He had to fight against coarse realities like deafness, where no romantic illusion is possible; against vulgar and rascally servants, who cheated and tormented him and poisoned him with bad food; against the daily annoyance of some of the most disgusting of bodily diseases. Out of this welter of pettiness and ignominy he made, by some incomprehensible alchemy, some of the noblest music of the world. What gives it its grand simplicity and universality and fathomless depth is just the candor of soul, the selflessness, that we see in a thousand passages in his letters. Wagner did well to speak of "the truthful Beethoven."

GEORGIAN WITS AND BEAUTIES.*

Mr. John Fyvie's "Wits, Beaux, and Beauties of the Georgian Era" is a fair specimen of the "made" book about the eighteenth century, with which we are becoming a little too familiar nowadays. It would seem that the public is thirsting for information about the picturesque Georgian people; obviously that thirst must be satisfied. So the maker of books spends some weeks at the British Museum; skims a dozen volumes of Georgian memoirs and letters; extracts from these volumes a collection of facts and anecdotes concerning, say, a dozen celebrated persons of the period; and serves the result up with a catchy title—generally something about belles and beaux. At this point enter the publisher, who designs a catchy cover, adds a few illustrations, and issues the volume to the thirsting public at twelve and sixpence net. It is all very harmless, of course, this book-making; it gives pleasure to a number of simple people; but it has nothing to do with literature. And it has, we fear, a peculiarly irritating effect upon the student and lover of the eighteenth century. Consider this book of Mr. Fyvie's. It contains eight sketches of as many well-known Georgian men and women. In one only of these sketches is there the slightest evidence of original research—that on Samuel Foote: the others are merely more or less accurate summaries of certain familiar volumes like Mr. Jesse's "George Selwyn and His Contemporaries." It is, of course, possible that Mr. Fyvie adopts the scissors-and-paste method deliberately. He knows his public; he knows what they want; and he sees that they get it. For the rest, Mr. Fyvie writes agreeably, if without any special distinction of style, and the not too critical reader may pass an hour pleasantly enough in his company.

* "Wits, Beaux, and Beauties of the Georgian Era." By John Fyvie. Lane. 12s. 6d. net.

The first sketch in the book, on Foote, is also the best. Foote, as Mr. Fyvie rightly observes, has had "something less than justice" done him by the literary historians of the eighteenth century. But Mr. Fyvie exaggerates when he says that "for Thackeray to include Gay (in the 'English Humorists') while he left out Foote, seems much as though a lecturer on the English novelists of the nineteenth century were to include G. P. R. James and leave out Thackeray." The parallel is far from apt. Gay was a man of letters, and a poet; Foote was neither. There is, as Thackeray himself said, "a pathetic sweetness and melody" in every ballad, even the slightest, which Gay wrote. Can you imagine Samuel Foote writing—

"'Twas when the seas were roaring
With hollow blasts of wind,
A damsel lay deploring
All on a rock reclined:"

with its exquisitely simple close:—

"When, o'er the white wave stooping,
His floating corpse she spy'd.
Then, like a lily drooping,
She bow'd her head, and died."

Nevertheless, the long series of farces written by Foote have a real value of their own, quite apart from their literary value which is not always considerable. They are a perfect mirror of the manners of the time. They reflect for us, in a vivacious and amusing way, the various types of men and women that flourished in Georgian London: wits and belles and beaux, authors, doctors, lawyers, preachers, Nabobs: and Mr. Fyvie has done a service in calling attention to them. Foote's best known play, "The Minor," is a bitter satire upon the Methodists, who were then (1760) beginning to be a power in the land. Like all Foote's plays, it abounds in personalities. George Whitefield, for example, had a "natural infirmity" in the shape of a squint. Accordingly he appears in "The Minor" as Mr. Squintum: Foote left nothing to the imagination. History does not record what Whitefield thought of Foote's caricature of him: probably he did not think about it at all. But there were others who took up the cudgels on his behalf, and on behalf of the sect satirised in the play. Foote's "Letter" in reply to one of these critics is a vigorous piece of work. One is inclined to agree with John Forster when he declared that, if all the other works of Foote had perished, this letter alone would conclusively have established his wit, scholarship, and sense, as of the rarest order. Foote, however, will continue to be remembered, not as an author and playwright, but as the greatest of English comedians, a maker of "loud, obstreperous, broad-faced mirth." "Foote, sir," said Dr. Johnson, "quatenus Foote, is superior to them all." And so he was.

A wit of a very different kind was George Selwyn, who is the next upon Mr. Fyvie's list. A good deal has been written about Selwyn of late, rather more, perhaps, than his achievements deserve. But he will always be interesting as the really characteristic figure of Georgian society in the days of the American Revolution. Mr. Fyvie takes the conventional view of Selwyn: that he was a very much overrated wit, who owed his reputation to the manner in which he delivered himself of his witticisms. This is probably right; but Mr. Fyvie goes astray when he repeats once more the legend of Selwyn's "fondness for executions." It has, we think, been conclusively shown that this "almost uncanny propensity of Selwyn's," as Mr. Fyvie calls it, had very little foundation in fact. But we have the old stories re-told, including Wraxall's myth about Selwyn's journey to Paris to see Damiens broken on the wheel. Selwyn never went to Paris for this purpose, nor did he, in fact, see the execution. The original of this story is to be found in Grimm's "Corréspondance," and it is there related of La Condamine, the apostle of inoculation. Again, Mr. Fyvie holds a brief for Selwyn in the great case of "Selwyn v. Fox." Frankly, we are on the side of Fox, and think, with Sir George Trevelyan, that Selwyn was consistently unfair to his friend. But this, to be sure, is a matter of opinion. By the way, we notice a goodly number of inaccuracies in this brief sketch of Selwyn. He was born, not in London, but at Chislehurst; he was made Surveyor-General of Crown Lands, not of Works, in 1784; his Registrarship in Barbadoes came to him on the death of Anthony Cracherode in 1752, and not in 1779; and, finally, he did not "decline a contest" at Gloucester at the General Election of 1780, but was beaten at the polls. Mr. Fyvie succeeds better in his essay on George Selwyn's "chaplain," the Rev. John Warner, D.D. Whatever we may think of Warner's character, we cannot deny that he was a most amiable and amusing man. His letters sparkle with wit and humor. Was he a glutton and a toady? In Thackeray's opinion, yes; but, says Mr. Fyvie, "Thackeray's characterisation may be promptly dismissed, as founded on a total misconception of the purport of some of Warner's correspondence." We are not so sure about that. Warner's letters speak for themselves. They are certainly the letters of a toady, if that word has any meaning at all. Still, we can forgive Warner much. He was a poor—a desperately poor—parson, and he lived in days when poor parsons, like poor authors, were compelled to flatter some patron or other if they wished to get on in the world. And Warner had many virtues. His friendship with "Mie Mie," Selwyn's adopted child, was a very genuine thing, and he was one of the first to recognise the goodness and greatness of John Howard of Bedford.

Most ungallantly, we have left ourselves little space in which to speak of Mr. Fyvie's budget of "beauties": Elizabeth Chudleigh, Mrs. Howard, the Duchess of Queensberry, and Melesina Trench. Miss Chudleigh and Gay's Duchess do not matter: neither of them can be called really attractive. Mrs. Howard—well, everybody must love Mrs. Howard; but it cannot be said that Mr. Fyvie gives any fresh information about this charming woman. There remains Melesina Trench. Mrs. Trench wrote a diary of her travels on the Continent in 1800, which was praised by Edward Fitzgerald. It is, in its way, a vivid chronicle, and Mr. Fyvie has done well to rescue it from oblivion. But it is odd to find this mother of Churchmen in the company of Kitty Queensberry and the Duchess of Kingston.

A DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.*

This is the third or fourth of the one-volume dictionaries of the Bible which have been issued recently at varying prices and on varying levels of merit. Dr. Hastings claims special significance for his volume as being a new and independent work; in this respect at least it is unlike one of its rivals. It is also declared to be "abreast of the average scholarship of the day," which is a much more important matter. A perusal of the volume shows that this means a moderately critical standpoint. The contents are neither ultra-conservative nor ultra-radical. In the Old Testament, the names of Dr. Skinner, Dr. G. B. Gray, Dr. G. A. Barton, and Dr. G. L. Robinson will serve to indicate the critical standpoint, as well as the competence of the contributors. In the department of the New Testament much the same caution has been observed as by the writers in Dr. Hastings' previous dictionaries. Thus Professor Falconer sums up his article on the Second Epistle of Peter by suggesting that "a disciple of Peter, who remembered how his master had dealt with an attack of Sadducaic sensuality in some of the Palestinian churches, being confronted with a recrudescence of similar evil, re-edited his teaching." Dr. David Smith even admits that the record of the death of Judas, in Acts i., 18-19, is a legend (p. 502), but in general a note of restraint is struck, particularly in the articles by Bishop A. J. Maclean and Principal Garvie. The editor has done wisely in taking this line. He knows as well as any man the religious public of this country, and we hope that this dictionary will help to educate the very class of Bible-readers who are untouched by more technical and expensive works. It is likely to discharge this very important function, for its combination of scholarship and reverence is sure to make it specially persuasive in circles where crude radicalism would only stiffen prejudices, and where pious conservatism would fail to serve the purpose.

* "Dictionary of the Bible." Edited by James Hastings, D.D. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 20s. net.

The proportions of the dictionary are well preserved, as one might expect from the practised hand of the editor and his coadjutors. The length of the articles on the Versions is perhaps a trifle excessive, and one almost wonders if an article on Flavius Josephus was exactly relevant; but on the whole there is little to cavil at, although it was surely not worth while to put the names of authors to minor articles of four or five lines. The contributors have generally managed to be succinct without being scrappy, and one or two of the longer articles, such as that by Professor H. R. Macintosh on "The Person of Christ," are capital specimens of popular theological pemmican.

The book is thick, but not unwieldy. It runs to more than a thousand closely-printed pages; the print is clear, the paper is good, and there is a generous margin to the page. There are four maps, but no illustrations. Principal Stewart writes an introductory article upon the "Pronunciation of Scripture Proper Names," which may be commended specially to the clergy and to all occupants of "places where they do read." But the work ought to circulate also among the laity who have neither time nor money for a larger dictionary. They may rest satisfied that the contents of this volume are reliable, and they should be told by reviewers as well as by their booksellers that it is wonderfully cheap at the price.

A CONSCIENTIOUS STORY-TELLER.*

Mr. James Lane Allen states in his preface to "The Bride of the Mistletoe": "Any one about to read this work of fiction might properly be apprised beforehand that it is not a novel; it has neither the structure nor the purpose of the novel. It is a story." And he quotes on one of his preliminary pages Maupassant's views on his art: "Not to reason overmuch: to observe life intently and think over what one has seen: to see with one's own eyes and not with the masters': to find a fresh signification in things, one hitherto undiscovered, and to express this in a personal manner." Admirable counsel! but a writer who adheres to all Maupassant's precepts may yet fail to produce a true work of art. And "The Bride of the Mistletoe," both in its merits and its faults, is an example of the fact that sincere purpose, a striking subject, and conscientious treatment cannot compensate for lack of grace, naturalness, and lightness of touch.

Conscientious is the term that best describes the spirit and the workmanship of "The Bride of the Mistletoe," as of so much of the work of the best American novelists. Perhaps one of the drawbacks of addressing a democracy is that the conscientious writer is led to take his responsibilities over-seriously, and is careful to enunciate nothing that is not sanctioned by severe ethical standards or upheld by common sense. This underlying correctness of mental and moral tone is apt to be destructive of artistic grace, spontaneity, and intensity; and even in the most unstudied moments of Mr. Allen's story he never lets the significant detail speak for itself, but swathes it with commentary, didactic or sentimental. When Maupassant advises the young writer not to reason overmuch he implies that the force of the thing in itself and of its atmosphere, which art conveys, is impaired by any obtrusive desire of a writer to play Providence to his readers. Mr. James Lane Allen is too accomplished a writer to err by gross didactic underlining, but a multitude of subtle touches betray that he, like his hero, is conscious of a "task," of a "message" which may "kindle in American homes some new light of truth, with the eyes of mothers and fathers fixed upon it, and innumerable children of the future the better for its shining."

The first three chapters of "The Bride of the Mistletoe" introduce to us, with a leisureliness and firmness of stroke that are in themselves interesting, the figures of an American professor and his wife who are keeping together, with private domestic ritual, the anniversary of their wedding day in their old Kentucky home. Mr. Allen communicates with much skill the feeling of the winter landscape at their door, and the mental outlook of three generations of his hero's forbears whose portraits look down from the walls; "the great grandfather, the pioneer with a lonely, stern, gaunt face, the timeless face of the woods; the grandfather with the countenance of the Southern slave-holding feudal lord, and the father with the American look—a new thing in the American face, undefinable but unmistakable." With equal cleverness the author indicates the secret bitterness in the wife's mental attitude towards her husband, and we may say here that we do not question Mr. Allen's psychological insight or the artistic power he shows in his slowly deepening disclosure of the spiritual alienation between his husband and wife. What we do criticise is his didactic touch, and the ponderous and highly unnatural style of conversation between his characters. In the first two chapters the professor's hesitation to comply with his wife's demands, and her feminine insistence, are ably but a trifle heavily emphasised. In the third chapter the professor produces a manuscript, the sociological history of the Christmas Tree seen through the labyrinth of ages. He has worked at this for a year in secret, shutting himself off from her, whereas formerly he and she have "shared everything." And in the fourth chapter the professor proceeds to give his wife a lengthy digest of his learned researches, while she is burning to ask him the question which has been torturing her for a year—"Am I much or little to you now?" After one hundred and twenty pages of this slow-moving and cumbrous machinery the professor conveys to his wife by means of a highly-colored and over-modern description of an ancient Druid festival the fact that she, his former "Bride of the Mistletoe," is no longer alluring to him, and that his desires, whatever they may be, are no longer for her. And this chapter ends with the disclosure: "'This is what I would have kept from you, Josephine,' he said quietly. . . . She sat there with the whiteness of death." In the last two chapters we are presented with a close analysis, again psychologically acute, of the bitter turmoil of the wife's feelings, as she passes through stages of revolt, hatred, and acquiescence, while she sits watching the sleeping man.

It is always a little ungrateful, and often a sign of obtuseness in a critic, to say to our author, "How much better would your story be if you had told it another way," but since Mr. Allen has invoked the example of Maupassant we may remark that "the personal manner" of telling a story, which the master counsels, cannot be held to cover sins against naturalness. We could enlarge on the striking absence of economy of line in Mr. Allen's method, on its deliberate impressiveness to which are sacrificed grace, ease, and the flash of the unforeseen. But, passing much artificialness in the literary style as in the description of a brook which is likened to "a band of jewelled samite," or as in the phrase "gray-eyed querist of actuality," when the husband addresses his wife, we may point out that the story loses all illusion of actuality in passages of conversation such as the following:—

> "Frederick," she said, "for many years we have been happy together, so happy! Every tragedy of nature has stood at a distance from us, except the loss of our children. We have lived on a sunny pinnacle of our years, lifted above life's storms. But, of course, I have realised that, sooner or later, our lot must become the common one: if we did not go down to sorrow, sorrow would climb to us; and I knew that on the heights it dwells best. That is why I wish to say to you to-night what I shall: I think fate's hour has struck for me; I am ready to bear it. Its arrow has already left the bow and is on its way; I open my heart to receive it. This is as I had always wished. I have said that if life had any greatest tragedy for me, I hoped it would come when I was happiest; thus I should not know it all. I have never drunk half of my cup of happiness, as you know, and let the other half waste; I must go equally to the depth of any suffering. Worse than the suffering, I think, would be the feeling that I had shirked some of it, had stepped aside or shut my eyes, or in any manner shown myself a cowardly soul."
> After a pause she went over this subject, as though she were not satisfied that she had made it clear.
> "I have always said that the real pathos of things is the grief that comes to us in life when life is at its best—when no one is to blame—when no one has committed a fault—when suffering is meted out to us as the reward of our perfect obedience to the laws of nature. In earlier years, when we used to read Keats together, who, most of all of the world's poets, felt the things that pass, even then I was wondering at the way in which he brings this out: thus to understand sorrow it must be separated from sorrows: they would be like shadows darkening life's clear tragedy, thus rendering it less bravely seen."

It does not need much insight to perceive that every sentence here of Josephine's speech is false to nature and quite impossible to a woman in her situation. The imagery and the carefully balanced periods smell of the lamp, of the highly literary endeavor of the conscientious writer whose strength lies in meditation and not catching or conveying to us the movement and interchange of living things. In the calculated effect of Mr. James Lane Allen's slow periods we are often reminded of Hawthorne, and while the originality of Mr. Allen's feeling and imagery is not to be questioned, it is possible that the formality and unnaturalness of his spoken dialogue is partly derived from the practice of a literary school of two generations ago, a practice which is now antiquated.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

The art and science of heraldry is one of those subjects in which everybody is vaguely interested, but the number of people who know anything about it is exceedingly small. Of recent years attempts have been made to popularise the study of it by the issue of inexpensive handbooks dealing with it from both the antiquarian and the artistic points of view, and very informative some of these are. "English Heraldic Book Stamps," by Mr. Cyril Davenport (Constable, 25s. net), is more important, however, than the majority of the modern volumes that have been published. True, it deals with only one phase or manifestation of heraldic art; but that is a specially fascinating one, since it is inseparably connected with the craft of bookbinding, and thereby with the bookbinders of yore. Moreover, the compilation of this work is admirably systematic. It contains reproductions of about three hundred English armorial bearings. To each are appended an heraldic description and a short biographical note concerning the owner. For the guidance, too, of the uninitiated, the introduction explains the meaning of the different heraldic terms, and gives as much of the history of titles as it is good for the average person to know. The owners of the various coats of arms are set forth in alphabetical order, and, though this method of classification has some disadvantages, it is the most handy one for quick reference, and is probably the best that could be devised to meet all requirements. Its principal disadvantage seems to us, in the present case, to be that the book-stamps of kings and queens are scattered among those of mere members of the nobility, famous book-collectors, and others. The English Royal book-stamps are absolutely complete from Henry VII. to his present Majesty. If these could have been given in a separate part of the book, and in chronological sequence, the achievement of so unique a collection would have been enhanced by the greater facilities for studying the royal heraldic developments from reign to reign. One would not, for instance, after studying William III., be obliged to turn back over 300 pages in order to find what changes in the quarterings were made by Queen Anne. However, this is only a minor point. As it stands, the work is a most business-like and accurate encyclopædia of notable book-stamps, with those of royalty as its special feature. We call attention to the latter because it is in the royal coat-of-arms that the great political changes of the last four centuries are mirrored. Thus the advent of the Stuart and Hanoverian dynasties is symbolised by well-marked modifications in the bearings owned by their immediate predecessors; with Queen Anne it is the legislative union between England and Scotland that is celebrated, and with Victoria the coat-of-arms of the Hanoverian dominions, included in the English coat since the reign of George I., is left out. The origin of heraldry was, of course, a military one, but, as wars and tourneys gradually ceased to be the principal object of existence, so heraldic symbolism widened its scope and included political events of any description. While, therefore, heraldry itself is an exact science, and an exact science is apt to be dry, the dryness in this case liquefies very considerably when one comes to study the subject in the light of general history. This book, with its capital introduction, should help the student, not only towards a sound knowledge of heraldic principles, but towards the recognition of their connection with great historical events since the Middle Ages.

By adopting a system of conscientious exploration from different centres, Mr F. G. Brabant has made his "Rambles in Sussex" (Methuen, 6s. net) a comprehensive and trustworthy record of a home county that is second to none in its scenery and historic interest. In regard to the Sussex country, we could have wished, perhaps, for a little less quotation and a little more original observation than we find in the descriptive passages; but all writers are not gifted in the same way, and Mr. Brabant's forte plainly lies in recounting the more prosaic, though highly important, archæological features, and letting the poets—Swinburne, Tennyson, and Kipling have all celebrated Sussex—tell its scenic beauties in their own words. Similarly the unkind things that have been said of the country folk are dismissed with the briefest refutation and a reference to previous authors, notably the Rev. J. C. Egerton, who have striven to show that if "Silly Sussex" deserves its name in some respects, its people are sometimes surprisingly rich in native wit and proverbial philosophy. It is but fair to state that Mr. Brabant disclaims any intention to present a study of the people in the country districts or of the industries by which they subsist, and, as we have intimated, his observations of natural features are not from the poet's, but rather from the geologist's point of view. There is an interesting fact in connection with the South Downs, which is here brought to notice. It is that the average height of this range of hills, which most people who have looked upon them casually imagine to be something very considerable, is less than 800 feet. The illusion of great altitude is produced, as Mr. Brabant explains, partly by the configuration of the hills themselves, and partly by the circumstance that there are no loftier objects in the neighborhood. Other interesting discussions are provoked by the comparative modern prosperity of some towns, such as Lewes and Chichester, and the comparative obscurity into which others, like Bramber and Steyning, have sunk. Mr. Brabant's remarks on the Sussex seaside resorts are not as unflattering as were Charles Lamb's; but, although he shows some partiality for Eastbourne and Hastings, his book tends to shift the interest from the seaboard to the interior. Six pictures by Turner are reproduced as illustrations to this volume, and the remaining twenty-four photographic views are artistically chosen and finely got up.

Almost since the days when Lyndin, the ancient British forerunner of London, was a stockade in the Essex woods, the pleasure-ground which we now call Epping Forest has been very closely connected with the Metropolis. For this reason, if for no other, the book which Mr. P. T. S. Perceval has written about "London's Forest" (Dent, 3s. 6d. net), should make a special appeal to Londoners. The recent history of the Forest will be familiar to most people. Of old a royal possession, it was transferred to the Corporation of London in the 'seventies. In 1882 it was declared open to the public by Queen Victoria, and since then it has been a place of unalloyed delight to thousands of holiday-makers, who have found in its natural beauty, recreating air, and proximity to town, a combination of advantages not offered by any other resort. Probably, however, the majority of Londoners know as little of the history of Epping Forest as they do of that of London's other historical possessions; and to these Mr. Perceval's book will be a revelation. It is a summary of the Forest's history from beyond the recorded beginnings to the present day. For centuries—until the nineteenth, in fact—it was a favorite hunting-ground for royal and ecclesiastical sportsmen. Its proximity to London, which draws the bank-holiday crowd to-day, attracted also the kings and bishops, Saxon, Norman, Plantagenet, Tudor, Stuart, and Hanoverian, who wished to follow the chase, and were allowed to assure themselves of good sport by the imposition of stringent forest laws. The City's Mayors and Aldermen hunted, too, though it was by the king's courtesy, not by their own right; the picturesque legends regarding their having obtained this right from one or the other medieval monarch are not supported by documentary evidence. It has been told, for instance, that Richard I., in order to recompense the citizens for the loss of their favorite sport of "Jew-hunting" during the Easter holiday, granted them the Forest for a hunting-ground, and that in this way arose the annual custom known as the Easter Chase. The latter was kept up in various forms until well on in the nineteenth century, but there is no historical charter authorising its practice. After the Revolution the Forest became the haunt of desperadoes, and sport languished. Leisure from business grew less, and the ridicule to which the latter-day followers of the Easter Chase were subjected helped to kill the custom. The climax, perhaps, came when, at the invitation of the Corporation, who were alarmed by the increase in the number of the wild deer, a number of cockneys went to Epping, not to hunt, but to stalk, and one of them slew a donkey by mistake. Sport is only one of the topics dealt with in this really fascinating volume. The grazing and other uses to which the land has been put from time to time are fully dealt with; and we glean some interesting facts as to the enclosure, by individuals, of parts of the Forest from time to time. In the latter connection the royal land-grabbers of the middle ages were followed in later days by imitators of lesser rank, including Forest officials. Even as late as 1831 a lord warden of the Forest enclosed and sold "desirable building plots" without a shadow of legality, and many other instances of unlawful acquisition are piquant reading in view of some landlords' present indignation against the taxation of increment values.

The fall of the French Ministry on Tuesday was a sensational event, and seems to be regarded with some dismay by official circles in Germany, where M. Delcassé is looked upon with suspicion as a firebrand. But the Paris Bourse took it very cheerfully, and actually put up Rentes on Wednesday to celebrate the fall of M. Caillaux. The American market is disturbed by fears that the Tariff will not be so easily settled as was supposed. President Taft is reported after all to be taking a strong line, and may refuse to sign any Bill which does not make substantial reductions in the cost of living. In any case some of the American railroad and industrial securities are now standing far above the normal, though perhaps good corn crops and high prices of grain may justify a certain appreciation. The Bank return shows very little change on last week, but there was a large export of gold on Thursday to South America, which had some slight effect upon discounts. But money is likely to remain cheap for some time longer; and this accounts for the firmness of the stock markets.

Argentina and Bolivia.

In spite of pacific assurances last week, it is announced that Argentina has recalled her Ambassador from Bolivia on the ground that the Bolivian Government has insulted the Argentine President by declaring its intention of not accepting his award until it has been submitted to Parliament. The idea of submitting an award to the decision of the party which does not like it is thoroughly American, and reminds one of our own past diplomatic troubles with the Senate at Washington. The territory which has been in dispute between Peru and Bolivia, upon which the Argentine President has made his award, lies, I am told, between the rivers Madre de Dios and Beni. A well-informed correspondent writes: "It is impenetrable forest, through which even the wandering Indians can hardly find a passage. It produces barely enough maize and bananas to support its scanty and primitive inhabitants; and some of the tribes who wander over it and scratch from it a scanty subsistence number not more than forty individuals. Bolivia possesses thousands of square miles exactly similar to this unpromising tract, and has only three persons to every square mile of her undisputed territory. Whatever State finally obtains it ought to put it under an honest Governor, who would protect the Indians. They are being rapidly exterminated by spirits, and by rubber-hunters, who entangle them in unpayable debts, frequently representing advances to buy alcohol. But, in fact, Peru avows her inability to develop the vast territories that are coming under her sway, and it is the height of folly to squabble over such white elephants. In course of time gold and rubber may be yielded in paying quantities, but both Peru and Bolivia have vast forests of rubber, as well as old and rich gold mines, which they cannot utilise for want of transport. It is hardly to be thought of that blood will be shed in such a cause. A main reason for the prosperity of South America proper as opposed to Northern South America and Central America is that the former has long avoided wars and revolutions, and has therefore gained the confidence of capitalists. It is to be hoped that the English, American, and German security holders will put pressure upon Bolivia, and induce her to accept the undoubtedly correct award of the Argentine President."

The Home Railway Dividends.

The dividends declared this week have for the most part been satisfactory, and the hopes of the market are, so far, not disappointed. Writing on the eve of one or two important announcements that will be known before these words are read, I hesitate to generalise, but the Great Eastern and the Brighton dividends both point to good results and make one feel optimistic. The Great Eastern's rate is increased from 1 to 1¼ per cent., and the London and Brighton's undivided ordinary rate from 2¼ to 2¾ per cent., so that there have been considerable economies in working. Of course, the half-year compares with a terribly bad period, for the first six months of 1908 saw a heavy reduction in traffics and practically stationary expenses. The reports as a result were tragic documents, and we may hope never to look upon their like again. With reviving trade and comparatively low working expenditure the railways ought to do well this half-year, but until the coal crisis is finally settled one can scarcely feel comfortable.

The Rubber Market.

A month or so ago we were all rubbing our eyes at the sight of a 6s. per lb. quotation for rubber, and this week our powers of amazement are further taxed by a quotation of 7s. 9d. This sudden jump is really most extraordinary, but I do not pretend to say whether or not it is reasonable. What is quite clear, however, is that it creates as fine a playground for the gambler as any one could imagine. Here we have a raw material saleable at 7s. 9d., and produceable at 1s. 6d., a number of companies already turning out fairly large quantities at an enormous profit, the price still rising, and fresh acres being brought under cultivation every day. It is a race between the consumer and the producers of two hemispheres, with the London capitalist betting heavily as one of the producers. The situation is extremely interesting, and the lucky investors who got in three or four years ago are at present coining money, the Vallambrosa Company, with a capital of £50,000, actually making £41,395 net profit in a single year, and paying a dividend of 80 per cent. Opinions on the future of the market vary enormously, and there is obviously room for a frightful slump in case anything happens to affect the value of tame rubber.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S LIST.

NEW SIX SHILLING FICTION.

THE QUEST
By JUSTUS MILES FORMAN.

"'The Quest' is every whit as good as its author's best-known story, 'The Garden of Lies,' and to say that of it is to give it the highest recommendation, which, indeed, it deserves."—World.

NETTA
By FRED M. WHITE.

"The author is an absolute master of sensation, and tells his powerful tale in a way which grips the reader at once, and carries him on from chapter to chapter with ever-increasing interest."—Dundee Advertiser.

POWERS OF MISCHIEF
By Sir WM. MAGNAY, Bart.

A novel of mysterious plot and counterplot that must lure the most jaded reader feverishly on to a most ingenious dénouement.

MAN AND MASTER
By LAWRENCE L. LYNCH.

"An extremely clever book, and to those who enjoy a thrilling detective story we can confidently recommend it."—Liverpool Courier.

AN EYE EOR AN EYE
By
MARIE CONNOR LEIGHTON.

A Romance of Love, by the ever-popular Author of 'Convict 99,' &c.

THE MESSAGE
By LOUIS TRACY.

A delightfully exciting romance of adventure, love, and intrigue. In a particularly breezy opening scene—Cowes Regatta—we are introduced to all the characters in the story, and then the tale proceeds with a rush of incident and adventure until its finish in the wilds of Nigeria.

JEANNE OF THE MARSHES
By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

"'Jeanne of the Marshes' is charming and delightful in the extreme; without a doubt it will be voted one of the best novels of the season."—Bristol Mercury.

A VERY DOUBTFUL EXPERIMENT
By L. G. MOBERLEY.

"A charming, attractive tale, ably conceived and convincingly presented. Miss Moberly's former works have well established her ability to write fascinating fiction and create interest in her actors, but we doubt if she has ever introduced a character whose career would be followed with more absorbing interest than that of Rachael Boyd."—Irish Independent.

LADY RODWAY'S ORDEAL
By FLORENCE WARDEN.

"'Lady Rodway's Ordeal' should prove an ideal novel for the holidays."—Chiswick Express.

SARAH TULDON'S LOVERS
By ORME AGNUS.

"Sarah Tuldon is a creation in the full sense of the word; a thing afire with life and the energy of a fearless paganism that is yet clean as the open hills. Splendour is the word that most naturally links itself with her—splendour in courage, mastery, and laughter."
—Manchester Guardian.

THE VAN DYLK DIAMONDS
By ARTHUR APPLIN.

A story of powerful interest by the author of "The Chorus Girl," "The Butcher of Bruton Street," &c.

THE SOLITARY FARM
By FERGUS HUME.

A murder mystery story in its author's best vein, and not since "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab" has the author written a story of such breathless interest or one with such an entrancing and powerful love interest.

Diary of the Week.

A descendant of Lord John Russell has been so kind as to send us the original of the following deeply interesting letter from Gladstone on the action of the Lords in throwing out the Savings Banks Bill. The letter is dated from 11, Downing Street, August 14, 1860, the date of the great controversy over the repeal of the Paper Duties:—

> My dear Lord J. Russell,—I am sorry not to find you to-day, the more so as I understand you go to-morrow.
> Pray look to the proceedings of the Lords last night on the Savings Banks Bill.
> This was a Bill sent up unanimously by the Commons—it consisted of two clauses—it could not be amended. Its object was to effect a saving of public money, and to oblige an account to be laid annually before Parliament of all the transactions of the National Debt Commissioners.
> The Peers voted (by a parity) that it was not urgent (thus to save the public money) and discharged the Bill.
> Sir J. Graham thinks this should not be suffered, but that the clauses should be sent up again in one of our Money Bills.
> Mr. Glyn suggested to him that they should be put into the Fortifications Bill.
> Lewis thinks the proceeding very bad and is ready to do this or to send up another Bill.
> Mr. Speaker largely shares their feelings and is considering as to the modus operandi. I have seen no other member of the Cabinet except Gibson, whose opinions you can guess.
> What do you think we should do in this matter? Probably you could not let me see you to-morrow or attend a Cabinet, which would be much the best thing; but it would be of great consequence to know your opinion.
> If it is for doing nothing I hardly think I shall move. But it seems to me an opportunity for rubbing off some dirt from the scutcheons both of the Ministry and of the House of Commons.—Very sincerely yours,
> W. E. Gladstone.
> Please mark your answer immediate.
> My Lord John Russell.

The Spanish adventure in Morocco has led to desperate fighting with the Riff tribes, and to a very grave internal crisis in Spain. On the 18th the tribesmen nearly captured General Marina's encampment near Melilla; on the 20th they almost cut off his vanguard, killing sixty and wounding seventy men; on the 23rd they inflicted losses of 400 killed and wounded and drove the Spanish forces into Melilla. After a few days' pause the attack was renewed on Tuesday, and although no details are to hand, the fact that a general and numerous other officers were killed, and that the Spanish loss in killed and wounded is 3,000 men, indicates the desperate and disastrous character of the fighting. Some of the Spanish troops are said to be mutinous. The Spanish Government is apparently determined to go on with the business. Reinforcements are being hurried to Melilla, and it is apparently intended to have there a force of 40,000 men, equal to half the strength of the standing army, though no hint is permitted to escape as to the character of the operations it will be entrusted with or the ambitions of the Spanish Government.

The war has been intensely unpopular in Spain from the first. Spaniards know that it has been undertaken in the interests of financial adventurers, and they fear that it will cause the ruin of their country. Their dissatisfaction was increased by the heavy slaughter and by the sending to the front of reservists, many of them fathers of families. The Government made matters worse by imposing the strictest censorship on all war news, forbidding anti-war meetings, and refusing to convoke the Cortes. The result was that riots broke out at the departure of the troops, and some of the soldiers themselves proved mutinous. The trouble was most intense in Catalonia. In Barcelona a general strike was proclaimed. The Government replied by declaring a state of siege. Fierce street fighting has taken place, and the movement in Catalonia is said to be nothing less than a revolution, which it is feared will extend throughout the country. All Spain has been put in a state of siege. The censorship is so strict that very little can be learnt of what is going on, but it may well be that the Morocco expedition has given that signal for the fall of the Spanish Monarchy which, in the view of competent observers, could not long be delayed. It is noteworthy that the Queen, who is personally popular, is at Bayonne, and is likely to stay there, and there has been a great demonstration of protest, in which soldiers took part, before the King's palace in Madrid.

On Monday, Mr. McKenna, in Committee on the Navy Estimates, stated the Cabinet's decision as to the four conditional "Dreadnoughts." They are to be laid down next April, and to be completed by March, 1912. There will be preparations this year in the way of plans, specifications, and orders. The reason assigned for this policy was not the development of German shipbuilding, but the four "Dreadnoughts" arranged for by Italy and by Austria. This tacitly abandons the old ground. It appears that one of the four ships of this year's programme is to be an enormous cruiser, in other words, a huge commerce destroyer.

The policy thus announced satisfied neither the Opposition nor the Radicals, Mr. Balfour declaring that the Government were letting down the Two-Power Standard, and that their plan made it necessary to build twelve "Dreadnoughts" next year. The Prime Minister spoke moderately, admitting that naval expenditure was entirely unproductive and wasteful, and that it promoted bad rather than good feeling. Insisting that the Government was still eager for an arrangement with other Powers, he added that we were forced to build on account of what has been done by friendly nations. The four ships were to be without prejudice to next year's programme, which would be fixed on the circumstances of the time. Mr. John Ellis, in moving the reduction of the vote, said truthfully that, so long as we lived in this atmosphere of suspicion, we should want not 35 millions, but 50 or 100. Ninety-eight members, including thirty-seven Liberals and Radicals, divided against the vote, though it is probable that, if the Government merely mean to quicken up the completion of the 1910-11 programme, the main body of Ministerialists will support them.

Lord Crewe moved the second reading of the Union of South Africa Bill in the House of Lords on Tuesday, the commander of the Raid standing with General Botha on the steps of the Throne to hear his speech, and Mr. Steyn, the late President of the Orange Free State, listening to it from the gallery. Lord Crewe truthfully claimed the special credit of the Act of Union for Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, and the policy of self-government which was its necessary preliminary and condition. Lord Lansdowne proposed to include Lord Milner, as well as Lord Selborne, in his tribute, but the only service to the Union of South Africa which it was in Lord Milner's power to render was to leave it alone. For the rest, the debate on both sides was almost entirely harmonious. Lord Crewe has, it appears, rejected the proposal of the delegates to eliminate the schedule which establishes the conditions for transferring the Protectorates from the British Crown to the Union. This, we think, would have been much the best solution, for it would re-establish the status quo, and give breathing space to both parties. On the other hand, the provisions for safeguarding native rights have been somewhat strengthened. Lord Courtney protested very firmly against the complete bar which the Bill puts upon the political future of the native and colored populations, and stated that he would propose the cutting out from the Bill both of the schedule and of the words limiting membership of the Union Parliament to persons of European descent.

On Thursday night the Prime Minister made an interesting statement of the findings of the sub-committee of the Committee of Imperial Defence, of which he, at Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's suggestion, became Chairman. The object of the Committee was to deal with Lord Roberts's attack on the voluntary system and his theories of invasion. The Committee's findings were hostile on all points. It assumed the improbable (we should have said the impossible), viz., that the regular expeditionary force was absent on one war, and that then another Power sprang a second surprise war upon us. In that case the Admiralty reckoned, and the Committee agreed, that no great body of troops, say 150,000, could possibly land unless the fleet had been disposed of, and that if it had been, our "subjection" would be inevitable. The Committee might well have stopped there. But it also found that, though it was improbable that a raiding party consisting of 70,000 men could slip through, if it did the 70,000 could be amply dealt with by the Territorials. We should have thought that 300,000 Territorials, plus 100,000 Reserve —a force of six to one—might be a slightly excessive provision. But at least the Committee has disposed of conscription, "an Imperial Army," and other visions. Mr. Balfour accepted its conclusions, which, indeed, were practically identical with his own.

On Tuesday Mr. Balfour, addressing the usual gathering in the City on the Budget, with Lord Rothschild unaccountably absent, gave a modified hint to the House of Lords to attack the Budget because the Government have "tacked" valuation on to taxation, and then declared for a very modified form of Protection. He inveighed against taxing the accumulations of wealth, suggested that the taking of 26 millions in death duties from rich men cancelled the millions a year raised for reducing the National Debt, and generally took a view of taxation which, as the "Manchester Guardian" says, would lead to the exemption of the big income and the full taxation only of the small. On Protection, while he insisted that the Budget was converting moderate men to it, he was more negative than positive. Thus, he stated his disbelief in any scale of duties likely to "hamper industries" or "divert trade," or whose cost would be "other than insignificant," or which was likely to promote "combinations or trusts." On the other hand, he favored fiscal reform "of a moderate, equitable kind." In other words, Protection was poison, but a "moderate" dose of it would do no harm. This "moderate" declaration has been received with very moderate enthusiasm by the Protectionist Press. It is needless to add that Mr. Balfour's duties would not pay for a tenth part of Mr. Balfour's "Dreadnoughts."

Hyde Park demonstrations are getting a little out of fashion, but all observers agree that the great assembly in favor of the land taxes on Saturday compared well with its predecessors in point of numbers, seriousness, enthusiasm, and absolute unity of purpose. Numbers cannot be accurately fixed when we have to deal with dense masses of men in the open air, or moving rapidly through the streets. But twelve platforms, stretching from the Serpentine to the Marble Arch, each beset by an enormous crowd, mean a very great gathering. A special feature of the demonstration seems to have been the rounds of applause with which Mr. Lloyd George's name was invariably received. The best phrase used by the speakers was an epigram by Mr. Sylvester Horne. "They want us," he said, "to turn our eyes to the sea, but we are determined to keep them fixed upon the land."

We observe that Mr. H. C. Malkin, writing in the new "Quarterly Review" on the privileges of the Commons in the matter of money bills, makes the extraordinary statement that it is an established principle that the Lords "may without breach of privilege omit the whole of a clause which they cannot amend, or the whole of a subject." Mr. Malkin suggests, but does not specifically state, that this action is relevant to a money Bill. But the only precedents which he adduces make it perfectly clear that it is not. These precedents are two. In 1839 the Lords were allowed by the Commons to strike out from the Dublin Police Bill a clause limiting the power of extending the Metropolitan Police district, and thus affecting the City's rating. In 1888 the Commons also accepted an amendment by the Lords of a Scottish Roads and Bridges Bill which restricted certain borrowing powers to burgh authorities, instead of extending them to burgh and county authorities alike.

What these precedents have to do with a Budget Bill we cannot even guess. Even if they had any such connection, they relate simply to a voluntary waiving of their privileges by the Commons, and do not touch an attempt by the Lords to excise a clause from the Budget against the will of the representative House. Mr. Malkin adds a postcript which is even less intelligible than his main statement. He says that some critics have contended that the supposed right of the Lords to omit the whole of a clause or a subject which they cannot amend, was destroyed by Gladstone's procedure in 1861. But Mr. Malkin says that this precedent is worthless, because it has never been proved, "or even suggested," that any Finance Bill since 1860 has contained provisions which the Lords would have rejected if they had been sent up in a separate Bill. Has Mr. Malkin ever heard of the Budget of 1894, of Lord Salisbury's embittered objections to it, and of his conclusion that the Lords could not reject it, because of the form in which it came to the Peers, and the constitutional consequences of meddling with it?

We note that the "Spectator," which invents a constitutional theory in one number and declares it proved in the next, recurs with touching fidelity to its doctrine that the Lords have a right to amend tax bills. "We must repeat," it says, "that it is abundantly clear from the precedents that the Lords, though they have no right to impose a tax or alter or amend a tax either in degree or in kind, have a right to amend a tax Bill by leaving out altogether any particular tax or series of taxes." With all respect to the "Spectator," this sentence seems to us to be as nearly devoid of meaning as it is possible for grammatical English to be. But we gather that the "Spectator" intends to emphasise the superior power of the Lords in dealing with omnibus Bills as compared with single tax Bills. Is it not extraordinary that this theory directly reverses the lesson of the last great precedent? In 1860, the Lords threw out the separate Bill embodying Mr. Gladstone's repeal of the paper duties. In 1861 the form of repeal was embodied in the Finance Bill and the Lords at once took their hands off it. This was the incident that fixed the power of the Commons over finance on the firm rock of privilege.

The Conference of Senators and Representatives on the Tariff has practically finished its work of revision. Mr. Taft has sent it an ultimatum, insisting on reduction in the lumber, gloves, leather, and hosiery rates, and on free hides, and his action has produced a temporary deadlock. But the tariff remains, in the words of the Republican Senator, La Follette, "the crowning infamy of its sponsor," based not on principle, but "on greed, graft, and pull." Some timely statistics have just appeared which throw light on American tariff policy. Between 1896 and 1909 food prices doubled, leather went up 50 per cent., and textiles 60 per cent; in other words, the cost of living is something like twice as much as thirteen years ago. The McKinley tariff has thus more than neutralised all the advantages of scientific and industrial progress, and the Aldrich tariff will prove a scorpion where the McKinley tariff was only a whip.

M. Briand's Cabinet includes six members of the Clemenceau Ministry, among them M. Pichon, the Foreign Secretary. M. Caillaux, the inventor of the Income-tax Bill, retires—it is understood that he was disappointed in not succeeding M. Clemenceau. The most interesting of the new recruits is M. Millerand, the Minister of Public Works, who broke from the Socialist party to join the Cabinet of Waldeck-Rousseau. The Ministerial programme was read to the Chamber on Tuesday, and approved by 306 votes to 46. M. Briand will, in foreign and domestic affairs, follow in M. Clemenceau's footsteps. The Old Age Pensions Bill and the Income-tax Bill are to have the first consideration, and to be pushed forward with vigor; an experiment in proportional representation will be made at the approaching municipal elections, and the Bill regulating the status of officials will be persisted in. In religious matters the new Government will be tolerant, but it will continue the laicisation of education. M. Briand's opening speech took the form of a personal confession, in which he described himself as a friend of ideas, but also "un homme de réalisation"—a phrase which embodies the point of view of the French Radical-Socialist.

Early on Sunday morning, M. Louis Blériot succeeded where Mr. Latham failed and crossed the English Channel, in a monoplane of his own construction. He took thirty-three minutes to pass from a village near Calais to a cliff in the neighborhood of Dover, a distance of about thirty-six miles. M. Blériot stated that at one time his speed reached forty-five miles an hour, with an elevation of 250 feet. During some part of the journey, the monoplane travelled against a stiffish S.W. breeze. Mr. Latham tried to emulate M. Blériot's feat and nearly succeeded, but his monoplane fell into the sea within two miles of the English coast. M. Blériot's feat was a brilliant one, for he was lame when he started, but these brief and hazardous voyages throw little light on the practical uses of the so-called art of flying. Thousands of balloons have already crossed the Channel, and M. Blériot's machine is almost as much the creature of wind, rain, air, and light as they.

The Censor in person was examined before the Joint Committee on Thursday, and made some interesting and valuable disclosures. Asked to describe his qualifications for the work of literary suppression, he explained that he had been a "bank manager," and had written some (unperformed) plays. He could not say on what "principle" he came to his decisions, but he tried to detect "indecency," and to eliminate personalities affecting any public character. But he had no power to prohibit the production of Wycherley's plays—perhaps the most indecent ever written—and he did not deny that Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Shaw had been caricatured on the stage. He also allowed "a good deal of latitude" to French plays, we suppose on the ground that the morals of people who speak or understand French are hopelessly corrupted already. German plays were read by his wife, as he did not understand German. He objected to any appeal from his (or his wife's) decisions, on the ground of expense, and for other reasons.

Politics and Affairs.

THE RE-HEARTENING OF LIBERALISM.

Every observer of our politics must be conscious of the great change that has come over them since the introduction of the Budget, a change wholly to the advantage of the allied causes of progress and Free Trade, or, let us say, of Liberalism and Labor. At the beginning of this year it seemed doubtful whether the good fortune which followed the Government during the first two years of its life would be sustained. Up to the close of 1907 it was clear that, though the mass of the electorate seemed to shift a little between a more and a less advanced propaganda, the general cause of democratic politics stood firm, and Protection made no progress. Next year saw a change, and from Mid-Devon onwards a series of elections attested at least the temporary success of the sensational campaign for Tariff Reform. The new appeal was based on lavish expenditure, and a lively presentment of a nation living lightly and handsomely on the proceeds of duties drawn exclusively from the foreigner. Peckham saw the new electioneering in full blast. The Licensing Bill gave it a familiar bogey, and the Government, stepping somewhat aside from the broad paths of democracy, reaped all the disadvantage that flowed from the impression that it could neither produce a popular measure nor curb the growing licence of the House of Lords. A thwarted Government is an unpopular Government, be its merits what they may; and, though Wales and Scotland stood firm to Liberalism, the less stable English electorate fell away from it. The results in Newcastle, Wolverhampton, Leeds, and elsewhere showed that Protection was becoming a power in the English towns. The Government might win back, but it would lack a clear mandate to maintain Free Trade, still less to deal with the House of Lords. Men saw again a period of unsettled politics, with the Irish Nationalists holding a wavering balance. In such a situation, reaction must in the end have found its account.

To-day we survey a country so changed that politicians hardly know it for the same. Four bye-elections have just been fought, avowedly on the Budget, and three Ministers have appealed directly for re-election as part architects of the worst, most unjust, oppressive, and vindictive measure ever proposed to the House of Commons. All have retained their seats, and the four supporters of this iniquity have registered a joint majority of nearly 4,000 votes in its favor. High Peak, one of the constituencies, was undoubtedly a "sporting" one. It was Tory till 1900. It had a considerable element of wealth and leisure, and two great ducal houses labored in vain for a Liberal defeat. But High Peak has kept its Liberal faith, and Mr. Partington's striking success was avowedly based on a steady and able presentment of the case for the land taxes. The majority, here and elsewhere, is a little smaller than at the General Election. But we shall take the comparison with 1906 to be of no consequence whatever. It is not flattering to our opponents to say so, but 1906 was fought partly on Liberal and democratic policy, partly on Free Trade, and partly on the quite extraordinary demerits and unpopularity of Mr. Balfour's Government. At least one of these causes for the heaping of all kinds of votes on Liberal candidates has disappeared, and we recur to the normal conditions of our politics, when an avowed and combative Liberal measure has to be defended, and every regular Tory voter has long gone back to his old allegiance. The result has been very remarkable. In the first place, it is clear that the Budget has re-heated the force out of which all Liberal triumphs grow, the enthusiasm of the main body of the party. Popular as it is in the House of Commons, it is more popular still with the rank and file. Anyone acquainted with the movement of economic thought among the progressive workers could have seen that the principle of the taxation of land values, growing not only out of the fiscal issue but from the development of the rural question and the expansion of town life, had taken firm hold of the people, and would furnish one of the historic rallying grounds of Liberal action. The Liberal Party has got something to fight for in which it believes with its whole heart, which is intelligible and just, and on which it is going to win. That is the true reason why we are back to normal electioneering, with a normal Liberal victory at the end of it.

The Budget has reacted not less notably on the Tory Party. They have chosen to speak and act as if the care of landlords (especially ground landlords) and very rich men were the special, if not the sole, object of their existence. Ignoring the remarkable movement of the municipalities in favor of the taxation of ground values, in which hundreds of their provincial workers have been interested, the huge fines exacted by the land magnates from the activities of London, Sheffield, and scores of manufacturing centres, and the deep and wide grievances aroused by the abuses of the leasehold system, they have talked as if landlords were the darlings of democracy. Equally mis-directed has been the platform appeal against the Budget. Hardly an attempt has been made to reach the masses of the electors. Rich men have simply wept in public on rich men's shoulders. With the City as his headquarters, and Lord Rothschild as a recurring decimal in all his calculations, the Tory leader has argued as if the taxation of wealth were equivalent to the destruction of the nation's capital, and, though he halts ostentatiously at a "moderate" tariff, the workmen and all men of moderate incomes have been led to expect a general assault on industry and labor as the result of the triumph of the party of dukes and millionaires. Thus the pseudo-democracy of Tariff Reform has been completely overlaid by the display of timid and egoistic class passion which lies behind the obscure and meddling obstruction of the Budget in the House of Commons, and the reckless signalling to brother landlords on the other side of the corridor. The milder, philanthropic aspect of Toryism has, in our view, received an equally severe blow by such letters, and there have been many, as the communication from the Duke of Somerset. If it be true, as every word of such writing suggests, that the charity of the squire is a sop to poverty and dependence, to be roughly snatched away on the first approach to democratic finance, a powerful moral argument has simply been added to the strong political and economic case for the Budget, and the anti-popular side of the Tory position is completely unmasked.

Under such tactics, indeed, every force which made for a Tory and Protectionist victory at the polls has been arrested. Nothing is more easily detected than class selfishness, and the Tory attitude to the Budget strips its policy of its two most attractive disguises. The Jingo cannot shriek for "Dreadnoughts" while his mouth is full of curses against the Budget, nor the Tariff Reformer for taxing the foreigner when it is quite clear that his real objection is to taxing the rich. But the most serious of the blows which the Budget has dealt is at the pretensions of the House of Lords. Not even the "Spectator" can represent the Lords in this matter as wishing to "save" anybody but themselves. In view of the recent elections, the pretence of "the country behind the Lords" disappears, and, disabled from touching finance without risking a revolution and giving Liberalism its best and most popular opening against it, the Upper Chamber sinks to its proper significance in our scheme of politics. It cannot be openly violent and irregular in its own interest in a country where violence and irregularity do not pay even on public grounds, and it cannot speak its real mind about the Budget without revealing the need for a vital change in its own constitution.

THE MALADY OF ARMAMENTS.

We shall take leave to assume that when the Prime Minister, quoting Sir Edward Grey, tells the House of Commons that the four "Dreadnoughts" which are to be laid down next April are "without prejudice" to next year's programme, he means precisely what he says, no more and no less. The naval programme of 1910-11 will, as he says, be considered "by reference to the circumstances of that time." There will be, in other words, a state of almost perfect freedom. We shall be considering not this year's programme, but next year's. The Government ought to be free to say that the four may not be wanted so soon. Failing this, they are certainly at liberty to urge either that they will be wanted, but that no more will be wanted, or that more will be wanted. The House will be free to consider, and to reject or approve, either of these propositions. This simple statement vitiates the attempts of the Opposition to treat the new four ships as a supplement to an average programme of four "Dreadnoughts" next year, or even to an unthinkable enlargement to the tune of eight. We claim for the Liberal Party entire dissociation from each of these calculations. It is a tribute to the never-ending audacity of elected persons that Mr. Balfour, in face of his attitude to the Budget, should have advanced them at all. But when he calls for deficit on deficit, and rails at the "preposterously meagre" programme of eight "Dreadnoughts" finished in three years, and laid down in one, the Liberal Party will, we hope, make it clear that they have no part or lot in any such proposition. When the Naval estimates for 1910-11 are presented, they will be considered with reference to the state of Europe, the needs of national defence, the advance of the programmes of other Powers, and, above all, the aims and policy of this country. Private Liberals go into this controversy unpledged to a single new "Dreadnought." They may be disposed to look leniently on the novel form of insurance against panic under which the Government propose to place twenty such vessels on the home seas by the spring of 1912. But they have not taken one step further in the "grammar of assent" which their opponents kindly propose for them.

Meanwhile we must assert with some emphasis the disappearance of the case on which the scare of last March arose. In its place, we are offered an entirely new argument in defence of the programme to which the scare gave birth. Four months ago the Admiralty presented us with a thoroughly alarmist statement as to an all-round acceleration of German ship-building, and a development of naval power which had practically annulled our own superior capacity. It was further suggested that this advance had been secretly initiated in defiance of Germany's public engagements. Mr. McKenna then (March 16th) pleaded a general speeding up of all the four "Dreadnoughts" belonging to the German pro-programme of 1909-10, an acceleration so great that they would all be completed by April, 1912. On the same date the Prime Minister stated that "in one or two cases, possibly in more, ships were actually laid down," and that these proceedings showed that our "substantial advantage" in construction had been destroyed by the "enormous" German development. Of these statements barely a fragment remains. Mr. Asquith admitted on Monday that he believed "our capacity (in ship-building) to be substantially greater than that of Germany." Mr. McKenna did, indeed, hint that one ship of Germany's 1909-10 programme had been laid down at the beginning of this year, but he completely destroyed the importance of this statement by the details of this so-called acceleration, with which he furnished Mr. Middlemore on June 29. He then said that the contract for one ship of the 1909-10 programme had been "given out" on the first of April last (i.e. some days after he first spoke)—not a word about laying down—and that the others had not yet been ordered. Where, then, are the "one or two ships" or "possibly more," which in March last the Prime Minister thought had not merely been ordered, but laid down? And if none of these German vessels are thus advanced, where lies the material for the hypothesis that the whole four can be finished by March, 1912, or for denying the official, reiterated statements of Admiral von Tirpitz and Prince Bülow that none of them can be completed before the end of 1912, and that no design of acceleration exists?

We come, therefore, to a situation in which we have committed ourselves to the production of twenty or (with the "Lord Nelsons") twenty-two "Dreadnoughts" by the spring of 1912, against an almost certain German eleven, or a barely possible thirteen. Considering our enormous preponderance in new "pre-Dreadnought" vessels, and in armored cruisers, we cannot describe this as other than an extravagant provision, which relegates the talk of eight "Dreadnoughts" next year to the region of phantasy. If a British strength of three to one against Germany is not enough, nothing will ever content us. But the German Navy practically fell out of account in Monday's argument, vitiated as it was by the old extreme reliance on a single fashion in huge battleships, which may pass out of date as quickly as their predecessor, the useless and almost forgotten Italian "Dandolo." Instead we were bidden to look to what Italy and Austria were doing, and other nations "with which we had no quarrel," or even the closest ties of affection. We do not know by what perversion of every rule of common sense we are bidden to regard both the Austrian and the Italian shipbuilding programmes as concerning ourselves, when every politician in Europe knows that they neutralise each other—four "Dreadnoughts" against four "Dreadnoughts"—and that Italy in particular would no more use one of her warships against England than against her own ruined children of Messina. It cannot be that either of these Powers is preparing to rival our Navy, or to use the two forces in a combination which would shatter the Triple Alliance. All we see is that on this principle any random sum in simple addition can be used to confuse friends and foes, to disguise our real position in the European world, and to defeat every calculation of the physical, moral, and intellectual forces that used to group itself under the word statesmanship. No matter how smiling the world's prospect, how completely relieved of all peril to these shores, of all hinted or possible combinations and designs of aggression, we find that our statesmen, while they write the sacred word peace on their phylacteries, still keep us and our neighbors expectant of a momentary outbreak of European war.

While we proceed on these lines we are bound to give both Europe and our own countrymen a false impression of the state of the naval world. Mr. McKenna, for example, told the House of Commons that within the last three years Germany had laid down eleven ships of the Dreadnought type, and we only eight. But this ignores the point that our "Dreadnought" building began in 1904, which gave us three years' start of Germany, and has enabled us to put seven "Dreadnoughts" on the seas before she is able to float one. To-day our building and repairing votes, as they stand in this year's estimates, represent together nearly twenty-two millions, a sum larger than the whole German naval estimates, while by March, 1912, we shall, in eight years, have spent about forty millions on completed battleships of one type alone. If, therefore, the German Press declares the refusal of their statesmen—and a refusal it is—to curtail their armaments on such a basis, our own politicians cannot be surprised if their tender of a naval agreement is set aside. The world does not heed our declared fears of invasion; is, in fact, utterly sceptical of their sincerity. It thinks, not that we are endangered, but that we endanger others. It holds us largely to blame for the fact that the European Chancellors, our own included, plough along through a thickening forest of obstacles, not the least of which is the revolt of the wealthy and directing classes against the burdens which their own fears create. We said some time ago, when writing on this subject during the lifetime of the late Prime Minister, that our continual raising of the general world-standard of naval strength, the example of our unrivalled wealth and power used to maintain an Armada of unparalleled costliness, must end in laying a grievous burden on the poorer nationalities in Europe. The important Spanish correspondent, whose letter we print elsewhere, states in terms that this result has already been reached in Spain. Popular Spanish opinion attributes the building of a new Spanish fleet to the direct and indirect pressure produced by the Anglo-Spanish entente. We hope, at least, that no word or action of Liberal statesmanship has called upon Spain for any such sacrifices. But we cannot plead not guilty to the scarcely less grave charge of moral responsibility. England used to send out a certain range of influences over the world; they were widely prevalent, they gave her a fixed character and force, which now and then changed the destinies of States. We are afraid she now acts in a different sphere. Europe is plagued, and is beginning to be convulsed, with the malady of armaments. Not a Government is safe from this infectious disease; not a policy but is twisted and maimed by it. And not one sign of relief does any European statesman hold out, least of all our Liberal leaders; though, as far as this island is concerned, it is impossible to state in coherent terms a cause of war with any Power in the world, least of all with Germany, or a combination either of wills or of material forces designed to shake our Empire.

SPAIN'S TWO WARS.

In the course of a single week Spain has contrived to involve herself in two wars. To carry on her campaign against the Moors, she must first repress her own subjects and take away their civil rights, and the casualty list from Melilla is swollen by a formidable catalogue of killed and wounded from Barcelona. From its first origins this adventure was as wanton as it has been ill-starred. There has never been in Spain the faintest trace of any enthusiasm for a forward policy in Morocco. A Spanish force was sent to Casa Blanca to co-operate with the French. It ostentatiously refrained from taking any real share in that bloody expedition, and its officers were at constant dissension with their allies. The operations around Melilla, if not more popular, have at least been more deliberate. Behind them was an intrigue in which it would be difficult to disentangle the dubious finance from the shady politics. There are in the mountainous Riff Hinterland behind the old Spanish fortress of Melilla iron and lead mines of uncertain value. Two companies, one wholly Spanish, the other formed with French capital, had obtained from the local Pretender, El Roghi, concessions to work them. Who and what El Roghi is, is something of a mystery. He may be a creature of Franco-Spanish policy, like the ex-Sultan Abdul Aziz. For the anarchy in Morocco the support given by foreign Powers to one native party or the other is largely responsible. But legally El Roghi had no title to bestow concessions. In order to work the concessions the companies constructed a short railroad, and, as at Casa Blanca, a few of their workmen were killed. The next step was the occupation by Spanish troops of the country traversed by the line, and against this invasion the warlike Riff tribes, well armed, determined, and apparently well led, rose in force. The fighting has been nothing but a series of disasters. A force of 15,000 men has been driven in from the hilly country to the environs of the town. They have had a general and three colonels killed. One regiment lost almost all its officers, while guns and an ammunition train are said to have been captured. The casualties in the whole series of engagements must reach a total between 4,000 and 5,000, and it is doubtful whether all the facts have yet been divulged. The abnormal loss in officers suggests that the men must have required a great deal of leading, and, indeed, there are rumors that some detachments refused to fight. The ground is difficult, and, even if it stood alone, this disaster would not be easy to retrieve.

But the really grave and at the same time the only hopeful fact is that the Spanish nation is resolutely opposed to the war. Every element of discontent, from the Republicans and the Socialists to the Catalan Nationalists, is actively hostile, but even outside their ranks there is no approval, still less enthusiasm. The working-class asks why it must send its sons to enable two companies of financial adventurers to seek their illicit gains in a country not their own. The Government dare not send the Reservists to the front. It has to face a revolutionary strike in Barcelona and the regions round it. It has had to suppress all uncensored news and all free comment in the Press of Madrid. The news that "constitutional guarantees" have now been suspended throughout the kingdom suggests that the unrest must be general and formidable. It is not, so far as we yet know, organised or inspired by any larger aim than the desire to protest against a disastrous and unnecessary war. But the very possibility of such a protest is an evidence of the utter alienation of the people from its Government. When the disasters in Manchuria, so far from inspiring among the Russian masses a determination to avenge the honor of the flag, were received almost with satisfaction as so many blows dealt to a hated autocracy, wise observers knew that the revolution had begun. In Spain, also, it is obvious that the average citizen feels a degree of discontent which might in the end drive him to generalise his protest. On some of the causes of his indignation the interesting letter which we print from Señor de Maeztu dwells with much plainness of speech. It is obvious that a good deal of this indignation, in the minds at least of educated men, is directed against the King and the Court. Among the less conscious masses it is probably simply such a deep common sense as inspired the women of Italy to stop the foolish war with Abyssinia after the disaster of Adowa, to save the lives of their husbands and sons. Behind this simple realism of the people there is also, no doubt, the influence of a more deliberate and intelligent anti-militarism. In a country which relies on a conscript army, the masses, if they are resolute enough, and dare to be themselves, can undoubtedly stop an aggressive and unnecessary war. There lies the larger interest of these events for the civilised world. Against such an enemy as these Moorish tribes a civilised Power can afford to take its time and delay its blow. But a very much less formidable movement than this would suffice to render aggression dangerous, because it would make victory impossible in a war against a European Power. Whatever be the consequence of these events in Morocco and in Spain, of this we may be sure, that all over the Continent they will be followed with an anxious and critical interest by every Socialist who has come under the influence of the theoretic anti-militarism of Jaurès, Liebknecht, or Hervé. Here is the first experiment which will show whether a general strike can impose peace.

The pointed question which our Spanish correspondent addresses to us in this letter deserves a candid answer. But, unfortunately, the exact motives and mechanism of the Moroccan adventure are as much a matter of mere conjecture to the democracy of this country as they apparently are to the people of Spain. As we have read the history of the past five years, it was rather M. Delcassé than any British influence who pressed forward the penetration of Morocco. We preferred the presence of France in Morocco to that of any less friendly Power, but it would surprise us to learn that we had urged her forward. That our diplomacy joined with France to make Spain a partner in the affair was quite intelligible. Spain had certain rights, and, if those rights had been ignored, she might have been tempted to throw in her lot with Germany. She derived certain advantages from the connection, for the security of her coasts has been guaranteed. There has clearly been a desire, by diplomatic and dynastic ties, to make her an adherent of the Triple Entente in the general struggle for a balance of Power in Europe. But we fail to see what interest either the French or ourselves could have had to lure her further into the Moroccan adventure than she herself desired to go. Opposition, or even a cold neutrality, on her part would have been a source of weakness to the Triple Entente; but her active participation should not have been necessary. That, however, is a priori reasoning. The fact undoubtedly is that France did put pressure on Spain to induce her to share in the Casa Blanca expedition. It also looks as if British influence were used to encourage the rebuilding of the Spanish Navy—to the profit of British firms. We have more than once in these columns regretted this tendency, which has diverted Spain from her wiser course of self-development, by luring her into the European maelstrom, and assisting her to squander her resources on ships. But if any foreign influence was used to spur the Spanish Government into this wanton adventure behind Melilla, the inference would seem to be that it must have been financial rather than political, and French rather than British. The power which stands behind most of these North African adventures is that of Messrs. Schneider, the great armament house of Creusot, which is interested not only in selling armaments to make war, but also in working the concessions which cause war. It made the difficulty at Casa Blanca. It is significant that a financial arrangement between the French firm of Schneider and the German firm of Krupp to exploit in partnership the iron ore of Ouenza, in Algeria, preceded the rather sudden détente between the two Governments in February last. If our Spanish friends inquire who pushed them into the Melilla adventure, we can answer only by asking a further question. Who supplied the capital to the Franco-Spanish company there? If it was, as we suspect, the same gentry who were at work in Casa Blanca, there is no deep mystery to be solved. We are no warm admirers of Franco-British policy in Morocco. The wisest thing which Lord Rosebery ever said was his prediction that that Convention would bring disaster. But it is fair to point out that Creusot is not in the United Kingdom, nor are Messrs. Schneider a British firm. We suspect the French and German ordnance firms of a considerable share in aggravating the Moroccan trouble, as we suspect the British and German ordnance firms of a large part in promoting the naval rivalry of the two countries. If we want to know why all the world is building "Dreadnoughts," it is well to begin by asking, Cui prodest?

THE HOLDING UP OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY.

The new American tariff, which is now virtually complete, furnishes the most striking example of our time of certain serious defects in democratic modes of government. Though no great political party and no large proportion of American citizens are convinced Free Traders, there has been manifested during the last few years a keen general desire for a genuine revision of the Dingley tariff in the direction of lower rates. The country has been passing through a period of deep economic depression shared by all trades and all sections of the population. But the workers, who form the vast majority of citizens, have suffered most, and they have cause to attribute no small share of their sufferings to the direct and indirect effects of the high protective duties. Prices of food and clothing have risen enormously since 1896, and, except for a few grades of favored workers, wages have made no commensurate advance, so that the working classes as a whole find that no share of the enormous growth of wealth which the rich resources of the country have yielded to recent capitalist methods has passed into their hands. Their share, indeed, is not only relatively but absolutely smaller per head than it was before the Dingley tariff came into operation. Protection, they say, has not protected their wages. Neither has it secured for them employment, for the depression, which has thrown out of work hundreds of thousands here, has literally thrown out millions in America. Moreover, the part played by the tariff in building up trusts and combines and in empowering them to tax the necessaries of the people has become manifest to the meanest intelligence. Hence the politicians of all parties before the last elections committed themselves to a policy of lower rates on common articles of consumption, and in particular to a removal of protection for the trusts. Inside the Republican party two powerful sections, one in New England, the other in the Middle West, under energetic leaders pressed for radical reforms, and challenged the "stand-patters" to defy the evident will of the people. The press of both parties, with remarkable unanimity, favored a genuine reduction.

But the business interests which govern America and the politicians who represent them have felt strong enough to set aside the popular will as mere empty clamor, and to force through the two Houses a measure more complete in its offensive and defensive structure and in the support it renders to vested interests than any which has preceded it. "It constitutes," writes the New York representative of the "Times," "a work of art in the international gallery of tariff legislation and deserves the place of honor. Its framers have industriously gathered in all the stray industries which Mr. McKinley and Mr. Dingley overlooked, and when in full operation, in combination with its maximum provisions for combatting hostile tariffs, its new methods of ascertaining cost to prevent under-valuation, its inquisitorial system of invoicing, and its improved administrative clauses, it will present to the foreign markets of the world the most formidable barrier that European importers have ever been called upon to scale." So far as it is possible to foretell from a first view of the elaborate schedules, no considerable damage will be done to British export trade. The duties upon textiles, largely prohibitive, remain much as before, and though there are increased duties on a few metal goods there is no great alteration of the scale upon metals, machinery, leather, and other articles which make up the bulk of our export trade of thirty-one millions to the United States. It is even suggested that we may indirectly gain by the operation of the maximum scale in turning over to us some of the trade hitherto done by other foreign countries which may fall under this ban. For one of the significant features of this Payne-Aldrich tariff is that it provides for a constructive application of a surplus tax of 25 per cent. upon all imports from countries which in any single matter discriminate against the United States. This method of retaliation will have the effect of limiting the power of important customers like Germany or France to negotiate with a single eye to special trade with other countries than the United States. Should Germany, France, or any other important customer prove recalcitrant at this interference, the clapping of 25 per cent. on to the tariff rate is likely to exterminate her trade, and possibly enable our merchants to displace foreign by British goods. Even under existing conditions some apprehension is manifested in Germany lest her protective measures, masquerading as sanitary, directed against American imported meat, should furnish a sufficient fiscal reason for the imposition of this maximum tariff. The greatest immediate sufferer from the new tariff, however, is likely to be France, for substantial increases have been put upon the wines, silks, and other luxury goods which she supplies. Thus does Free Trade guarantee this country against the reprisals which continually threaten her Protectionist neighbors.

Even if President Taft succeeds in getting the Senate to admit to the free list coal, iron ore, lumber, hides, and oil, which are the objects of the final struggle of this week, the Tariff will nevertheless stand as a crowning act of perfidy and tyranny, committed by men elected by a "free" vote of the whole body of American citizens to execute the popular will. For another decade, it seems, the great, intelligent people of America are to be forbidden to take advantage of the superior natural resources, the higher skill, the better machinery, organisation, or labor, which other friendly nations may happen to possess. Forbidden to buy these better or cheaper products, they are compelled to put up with dearer or inferior goods of their own making. America is full of seats of learning in which Political Economy is taught. Yet such is the control which business interests exercise over the intellectual machinery of the country, that the most elementary truths regarding the nature and the benefits of international exchange are either "boycotted" or else are so doctored and sophisticated that they become inoperative for practical policy. Every person of ordinary information in America is fully aware of the trick that has been played upon the people by the politicians. They even know how it is done; for the lobbyists for woollens, chemicals, or steel have been at work naked and unashamed. They know that their Senate is composed of or controlled by the great manufacturing trusts, the railroads, the banking and insurance corporations and their lawyers, and that it is used primarily and openly to safeguard the business methods and enhance the private fortunes of the little oligarchy of wealth which is able to pump down its will into the great democratic machine and get it up again duly registered as the will of the people.

The complete collapse of American Radicalism in the last presidential election must, doubtless, have emboldened Mr. Aldrich and his pirates to their work. But they have also been materially assisted by a conspicuous revolt of Southern senators against the traditional democratic policy. The new manufacturing South is brewing its own big business interests, and its business politicians are clamoring for a finger in the tariff pie. Thus the solid party opposition which in earlier years the Democratic party would have offered has been broken. It is not, in fact, difficult to explain the result in terms of machine-politics. The adoption of the protective idea and its embodiment in legislation have indeed been historically the most important factors in the construction of the perilous machine which has mastered American democracy. This ignominy and injury suffered by the nation nearest allied to us by race, institutions, religion, and morals, will assuredly be suffered here if we once permit this accursed system of organised corruption—to which Mr. Balfour invites by the sophistical epithet of a "moderate and equitable" tariff—to set its foot again on English soil. Once empower our rich, able manufacturers and merchants to keep out their foreign competitors by taxing their goods, to organise combinations, control markets, and to charge consumers monopoly prices, our Houses of Parliament, Lords and Commons alike, will similarly find themselves unable or unwilling to "reform" the tariff in any other manner than by raising rates which rob the consumer while they antagonise the foreigner. This is of the essence of Protection. The Payne-Aldrich Tariff furnishes a crushing rejoinder to Tariff Reformers of Mr. Balfour's type with their silly talk of little 10 per cent. duties which "nobody will feel." Once put our Protectionist into the political saddle and he will "go the pace" like any other Dick Turpin.

THE RIGHT OF PLAIN SPEECH.

THERE is in the history of constitutional rights a vast chapter which still remains to be written. It is the manner of our historians to treat the winning of rights as the old-fashioned novelist used to treat the loves of his juvenile heroes. The romance of history ends with a charter or an Act or a sensational trial, much as the novel used to end with a happy marriage. For a few centuries or decades or generations the life of a people is turmoil and strife, the beheading of kings, the making of civil wars, the imprisonment of popular champions, and the trial of bishops. But there always comes an auspicious moment when the right is at last conceded, and then we are left to suppose that people and rulers live happily ever afterwards, like the model couples of the old three-volume tales. To our thinking history is rarely so simple as that. The real fight is much more to secure the effective exercise of a right than to obtain its formal recognition. Coercion is the earliest and the crudest of all the weapons of a governing class. It is really formidable only when it begins to smile and to organise. The old way was to send Wilkes to prison. The new way is to make Sir Alfred Harmsworth a peer. Rights are stifled much more effectively by the steady use of social pressure and the adroit dispensation of patronage than by the public and violent punishment of rebels. To make rebellion and plain speaking dangerous is also to make it heroic, interesting, and, ultimately, popular. To make it slightly disreputable and rather bad form is to place it, in modern conditions, under a much more formidable ban. It is the latter process which has, on the whole, succeeded in silencing the greater part of our Press in the face of the coming visit of the Tsar. The prosecution of a newpaper for using critical language towards Nicholas II., had it been possible, would have raised a tempest of indignation. The subtler method was that of the Windsor Garden Party incident, by which members who voted against the King's visit to Reval were placed under a social boycott.

The right of free speech we still possess, and always shall possess. The less it is used, the less is it assailed. What we have lost is the habit of plain speech, one might almost say, the right of plain speech. It was a right which our forefathers exercised a little roughly in their comments on the doings of other peoples. We were secure in our splendid isolation. We made neither alliances nor understandings. We feared no Continental Power, we courted no Continental Power. Our voice amid the contemporary tragedy was, in its freedom and its impartiality, a Euripidean chorus, commenting in bold words on the doings of the protagonists on the stage beyond the Channel. Nor was it an obscure or chaotic chorus. It had its leaders, who spoke as boldly and as bravely as the mass. Those were the days when Mr. Gladstone dared to say of a foreign ruler that his Government was the "negation of God." We made enemies among the great of the earth. Our independence, our supreme indifference to consequences, made us envied and sometimes disliked. But it also caused us to be regarded as the friend of every national cause, and made of our public opinion a force which was dreaded by tyrants and invoked by the oppressed. There were then, as now, powerful influences which resented this directness and fearlessness of speech. Queen Victoria, to judge by her letters, seems to have spent a good deal of her political energy in attempting to curb it. The answers of her Whig Ministers are on record. They always insisted that, at least, they had voiced the national mind, and made of our foreign policy a true expression of the national will. "Somewhat of the good opinion of the Emperor of Russia and other foreign Governments may be lost, but the good-will and affection of the people of England are retained." So Lord John Russell wrote to the Queen in defence of Palmerston's condemnation of European despotisms. The sentence survives to point the contrast to the habit and attitude of our modern Whigs. We have won the good opinion of the Emperor of Russia. But no one who witnessed Sunday's demonstration in Trafalgar Square against the dishonor of his visit can claim that our Russian policy retains in this respect the "affection" of the people of England.

In this respect Sir Edward Grey's speech in the House of Commons supplied the measure of our loss of the old tone and point of view. It was not merely a defence of the policy of our quasi-alliance with the Russian Government. It waived the old claims of sympathy and free judgment in foreign affairs. "It is not our business," he declared, "even to know what passes in the internal affairs of other countries." That our policy should be color-blind in its relationships, that it should not see the stain on the hand it grasps, that it should allow no consideration based on the character of the government with which it deals to influence its conduct—that would be the natural consequence of this doctrine that it is not our business to know what passes in foreign countries. Sir Edward Grey was answering an indictment of the Russian prison system, the indiscriminate hangings, the tortures and the exile of untried suspects, which recalled Mr. Gladstone's exposure of the Neapolitan dungeons. He did, indeed, suggest that some of Prince Kropotkin's figures are inaccurate—an answer which is sufficiently disposed of when one states that all these figures were laid before the Duma by the Russian Government itself. But his main answer was not a charge of inaccuracy. It was that we have no business to know what passes in Russian prisons, that the abominations of Jewish massacres and Siberian convict settlements are not relevant facts which the director of our foreign policy can be expected to consider. For our part, the name of Nicholas II., whom King Edward will welcome next week at Cowes, recalls to our mind principally this one sentence which appeared among the foreign telegrams of the "Times" on September 26, 1906:—

> "At the instance of M. Stolypin, the Tsar has made a grant of £2,500 to the Union of Russian Men, which is now endeavoring to organise a pogrom at Odessa."

Such are the facts about the internal condition of Russia and the character of the nation's guest, which it is not our business to know. It was our business in 1906. But that was before the consolidation of the Triple Entente. The fact which appears most to impress Sir Edward Grey about the Tsar is that "during his reign a constitution was granted to his country." Mr. Bernard Shaw's retort is conclusive, "It would be almost equally relevant to say that during the reign of Charles I. Parliamentary government was firmly established in England, and that under Leo X. occurred the Protestant Reformation."

It is not in regard to Russia alone that this doctrine of diplomatic indifference is sapping our influence on behalf of humane causes. Everyone who has taken the pains to follow the recent history of Turkey is aware that as yet the Turkish Government has failed to punish any of the real authors of the Adana Massacre—it has punished the Armenians. The Court Martial has published its findings. It announces that, since 80,000 persons are more or less guilty, it would be well to pardon everyone. This pitiful confession of weakness was received in silence by nearly all the English Press. There were two exceptions. The "Daily News" recorded a vigorous protest. The "Westminster Gazette" expressed its satisfaction that no one, or very few, should be punished for the slaughter of 16,000 Christians, on the ground, as it put it, that one cannot bring an indictment against a nation. It is quite untrue to accuse the Turkish nation of this Hamidian massacre. But, if it were true, the conclusion would certainly not be that we ought to embrace that nation. The considerations which have imposed this nearly unanimous silence are not at all obscure. An influential young Tory, who has travelled in the East, and was connected for a time with the diplomatic service in some honorary capacity, remonstrated last week with a member of the Balkan Committee, who proposed to raise this question in the presence of the Young Turkish delegates. "For Heaven's sake, say nothing," he declared. "If you do, it will be reported in the 'Osmanischer Lloyd' (the German organ in Constantinople). The Young Turks are already leaning to a German alliance. If you talk about Adana, you will push them over the line." There in all its apprehensive cynicism is the working theory of our foreign policy to-day. We must abandon the right of plain speaking, in order to play our hand with more effect in the European game called the Balance of Power. We must learn to adopt the habits of the flunkey, that we may enjoy the delights of hegemony. The maxim must fail even in its own ends. We shall not find our prestige enhanced because we dare not discriminate in our public courtesies between the French President and the Russian Tsar. We shall not be more powerful in Turkey because even in London we dare not speak of Adana. We have entered the climate of fear; we have succumbed to the twin and banded phantoms of panic and hatred. We are not the stronger because we have put a gag on our own lips, or more formidable because we no longer stand erect to speak a fearless word.

"OH, FOR THE WINGS!"

When M. Blériot lumbered noisily across the sunrise last Sunday morning and alighted with toilsome mechanism upon our shores, the organist of Dover's parish church was inspired to raise the familiar anthem which cries and cries for the wings of a dove. In that strain of almost excessive sweetness he was uttering the long desire of all mankind. To leave the common world on wings, to fly into the wilderness and have rest, or with Faust to follow the setting sun upon the pinions of a crane—"the day before me, and the night behind"—is a yearning persistent in the human soul. Perhaps it springs from a dim reminiscence of unrecorded time; just as they tell us that the sense of falling into an abyss as we go to sleep, is a reminiscence of days when a creature arboreal in its habits missed its hold among the branches and fell down, down into the depths of the primeval forest where crawling monsters of the fen stood waiting with open jaws. Far more precious, at all events, would be the memory of that still more distant age before the thing that was to be man made the greatest error in its development, shed the plumes from its pinion joints, and took to liquid mud and spiky rocks instead of the bright plains of air.

Passionate regret for that irretrievable error still haunts the imagination of every race. Victory flies upon the wings of an eagle; fairies flitter through the twilight on the wings of butterflies or moths; the ocean nymphs rustle on feathers to the cliffs of Caucasus; Iris is borne upon the wings of the rainbow, angels upon the wings of swans, love upon his own. Without wings the great emblems of strength and terror are incomplete, and there have been religious symbols that were little else than wings. Even to monsters they are added, and the Furies, though lame of foot, pursue with the wings of vultures. The good horse Pegasus and the lion of St. Mark are winged; but the Harpies, for all their woman's breasts, are winged in like manner, though for evil intent. So were the Griffins that guarded the hyperborean hoards of gold, and so is the Griffin that now stands sentry to the City at Temple Bar.

In nearly all cases the common mind has made the anatomical mistake of attaching the wings to the shoulder-blades, though sometimes artists have pictured them sprouting from the heels, or even from the head. But throughout man's history we find the same longing for flight, the same mournful desire to recover that precious faculty lost so long ago. The soul is imagined winged, and so are thoughts, and so are even words. In one of his earlier books, Mr. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt suggested how much the world might have gained if its dominant genus had developed from another stock. Let us suppose them sprung from peacocks instead of apes. How much more beautiful men and women would then have been! How finely clad in their own nice down, instead of being wrapt and decorated in the putrifying relics of other beasts and birds! How many disagreeable and apelike habits they would have escaped, what jabbering, what ill-temper! But, above all, on what oarage of wings they would then have launched from the battlements of the sky! Similarly, Anatole France has imagined a race of creatures that was developed out of penguins owing to an ecclesiastical misconception. But from generation to generation that brood came to resemble the present human stock with more depressing deterioration. For penguins, like ourselves, have but rudimentary wings, and cannot fly.

The finest wit of man has been expended in the vain endeavor to recover that early gift and to move from place to place with ease. In all ages prizes have been awarded to those who traversed space most quickly even on their own poor legs, and swift-footed Achilles was honored by his constant epithet because he could beat a tortoise. Perhaps the supreme moment in man's history, since his fall from air, came when it occurred to some semi-human being to avoid peril or reach new pastures by clinging to another animal's surface. "I am slow and weak," he said in his gibbering gabble; "you are swift and strong. You shall move me to yonder place." Driving his black nails into the hide of a furry mammoth, lying with all four legs extended upon his victim's back, steadied by a prehensile tail lapped round the creature's flanks, man started upon his first ride—his first essay in vicarious locomotion—and from that moment his supremacy over all the beasts of the field was assured. Thence came his conquest of nature, and his diffusion through the world; thence Alexandrine invasions, and passages of the Alps, charges of light brigades, the rapturous applause of Derby winners, and man the sum and crown of things.

Many and various are the fellow-creatures which he has impressed to aid his transport. By lashing himself to the neck of the giraffe, he avoids sliding over its tail; by fastening a step on each side of the horse, he clambers on its back and retains a fairly upright posture; by constructing a platform upon the elephant, he stalks through the land as on a conning-tower at sea, and he has taught the elephant neither to break his master's head against overhanging branches, nor to include him in the tepid shower drawn up through its nose from an internal reservoir to refresh the dusty way. Balanced upon the swaying hillocks of a camel, man ventures across the ocean of sand, defying the seasickness which has earned for the camel its title to be called the ship of the desert. Strength of spine and the disposition of cast-iron slaves have saved the horse and the ass from the extinction due to their antediluvian forms and solid hoofs. The rolling ox is the charger of Central Africa, and since the silly ostrich chose to run instead of fly, man has fitted a bridle to its beak.

It was a cunning thought that suggested to man thus to become a parasite of movement, to walk with knee-joints not his own, to assume the Centaur until he was thrown, and to deem a king dishonored in his statue unless the bronze sufficed for a horse as well. But next to this thought, man's subtlest invention in his endeavor to console himself for the loss of flight has been the wheel. The wheel is of the same divine order of inspiration as the Promethean gift of fire or the sublime convolution of successive sounds by which the sons of apes have rivalled the choiring of the birds and spheres. Harnessed to wheels, lions and panthers have drawn the gods made in man's image; horses have collected Olympic dust and sped the scythed chariot through the crops of war; oxen still drag the spiked wagon of Eastern peasants on axles revolving whole; zebras once bore beauty to the shops of Regent-street; goats delight man's young on Margate sands; and a woman and a dog together trot the milk-cans round in France. Attached to wheels, a steaming kettle will outrun the wind and whirl us in its wake, indifferent to the proximity of the grave; ignited oil bears vulgarity's superman through a stricken countryside; and the nursemaid lightly pushes the perambulator of the twins. On wheels we writhe like snakes beneath the surface, we outstrip the guides upon the Silver Horns, and stand stock-still in County Clare.

Our fathers set two wheels in line, and, balanced as on a razor's edge, they sped downhill upon the hobby-horse. We added crank, chain, and pedal, and the cycle bears us along the level and up the hills besides. But time would fail to narrate all the many devices that man has elaborated to spare his legs and compensate him for unfledged arms. The elk that draws his sledge he calls a reindeer, as though God made it to be driven; and the faithful dogs that drag him to the Pole are eaten, instead of feasted, for their reward. Strapped to long walking-sticks, man stalks like a flamingo over the sandhills of Biscay. Binding boards to the soles of his feet, he leaps like a goat, rushing down Norwegian snows, and the inhabitants of Dunge Ness waddle over their shingle like the duck-billed platypus. Nor is it only birds and beasts that are imitated by our aping race. For want of fins, the savage sits astride a log and paddles over the unbreathable water with a flattened stick; university students gasp at Mortlake; and "Dreadnoughts" are propelled by a fish's tail. "White wings, they never grow weary," cries the sailor in the only beautiful line that popular songs have given us in twenty years, but the sail of Ulysses came nearer the model of a nautilus than a seagull, and, though the submarine may be called a clumsy parody on the Northern Diver, no naval constructor has yet approached the combined mechanism of the flying-fish.

At this moment there is among us in London a human being who has wagered to encircle the globe by a million means of motion. He seems a man of all-round-the-world talent, for he proposes to hop, skip, jump, skate, ski, ride, drive, walk on his hands, swim, slide down the bannisters, and do 999,990 other things upon his way. Were not his purpose to keep himself alive, we should suppose such a method of spending the brief interval of this earthly existence indicated a mind diseased. But is he not, after all, the mere epitome and emblem of mankind in our secular craving to recover the power of the bird and be in two places at once? The better half of man's ingenuity has been expended on aids to movement, and more than on Platonic philosophies he prides himself on the comfort and rapidity with which he can go somewhere else. And now a new crisis in that long endeavor has arrived. After the desire of prehistoric ages and the toil of unnumbered generations, after the most delicate employment of mechanism and subtle calculations of the invisible forces that bind the stars together, one or two men of dauntless courage and heroic persistence have accomplished the movement of a card that you toss against the wind. We extol M. Blériot, we feast and reward him, we flock in thousands to gape at his machine; and it is no wonder, for he has restored to mankind some remote semblance of the lost faculty we have been so long seeking to regain. With whirring motors and an infinite elaboration of planes and angles he has done at great peril what an eagle does daily without a visible movement of its silent pinions, what a swift does a thousand times an evening with screams of delight, and a tomtit by cheerful flapping of its tiny feathers. On the strength of feats like these, man rightly calls himself the paragon of animals; but what does an albatross call him when it sees him fly?

THE SPEECH OF THE IRISH PEASANTRY.

> "An old woman, at least eighty, was seated on a stone, cowering over a few sticks burning feebly in what had once been a right noble and cheerful hearth; her side glance was towards the doorway as I entered, for she had heard my footsteps, I stood still, and her haggard glance rested upon my face. 'Is this your house, mother?' I demanded, in the language which I thought she could best understand. 'Yes, my own house, my own house, the house of the broken-hearted . . my own house, the beggar's house, the accursed house of Cromwell."

The passage is from "Lavengro." The phrase used by the old Irish-speaking woman is memorable in a book that contains many memorable phrases. Here Borrow is true to the dignity that is always in the heartfelt speech of the Irish people. Anyone who knows the peasantry could recall phrases of their making to go beside the one that Borrow has recorded. The writer went into a house where a quarrelling couple lived. There was silence when he entered, but the atmosphere was still tense. "What is the matter with you, Nora?" he said to the woman. She answered with a single phrase that was like a line of tragic poetry. "There is an old devil eating the flesh off me." Outside the man made an apology. "I'm running the four winds of the world striving to get them bread. I would not know why the people were dressed nor when the holidays came, I'd be that bent to the hardship."

Along the Gaelic districts, speech in English is neither abundant nor picturesque. The English language has come through the newspapers and the school-books, and it has received little temperamental coloring. When they wish to express something that is intimate, the old people turn from English to Irish. A vigorous English is spoken in the Irish Midland Counties. "Did you know such a person?" the writer said to an old man who was breaking stones by the roadside. "Did I know him? Do I known my own oul' shirt? Ay, I know him as well as I know bread!" It was an answer that might be given by one of the popular characters in the Arabian Nights, by the fisherman or the porter. With their descriptive power goes a fine sense of style. "The water of that well. . . . When the sun would be splitting the flags the coldness of it would shiver the teeth in your head." The people have a remarkable power of illustration. Describing the night of the great wind, a man said, "It was a wind to blow the world out." You saw the poor little world flickering like a candle. Of a child that was self-contained a woman said, "Maggie's one in herself. She wouldn't be 'put out' (perplexed or embarrassed) if she saw you coming down the road with horns on you." When the same child attempted to make the sign of the cross with her two hands a man said, "She's like a dog at a rat-hole, striving to take it right and left." A fine impression of a yell is given by their phrase, "He let a red roar out of him." Of an adventure, such as going to the agent's to get the rent reduced, they say, "It is like going down to hell to take law against the devil." They can improvise little proverbs, "A borrowed horse should have hard hoofs," "Money was made round to go round." They have expressions that seem to have been invented by literary people in imitation of folk-speech. The people actually say, "She's as sweet as the heather," "The dread never left their hearts nor their eyes," "You're like the flowers that grow up—everything is welcome to you." Naturally, they think little of poetry written in the language they use. A countryman said, "No good ballads are made now; the people that make the songs haven't the language." Against his own vigorous and picturesque speech he set this ideal of poetic diction:—

> "Like Hercules, undaunted, he did them oppose,
> But being far from his friends, in the midst of his foes,
> And having no armour, no sword, and no shield,
> At length valiant Reilly was forced for to yield."

A contribution to the study of the Irish dialect of English appeared in the April and May numbers of the "Fortnightly Review." The writers, Miss Hayden and Professor Hartog, show that the dialect is naturally formed and logically constructed, that every deviation from the standard tongue has its reason and its explanation. Many idioms in the Irish dialect are survivals from the Gaelic: "I saw him and he coming down the road." According to the writers in the "Fortnightly," the use of "and" in this way survives from Old Irish. "I am after writing a letter" is a sentence puzzling to a non-Irish person. The speaker does not mean that he is in train to write a letter; he means that he has just written one. The majority of Irish people regard the use of "after" in this way as logical and right; they will be surprised to learn that Sir John Rhys, not finding the form in any other Indo-European language, is inclined to believe that it came into Irish as a literal translation from some pre-Aryan tongue. Perhaps the writers in the "Fortnightly Review" have not dealt sufficiently with another interesting tense in the Irish-English dialect. In reply to the query, "Does it rain here?" the native says, "It bees raining," or "It does be raining." The native is striving to get an exactitude that is possible in Gaelic. As the student of O'Growney knows, there are three different ways of saying in Irish "Edward is a Ruler." The use of the first form would imply that Edward was born a ruler, the second that Edward became a ruler, while the third would convey the idea that Edward rules intermittently. The verb in the third form corresponds in sound with the English "be," hence "bees" and "does be" are used in Irish-English as a frequentative tense, thus: "He bees lame in the winter," or "He does be a cripple in the winter."

The faculty of expression is part of the Gaelic genius; it develops in a country where there is no great pressure of affairs, where the intellect is at the service of the imagination rather than of the practical will; it is fostered by an environment created by a highly-developed social sense. "Isn't my wife a well-discoursed woman?" said a young farmer, speaking of one in whom the social and literary sentiment had run to seed. His father made answer: "She thinks she's as famed for her conversation as Daniel O'Connell, but there's as much heed given to her as to the dog barking on my ditch outside."

The energy and the extravagance of the people's language is well reproduced in the dialogue of Mr. Synge's plays. Here is a speech from "The Playboy of the Western World":—

> "It is that you'd be saying surely if you had seen him and he after drinking for weeks, rising up in the red dawn, or before it maybe, and going out into the yard as naked as an ash tree in the moon of May, and shying clods against the visage of the stars, till he'd put the fear of death into the bonavs and the screeching sows."

Mr. Synge's dialogue is not a transcription; it is a re-creation. There is a selection of words and phrases. Gaelic idioms unused in English are boldly translated. All the speeches are in the same rhythm. Mr. Synge's dialogue is a splendid convention; it is related to the language of the cabin as the dialogue in Oscar Wilde's comedies is related to the language of the drawing-room. Of all writers of Irish dialogue, Carleton is nearest to absolute authenticity, and the speech that Carleton records is vigorous and dramatic. "We'll decide it now," says the brother of a girl to her lover, in one of the stories of the faction fights; "we'll decide it now. I'm as good a man as you, O'Callaghan. And let me whisper it in your ear. You'll never warm the one bed with Rose while God is in his heaven. It's past that now. There can be nothing but blood between us."

HISTORY BY PAGEANT.

On a pleasant lawn, flanked with trees, and closed in, save for a glimpse of ancient windows and towers beyond, by beautiful ruined mouldings of old grey stone, silvered over with decay, stand two long lines of singers, chanting to the occupants of a Grand Stand the eternal song of Hope and Memory. Memory (in blue and white) sings in appropriate bass of the things buried in "æonian sleep," while Hope (in orange and yellow) lightly invokes the golden train of years to come. Memory, with venerable beard and air, suggests, as well he may, a measure of ruth. Hope, in jerkin and hose, is full of pleasure in the joys to come. Both unite to chant, like Virgil, the founding of a City, the great northern City of York. Presently their voices cease, and as the two divisions of the chorus break up, we look across the lawn, and see the earliest dwellers in "Caer Ebrauc." They are the skin-clad Brigantes living in hive-like huts, and slaying each other and their foes with ineffectual flint implements. Enter from near the Abbey walls a band of warriors, glistening in casques and armor of bronze. They are Ebrauc and his gallant comrades from Troy, scions of old Anchises' line. They teach the simple Brigantes the value of gold, and their daughters the charms of ornament and the delights of marriage (not unknown to their male descendants) with well-to-do strangers. Their colloquy over, the huts disappear mysteriously, rising from the ground with a vision of modern legs moving beneath them. British Queens, at once falser and less fair than Boadicea, and betrayed and hunted British warriors, shadowed by the eagles of the world-conquering legions, take their place. History and civilisation have begun; York is launched—through seven episodes and seventy times seven scenes—on her long road to greatness, culminating, a little mysteriously, with the successful siege of the Roundheads in 1644.

On her way she certainly seems to have come across a great deal of stirring human history. Here come the great Romans—Hadrian and his wall; Severus and his sons; Constantine and his mother, Helena. Severus died and was quite possibly buried in York; Constantius died there too; his son, Constantine, passed from it on the shoulders of his legionaries to tread his long and bloody path to the purple. The temptation to make much of Constantine has proved too great for the scholarly organisers of the pageant. So we have the sagacious opportunist, of whom Gibbon wrote that "as he gradually advanced in the knowledge of truth, he proportionably declined in the practice of virtue," elevated to the character of the Christian hero, and the famous legend of the conquering sign of the cross transferred from the plains of Italy to the forests of Britain. According to Gibbon, "the devotion of Constantine was more peculiarly directed to the Sun, the Apollo of Greek and Roman mythology"—a devotion barely closing with his death. But the authors of the York pageant suggest an earlier and less interested leaning to Christian evidences. Christian bishop and priest of Apollo set out before him the ever-warring doctrines of the two creeds. The one preaches vengeance, the other pity. Constantine inclines to Bishop Eborius. "If your teaching is true," he exclaims, "Apollo can wait. But if his be true, I cannot wait." History tells us that he waited thirty years.

The pageant is on surer ground when it deals with the early Christian scholars and doctors of Northumbria. In these York and the North were rich. Paulinus, Aidan, Alcuin, Hilda, Abbess of Whitby—a kind of she-St. Patrick, sworn enemy of snakes—all have their place. Later come the feuds between the old and the new orders, and the long, inconclusive struggle for the mastery of Yorkshire between Saxon princes and Danish marauders. Close on their heels march the figures and fighters of Kingsley's "Hereward," Waltheof, Edwin and Morcar, the two Godwins, and the great conqueror of them all, William. One hero follows another so quickly that, as the dead Siward is borne off to the solemn music of the lyke-wake dirge, the chanting nuns are almost jostled by Tostig and his housecarles. The pageant moves faster even than life, and we are in the Middle Ages almost as we lose sight of Harold's queen galloping off after her hapless lord to the field of Senlac.

The scenes which follow are the most brilliant of the pageant. The details of heraldry have been thought out in more than a year's toilsome search and rehearsal. The blazoning on shields and standards, the coloring of the banners of the guilds, the head-dresses of queens and ladies, all the bright adornment of those glittering "beasts of prey," as Mr. Coulton calls them, who ravaged and sported through that childish world—even the bells and ribbons of the gay little morris dancers, delighting in their part—are as like the old models as the scholarship of city and county and Minster can make them. Descendants of famous Yorkshire families have helped to revive the glories of the past. Lord and Lady Garnock play Richard Crookback and his queen—Shakespeare's hapless Anne. A Fairfax gallops into York, accoutred like the great Sir Thomas, to receive the city's surrender after Prince Rupert has flashed away from the stunning blow of Marston Moor. All that York's pride in her past can invoke of the historic sense has been done to illustrate York's and Yorkshire's part in the tale of England's martyrs, heroes, wars, passions, deaths for the wrong cause, deaths for the right cause, alternate embracings of truth and error, good and bad. So we canter pleasantly through Middle and Reformation and Puritan England, to the accompaniment of Cathedral music. York survives it all. The weakest of the Edwards and the worst of the Plantagenets woo her; bluff King Hal raves at her; Charles and Cromwell fight for her. But she lives to receive the filial kiss of New York, and a score of little Imperial Yorks besides, as she stands enthroned in the finale of the pageant, with the kings and queens, maids and horseboys, of twenty centuries at her feet.

It was interesting to see how a homely, vivid piece of acting and some bye-play of human story, culled from the Chronicles, lit up the long procession of capital incidents. Hugh, an early citizen of York, paid for his pig with heathen coins, which were a sin for a Christian man to touch, or Nigel, the pompous Mayor, pestered by girls of the period for places in the tournament (true mothers these of the suffragettes), made the pageant live more than a dozen solemn parleys of kings and bishops, knights and men-at-arms. Would not these splendid photographs have been more human still if they had been fixed more on the life of the times and the people—the pilgrims, pardoners, singers, friars, merchants, jugglers, peasants, bandits, who fared among the streets and roads and alehouses of old England—and less on the figures whom history blazons as her masters? These the critic and censor alone discover for us; with Chaucer's and Langland's lantern we peer for a moment through the veil that covers the unreturning past. But for most Englishmen such books are sealed; and for thousands of them the pageant is their first real dive into the abyss of time, the first treasure of Memory (in blue and white) and Hope (in orange and yellow) they have plucked from it.

THE SECRET RACE.

On a mild autumn afternoon I was seated alone in a remote portion of Kensington Gardens. The west was aflame through a thin gauze of mist, and the broad plane-tree leaves were dropping thickly around. The promenaders upon the path skirting the water were few in number, though varied both in class and nationality. Sitting idly absorbed, I felt my arm seized. A man who had been seated at the other end of the seat was speaking to me in low, level tones.

"I want you," he said, "to look well at the man who is approaching us." I started, glanced at the speaker, and then at the man upon whom his gaze was fixed. "He is one of a race," my companion went on, "which of late I believe to be growing more numerous. They are to be found in all the great capitals of Europe. I myself have seen his kind in Paris, in Vienna, and in Berlin. Apparently they live like the Jews, dispersed through every nation, but unlike the Jews, or like some of them, they conceal their identity and appear to be unclassified by the ethnologist. They seem to have escaped his notice because they happen to emanate from every European country, and each to possess the physical traits of the various catalogued races from which he springs. But look more closely. Is there not something distinctive, something individual, in that man's aspect, which has totally escaped the notice of your scientific wiseacre satisfied with observing the shape of men's skulls and the proportionate length of their backbones?" Again the nervous hand closed upon my arm.

"You see," he whispered, with greater eagerness. "Here comes another. They have some kind of common understanding with each other. This man, one can see, has an assignation with the other of his kind. They have just met, and are coming back together. Now, observe these two faces and forms, and tell me, is there not something abnormal in their aspect, something which marks these two men as utterly cut off from the rest of our human kind?" The man's excitement had communicated itself to my blood. I thrilled under his touch, and my whole mind was absorbed in marking the features of the men who were approaching.

One, the shorter of the two, was fair, and possessed the rough, ill-fashioned features not uncommon in the Northern lowlands. It was a face rudely cut, with high cheekbones and deep-set eyes, and yet possessing a certain massive and imposing harmony. The other was tall and dark, and handsome in a hawk-like way, and had a face the nose of which at the bridge seemed about to burst its overstrained envelope of skin. The chin was firm and round and strongly indented, and the jawbone in its powerful curve seemed almost to become visible in the boldness of its salience.

They belonged to totally different types, and to the ordinary observer there was nothing very unusual in their appearance. Seen singly, either might have passed without attracting special notice; but, seen together, as I now saw them, a singular and altogether unfamiliar effect was produced upon my mind. The two were somehow strangely alike. It was a resemblance obviously neither of family nor of human race. It seemed to run deeper than either, and to dwell rather in the spirit than in the flesh. In spite of their utter diversity of feature, it was irresistibly borne in upon me that the two men were really as much alike as are Chinamen or the Japanese in Western eyes. And the resemblance was both fascinating and repugnant.

In the first place, their expression was strangely inhuman. They struck me as the faces of men through whose brains anxiety and remorse—those twin maladies of the soul—had never passed. The complexion of the face, too, seemed somehow too pure and unblemished for men of their years. One of them was laughing heartily. Both faces were lit with vitality and animation as they talked gaily to each other. But when for a moment silence intervened, without in any way losing the color of high health, they fell into a strange deadness in expression, as if the souls of each had become petrified or were withdrawn. It is impossible properly to describe and sum up the effect these men produced upon my mind during those few moments I could observe them, but the idea suggested to me was that the inhuman look must have been due fundamentally to a certain air of effortlessness.

As compared with these two, all other men and women I had seen, even the most joyous, seemed to possess a strange, but essentially human, watched or even hunted look, of which in these there was never a trace.

As we two upon the seat sat absorbed and silent, watching them, one of the men shot a glance at my companion as they approached. It was a glance which sent an uneasy shiver through my body. It was a look of mingled contempt and derision, of haughty superiority and concentrated hate. It passed, however, in a moment, and the man's face resumed once more its strange, fixed, waxen look of effortless ease and power and triumphant satisfaction with the world. But he and his companion, instead of seating themselves, as they had evidently intended, passed on in silence, and finally disappeared from view. I had now time to look at the man on the seat beside me. He was a middle-aged man with resolute features. He had a pointed white beard and rimless spectacles, and from his dress might well have been an Englishman. His accent, however, sounded foreign to my ear.

"Who are they?" I asked, a little breathlessly.

"One of these men," said my companion, "is a famous surgeon; the other, one of our most illuminating writers on social reform. He likewise lectures on ethics. And yet I tell you these men are as utterly different from you and me as the dead are from the living."

"But what do you mean?" I asked hastily. "The men are certainly alive."

"Yes, yes, yes," said the foreigner earnestly. "They are alive all right, and living flesh and blood, but —but—" Here he broke off for a moment, and looked at me doubtfully. "There is something in these people," he resumed at length, solemnly—"I have watched them often now—which pertains to death. I alone know what that is. But I can assure you of this, that they know each other instinctively in whatever country they may be, that they protect and assist each other secretly; and I tell you they are growing in strength. The future is with them—all human progress—the realisation of a perfected society."

My companion ceased to speak, and was now sitting with rigid face and fixed eyes gazing into space, almost as if some strange scene was being enacted before him. Horrified, I waited for him to speak again, but he remained silent and seemed to think the conversation ended. I touched him on the shoulder. "But who, in God's name, were they? Who are these dreadful people?"

My companion looked at me in amazement. "But, my God, have I not told you," he cried wildly, "do you not understand?

"These men have got no consciousness, no freedom, no souls. Mind and free will are one; in these they have become a superfluity, and passed away. Behind these masks of living flesh the brain clock works, the unconscious figures smile and speak and work and know not wherefore. There is no 'I' to know it. That strange imponderable fragment of reality, which sees and knows and hampers us, is absent from their skulls. These are the Perfectly Efficient, the Overmen." We sat in silence together for a time. I felt a little sick with loathing.

Then my companion spoke again. "My friend," he said sadly, "do not tell anyone what you have seen, for they will think you mad, as they do me. Good-bye."

I took his hand and rose quickly, and hurried away; it was not good for me to remain. And so for the last time I saw him sitting there, his grey head, touched with the red glow of the setting sun, resting upon his hands, a moving picture of sorrow.

THE ANTI-WAR MOVEMENT IN SPAIN.

SIR,—Who is primarily responsible for the present Spanish campaign in the Riff mountains: the Spanish, the French, or the English Government? Let me put this question in the columns of your paper before your influential readers. No other question is to-day more important for my country.

The campaign, as you already know through the telegrams published in English papers and dated from Madrid, Barcelona, and San Sebastian, is intensely unpopular in Spain. The Spanish correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" did not exaggerate the national feeling in saying from San Sebastian (July 23rd, 1909): "I may remark as a fact worthy of note that I have been unable to find a single person who is in favor of a war with the Kabyles. Everybody is unanimous in declaring that a campaign would have no object, and would be disastrous to the national interests." San Sebastian is the fashionable summer residence of the Court, the Government and the rich classes. Had he written from any other place his words would have been still stronger. The Socialist party has practically stopped all propaganda in order to stir up the country against the war. The Republicans declare ("El Pais," July 20th) they are going to expel from their party any individual who favors the war, even by keeping silent. The Basque Nationalists, all clericals and conservatives, are unanimous against the war. So are the Catalanists of the left. The most widely read of the moderate papers, "La Correspondencia de España," wrote before the embarkment of the troops: "We should neither waste a man nor a peseta in Morocco. To go to Morocco is to court revolution." Nine-tenths of the Press is entirely set against the war. But the cry "Down with the war!" is not political; it comes spontaneously from the people. In Barcelona, when the steamer "Cataluña" was leaving, the enormous crowds on the wharves cried "Down with the war!" and the soldiers replied, "Down with the war!" from the deck of the ship. In Madrid the Government has tried to avoid hostile manifestations by moving the troops at three and four o'clock in the morning; but the crowds did not sleep all night, in order to be able to repeat their cry before the soldiers left. The Home Secretary has said: "It looks as if Madrid had become an effeminate town." But the cry against the war is not effeminate. People cry manfully: "Guerra a la guerra" (War against the war!). One paper says the agitation is of an anti-militarist character. But the crowds cry: "Long live the Army! Down with the war!"

It is true the "Times" correspondent has said (July 26th): "In view of mischievous reports circulating abroad, it is necessary to say that public opinion here is not opposed to the war." But the truth of this statement is qualified by this other statement which appears in the same page, column, day, and paper, written by the same correspondent, and printed only sixty lines below: "The expedition is not more popular than before . . . ."

Now, what are the causes of this unpopularity? Partly, obviously, the old mistake of employing troops recruited by conscription in Colonial affairs; partly the special kind of conscription we have got in Spain where rich and middle-class recruits redeem themselves from service by paying £60 to the Treasury, and throw the whole burden on the shoulders of the poor. Partly because in the eleven years of self-analysis we have had since the absurd war with the United States the intellectual classes of Spain have arrived at this conclusion, that what is needed for Spain is peace, for in all our troubled history it is what has always been lacking. We must have peace (they say) in order that the force of intellect may take its rightful place, hitherto usurped by emotion and overwhelmed by floods of blind opinion. Because our common sense tells us that there is nothing to gain in a campaign in the desolate, waterless, treeless mountains of the Riff, and we should waste on it the money we want for the colonisation of the barren deserts of our own land. But above mere practical considerations (for our moral conscience is awakening at the same time as our intelligence) we feel that the Moors are our brothers, and that this war is both immoral and unjust. Also because the people of Spain look upon this expedition as a business whose purpose is to secure the interests of the shareholders in the Riff mines. "We are going to promote the Beni-bu-ifrur mines!" exclaimed a reservist on board the "Cataluña." The Liberal ex-Minister, Sr. Villanuerra, has said that the massacre of the four Spanish workmen in the mines was arranged beforehand by the Company. "The Government, neglecting my sound counsels, and obeying pressure from Paris, opened the hinterland of Melilla to the French Mining Company, and so provoked the actual events." But, above all reasons, the war is unpopular because it is not our war; the Spanish people are convinced that the war has been forced upon the Spanish Government by foreign Powers.

Don Joaquin Costa, one of our greatest writers, says again and again that the culprit is England, "la pèrfida Inglaterra." Don Genaro Alas, our military critic, says that the Spanish Government "is not free in this question." It is a known fact that the Conservative Prime Minister, Sr. Maura, has resisted during more than two years diplomatic pressure to start the campaign; thanks to him we only sent a few soldiers two years ago to accompany the French expedition to Casa Blanca. And now, when we ask why the Government is forcing this war upon our people and the Kabyles, we get the same reply from the rare supporters of the campaign: "International obligations," says "El Universo." "Europe, not ourselves," says "A. B. C." Europe in this case means England, as England was the power which placed Morocco in French and Spanish hands.

It is not the first time the name of England serves to cover an unpopular action of our Government. We are still asking why our Government is going to spend two hundred million pesetas that we want so badly for elementary schools and works of irrigation to buy ironclads of 14,000 tons which are old and useless even before they are finished. The partisans of this naval policy tell us that England wants us to buy a fleet as a reward for the Anglo-Spanish entente. As regards the fleet, both the "Manchester Guardian" and the "Times" have said that they cannot understand Spanish policy. Nor are we old supporters of the Anglo-Spanish entente able to believe that the English Government has the slightest interest in making us buy a fleet and fight an unpopular war. What advantage can she possibly obtain by this policy? She does not want our ships for a war, and she gains nothing by ruining Spain and the Riff by this campaign. Everybody knows that the conquest of Morocco is an expensive and difficult business. When France found it so, her bellicose mood was considerably chastened. When England found that the diversion of French forces would only weaken her hands in Europe, she has ceased to force the invasion of Morocco upon the French Republic. What interest can England have in making us conquer the wildest and poorest and fiercest part of Morocco?

We know that we have to pay something for the security we receive from the entente with England. Let us develop quietly our own lands, our own mines, and our own minds. We cannot be a naval Power for many generations, as we cannot improvise a fit personnel for modern ships, but we might be able in a few years to organise a good army. We could then be useful to France and therefore to England, if it is not found possible to meet every emergency by a Pan-European entente.

But, notwithstanding those reasons, the mass of Spanish opinion believes blindly that our actual policy in Morocco is dictated by the English Government, as, it believed, was the acquisition of the fleet. In the same way it attributes to the English sympathies of our Court the increase of luxurious living, of sport, of motor cars and of yachts, things that our aristocracy is too poor to afford, and which would inevitably entail political corruption to meet the enhanced cost of life in Spain.

If there is no truth in the statement that our actual policy in Morocco is dictated by England, Mr. Editor, tell us so with your authority. We may then say to our Government: "It is not England, it is you." If there is some truth in it, we, the Spanish friends of England, may always go on pointing out to our people that besides the world of idle sport, of useless ships and futile wars, there is an England of culture and social reform. But why do you English Liberals make our task so difficult for us?—Yours, &c.,

Correspondent of "La Correspondencia de España," of Madrid.

THE WORKING OF THE LAND TAXES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you kindly explain one portion of your interesting article on "The Working of the Land Taxes." You give an illustration. "Land exists (for example) in the neighborhood of a village. Its agricultural value is, say, £50 an acre. Through a rise in prices it goes up to £100 an acre. Meantime, its value for building continues small—there being no demand for building expansion—say, £40 an acre. That is its site value—a value for prospective building purposes, quite apart from its agricultural value—which the site would sell for, quite apart from its agricultural uses."

May I suggest that if there is "no demand," there cannot be any price? We have surely been taught that price depends on the relation between demand and supply.

In the next place, is it possible to have two sale prices for the same article at the same moment of time? If your agricultural value goes to £100, can your site value rise to £60, seeing there must necessarily be no sellers—that is,

"no supply"—at the lower price? If there is any "demand" for building land, it can only be met by paying the higher agricultural value, and this therefore is the site value. So, too, as it seems to me, if the land of that village has a building value of £150, nobody will sell that land for agriculture at £100; for there being an effective demand at £150 (whatever the purpose)—and if there is no effective demand, there is no present value—to sell at £100 would be to give away £50.

Finally, you state "the principle of the increment tax" as "one of extreme simplicity. . . In case of any subsequent increase of value of any portion of that land (the land of the British Isles) which is not due to the industry and exertion of the individual owning that land, one-fifth goes to the services of the State." But in your illustration you assume that, "through a rise in prices," the value of the agricultural land of your village, from being £50, "goes up to £100 an acre." Is this rise in price "due to the industry and exertion of the individual owning that land," or is the very simple principle stated by you by no means the principle of the increment tax? If the rise in prices is due to the industry and exertion of the individual owning the land, does not this infer that he has entered into a combination with other owners to force up prices? If so, is that an exertion which should excuse him from the payment of any tax? If the rise is not due to his industry and exertion, as it is evident that the community does actually pay the extra prices—whereas the "rise" in the "site value" may be merely a surveyor's estimate, or guess, which nobody pays—is it not at least as reasonable (if at all) that the increment tax should be applied to agricultural land?

In the case you put, you try to make a distinction between the agricultural value of £100 and the non-agricultural value of £150, and you say that the land "would then pay—on its non-agricultural value—the difference between its present site value for building (£150) and its previous site value for building (£40). An increment of £110—an increment duty of £22." But if, as you suggest in this sentence, there is an actual agricultural value of £100, and for some reason in compulsory sale this land is sold at the agricultural value—and, as I have suggested, if there can be no sale at the agricultural value, then there is no such value—this increment duty of £22, being paid by the seller, must necessarily come out of the agricultural price (£100) which he receives. Supposing you argue, that if he sold for £100—this being the agricultural value—he could not be charged any increment on account of the building value, then what comes of the increment site tax in this case, seeing that ex hypothesi the site value, as declared by the tax commissioners and their surveyors, has gone up to £150? My point in this connection is that only the actual sale will give a complete valuation, and that in such a sale the value must be either agricultural or non-agricultural and cannot by any possibility be both. I put this case because, as it seems to me, this part of your argument rests upon a confusion in terms, and I am sure that nothing is further from your wish than to state an argument unfairly.

The question as to valuation is distinct from these. But is there any really fair valuation in all cases—possibly there is in some—save an actual purchase transaction? At the present moment the City of Leeds is in arbitration with a neighboring landowner for the purchase of 600 acres. The expert valuers for the owner—all of them men of honor and experience and good judgment—put the value at about £235,000, while the valuers for the Corporation—equally honorable and experienced—think £32,000 a top price. The difference does not suggest simplicity in estimating the increment.—Yours, &c.,

LEODENSIS.

Leeds, July 24th, 1909.

[The able and interesting letter of "Leodensis" reveals the difficulty of attempting explanations in a condensed form of matters of some complication. There are three chief points to which an answer may be useful.

(1) Can a piece of land have an agricultural value of, say, £100 an acre and a building value of £40 an acre? Certainly; though we should perhaps have said "prospective" building value. This is the value which it would fetch in the market quite apart from the operations of agriculture: the value for possible future building, even if to-day it were a blackened waste. It is an "entity" entirely familiar to surveyors and valuers in the neighborhood of the big towns; and it may be there, even although there is—as we said—no demand at the moment for building expansion. It may rise—with the increase of the prospect of an effective demand for building—until it overlaps the agricultural demand. It represents the growth of, and demand for, an alternative use of the land: for, when building commences, the agricultural value disappears.

That "building value" represents a hidden demand which appears in the capital value, but not in the rent. "Leodensis" is perfectly correct in asserting that land with a value of £150 will not sell for £100. But land which "will not sell" for much more than £150 may have an "agricultural value" (deducible from the capitalisation of the agricultural rental) of only £100.

(2) "Leodensis" asserts that a rise in prices which drives up the price of agricultural land from £50 to £100 is not due to the industry and exertion of the individual and hence should be subject to the increment tax. We think he has misunderstood our use of "prices." By that term we meant prices of agricultural produce in the open market: he takes it as a rise in the "prices" of land, due to a combination of owners. If he means that agricultural increment—i.e., a general increase—in the value of land, due to failure of foreign harvests or the imposition of a tariff, is essentially "unearned" increment, we entirely agree with him, and think that such an increase might legitimately be included in the increment tax. In fact, the only argument against its inclusion is the plea ad misericordiam—i.e., that agricultural landlords have been nearly ruined by the great fall in prices in the past forty years.

(3) He states (what, indeed, is well known) that large discrepancies generally exist between the estimate of the valuer employed by the buyer and that of the valuer employed by the seller. That seems to us the strongest of all arguments for a universal State valuation, conducted throughout the country upon a systematic and uniform plan.—ED., NATION.]

"A REVOLUTION IN EDUCATION."

SIR,—We are all, I think, glad of the opportunity offered by the columns of THE NATION of considering "without heat and haste" the difficulty of the present situation. As I ventured to open the correspondence, may I try to make my position as clear as Mr. Wallas has now made his? I do not think it is really antagonistic, though I may be looking more sanguinely to the "freer atmosphere of a ten years hence" than he is, and there is one point at least I wish to criticise. As I said in my first letter, I hold no brief for the present system of religious instruction. Still less do I wish to be understood as advocating "compulsory religion" which, with a celebrated Canon, I find a difficulty in distinguishing from no religion at all. With Mr. Wallas's specific proposal, moreover, to reduce the number of hours of religious instruction from four or five to one or two per week I find myself in hearty agreement. It is where he adds that "the immediate result would be that the instruction would be specialised" that I sincerely hope he is wrong. This, I think, would be a grievous educational misfortune, and it is because I desire to carry reasonable undenominationalists with me in this contention that I venture to add a postscript to my first letter. The article in this week's issue on the "Future of Cowper-Templeism" opens with the statement that "what we have to deal with is broadly the effect of the Higher Criticism on that undenominational Biblical instruction which has been given since 1870 under the Cowper-Temple clause." I believe that so long as we confine our attention to this aspect of the question we shall never truly understand the situation. It will remain to us, as it does to Mr. Wallas, a matter, first, of denomination and specialisation; next, probably (and, I think, naturally and rightly), of exclusion. We seem to have before us a far wider question—nothing less than the possibility, the value for human life, of what the article calls "spiritual religion" itself. I know these questions are not for a journalistic correspondence, but no helpful result can come of the present discussion unless we keep them clearly before our minds. Taking for granted that the nation's mind is set on maintaining at all hazards as the basis of education belief in the reality of the unseen and the spiritual as interpreted, not by religious philosophers, but by the greatest of the poets and the ethical teachers of all time, how, we ask, can it best be made a part of the national system? What is the best preparation of the teacher for the task of transmitting it to the coming generation? If this or anything like it is the real problem before us, three things, I submit, at once follow. That Biblical instruction is only important as one (if withal the greatest) of the traditionally and, in the judgment of so good a witness as Professor Huxley, reasonably approved methods of moral and religious education. (2) With the right use of this instrument "academic instruction" in the results of the Higher Criticism has little or nothing to do. What is wanted is not that the teacher should know whether St. Paul wrote the Pastoral Epistles, or whether he ever wrote anything at all, but that he should be able to see in the ideas of the Pauline books and in the other more inspired portions of Scripture living parts of a great ethical and religious tradition, and to use their words as a means of inspiring and strengthening the faith in the unseen which is the essence of all the great religions of the world—places, as it were, where the veil of the sensible and obtrusive has worn thin, and the underlying truth of our world and our experience shines clearly through. It is only such a view of the teacher's preparation that holds out any hope of a "solution" of the religious difficulty. For it is only by teaching of this kind that the new generation can be carried past the sectarianisms that meantime obstruct us in the effort to set our national system of character-training on its proper basis. (3) The power I speak of is one that those responsible for the curricula of our colleges are called upon to give all teachers in training the opportunity of acquiring so far as it can be acquired, and can only by a fatal misapprehension regard as a speciality to be entrusted to a few. It was because some of us felt both the enormous importance and the enormous difficulty of such work that we did not resent as apparently we ought to have done and were even under proper safeguards prepared to welcome the issue of regulations which seemed to pledge the central department to the support of efforts which individuals might be making to supply what is so cryingly wanted. The minute may have been mistaken, but it cannot be a mistake to appeal to progressive politicians for sympathy with the view of the function of training colleges to which I have tried to give voice.

We are summoned by the article "to free ourselves from the bondage not only of the daily forty-five minutes, but also of the typical London County Council syllabus." I agree, but I would add that we free ourselves also from bondage that the idea of which those brought up in public schools and the older universities find it so difficult to rid themselves of that religious teaching means "divinity" and that the main requisite is "Biblical instruction of an academic kind."—Yours, &c.,

J. H. Muirhead.

FATHER TYRRELL'S POSITION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Although I have no right to make an explanation of Father Tyrrell's position, as one who has read all his books, I should like to answer "F. R.'s" question in your last issue.

It was essentially "a human problem" with which Tyrrell was concerned, but he did not think that he should therefore be less interested in "a domestic readjustment." Like every great thinker, he dealt with that which he knew best as his starting point for reform. The domestic was for him not separable from the human. He knew well that the problem as it stands within the Roman Church is like that of every religious organisation, but he wished the term "Modernism" to be reserved for the peculiar solution attempted by those Roman Catholics who are—in the present circumstances, unfortunately—intelligent. Other Churches, however, are faced with a similar problem, and may find a solution not unlike Modernism. Tyrrell's force would have been lost if he had tried to establish a Modernism which might be equally applicable to Islam or Positivism. But it is clear that he never lost sight of that City of God where neither sect nor nation is known—which, nevertheless, lives in and through all nations and all sects. He saw that the only true Catholicism was to be found through individual religion. He hated clericalism chiefly because it lives by vicarious religion.

His attempt has failed. The Roman authorities may now breathe a little more freely until history proves the small worth of success.—Yours, &c.,

Sir,—The best way for "F. R." to understand the late Father Tyrrell's position is to read his books. He will then discover that—quite unintentionally, I am sure—he has been guilty of an impertinence in asking whether the author was concerned "merely with a domestic readjustment or with a human problem." Indeed, it would be difficult to conceive a more human problem. For the issues raised in Father Tyrrell's books affect not only all Roman Catholics, but men of all denominations—in fact, many hundreds of millions of Christians.

"F. R.'s" difficulties are chiefly verbal. A Catholic Church is truly Catholic, not by virtue of its universal membership, but by virtue of its life and ideal. It is against the perversion of that life and ideal in the Roman Catholic Church that many of Father Tyrrell's books have been written. But his work also makes a wider appeal to all men of good faith. He was convinced that every religion can bring men near to God though they differ in their kind and degree of excellence, and though Catholicism on the whole seemed to him to comprehend what is best in all.

As for the good Positivists and Agnostics, he judged them more by their conduct than their formulated beliefs. "Often," he writes in "Oil and Wine," "one who says he does not believe in God, only repudiates a belief in some conception of God that his reason tells him is untrue or impossible; and he would only need a skilful Socrates to show him that a belief in God is knit into the very texture of his thought and life." He believed that if a man who puts truth and honor and goodness before every other claim could always disentangle his ideas, "he would find himself governed ultimately by a de-humanised, but essentially sufficient idea of God."

I hope this short letter, which is necessarily inadequate, may lead your correspondent to read more of Father Tyrrell's books. No religious writings of our time will better repay study, and they are always distinguished by a fine style and rare candor and sincerity. At the same time I would remind "F. R." that there are great men whose "position" cannot be defined as simply as a place on a map. And George Tyrrell, I believe, was one of them. He had a source and a direction to which he held with unflinching singleness of purpose in the teeth of much bitter persecution. He was for our generation a dynamic force, a great truth-seeker, and he dedicated his life to the service of the God of Truth. History and criticism may be left to define his "position."—Yours, &c.,

TAXING SUPERFLUITIES.

Sir,—I have just come across the following passage in Penn's "Fruits of Solitude" (sec. 53), which seems worth quoting in connection with the Budget discussion:—

"Were the Superfluities of a Nation valued, and made a perpetual Tax or Benevolence, there would be more Almshouses than Poor; Schools than Scholars; and enough to spare for Government besides."—Yours, &c.,

THE SUFFRAGETTES AT BYE-ELECTIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter from Mrs. Brailsford which you printed on Saturday exemplifies very charmingly the power which her sex so notably enjoys of tempering admirations with strong sense and of restraining optimism within the bounds which facts, dispassionately viewed, impose. Her enthusiasm for the stalwarts of "The Cause" and for the methods which they so tastefully employ, is founded on very thorough knowledge of them both. Her membership of the W.S.P.U. has extended over a period of seven days, and within that time she has travelled from London to Buxton and from Buxton to Dumfries. The evidence that she has gathered on her journeyings is remarkable, both in quantity and worth, and the noteworthy facts that she rightly now makes known may be summed up all too briefly in the following digest:—

(1) No one was impolite to her on the way.

(2) Two men were polite (a stationmaster and a guard).

(3) Several people discussed the suffrage question with her.

(4) Her absolutely reasonable defence of the Union's tactics confounded some who had asked "Why oppose a Liberal Government?"

(5) Some "canny Scots" at Dumfries grasped her position.

(6) A young Dumfries woman (a) had thought the Suffragettes worse than they were, (b) has joined the Union.

(7) (a) A Buxton restaurant-keeper, (b) a Buxton doctor, (c) Mr. Arthur E. Piggott, testified to positive results achieved by the Union's efforts.

Truly an astonishing accumulation of pertinent facts. But Mrs. Brailsford is not content with accumulating them. She can explain them, and she does. They are due to the oratorical ability, the business capacity, the "selfless" devotion of the members of the Women's Social and Political Union, and to the support which their enthusiasm derives from the consciousness that comrades are meantime starving in prison, "hunger-striking for the dignity of their cause." After this, Mrs. Brailsford leaves the realms of fact and soars into high planes of imaginative thought. She contemplates the possible effects of Suffragette oratory upon a group of hypothetical quarrymen, and shadows forth the feelings that they would experience "when some refined womanly woman who is addressing them suddenly begins to tell them about her arrest and imprisonment."

Now that the stationmaster and the guard, the Dumfries lady and the Buxton restaurant-keeper, the Derbyshire doctor and the conceptual quarrymen have given their evidence thus convincingly, Mrs. Brailsford asks for a verdict and sentence against the guilty Government, and proffers pardon and relief on the sole terms that it "take its head out of the sand" at once. But possibly the Government does not wish pardon and relief. Possibly it is as enamored of self-sacrifice as the members of the W.S.P.U. Possibly it would rather endure the persecution of the Union and the desertion from its colors of the Buxton restaurant-keeper and the young married woman of Dumfries, than purchase immunity at the light cost of admitting defeat before the dog-whips and the megaphones. Perhaps the Government, too, will martyr itself for the sake of its own "dignity." This is really the most interesting point in all the information that Mrs. Brailsford gives—her explanation of the "hunger-strikers'" policy as adopted "for the dignity of the cause." They starve for the dignity of their cause, and for the dignity of womanhood, no doubt, therewith; for that dignity which the Downing Street padlocks and the dog-whips at the Albert Hall, the slapped inspectors, and the bitten constables, and all the long roll of their achievements have in the past so worthily preserved. It is possible to defend these tactics of the militants on the ground that they make for notoriety, that they keep the question of the vote before the public eye (and it cannot be denied that the policemen at least are likely to remember it), and this defence is sometimes met by the reply that notoriety is not popularity, and that if you scratch a policeman you do not necessarily find a suffragist, but to the argument from dignity an adequate answer is not so easily found. I, at least, stand appalled before it, and can only regret that my conception of "dignity" is so far removed from that of Mrs. Brailsford.

It is possible, however, to say a word on the matter of the Liberal deserters of whom Mrs. Brailsford speaks. The Government has promised to do at the earliest moment all that a Government without orders from the country can dare to do for the Suffragists, and while the Budget battle is being fought, a man who does not vote for the Liberals because they have not done more than this must have ideas of proportion that are strange at least. Mrs. Brailsford should, perhaps, have asked these deserter friends (at some unguarded moment) how many brewery shares they held. That the cause of the Suffrag*ists* (differentiated from the Suffrag*ettes*) is popular in the country I do not doubt. It would be sad indeed if it were not. But is it possible to believe that Suffragettism and its methods advance that popularity? The final argument for women's suffrage is the argument from education—the argument that only by the possession of political power will women be made fit to exercise it, and it is well indeed to know how great the need for this educative process is. But to emphasise, as do the militants, their extreme unfitness for a trust is not the best way to secure its committal to them. There is a very delightful optimism in Mrs. Brailsford's letter, and her enthusiasms do her honor, but she is surely a little rash to infer from the politeness of strangers in a train, the friendliness of a railway guard, and the interest which a cart-load of clamorous feminists excites in a city at election time, that the militant tactics of the W.S.P.U. are seriously promoting the "Cause of the Vote."—Yours, &c.,

SIR,—The letter by Mrs. Brailsford in to-day's NATION is both interesting and instructive. It has all the enthusiasm and daring of the new convert without the quite unnecessary bitterness which characterises most of the suffragette utterances.

The writer tells us that the W. S. & P. U. having "every form of calumny to fight," she, armed for the fray, went down to Buxton to help. But when she arrived on the battle field she found, much to her surprise no doubt, that there wasn't an enemy—no, not a sign even of that campaign of calumny she had been led to expect by her officers at headquarters. Absolutely "nothing but courtesy, interest, and real kindness awaiting her." Exactly. There is no real enemy to the woman's movement—except the suffragette and her suicidal policy of the end justifying the means.

This policy is well expressed in their battle cry, "Keep the Liberal out." It has been very deliberately adopted, and the militants have not hesitated on every occasion to ally themselves with the forces of reaction to make it effective. This policy, it seems to me, is like a spear pointed at both ends, which always wounds the hand that wields it. With an unscrupulous and often subsidised Tory Press no programme could be more popular than that which has for its first object the "humiliation of a Liberal Government," and the Yellow Press has taken full advantage of the help offered by the W.S.P.U. Publicity in such journals, however, does not necessarily imply progress, or most of the reform movements of the day would die of starvation.

Working men, as Mrs. Brailsford reminds us, know all about strikes and starvation. They also know something about the methods of the modern Tory newspaper syndicates. Then, too, they are not entirely ignorant of the fact that smashing windows, other than one's own, means, when caught, fine or imprisonment. These persons who break windows to call attention to a grievance, and who are described by Mrs. Brailsford as "facing starvation or maybe death for their principles" are not martyrs. They are very 'cute advertising agents, who, with their cleverly posed flashlight photographs "taken by our own photographer," have nothing to learn from any publicity department of American politics.

"Votes are being turned" (not many in Buxton, by the way). Yes: mine is one, but it has been turned away from the Suffragettes and not to them. There is another side to the picture drawn by your correspondent, and it is this: Like most Liberals, I believe in woman suffrage because I believe in government by the people, but I had seen nothing of suffragette methods until I attended the great meeting in Queen's Hall in support of the Licensing Bill. What I saw and heard there, and at the subsequent Peckham election, filled me with intense disappointment and disgust. The callous want of principle displayed in that shameful alliance with the agents of the drink traffic degraded and disgraced the suffrage movement in the eyes of thinking men and women all the country over, and, I am quite sure, alienated many thousands of persons who, like myself, had been sincere well-wishers and supporters, and until that outrage has been atoned for the Suffragettes will be neither forgiven nor trusted.—Yours, &c.,

THE AMERICAN COLLEGE FOR GIRLS AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In February or March last you published a letter from a lady of educational experience who had recently visited the above institution and desired to interest English people in the useful educational work carried on by our American cousins in Armenia, Turkey, &c. The reactionary mutiny at Constantinople which occurred in April may have deterred many of your readers from following up the subject by sending contributions, as requested, to Miss Isabel Fry, 239, Marylebone Road, London, N.W.

But now that the Constitution of Turkey has recovered from that shock, and on the occasion of the presence in England of delegates from the Committee of Union and Progress, I submit that there exists a great opportunity for testifying in a non-official but practical manner our sympathy with the Young Turks' struggle for liberty and our desire to share with Americans the expense and the honor of extending facilities of education where they are greatly needed.

Miss Fry informs me as follows in reply to my inquiry as to the past and present demand for education in the Near East:—

"I was so impressed both with the character of the women who are working there and the results of their work as shown both in the tone of the pupils and in the usefulness of the lives of former students at the college, that I feel bound to try to make English people aware of the importance of keeping it going on with efficiency.

"One ex-student, a rich Armenian girl, has given up her comfortable home in Broussa and taken up life in one of the remote interior villages simply because she knew it to be one of the most wretched and forsaken communities in Asia Minor. There she is devoting herself completely to civilising, educating, and befriending the poor people, who are in a state of almost chronic famine.

"In Bulgaria, again, the college influence has been immense, and an offshoot or copy of the parent college at Constantinople has been started by ex-students in Albania, where it seems to be almost the only secondary school for girls in that country."

The college was only recently founded as a branch of the American missionary work which has been carried on for forty years or more. But recently a separate corporation has been formed under B. Parker Bowne, LL.D., of Boston, U.S.A., as President of an influential council, to carry on the college on independent lines.

Current expenses, of course, exceed the fees paid by pupils, and the Principal of the college, Dr. Mary M. Patrick, now returning to Constantinople from America, reports that she has collected annual subscriptions from all parts of the United States of America for the better support of the college than it had under the Mission Board.

But an excellent estate on the north shore of the Bosphorus has been obtained for the erection of more extensive premises than those hitherto occupied at Scutari, and funds are wanted for this purpose.

Will not some of your readers come forward to help Miss Fry to form an English organisation for the purpose of collecting a suitable sum for presentation to the American College Corporation?—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED S. JONES, Lt. Col., M. Inst. C.E.

THE INSCRIPTIONS IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On a visit to Westminster Abbey some time ago, I could not but observe with much regret how very worn were many of the tomb inscriptions, some, indeed, of the more important being completely obliterated. This wear is undoubtedly caused by the ceaseless tramp of sightseers and hero-worshippers, and is, perhaps, more apparent from the Chatham monument in the North Transept to the Poet's corner. Most of the inscriptions in this particular locality are graven in the tomb-stone, and left unfilled by any preservative, such as the brass finishing process, which indicates to the visitor without any exhausting search the resting-place of David Livingstone. The North Transept is almost exclusively occupied by the dust of great statesmen whose actions and policies have made an Empire world-wide, and yet how difficult it is to locate the graves of Castlereagh, Fox, Pitt, Chatham, and even one of so recent date as Gladstone's. I have communicated with the families of some of the great statesmen referred to regarding the scandalous condition of the tombs in this particular transept, and although they appreciate very keenly the necessity for some action in the matter, they are naturally rather reluctant for obvious reasons to interfere with the Abbey authorities.

Observations of this nature may have been brought under the notice of the Dean ere now, but, if so, for some reason unknown to the public, no effective remedy has been either proposed or suggested. Some there are in whose estimation it may appear sacrilegious to tamper with relics which command the veneration of every seriously disposed person, and this is a consideration which I do not pretend to make little of, but however much one may feel disinclined to effect "modern improvements" in this ancient pile, the necessity for preservation of the inscriptions presents itself for urgent attention, failing which, the Abbey authorities will be guilty of nothing less than vandalism. The functions and characteristics of a carping critic or a busybody I do not wish to assume, but humbly suggest that, if improvements of this nature are not provided for by the Abbey funds, a public subscription list should be opened for this purpose to enable the Dean to keep our National Necropolis worthy of our national traditions.—Yours, &c., S. ## TO DORA.

In the tinted dayspring of a London alley,
Where the melting moonlight cools the sunburnt lane,
Deep in the flare and the colored noise of suburbs—
Long have I sought you in the shade and shine and rain!
Through dusky byways rent with dancing naphthas,
Through the trafficked highways where streets and streets collide,
Through the evil twilight, the night's ghast silence,
Long have I wandered and wondered where you hide.

Young lip to young lip, does another meet you?
Has a lonely pilgrim, when day was stark and long,
Drawing ever slower to the grey road's ending,
Reached a sudden summer of sun and flower and song?
Has he seen in you the world's one yearning,
All the seasons' message, the sky's sweet play;
Read in you at last the riddle of the heavens?
Have you to another been the dark's one ray?

Well, if one has held you, and, holding you, beheld you,
Shining down upon him like a single star;
If Love to Love leans, even as the June sky,
Laughing down to earth, leans strangely close and far;
Has he seen the moonlight mirrored in the bloomy
Sudden-living gloom of your dear dark hair,
And, seeing it, has worshipped and cried again for heaven—
Then am I joyful for a fire-kissed prayer!

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

IT is a sign of the times that the current numbers of "The Quarterly Review," "The Edinburgh Review," and "The New Quarterly" all contain articles on the mystical element in religion. Father Tyrrell's essay in the "Quarterly" is marked by the qualities of thought and style that won him a reputation such as no English Catholic writer since Newman has possessed. It is, in the main, an examination of the views put forth by Baron von Hügel in his recent book, "The Mystical Element of Religion, as studied in Catherine of Genoa and her Friends." Father Tyrrell declares that religion, like life, is a harmony or dependent organism; "and its three factors—the historic or institutional, the mystical, and the rational—correspond roughly to three stages of religious development, successive yet superposed, in the race and in the individual." But the fact that the three elements are connected organically does not hinder us giving "a certain primacy" to the mystical over the other two. "Social religion grows from and lives by man's mystical need of converse with the invisible world, with that Whole of which the few aspects that filter through our limited senses constitute the visible world. That root remains safe in the soil of humanity after its institutional and rational manifestations have been hewn down by criticism. For a time men may try to be satisfied with the root; but inevitably religion must reintegrate itself according to the law of its nature."

DR. MCTAGGART in "The New Quarterly" holds that the essential characteristics of mysticism are two in number —the assertion of "a greater unity in the universe than that which is recognised in ordinary experience or in science," and "an affirmation that it is possible to be conscious of this unity in some manner which brings the knower into closer and more direct relation with what is known than can be done in ordinary discursive thought." He points out that mysticism, thus defined, has been held in conjunction with every theological and philosophical belief. "There are mystics in whose creed the existence of God is a fundamental element, and others with whom the non-existence of God is equally fundamental. Human immortality is for some mystics the greatest of all truths, for others the most dangerous of all errors. Free will is essential to some mystics, determinism to others." Dr. McTaggart ends by protesting against the condemnation of the mystic who turns his attention from that which he judges to be evil, or which he temporarily finds distasteful, to that which gives him happiness. "He will gain happiness—and happiness is good. And if happiness differs in quality, his is of no ignoble kind."

A COLLECTION of essays by Mr. Francis Grierson is to be published in the autumn. Many of the critics seem not to have heard of Mr. Grierson's work until "The Valley of Shadows," a book of memories and impressions of Lincoln's country before the war, appeared last spring. He had issued previously two small volumes of essays—"Modern Mysticism" and "The Celtic Temperament." In these books he treated of contemporary life and art in a style of unusual distinction, not, however, free from a mannerism that approached preciousness. Among the subjects dealt with in the coming volume are "The Wagnerian Decadence," "Nietzsche and Wagner," "The Humor of the Underman," "Lamartine," "The Classical and the Critical," and "Equality and Opportunity."

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH have in preparation a book by Mr. W. H. Davies, which is on somewhat similar lines to his "Autobiography of a Super Tramp." Its title is "Papers on Beggars and Begging," and it relates some of Mr. Davies's own experiences in this country and in the United States. Readers of THE NATION have had frequent opportunities of appreciating the freshness and true poetic reality of Mr. Davies's verse.

MESSRS. HACHETTE intend to complete "L'Histoire de France Racontée à Tous" by issuing the four remaining volumes during the autumn. These, in order of publication, are "Richelieu et Louis XIV.," by M. Jacques Boulanger; "La Révolution" and "L'Empire," both by M. Louis Madelin; and "Le Moyen Age," by M. Funck-Brentano, the general editor of the series. Another enterprise which the same publishers hope to complete before the end of the year is their great "L'Histoire de France jusqu' à la Révolution," produced under the direction of M. Ernest Lavisse. The coming volumes which cover the reigns of Louis XV. and Louis XVI. have been written by M. H. Carré, Professor at Poitiers.

THE first English biography of Boccaccio has been written by Mr. Edward Hutton, and will be published during the autumn by Mr. John Lane. The title is "Giovanni Boccaccio: His Life, His Love, His Work," and the volume deals at some length with Boccaccio's love for Fiametta, an affair which the biographer holds to have had a greater influence upon Boccaccio's career than is generally supposed. In addition to having written several books on Italian travel, Mr. Hutton is the editor of the "Decameron" in the series of "Tudor Translations," so that he should be well qualified for writing a life of Boccaccio.

"SKETCHES AND SNAPSHOTS" is the title of a volume of essays by Mr. G. W. E. Russell, which Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. have in the press. Mr. Russell is always an engaging writer, and many readers will be glad to learn that his weekly contributions to the "Manchester Guardian" are to appear in a more permanent form. The same publishers announce a collected edition in fourteen volumes of the late Henry Seton Merriman's novels. Although Merriman seldom rose above clever mediocrity, his books have had a large sale, and he still retains enough popularity to make the coming venture sure of success.

"THE LIFE AND TIMES OF BISHOP CHALLONER, 1691-1781," by Dr. E. H. Burton, Vice-President of St. Edmund's College, Ware, will be published early in the autumn by Messrs. Longmans. The work is to be in two volumes, uniform with Monsignor Ward's "The Dawn of the Catholic Revival in England," which began with the death of Bishop Challoner. The history of English Catholicism in the eighteenth century has not hitherto received much attention although the period from Wiseman onwards has attracted a crowd of writers. Two other theological works to be published by the same firm are "Christian Ideas and Ideals: An Outline of Christian Ethical Theory," by Professor Ottley, and a volume of historical and miscellaneous essays by the late Father Ryder.

AMONG works of fiction preparing for publication are a translation of Sudermann's "Das Hohe Lied"; "Great Possessions," by Mrs. Wilfrid Ward; "The Blindness of the Reverend Dr. Gray," by Canon Sheehan; "Robert Emmett: An Historical Novel," by Mr. Stephen Gwynn; "The Haven," a story of life in a Devonshire fishing village, by Mr. Eden Phillpotts; Mr. William de Morgan's long-promised novel, "It Never Can Happen Again"; and "The Knock on the Door," by Mr. Robert Hichens.

FRANCE BEFORE THE STORM.*

M. Kovalewsky draws in this very interesting volume a detailed picture of the economic condition of France during the period immediately preceding the Revolution. He leaves on one side many of the questions discussed from contrary points of view by De Tocqueville and Babeau: questions such as those of the extent and nature of popular education, and of the powers and vitality of the village assemblies. M. Kovalewsky addresses himself rather to the economic structure of 18th century France; to the interpretation of such facts as can be collected about the distribution of property, the methods of industry and agriculture, and the actual state of the different parts of France when the Revolution broke out.

The authors and contemporaries of the Revolution always spoke of it as the destruction of the feudal system. This description M. Kovalewsky contends was entirely misleading. Nothing remained of the feudal system to destroy except certain survivals of the special privileges of the nobility in regard to property in land. France was no more feudal in the 18th century than Russia was feudal before the Reform of 1861. There is indeed a sense in which the term can be applied to 18th century France, the sense in which nowadays the term is used of the great concentration of the means of production in a few hands. By feudal M. Kovalewsky understands a relation of mutual responsibility and aid, a state of society in which, for example, the peasants were quite content to spend the night in keeping the frogs quiet in the neighboring ditches in order to secure the repose of their lords in the chateaux. Feudalism as a system of reciprocal duties had virtually disappeared before the 18th century, and the state of things which provoked the Revolution was the increasing antagonism of the rich and the poor in a society in which the poor were continually exploited for the benefit of the rich.

This is the main theme of M. Kovalewsky's book. He supports it by a detailed examination of the evidence he can find about the condition of the different classes. The general picture he presents is one of decay, and this decay, he thinks, was general in all parts of France amid all the diversity of conditions and tenure. Land had been changing hands to a great extent in the 18th century, but, unlike De Tocqueville and Arthur Young, M. Kovalewsky maintains that the land had been passing not to the peasants but to rich merchants. Incidentally he combats De Tocqueville's view that the aristocracy in the 18th century despised all connection with the rich bourgeoisie; he thinks the two classes mixed freely. He combats, too, Arthur Young's view that peasants owned two-thirds of the landed property in France. He argues that peasants held a certain amount of land under the tenures known as censive, champart, or terrage, but that their position was really analogous to that of the English agricultural labourer. He quotes as an illustration the returns made by a curé of Craon in the course of an inquiry set on foot in 1763 in Metz, who gave the name of laborer to peasants owing these dues. He thinks also that the peasants, so far from gaining, were losing their hold on the land during the last part of the 18th century, and he points to the evidence contained in the procès-verbaux of the States of Auvergne to show that in parts of France rural depopulation was setting in at a rapid rate. The peasants' burdens were indeed overwhelming, and they were growing. The condition of the Breton peasant was summed up in a sentence by the economist, Moreau de Tonnés: "Des quatre gerbes qu'il récolte d'un champ, l'une appartient au seigneur, l'autre au curé de la paroisse ou au prieur du convent voisin; la troisième sert au payment des impôts et la quatrième—à couvrir les frais de production." M. Kovalewsky calculates that in Picardy only one-fifth of the income from his holding remained in the hands of the peasant. These dues became more and more oppressive with the growth of taxation and the growth of privileges. Thus the Church managed to bring more and more of the peasants' property within the grasp of the dîme. M. Kovalewsky, after tracing the gradual extension of this tax to new products, and showing what an importance was attached to this among the causes of the stagnation of agriculture by contemporaries of the Revolution, remarks aptly that a man must have a large dose of idealism in his nature to be able to shed many tears over the disappearance of the touching relations that used to exist between the Church and its flock. If the Church weighed more and more heavily on the peasant, so did the seigneur. When the peasant failed in paying his dues he was treated without mercy. If he paid regularly, the seigneur, though he could not raise his direct rent, could take it out of him by a rigorous insistence on seigneurial rights known as "banalités." These rights had their origin in service. The seigneur, that is to say, built a mill, and in return he could oblige the peasants to grind their corn there or pay him for it. But, in the time M. Kovalewsky is discussing, peasants were in some cases paying the banalité although there was no mill for them to use; in others they were paying it in order to acquire a right to grind their corn somewhere else.

The Physiocrats thought that the true remedy was to get rid of all these tenures and to develop large capitalist farming. They consequently encouraged the movement in that direction that was going on in France during this period. But the results, while threatening to create a new social problem, did not, as a rule, bring the economic benefits that were expected. Enclosures, again, another panacea, were not followed by great agricultural improvement, and Arthur Young pointed to the parts of France where enclosure had been pushed far, as examples of a bad state of cultivation.

Meanwhile, what was becoming of the aristocracy of France? De Tocqueville pointed out that under Louis XVI. the higher ranks of the army were much more of a monopoly for noble blood than they had been under Louis XIV., and he argued that the nobles, as they lost political power and the land, tended to attach greater importance to their privileges. But there was a further reason for this change. The aristocracy was driven to seek its revenues from other sources as its land passed to the rich merchant, and the two quarters to which it looked were the higher ranks of the army and the higher ranks of the Church. Consequently one of the social features of the time is the growing distance between the Bishop and the curé. The curé was more or less of a peasant, sharing his wretchedness and hates; the Bishop was a noble and regarded the curé as "un vilain, sentant le fumier." Their relations were not sweetened by the fact that the dues wrung out of the peasants went as a rule into the rich and not the poor pockets of the clergy.

It is impossible to do more than glance at some of the main ideas of M. Kovalewsky's work in the space at our disposal. He has given a singularly interesting and detailed picture composed from the reports of Committees as well as from the cahiers of the state of France. It is a picture of hopeless confusion, due partly to heavy taxation, partly to the bad survivals of a system of which the good attributes had perished, partly to the power of the rich to ravage the country for their pleasures, partly to the systems of tenure and the dead weight of custom. M. Kovalewsky thinks that in many respects the peasant was worse off than the English agricultural laborer: that, for example, he ate less meat and was worse shod. But there are two important differences which go far to explain the divergencies of agrarian history in the two countries. The peasant had not lost his status; there was continual litigation between the seigneur and the peasants, and that litigation we may remark incidentally has bred the class of lawyer who is so prominent in the Revolution, a lawyer who looks at politics from the point of view of the peasant and not from the point of view of the rich. The English litigation that concerned this class centred not round the rights of peasants against the squire, but round the disputes of different parishes over pauper settlements. The English agricultural laborer was in no position to carry on war with the squire. And if the peasant had not lost his status, he had not, as a class, lost his footing on the soil. These two facts explain the success of the Revolution.

THE END OF PAPAL ROME.*

In "Il Fine di un Regno" Signor de Cesare described the closing years of the Bourbon rule in Naples. "The Last Days of Papal Rome" is, like the former volume, a "moral photograph"—a few years and it would have been too late to obtain it—of a social order that has disappeared. That it should have existed within the memory of men now in middle age is an illustration of the "nos et mutamur in illis"; we find it difficult even to imagine what less than a generation ago was concrete fact. That it has ceased to be so is due to no single cause. It is safe to say that the forces of what clerical writers call the Revolution could not have overthrown it unaided. The assent, tacit or avowed, of Catholic Europe was a necessary factor in the event:—

> "The temporal power fell, partly because it appeared no longer necessary to the Catholic conscience, which reasoned that, if exempted from political power, the Pontiff's independence and the liberty of the Church would be better guaranteed."

The Pope denounced this position as hypocritical; and, as long as it was that of the few, he held his own against it. When it became that of the many, who, when all is said and done, hold the balance, it swept him away.

The Papal Government, though under the influence of panic or revenge it could be brutal enough, as in the Perugia massacres of 1859, was not usually cruel. But it was meddlesome and muddling. It professed to be paternal; it was grandmotherly. Its charities were more demoralising than its severities. The Panem et Circenses tradition was a legacy from the worst days of the Republic; the sportula survived from the time of Juvenal to our own. Economically as well as morally the effect was disastrous:—

> "The poverty of the lower classes far exceeded that of any other European city. The workmen who lived without charitable assistance were in the minority; work was intermittent and individual and unassisted by credit. Each man worked on his own account, and rested or made holiday as pleased him best, often spending in one day the earnings of a week. Such irregular existence was rooted in the knowledge that, under no circumstances, could anyone die of hunger. The municipality daily subsidised some three thousand families, and the cardinals, monastic orders, and princely houses also spent large sums in this manner. The Jesuits sent out daily hundreds of baskets containing food to families to whom they could not well give a halfpenny in alms."

In spite of this elaborate system of doles, the Government lived on a volcano. The balance of power on which it depended was uncertain; and the Risorgimento had developed ideal motives of exceptional loftiness and strength among Italians. Mazzini, Garibaldi, Cavour, and Victor Emmanuel were figures cast in a heroic mould—their opponents had not among them a single leader of moral or intellectual eminence; the nearer a man approached this standard the more half-hearted was his support. The battle was unequal: the fittest—it could not but be so—prevailed.

The benevolence for which Pius IX. had a name was uncertain, and not inconsistent either with considerable vindictiveness or with an irascibility which sat ill on a man of his calling and rank. He was kindly, when not opposed; one of his leading traits was curiosity; he was inordinately vain. The epileptic tendency which he never wholly overcame was the key, it has been said, to his personality and to his Pontificate; his treatment of the unfortunate Cardinal d'Andrea, of Santucci, Guidi, and the Patriarch Audu, can only be accounted for on some such hypothesis: a perfectly sane man does not lose self-control in this way. The atmosphere of Byzantine flattery in which he lived would have affected a stronger mind than his. The Jesuit Oliva had known the Popes of his day, he tells us, before they were raised to the Papacy: in each case the elevation was followed by a marked deterioration of character; the office is the test of the man. In a humbler station Pius IX. would have left a happier record; his was not the stuff of which rulers are made. Antonelli was a man of another type. A Roman official to the manner born, astute, without scruples or fanaticism, he contrived to make himself necessary to a master whose weaknesses he condescended to and despised. A politician rather than an ecclesiastic, he used fanaticism for his own purposes: Veuillot, Pie, even Manning were pawns in the game which he had to play.

> "He realised that the political Papacy was doomed, and was convinced that nothing could avert the catastrophe. He therefore left a free hand to the Ultramontanes after he saw that Pius IX. took their follies seriously. Perhaps he, too, had some illusions; but that touch of Roman scepticism which endowed the race as a whole with a substratum of good sense, and the precipitation of events after 1859, convinced him that resistance was useless; therefore he let events take their course, not feeling assured, like Pius IX., that the Divinity would interfere. Neither a mystic nor an idealist, he desired to enjoy life and to accumulate a fortune, which, in fact, he did."

In 1860 the fear of invasion gave rise to an effort to enrol an international army for the defence of the Papal territory. Antonelli held aloof; but the Pope, now under more fanatical influences, named Mgr. de Merode, Pro-Minister of War, and Lamoricière, Commander-in-Chief. It was a reign of terror: the Fausti case reproduced the features of the Affaire Dreyfus on a smaller scale. It is pleasant to learn that the just and intelligent Leo XIII. made generous reparation to the victim and his family: nothing in his too long Pontificate was more discreditable to Pius IX. Meanwhile the new army was organised, if the word can be used.

> "Hundreds of volunteers arrived, among them Austrians liberated from prison, turbulent and undisciplined Swiss, Spanish beggars, starving Irish, whom it was impossible to persuade to wear decent uniforms, or even to carry a sack to hold their belongings. They were incredibly dirty and immoral, the most turbulent claiming their pay with menaces. Besides these de Merode formed a regiment of volunteers drawn from the Ciociara, baptised by the Romans "barbacani," who preferred robbery and pillage to military glory. This was the only native element that could be collected. To harangue, to pay surprise visits to the barracks, to hold reviews, to dream of battles, such was de Merode's life."

The Syllabus of 1864 broke down Cavour's formula, libera chiesa nel libero stato. Two incompatible conceptions of society stood face to face: the only freedom recognised by the Papacy was that of hindering men from being free. The one must increase, the other decrease; all that was possible was a succession of accommodations between the two. The Vatican Council belongs rather to theology than politics; but the aim of the Pope in engineering the Definition of 1870 was mainly political. He believed that by means of it he would be able more easily to subdue the revolution and secure the temporal power. He was soon undeceived. "I am no prophet, nor the son of a prophet; but I tell you you will never enter Rome," were his words to Victor Emmanuel's envoy on September 8th. Twelve days later the Italians occupied Rome.

The new Rome is still in many respects the outcome of the old: national character, the growth of generations, is not changed in a day. Readers of Zola's "Rome" will remember Orlando Prada; his regrets, his counsels, his unswerving faith. Signor de Cesare ends on a lower note.

> "Rome has carried even into national life her keen and characteristic scepticism, before which the strongest impetus dies down, and the most rooted convictions yield to the temptations of opportunism, and still more to that law of adaptability before which the city at all times has bowed, and caused its conquerors to bow."

Here is the difference between the Italian and the French mind.

DARWINISM AND NEO-DARWINISM.*

In days when every new theory, sound or unsound, finds its way into print by the shortest available cut, the general reader may well be shocked to learn that the "Origin of Species" was not merely projected, but actually sketched out on paper in considerable detail, some seventeen years before it was offered to the public. This preliminary sketch, together with an expanded and still more complete draft written two years later (i.e., in 1844), is now published for the first time, with a preface and full notes by Mr. Francis Darwin.

Needless to say, the two "essays" are full of interest. In both the substance of the theory of natural selection is fully set forth, and there is evidence to show that the author was quite alive even then to the importance of his discoveries. "I have just finished my sketch of my species theory," wrote Charles Darwin to his wife in July, 1844:—

> "I therefore write this, in case of my sudden death, as my most solemn and last request . . that you will devote £400 to its publication. . . . I wish my sketch to be given to some competent person, with this sum to induce him to take trouble in its improvement and enlargement. . . . Mr. Lyell would be best if he would undertake it . . . the next best editor would be Professor Forbes, of London. The next best (and quite the best in many respects) would be Professor Henslow. Dr. Hooker would be very good. The next, Mr. Strickland. . . . Should one other hundred pounds make the difference of procuring a good editor, I request earnestly that you will raise £500."

Fortunately the services of none of these eminent gentlemen were required, for it is doubtful indeed whether any other man of Darwin's generation could have essayed successfully the task of making the mid-Victorians believe in evolution. The idea of evolution was no new one, and the mere publication of a fresh evolutionary theory would surely have effected little without the immense and convincing array of biological and geological facts which Darwin alone could muster. Moreover, the charm of Darwin's style and personality, and, above all, the manifest sincerity of his desire for truth must have been assets of untold value in the conflict against conservative biology. It was at all times impossible for the most prejudiced of his opponents to question his single-minded honesty or suspect him of suppressing awkward facts. It is perhaps this quality more than anything else which strikes the twentieth century reader of Darwin's work. Nowadays we are all too accustomed to biological treatises in which facts are only emphasised in so far as they can be subordinated to the author's pet theory, and are rarely introduced at all except to illustrate one side of a threadbare controversy. Darwin welcomed all facts for their own sake, awkward or otherwise; there was not one observation in his notebook but was too valuable to be sacrificed to any theory. Whatever new theories may arise, his work will remain a model of the true scientific method, and the contrast—which even the mere layman cannot fail to observe—may be thought to reflect little credit on contemporary science.

The latest biological treatise is not, however, of the sort characterised above. On the contrary the authors, Messrs. Dewar and Finn, are very much concerned about the "unhealthy condition" of biological science, and attribute it to excessive theorising and the comparatively little attention paid to the study of live animals.

> "It is in the open, not in the museum or the dissecting room, that nature can best be studied. . . . Natural selection—the idea which has revolutionised modern biology—came not to professors, but to a couple of field naturalists who were pursuing their researches in tropical countries."

The authors claim for themselves the title of Neo-Darwinians, using the term "Wallaceians" for the school which has hitherto usurped the prouder name. They point out with some reason that the central dogma of so-called Neo-Darwinism—that natural selection is the sole determining factor in organic evolution—is due to Alfred Russel Wallace, and was never held, indeed was specifically repudiated, by Darwin himself. "Like Darwin," they write, "we welcome all factors which appear to be capable of effecting evolution."

This eclecticism is the keynote of the book, the lesson which these outdoor naturalists endeavor to impress upon the "professors." With no pet hypothesis of their own to sustain, they range freely over the whole field of biological science, accepting here and rejecting there with a fine impartiality, and, we may add, with a sound critical sense of what does and what does not constitute proof. They have, too, a keen eye for those cases in which the wish has been father to the observation, and where they have reason to be dissatisfied they say so in a fashion which shows them to be no respecters of persons.

The attack upon the "Wallaceians" opens rather quaintly:—

> "The burden of proof is on him who asserts. . . . It is therefore incumbent upon us to prove our assertion that the theory of natural selection does not afford an adequate explanation of all the varied phenomena observed in the organic world."

If all controversialists estimated their duties as generously as this, the burden of proof would be pretty evenly distributed. But our authors can afford to be generous, for we do not think that any unbiassed reader will hold that the burden they assume is more than they can bear. If their arguments are not new their facts often are, and their criticisms have at least the merit of comprehensiveness. They let fly at "Wallaceism" from all sides at once, but we need only notice here the frontal section of the assault:—

> "The double assumption that variations are, for all practical purposes, haphazard in origin and indefinite in direction, is necessary if natural selection is to be the main factor in evolution. For if variations be not haphazard, if they are definite, if there be a directive force behind them like fate behind the classical gods, then selection is not the fundamental cause of evolution. It can, at most, effect, not the origin of species, but the survival of certain species which have arisen as the result of some other force. . . . It is no longer a cause of the origin of new organisms, but a sieve determining which of certain ready-made forms shall survive."

The authors then proceed to show that in every species known to the practical breeder there is a tendency to vary in certain definite and well recognised directions, and that, moreover, all the evidence available tends to indicate that there is a definite limit to the extent to which minute continuous variations can be accumulated by selection along any given line. The extant skeleton of "Eclipse" is referred to in this conection, as showing that all the efforts of breeders have failed appreciably to improve the form of the British racehorse in the course of over a century and a quarter.

This naturally leads on to the question of discontinuous variations or "mutations." Here the authors give a useful if obvious definition. A variation, they suggest, is continuous or discontinuous according as it does or does not obey Galton's Law of Regression—i.e., according as its offspring do or do not tend upon the average to regress towards the parent type. The authors are fully convinced of the widespread and frequent occurrence of mutations, and give a large number of recorded instances both in animals and plants. But this does not prevent them from charging De Vries with having pushed his theory to extreme lengths.

> "We do not think that, on the evidence available, he [De Vries] is justified in asserting that every species passes through alternating periods of comparative quiescence and periods in which it throws off, as mutations, swarms of elementary species. He is justified in asserting that discontinuous variation is by no means an uncommon phenomenon, but further than this it does not seem safe to go at present."

Hybridism is the next subject dealt with, and the doctrine of the infertility of hybrids is summarily dismissed as a bogey which no longer deceives anybody, except those who argue in a vicious circle and define different breeds as varieties or species, according as their crossed offspring are fertile or infertile.

The Mendelians, like the De Vriesians, receive due appreciation for the value of their pet theory within the limits of its application, together with a meed of reproof for the exaggerated importance they have attached to Mendel's experiments.

A very long chapter, occupying a third of the whole book, then follows upon the subject of the Coloration of Organisms, including Mimicry and Recognition Markings. Here the "Wallaceians" come in for some very severe handling—which we have no doubt they deserve—on account of the absurdities into which they have been led by their anxiety to prove that every patch of color in every organism has a definite "survival value." This chapter alone justifies the publication of the book. For in it the authors are able to substantiate their claim regarding the superiority of the outdoor naturalist over the indoor student by adducing such a wealth of observations of their own gathering as should dispose of many a long-lived superstition.

After discussing the difficult problems raised by sexual dimorphism, the authors conclude with a summary of the present position of biological science. "Natural selection," they hold, "although an important factor in evolution, is not an indispensable one." It is not selection so much as variation that determines the direction of evolution, and it is the laws which govern this latter phenomenon which stand most in need of systematic study. The hope of solving the more fundamental problems of biology > "lies, not in the speculations in which biologists of to-day are so fond of indulging, but in observation and experiment, especially the last.

> "The future of biology is largely in the hands of the practical breeder."

So concludes an exceptionally interesting book. Its faults are easy to discover, but they are mostly to be ascribed to nothing worse than literary inexperience, and we are not inclined to dwell upon them.

Whether or not the authors' naïve expectation, that their book "will come as a rude shock to many scientific men," be fulfilled, we can at least be grateful to them for the breath of fresh outdoor criticism which it has brought to us. We are tired of the axe-grinding biologist, and gladly welcome the literary advent of two such able and independent naturalists as Messrs. Dewar and Finn.

THE OMNIPOTENT AUTOMOBILE.*

Once more the incredible has been accomplished, and again it is Italy which wears the laurels. Not long ago we read Prince Barzini's account of his automobile race from Pekin to Paris; now comes Signor Antonio Scarfoglio's book describing how, by the aid of petrol, patriotism, and the sporting Press, he and his henchman, Haaga, put a girdle round the earth in thirty weeks.

To perform the double feat successfully requires unusual qualities. Signor Scarfoglio, however, drives his quill as skilfully as his car. To the sensibility of the artist he adds a chauffeur's stoicism, and unites to an Anglo-Saxon ability for pushing straight ahead a Latin talent for seeing round the corner.

Almost every variety of physical adventure attends the pilgrims. From New York to Leicester the way is blocked with snow, the car sinks into drifts from which it is dug again and again, bridges and trenches are perpetually constructed, food has to be attacked with hammer and chisel, while feet freeze, hands and faces crack, and exhaustion woos the travellers into a nearly fatal lethargy. Next comes an ocean of mud with progress at a snail's pace—four miles are gained in nine hours; then it is never-ending rain, weakening the will and reducing the spirits to zero. In the Death Valley of the Rocky Mountains they are attacked by a consuming heat:—

> "It seems as if the whole plain were flaming, burning like an immense pyre. We breathe in fire, and a vestment of fire hangs on our limbs; our foreheads are bound by a circle of fire. A yellowish vapor surrounds the sun, hiding it in a thin cloud. It seems to have descended still lower, and is still more pale and livid. In the distance near the horizon, the Fata Morgana constructs and destroys towns and castles, and spreads before our eyes immense shining lakes. . . . We work automatically, without thought or idea, our heads swollen like enormous balloons, and legs as limp as rags. . . . After exhaustion comes thirst, the atrocious thirst which tears at our throats with red-hot fingers."

Nor has human nature extremes less violent. In Manchuria the travellers are benumbed by the frozen indifference of the officials, in the Rocky Mountains a bevy of admiring damsels nearly exterminate them in a tropical storm of kisses. To the credit of the human race, however, it must be said that kindness and sympathy are more common than hostility and suspicion, and delay is caused as often by hospitality as by ill will.

The advent of the car is, indeed, not infrequently a godsend. Stopping at a solitary station in the Rockies, they are entertained by the guardian of the signal lamp, a lonely woman. Quite detached from the rest of humanity, she has become part of the wilderness in which she lives; even her skin and eyes seem to have taken the color of her surroundings. For six months in the year she does not speak to a living soul.

> "She received us as if we had been angels. She tried to force us to drink, to eat, and to smoke. She spoke nervously, laughing with every word, interrupting herself, losing the thread of each sentence, picking it up again, and asking the most ingenuous and puerile things, 'Do the ladies in town still wear green?—and black feathers?—and velvet, and tailor-mades?'"

Farther on they cheer the solitude of a station-master, whose sole contact with mankind is the telegraph instrument. To this he desperately clings, inventing perpetual and futile pretexts for communication, asking for greetings, messages, news, or the time—anything to dispel the miseries of ennui. In the gold deserts the travellers encounter an even more tragic victim of detachment. Blooming like a rose in the wilderness is a neat white house, clean and shining, in which dwells an old French gentleman, of fine manners and distinguished appearance, who reads Tennyson, cultivates an interior, regales his guests with oysters and Burgundy, and speaks the tongue of civilisation. On the walls of his large, well-lighted room hang portraits of an adored wife and children. For thirty years he has neither seen nor heard from them. Very simply and calmly he tells the travellers his story

> "Toiling beside his wife and children in his distant home, he was seized with despair because he could not give to the objects of his affection everything they desired. The consciousness of his poverty, his incapacity, his uselessness, became a tormenting fever. With eager eyes he would read in the newspapers reports of an El Dorado somewhere across the sea, and day by day the idea was hammered into his head that he must leave, abandon everything, and then at some distant time return with his hands filled with gifts and happiness. . . .
> "But he never found fortune. Like the medieval alchemist who consumed his existence beside the furnace and alembic in a smoky laboratory searching for the philosopher's stone, so he wasted himself in quest of riches. . . . And now, after thirty years, he is hopeless, weakened and exhausted. His hopes of happiness have passed, his gilded porcelain dreams have been shattered, and he has fallen here with his wings broken and his members bruised like a bird shot while in full flight. He will never see his country or his family again, he will never leave this spot. He has a little unknown mine amidst these rocks, and he wishes to die beside it."

It is this gift of sympathetic portraiture that gives the charm to Signor Scarfoglio's book. Thanks to some spell of youth, comeliness, or generosity of nature, the writer has escaped the dehumanising influence of the automobile. They ride a race and never forget it, yet can turn aside for compassion's sake. Crossing the Russian frontier, a child is run over by a cart and killed. The carter drives on, but the automobilists carry the little corpse to the nearest town. Suspicion not unnaturally falls on the innocent, and the result is three days' imprisonment. No bitterness vexes the hearts of the pilgrims, delays are inevitable, and it is all part of the great adventure. At Perm they spend a night at a bakery; the wife is a Parisienne, married six months ago. On hearing the travellers speak her native tongue she weeps with joy and begs them to kiss for her sake the first woman they meet on French soil. They promise. The frontier is reached, two French soldiers and a woman appear in sight, the car stops and the writer dismounts. He approaches the woman:—

> "Vous êtes française, madame?"
> "Oui, monsieur, à votre service."
> "Eh bien, madame, permettez-moi de vous embrasser. Je vous porte ce baiser du fond de la Russie, de la part d'une femme française qui vit là—bas dans le tourment continuel de ne pas voir son pays. . . . Permettez donc que je vous embrasse pour l'amour de cette pauvre exileé. Voulez-vous?"
> "Mais très volontiers, Monsieur."
> And we kissed each other effusively.

Sentimental? Un-English? Perhaps.

Signor Scarfoglio devotes a chapter to the study of the Japanese. The race does not please him: it is servile and conservative, without imagination, creative power, or personality, military to the core. Even its art is an art of "muscular instinct" merely, and has remained stationary throughout the ages. "Their eyes and the tips of their fingers have never changed, and it is the same with their minds." Their cardinal defect is altruism:—

> "The Japanese never considers himself, never lives for himself. He cannot conceive man as the representative of a race. . . . The man does not exist and has no value. The people, the race, is the sole unit, and the men are the anonymous, mute particles which give it force and life. All their efforts, all their activities are collective."

Yet this uninteresting people has become a power, and, says Signor Scarfoglio, reluctantly admitting the eternal paradox of renunciation, "Europe setting out with drums and trumpets to conquer, has seen herself conquered and disarmed."

At Vladivostock the travellers' ears are filled with tales of the coming horrors in Manchuria. They will be attacked by the Chunchuse brigands, by the famous and ferocious Manchurian tigers, by fever, plague, pestilence, and famine—far better abandon their project and go home by sea. Nothing worse, however, happens than an expensive altercation with an irritating telegraph operator and a champagne lunch at Ymen-po.

Arrived at Paris the automobilists are fêted with all the uproar appropriate to the occasion. Speeches, feasts, toasts, processions—no note of triumph is lacking. Yet a doubt creeps over the last page. Signor Scarfoglio has broken a record, he has suffered, endured and conquered—but now that it is all over—Cui bono?

A NOVEL OF SPANISH CHURCH LIFE.*

We are grateful to Mrs. W. A. Gillespie for her translation of "The Shadow of the Cathedral," by Ibañez, one of the most vigorous of modern Spanish novelists, whose national pictures are distinguished by breadth of vision, the historic sense, and passionate sympathy with the life of the laboring poor. Technically speaking, the art of "The Shadow of the Cathedral" is clumsy and full of longueurs: the author often avails himself of transparent ruses in introducing, by the mouths of his characters, social disquisitions and historical retrospects, but his insight is so penetrating and his picture so rich and varied that only an exacting reader will complain of the book's artistic defects.

The hero of the story, Gabriel Luna, the descendant of the Lunas, a family which for over four centuries has served the Cathedral of Toledo "in the garden, the sacristy, or in the crossways of the choir," returns to Toledo, a broken and dying man, hoping that his brother, Esteban, the verger, will shelter him in his little house in "the Claverias," or upper cloisters, so that he may spend his last days in peace in the shadow of the great Cathedral. Gabriel, who as a boy, was a prodigy of learning and good behavior, had been given a scholarship at the Seminary, and entered for the priesthood; but after the stormy days of the September revolution, infected with the ecclesiastical hatred of the Government and the republican cause, he flees from the Seminary and joins one of the roving Carlist bands "anxious to perform exploits for the cause of God." When the war comes to an end Gabriel does not avail himself of the amnesty, but, wishing to see new countries, goes to Paris, finding employment as a proof-reader in an ecclesiastical printing house. Paris and Renan's lectures speedily destroy the young man's faith, and he finds a new religion in philosophic Anarchism of the Elisée Reclus type. Years of hardship pass in social propaganda in England and Italy and Barcelona, and finally Gabriel, unjustly accused of complicity in throwing bombs, is arrested, imprisoned and tortured in the fortress of Montjuich. When he is released, solitary confinement for two years in the bad air of 'a small stone box" has done its work He emerges from the prison racked with consumption, a shadow of a man. Broken in spirit, incessantly harassed by the police, Gabriel wanders aimlessly from town to town, begging his way, till at last, in despair, he returns to Toledo, and is sheltered in "the Claverias" by his brother Esteban, who has managed to conceal from his ecclesiastical superiors that his brother and the notorious "Comrade Luna" of newspaper fame are one and the same person.

This slight, but ingenious, framework of plot serves to introduce and hold together a series of detailed descriptions of many generations of ecclesiastical life "in the shadow of the Cathedral," and the mental outlook of these classes, from the humble bell-ringers, acolytes, and sacristans to the canons, chaplains, and the archbishop himself, is sharply outlined against a background of national history. In a sense there are two heroes of the story—the first, Gabriel, who stands for the emancipation of the mind and heart of man, and the second, the Cathedral of the Catholic Church which, after slowly drawing into itself the glory and the energy of Spain, has ended in sharing the exhaustion of the country. Senor Ibañez's argument is that every established system, spiritual or material, which is allowed to flourish in unchecked freedom ends by preying upon the community it has begun by serving. The case for the Church is put by Don Antolin, the priest, its faithful and devoted servant, who is never tired of recounting the gifts showered upon the Cathedral by the great princes and nobles of Spain in the palmy days when "our dominions extended throughout the whole nation from end to end, when the territory of their diocese was larger than a principality, when everything contributed to the glory of the Lord, and to the comfort and welfare of his ministers." Towns, villages, mills, vineyards, fisheries, tithes, bridge tolls, castles, ovens, salt works, legacies, mortgages, and principalities were rained upon the Cathedral for centuries by the pious. "Bread when it was baked in the ovens, the casting of the net, wheat as it passed through the mill, money as it came from the mint, the traveller as he went on his way; the country people who gave the best sheaf in every ten, so that the granaries of the Holy Metropolitan Church were quite insufficient to contain such abundance." It is no wonder that Don Antolin sighs for the old times when faith was the chief thing in life, when whole towns would throw themselves into the work of raising a cathedral in the hope of gaining heaven. Gabriel, however, holds that the brilliant times of the Catholic kings, of Don Carlos and the two Philips, when the Spaniards were masters of half the world, and everything was for the greater glory of Spain and the splendor of religion, were, in fact, the centuries of Spanish decadence. In a lengthy dissertation which he develops to the horror of the churchman, Gabriel contends that the strong and healthy Spain was that of the eighth to the fourteenth century, when Christians and Mussulmans, pure Arabs, Syrians, Egyptians, Jews of Spanish extraction, and Jews from the East all lived peaceably together, and all the arts, sciences, industries, and inventions, and culture of the old civilisations budded and blossomed in a Spanish Renaissance. It was "Don Carlos and Philip II., the German foreigners, who destroyed the pure and uncorrupted Spain, the Spain of religious tolerance, of industrial and agricultural wealth and of free municipalities. What came after was a Teutonic and a Flemish Spain turned into a German colony, serving as a mercenary under foreign standards, ruining itself in undertakings in which it had no interest, shedding blood and gold for the ambition of the so-called Holy Roman Empire." And the Catholic Church had changed from a beneficent into a malign growth on the national life, when the Inquisition was established, and "science became a pathway that led to the bonfire":—

> "The free municipalities disappeared. their defenders went to the scaffold both in Castille and Valencia; the Spaniard abandoned his plough or his weaving, to range the world with an arquebus on his shoulder, and the town militia were transformed into bands which fought all over Europe without knowing why. The flourishing towns became villages; churches were turned into convents; the popular tolerant clergy were changed into friars, who imitated with servile complacency the German fanaticism. The fields remained barren for want of hands to cultivate them, the poor dreamt of becoming rich from the sack of the enemy's towns, and left their work; the industrious burghers abandoned commerce as fit only for heretics, and became nurseries of clerks and petty magistrates. . . . And in the days when ruin overwhelmed us, Spain had never been so religious. The Church was mistress of everything; the ecclesiastical tribunals judged even the King himself; but secular justice could not touch even the hem of a garment of the lowest sacristan, even though he committed the greatest crimes in the public streets. . . . Spain had eleven thousand convents, more than a hundred thousand friars, and forty thousand nuns, and to these must be added seventy-eight thousand priests, and the innumerable servitors and dependants of the Church, such as alguaziles,, familiars, jailors, and notaries of the Inquisition, sacristans, stewards, buleros, convent door-porters, choristers, singers, lay-brothers, novices, and I know not how many other people. In exchange, the nation, from a population of thirty millions, had shrunk to seven millions in less than two hundred years. The expulsions of Jews and Moors by religious intolerance, the continual foreign wars, the emigration to America in the hope of growing rich without work, hunger, the lack of sanitation, and the abandonment of agriculture had brought about this rapid depopulation. The revenues of Spain had fallen to fourteen million ducats, whereas the clerical revenue had risen to eight millions; the Church possessed more than half the national fortune! What times! Eh! Don Antolin?"

Finally, this lust of universal empire and religious power combined, ended in a period of barbarism and general stagnation, when foreigners had to be called in to "save the country from death, a foreign Government, foreign manufacturers, foreign soldiers, and with them came the anti-clerical spirit." Such is the moral Gabriel draws from

* "The Shadow of the Cathedral." By Vincent Blasco Ibañez. Constable. 6s.

Spanish history, "excess of religion was our ruin and came very near exterminating us as a nation." In his pessimism Gabriel declares that nothing but science can raise Spain again, and "Spain still lives far from the sun of science. Spain is no longer a country, it is an ill-arranged and dusty museum, full of old things that attract all the curious of Europe, but in which even the ruins are ruined."

Gabriel's arguments and his descriptions of the splendors of foreign civilisations open the eyes of the simple-minded audience of poor lay folk who collect every evening in the bell-ringer's house to listen to him, and gradually their simple minds, long nursed in isolation from the great world, are inflamed with envy and greed. The main thesis of the author is skilfully preserved from becoming tedious by being diversified with life-like little episodes of various contemporary clerical scandals. Thus Esteban's charming daughter, Sangrario, who has been seduced by a military cadet and has run away to Madrid, is at length found and brought back to "the Claverias" by old Aunt Tomasa. The Cardinal Archbishop Don Sebastian's furious quarrels with the Chapter, his past intimacy with a certain devout lady, and the calumnies circulated by his enemies concerning the girl Visitacion, who is believed to be his mistress, but is, in fact, his dearly beloved daughter, are also cleverly presented along with the good Aunt Tomasa's reflections, "Believe me, no saints enter here; they are men, nothing but men." Gabriel receives the confidences of everyone by turns, of Don Luis, the chapel-master, who asserts that "the Church does not love music, and does not understand it," and of Don Martin, the poor chaplain, who receives only a miserable seven duros a month with which to support himself and his old peasant mother. We, indeed, perceive, long before the end of the book is near, that Gabriel, the hero, is not a real man, but a convenient channel through which a ruthless picture of Spanish Catholicism has been presented to us. The end is tragedy. Gabriel by his eloquence has sown the revolutionary seed only too thoroughly, and he is killed by some of the desperate spirits among the poor lay-brothers when he interferes to prevent them stealing the jewels off the Virgin on the high altar.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

One of the many piquant stories told in Vasari's "Lives" is that of the friar-artist, Filippo Lippi, and his liaison with the nun Lucrezia. In "The Romance of Fra Filippo Lippi" (Stanley Paul, 10s. 6d.), Mr. A. J. Anderson has reconstructed this story in the light of personal impressions based on "some experience of human life, an intimate knowledge of Catholics, and a close study of Fra Filippo's paintings"; the result being a pretty tale of true love that ran very crooked for a while, but ultimately ended as it should. Vasari's version, it will be remembered, relates how a papal dispensation, legalising their union, was granted to the erring couple, but how Filippo refused to accept it for reasons highly discreditable to himself, and most modern writers have taken their facts and their conclusions as to Filippo's morals from this source. Mr. Anderson, however, re-unites the "Glad Friar" and Lucrezia in wedlock duly authorised by His Holiness, and ends the tale on a note of high respectability. This, of course, involves the complete whitewashing of Filippo, who is transformed from a libertine into a fine and simple, if full-blooded character, and, incidentally, the virtual canonisation of Lucrezia, not to mention the presentation in the kindliest light of Cosimo de' Medici, Pope Pius II., the Lady Abbess, and everybody else mixed up with the episode. It also involves—as we discover in Appendix A.—a rather warm argument in favor of the convent system, the desirability of which in fifteenth-century Prato is rather strangely deduced from the writer's own experience of an existing establishment in England. Mr. Anderson's belligerent attitude, however, towards those writers who have accepted the popular ideas of Filippo and Lucrezia and convents is confined to the appendices, and does not affect the interest of his romance. This latter mixture of fact and imagination is skilfully compounded, the dialogue is comparatively free from solecisms, and Italian social life in the fifteenth century is presented under the cleanest conditions compatible with any sort of probability. The book could go into a schoolroom, even into a convent, without doing any damage. It is illustrated with reproductions of seventeen pictures by Filippo, including a photogravure portrait of Lucrezia as a frontispiece.

The scope of Dr. T. Kirke Rose's "The Precious Metals" (Constable, 6s. net) does not include questions of currency and finance, but, as an introduction to the study of metallurgy per se, the book contains all the information that the average reader can desire. As chemist and assayer of the Royal Mint, and vice-president of the Institution of Mining and Metallurgy, Dr. Rose writes with unusual authority on this always fascinating subject. Gold, silver, and platinum are the precious metals dealt with. A brief historical sketch reminds us that gold was well known in Egypt 5,500 years ago, and that the ancient methods of obtaining it are illustrated in rock carvings still preserved in that country. Ore-crushing was established there in B.C. 59; we have the testimony of Diodorus, the Sicilian, as to the pitiful condition of the mine-workers in those days. The Middle Ages produced the alchemists, and their fruitless endeavors to manufacture gold out of something else was followed in the sixteenth century by a more practical development, namely, the introduction of the stamp mill in Germany. A systematic account of the properties of the metals and the modern processes of their production occupies the remainder of the volume. Gold and its alloys, its occurrence in nature, and its treatment by washing and amalgamation, comes first, and is followed by descriptions on the same lines of silver and platinum. We are given an insight into the practical working of a mine, are initiated into the mysteries of refining, assaying, and minting, and are told how imitation gold and silver wares are produced. The concluding chapter contains tabulated statements of the world's gold and silver production since the end of the fifteenth century, the earlier returns of gold being according to Soetbeer's estimates, while the later estimates of both metals are those of the United States Mint. A large selection of photographs of mining plant, of the Royal Mint, and other pertinent subjects, illustrates this most instructive hand-book.

"Enchanters of Men," by Miss Ethel Colburn Mayne (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net), deals under five headings—"The Royal Mistress," "The Courtesan," "The Royal Lady," "The Star," and "The Egeria"—with twenty-three ladies, ranging from Diane de Poitiers to Adah Isaacs Menken. Most of these "enchanters" have already been the subject of separate volumes, and we can see little use in attempting to compress into a dozen pages the careers of Marie Antoinette, Ninon de Lenclos, or Sophie Arnould, to mention three of Miss Mayne's heroines, who were very unlike in character. Few of the essays are without some touch which shows that Miss Mayne has taken pains to realise to herself the character of the woman she writes about, but the book as a whole is marred by the mannered style she has chosen to adopt. Nearly half the sentences end with exclamation marks, and the preciosity which Miss Mayne affects often borders dangerously upon the ludicrous.

"Worcestershire, Painted by Thomas Tyndale and Described by A. G. Bradley" (A. and C. Black, 7s. 6d. net), will certainly rank among the best volumes of a well-known series. Mr. Bradley's text, in particular, is admirable. He deals with the landscape features of the county eloquently and yet succinctly, leaving a clear picture of their character in the mind; and the many stirring episodes of history with which Worcestershire is connected are recounted with no slight dramatic power. Nothing could be more vivid than his description of the Civil War as it was fought in these parts, or that of the last desperate fight and flight of Catesby and the Wyntours, the Gunpowder Plot conspirators, in the Huddington district. Many another famous memory is awakened by the names of Evesham, Ludlow, and Edgehill. Worcestershire, in fact, though not recognised as a tourist's resort, is one of the most interesting counties in England in regard to historical associations. Geographically it is not without distinctions of its own.

By HUGH DE SÉLINCOURT. [Just Out.

Mr. de Sélincourt is already known as the author of "A Boy's Marriage," "The High Adventure," and that much-discussed play, "Loyalty," produced the other day at the Court Theatre. The style of his new novel is in the true line of succession from his previous essays. The story, which is a study of a lonely lady of middle years, is carried through on a note of seriousness, but is untainted by anything dismal or sordid, such as characterises much of the best of modern fiction. Mr. de Sélincourt is proud to be an apostle of joy, and he enshrines what he has to say in an atmosphere of beautiful serenity.

The following letter has been received from the Bishop of Hereford by the publisher of Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole's novel "THE POOLS OF SILENCE."

The Palace, Hereford,
July 12th, 1909.

"DEAR MR. FISHER UNWIN,

"I have found the copy of Mr. Stacpoole's 'Pools of Silence' waiting for me on my return from Germany, and I have just read it; and I hope it may be widely read, and may help to rouse all England to a proper sense of our share of responsibility for the abominations which, as we are informed, are still allowed to continue in the Congo territory.

"King Leopold stands condemned before the Christian world for his part in these abominations. One is tempted to say of him—may the Lord reward him according to his works!

"And it is sad to see that the Belgian Government and people seem to be in imminent danger of coming under the same condemnation.

"I sincerely hope that our Government may be stirred up to save us from any longer sharing in the disgrace brought upon Western civilisation by Congo mis-rule, and may do something adequate for the relief of those unhappy natives who are suffering under it.—Believe me, Yours sincerely,

"J. HEREFORD."

"The three most conspicuous physical facts in Worcestershire," writes Mr. Bradley, "are the Malvern Range, the River Severn, and Bredon Hill." On each and all of these he has a good deal to say. His likening of the Malvern Hills to "some detached section of a Welsh mountain range that has broken away and wandered incontinently on to the edge of the English Midlands, a strange alien among the fat plains of the Saxon," will strike those who know Malvern as eminently just. His observations on the county's wriggling boundary are equally happy, and the influence of Birmingham on its north-east corner has not been missed. The country industries of present-day Worcestershire, chief among which is fruit-growing, are necessarily treated very briefly and generally, but here again we find evidence of the author's comprehensive vision of his subject. There are, it is true, important things left out; some mention might, for instance, have been made of the small holdings in connection with Bromsgrove, which place, we believe, was about the first to establish the movement successfully. However, one cannot have everything in a book of these dimensions, and, on the whole, there is little fault to be found with Mr. Bradley's selection of matter. Mr. Tyndale's art is familiar to us through previous color-books he has illustrated. The tender color and soft luminosity of his drawings redeem them from the insipidity which their rather commonplace composition might otherwise impose.

There is a spurious kind of garden literature that has very little to do with gardening. A horticultural title is blazoned on the cover of a book; the contents, beyond a few general references, perhaps, to dahlias and sunflowers, concern anything except what lies nearest to the heart of the gardening enthusiast. We have met with several of these books lately, in which a garden is merely the mise en scène for a discussion about nothing in particular. Miss Helen Ashe Hays, the author of "A Little Maryland Garden" (Putnam's Sons, 7s. 6d. net), has, however, employed no such subterfuge. Her book is precisely what its title promises, a real garden book, practical without being unpoetical; a record of a year's work and observation, month by month, in a garden which she herself created and cultivated. As such it contains many useful hints to the would-be gardener. She has also studied her Maeterlinck, who "can picture a flower in a phrase," and other authors who have taught the larger philosophy of gardening in its relation to the human soul, and have driven home the lesson that the pleasure to be derived from a garden does not depend upon the latter's acreage. In this story of a fascinating hobby made more fascinating by its disappointments, the style is refreshingly direct and succeeds to a very large extent in communicating the enthusiasm it expresses. Moreover, the volume itself is as dainty a piece of book-making as one could wish for. The color reproductions of Miss Steele's drawings prove this artist's sympathy with her subject, and, while not wanting in vivacity, evidence an appreciation of atmosphere and values that is not always found in illustrations of this kind. The lifelessness that makes a patchwork quilt of so many representations of plants has no place in her beds and herbaceous borders. It was, too, a happy idea to preface each chapter with a page of prose or verse from the classics of garden literature, each suitably embellished with a floral design.

In striving to wean Social Democracy from the materialistic and revolutionary dogmas forced upon it in early infancy by the dominant authority of Marx and Engels, and to bring it into harmony with the more enlightened form of constructive liberalism, Herr Bernstein is doing a work of immense importance, not only for Germany, but for the politics of other countries, where the same problem of socialising liberalism and liberalising socialism confronts workers for progress. His little book, "Evolutionary Socialism" (Independent Labor Party, 1s. 6d. net), has gone through many German editions, and a translation of it is particularly acceptable at the present time. Though Marx's magnum opus is not now widely read in this country, its main ideas, crystallised in hard, dogmatic judgments, and often unintelligently repeated, have done much to maintain the false notion that progress is directed by a purely economic fatalism, and that only by an accentuation of class war can social justice be attained. Herr Bernstein, in a number of closely reasoned and well-informed statements, shows exactly what sort of modifications of doctrine and of policy are necessary in order to bring social democracy within the range of possibility. His long residence in England has enabled him to bring a close knowledge of our working-class movements to bear upon the situation in his own country where political representation is still so incomplete that the State appears to the workers an external control, and where the trade union and co-operative movements have but recently become important influences in the life of the workers. No more useful book could be put into the hands of a college don or an intelligent artisan to check the crude views of socialism he may have picked up from his "Times" or "Daily Mail."

Mr. Montgomery Carmichael's volume, "In Tuscany," published some time ago, showed such a singularly sympathetic and pleasing touch that one regrets that his literary output has not been more considerable. In his "Francia's Masterpiece" (Kegan Paul, 5s. net) he gives us a work that is quite as happy as its predecessors, the masterpiece referred to being the altar-piece representing, as Mr. Carmichael contends, the Immaculate Conception, which is to be seen in the church of San Frediano, Lucca. The book, however, is much more than a study of a single picture. It is also an essay on the beginnings of the Immaculate Conception in art, and it contains several novel and interesting hypotheses. To begin with, the title he gives to Francia's picture is itself hypothetical to a large extent, since the majority of writers have called this work an "Assumption" or a "Coronation," and one—Mrs. Jameson—denies that Immaculate Conception pictures came into existence until the seventeenth century. As the result, however, of his own theological knowledge and of research in the Lucca archives, Mr. Carmichael establishes the fact that the subject of Francia's altar-piece is the Immaculate Conception, and that another altar-piece, in the neighboring church of San Francesco, painted ten years before, is an earlier representation of the same subject. The case he makes for his theory is that of a theologian rather than an art critic, but it is a very convincing one. Moreover, the theology is in no way dry; while we may hasten to assure the author that the recital of his researches among records, which enabled him to arrive at his conclusions step by step, requires no apology for its existence. It is part of his aim, as he tells us, in writing the book, to write also the way in which it came to be written. In general the volume, which embodies a frank declaration of the importance of subject in a picture, sheds a good deal of fresh light on the meaning of religious pictures, while those who are interested in the history of the particular doctrine illustrated by the altar-piece will discover in its pages valuable information and comment persuasively and not too heavily set forth.

A number of writers of English history have tried to do for the children what Froude and Richard Green have done for the grown-up reader. Only a very few have succeeded in the attempt. To write history for children is a very difficult task. It requires not merely the faculty for scrupulous selection, but an historical imagination that must be given rein and yet kept well within the limits imposed by youthful intelligence. The judicial mind is essential. A partisan historian can wreak more harm among the rising generation than any other species of educator. In "Stories of the English, Told to a Child by F." (Blackwood, 5s. net) we have a good attempt to make history instructive and attractive. The scope of the work is the history of England from the landing of Hengist and Horsa to the Battle of Waterloo; and while the stories are self-contained, the continuity of the whole narrative is adroitly preserved, in such a way that the average child would only become aware of the fact in after years. To every chapter is appended a note, addressed to a little girl called Susan, for whose benefit the stories were originally written, and in these notes mention is made of some historic monument, still extant, which is a reminder of which "M.A.P." in the issue of July 17, in the "Book of the Week" notice said:

"To give the story more fully would spoil the reading of the book; complication follows complication, and the love of Osteric and Beltis keeps growing in spite of separation and imprisonment. But as I have said above, clever and well conceived as is the plot and its development, Miss Forbes Robertson's clear, well-chosen English, her learned comprehension of the characters and period about which she writes, and the general excellence of the handling of her materials, make her book one which cannot be passed over by lovers of sound and promising work."

Daily Telegraph: "A most excellent romance, thoroughly interesting, extremely well written and worked out and should win high favour with all lovers of spirited historical fiction. He will find it hard to put down the volume when he has once got well into the story. Very ingeniously has the author worked out his plot. A really fine tale. We heartily recommend it to all readers in confidence that they will not be disappointed."

Times: "Mr. Drummond writes the historical novel with much talent, a busy, spirited story."

Truth: "A stirring picture of Eighteenth Century Court Life at St. Petersburg and Versailles."

Guardian: "A spirited historical romance—wonderfully well rendered."

Morning Leader: "It might be imagined that no one could write a fresh, original, historical novel about France, but Mr. Drummond has done so. A striking, vigorous, and charming romance."

Observer: "The picture of the precarious Court life is vivid in the extreme and makes the book one to read and remember."

Early Reviews.

The Sunday Chronicle in devoting three columns to noticing the book says: "A great fascinating and picturesque romance."

Scotsman says: "The narrative is pervaded by human sentiment, the atmosphere of the Florence of the Day is happily reproduced, and his 'reconstruction' of the scene in the Convent in which the 'Glad Friar' as he was called, falls a victim to the charms of his model, has an air of verisimilitude which some of the older accounts do not possess."

Globe says: "The ways and manners of Florence and Prato during the middle of the Fifteenth Century are portrayed with carefulness and the central figures of the story are well and clearly defined. The book should recommend itself to all interested in romance and in the life of the Friar Artist. Its illustrations are excellently reproduced."

of the events detailed in the preceding chapter. These monuments are chosen with a proper regard for their power to impress the average child's mind and so establish therein a stable memory of the events they illustrate. Intricate matters of constitution and law are wisely kept in the background; one would not try to interest a youngster in history by providing a preliminary course of Stubbs and Maine. On the other hand, social history is skilfully introduced at the points where it is necessary to explain or vivify a political incident. But, above all, "F," who, we believe, is a woman, shows beneath the literary romance with which she clothes her facts a wonderful grasp of the facts themselves and a power of grouping them in a sympathetic picture that appeals to readers a good deal older than her immediate audience. For instance, her brief account of the Great Rebellion indicates the character of the fighting so admirably that many an Honours man at the universities would derive benefit from reading it. Valuable also are the reproductions of old portraits, engravings, and prints with which the volume is embellished. In affording facsimile representations of the various men, places, customs, and costumes during different periods, they help to realise the times they illustrate.

Depressing influences have been rather busy during the week. The addition of four "Dreadnoughts" to the naval programme and the unfriendly exchanges of opinion between the London and Berlin Press with regard to the possibility of a naval understanding caused a relapse in Consols. Sir Robert Giffen's article in the "Quarterly" advising that the sinking fund should be abandoned and used for war preparations has also been disquieting, while Mr. Balfour's declaration to his City audience that more money is required for the Navy and that the Government naval programme is dangerously meagre, indicates the possibility of our finances getting into serious disorder before long. Then again the trouble in Spain, arising out of the Moroccan war, has been seriously regarded, and Spanish bonds fell sharply in consequence. The heavy losses at Melilla were only known on Thursday afternoon, but the selling of Spanish bonds in London was checked by the more confident tone of Paris where a great part of the Spanish debt is held. Peruvians have improved owing to the law suit between the Corporation and the Government having been won by the former, and there has also been some speculative buying of Central Americans, especially Porto Ricans and Honduras bonds. The Home Railway market and industrial securities have suffered from fears of a general coal strike. The readiness of the men to enter into a hazardous struggle of this sort is a painful surprise. But it is, of course, still hoped that conciliation will succeed in averting a catastrophe. Another important event to investors has been the action of the directors of the United States Steel Corporation in raising the dividend on the common stock to three per cent., thus affording a certain outward justification to the high price which the stock has recently attained. Some operators are now asserting that Mr. Pierpont Morgan's well-known prediction that he will live to see the stock at par is likely to be justified very soon. On the other hand leading American bankers say that the prices of American industrials and railroads are far higher than they should be on any reasonable estimate of trade conditions and prospects. The corn crops promise well. But if they are very heavy money may become dear, and that would cause a lot of selling by tired speculators.

The Report on Gold Reserves.

The report of a Committee of the London Chamber of Commerce on means to be taken for strengthening our gold reserves is being a good deal criticised by bankers in the City. Out of some twenty-four members of the Committee only six were bankers, and of these six three or four refused to sign, or signed only with important reservations. Some of the leading bank managers are quite satisfied with our present system, which worked so well during the American crisis, and seems capable of meeting any conceivable strain. To increase our gold reserves means to keep more treasure hoarded and unemployed. This is bad economy. What we need is good banking, not more gold. The consequences of bad banking cannot be cured by large reserves. The discussion, no doubt, does good, and tends to make bankers careful not to work on two narrow a margin. But neither the Government, nor the Bank of England, nor the joint stock banks as a whole are at all likely to take the steps recommended by the London Chamber of Commerce. Something, however, may be done in the way of introducing weekly averages of the cash held by the banks.

Taft and the Tariff.

After his election President Taft intimated to his friends that his tariff platform must be interpreted to mean revision downwards in the interests of the consumers. The Payne tariff, however, was little better than its predecessor, and the Aldrich tariff was worse. It was evidently thought, however, that the President would readily sign the tariff Bill if a few minor concessions were made. Now, however, we are told that confusion reigns in Washington because the President is proving unexpectedly stiff. He seems to be convinced that public opinion is behind him, and a Republican convention in Nebraska has passed a resolution asking him not to sign unless substantial reductions are made. He wishes to sweep away the tariff in hide, leather, and boots, and also to cut down the glove and hosiery and cotton schedules. But apparently he is afraid of touching the wool and woollen tariff. The accounts of the "trading" that is going on between the various interests and lobbies in Washington would make any decent Tariff Reformer's hair stand on end.

President Reyes.

The retirement of General Reyes, the intrepid explorer, is an event of some importance in South American history. He became President of Colombia in August, 1904, when the fortunes of the Republic were at their lowest. The Department of Panama had just been lost, and with it all prospect of future raids upon the United States Treasury; the internal condition, currency, and credit were all at their worst. The legal term of office is four years, but General Reyes contrived that he should be elected for a period of ten. He has been compared to Porfirio Diaz, and at one time it was surmised that an equally bright future was before him; but he seems to have been of late gradually losing ground. Numerous plots were directed against him during his first two years of office, and in 1906 eight shots were fired at him, five of which struck his carriage. He certainly was not cruel, and strenuously denied any breach of the Constitution—"Under the laws of the country I have hitherto governed, and shall continue to govern, without giving anyone just grounds for laying to my charge a single illegal act, or to denounce me as a Dictator." This, however, is a small matter in comparison with the quality of his administration; the state of Colombia urgently required a benevolent Dictator, and, on the whole, found one in General Reyes. He introduced economies, cut down military expenses, and made serious efforts to meet the evils of the coinage and foreign indebtedness, and, though, of course, progress was necessarily slow, the improvement was considerable. In 1903, Colombian bonds were about 15, in 1906 they were 45 or 46, and now they are somewhat above the last figure. It is to be hoped that the change of rulers will be made without bloodshed, but it is difficult to believe that the resignation of General Reyes will make for the security or tranquillity of Colombia.

To Parents and Guardians, and all desirous of becoming Practical Journalists.
To meet a long-felt want THE PRESS TUITION BUREAU have instituted a
Special Five-Guinea Course of Journalistic Instruction, arranged for the convenience of those who are anxious to enter the higher branches of Journalism, which includes the London daily newspapers, the leading provincial journals, and the good-class magazines and reviews, but who do not care to waste several valuable years in the drudgery of filling minor and badly-paid posts.
Those who are desirous of choosing a profession, either for themselves or those connected with them, cannot do better at the present time than direct their thoughts towards the path of Journalism. The modern spread of education has resulted in a demand for reading matter of every description, covering every conceivable subject, and appealing to every possible class. In consequence, there has been a marvellous increase in the output of British literary matter, but still the supply is not equal to the demand.
Our Five-Guinea Course includes a Literary Section and a Business Section, also Criticisms of Manuscripts.

Diary of the Week.

A remarkable change has come over the political situation. On Friday week Mr. Lloyd George delivered at Limehouse a brilliant and outspoken, but good-tempered, exposition of the working of unearned increment and the abuses of the leasehold system. Pleading for the constructive side of the Budget, which, he said, endeavored to cut a new and pleasanter path through the brambles and thorns of poverty, laid bare no cupboard and made no poor man's lot harder, he gave a series of vivid and simple illustrations of the evils at which it struck. He instanced the case of what he called "the golden swamp" of the Lea, where land, once rated at £2 or £3 an acre, was sold at £8,000, of land at Golder's Green, once sold at £160, and since the opening of the tube railway sold at £2,100, and of the famous dealings of the Duke of Westminster with Mr. Gorringe. He ridiculed the action of landlords who cut down their gardeners but not their gamekeepers, and warned them that land-holding was not an enjoyment but a trust. This straight dealing, spiced with raillery, was not a whit more advanced in tone than Mr. Chamberlain's Ransom speech, and by no means so fierce in style.

But the utterance roused a wild storm. Sir Edward Carson wrote to the "Times" suggesting that Mr. Lloyd George now stood revealed as Jack Cade, and that the Opposition should stop the discussion of the land clauses. A few hours later, however, these tactics were changed, and a flag of distress was held out. On Wednesday the "Political Notes" of the "Times" contained a hint that the political situation had "undergone a change," that the High Peak result had taken the heart out of the Opposition, that the Government was stronger, and felt themselves stronger, and, in a word, that the tide had turned. The following day the "Morning Post" contained a similar suggestion, while the "Daily Mail," italicising these intimations, published a two-column article, in its largest type, from its Parliamentary correspondent, admitting that the Unionist reports were bad, and that the country appeared to care neither for the Dukes nor for the victims of the super-tax. All these organs suggested that the discussions on the land taxes should be cut short. It is no secret that these public confessions of failure are shared by the Tariff Reformers, who have carried on a vituperative private comment on Mr. Balfour's Parliamentary tactics. The idea now is that the taxes on undeveloped land will go through largely unchanged, that the City will be pacified over the stamp duties, and that there will be some concessions to hotel-keepers and to the London brewers. It is openly hinted in the "Birmingham Post," and elsewhere, that if these claims are conceded the Budget may be through the House of Commons in September and will become law a month or so later.

The secession of the "Mail" and the lukewarmness of the "Times" and the "Post" have caused a panic in the Tory camp, which has witnessed this flouting of its much advertised plan of campaign and revolution. The "Standard" bewails the "cry of despair arising from journals supposed to be loyal to the Unionist cause," but admits that the thought of the rejection of the Bill is now outside the counsels of the Unionist leaders, and that only amendment, and a "course of gradual surrender" by the Chancellor are to be hoped for. The "Telegraph" is acutely distressed, exclaiming at the "shame and folly" of a Unionist "capitulation" and asking where is the manhood of Lord Northcliffe that he can suggest such a course. But this talk is too late. No army can fight when one half calls "forward" and the other half "back," especially when the other half is right.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced a fresh series of amendments to the land clauses of the Finance Bill, designed to meet a series of hard cases. Thus the undeveloped land tax is not to apply to cases in which the owners have spent £100 an acre on it for purposes of development, or where the land is being kept free of buildings on a "definite scheme" of development. Agricultural land is definitely secured from the tax on increment, through the formula that the tax is not to apply while the land is of "no higher value than its value for agricultural purposes." Amounts paid for increment duty are also to be deducted from the value of a holding which is called upon to pay estate duty. It is further understood that the valuation is to be conducted at the cost of the State. We believe that it will be spread over about three years, and the cost is estimated to be within one million and a-half. The first valuation will be of urban and suburban lands, where the chief sources of increment duty accrue.

Mr. Churchill, speaking at Bournemouth on Saturday week, outlined the Government's schemes of insurance against unemployment, sickness, invalidity, and death, on a scale "undreamt of as practised in the history of our country," and claimed that this policy was essential to security as well as progress. On Monday, speaking at Canford Park, he prophesied confidently that the land proposals would take their place on the Statute Book. If the Lords touched finance the whole force of Liberal government would disappear. It would be a "crime" to democracy to acquiesce in the "slightest mutilation" of the Budget by the House of Lords. As it left the House of Commons, so it must stand or fall.

The Tsar and Tsarina arrived in the Solent on Monday morning in the yacht "Standart," and were met by the King, and afterwards greeted by the assembled British fleet, through which the royal yacht passed. At a dinner party, the King, giving the Emperor's health, spoke of early family ties between the two Houses, declared that the fleet, "the most powerful and largest" ever assembled, was a symbol not of war, but of peace, and, somewhat significantly, linked the Tsar's visit with his reception of the members of the Duma. He hoped that the visit would strengthen the "good feeling" which existed between the two countries. The Tsar reciprocated the family recollections, and spoke of the "growing cordial relationship" between the two lands, founded both on interest and esteem, language which points to a somewhat close diplomatic relationship. On the following day both the Tsar and his family paid visits to the shore, the children stopping at Cowes and the Tsar visiting Osborne College and House. His yacht, the "Standart," was, throughout, rigidly guarded by a ring of torpedo boats and war vessels.

On Thursday, addresses were presented to the Tsar by the City Corporation, the London and Liverpool Chambers of Commerce, and other bodies, and the visit was wound up by a fervently-worded message in which he declared that his affectionate greeting by our Royal Family and the "attitude of British statesmen, people, and Press" were happy auguries for the future of the two nations. This attitude, we need not point out, is far from unanimous. On Monday an open letter was addressed to Sir Edward Grey, signed by two Bishops and many Anglican and Nonconformist dignitaries, three peers, including Lord Courtney, over seventy Liberal and Labor members of Parliament, and a body of authors, professors, editors, and other men of note, recalling the unsparing and extra-legal character of the system of repression on which the Tsar's rule rests. While welcoming the development of friendly relationships, it asked the Government to exert its influence to ameliorate the evils which it described. We cannot see on what ground such a plea can be refused.

The Master of Elibank, the new Under-Secretary for India, explained the Indian Budget to the House of Commons on Thursday. The financial situation which it revealed was bad, with some prospects of betterment. The period of prosperity being over, there was a deficit of $3\frac{3}{4}$ millions. Famine and plague, India's twin scourges, still prevailed, but in diminishing volume. Mr. Murray praised Lord Kitchener's military administration, but it has been terribly costly, especially in respect of military works, the increase coinciding with the easing of the Russian strain. The Under-Secretary announced a very useful attempt to discover some means of shepherding Indian students in England so as to save them from the influences which perverted Dhingra.

On the question of order Mr. Murray announced no definite change of policy, but quoted John Mill in defence of a measure of repression in communities which failed to co-operate freely with the law, and had no regard for it—a difficulty for which both in India and in Ireland Liberalism has in the main found one kind of remedy and Toryism another. The Radicals again criticised the deportations, and rightly pleaded for amnesty, which we hope Lord Morley will concede as the scheme of reform assumes a workable shape. Liberals should, we think, be careful to present the Indian community with a full view of the importance of this great departure and of the fact that it, and not the passing phase of repression, is the key-note of Lord Morley's statesmanship.

The Spanish Government appears to have put down the rising in Catalonia. They got the upper hand in Barcelona by Saturday, after heavy reinforcements had reached the garrison and artillery had been brought into action. The censorship still continues, so that it is impossible to know how severe was the fighting. The authorities put the killed at 100 and wounded at 1,000, and some thirty-seven convents and churches were burned. They profess to have only 400 prisoners at Montjuich, and deny that any rebels have been summarily shot, though pretty definite reports tell a very different tale. The stories of murdered monks and nuns and tortured policemen are pure fables. The rising was anti-clerical, partly because of the competition of conventual institutions, but regard was paid to business-houses and factories. The Government claims that there is complete tranquillity in other cities. The general strike proclaimed by the Socialists in Madrid for Monday failed because the authorities arrested the Socialist leaders and threatened military action against all strikers. It is, perhaps, of significance that, despite expressions of official optimism, the Queen remains close to the French frontier. Hardly any fighting has taken place at Melilla during the last week, but the Moors are as numerous and resolute as ever.

Mr. Churchill and Mr. Askwith—one of the ablest of our civil servants—have saved the country the immense loss involved in a general strike of coal miners, as the result of the Scottish dispute. The vital point of the settlement is the withdrawal by the Scottish coalowners of the demand for a reduction of the minimum wage from 6s. to 5s. 6d. a day. In return, the Federation abandons the idea of a general strike, and agrees to set up a scale of prices on this basis, with a reference to a neutral arbitrator in cases of disputed interpretation. The moral of the quarrel, which nearly culminated in a national disaster, is probably the necessity of a Wages Board.

On Wednesday one of the greatest labor conflicts of modern times began in Sweden. The Swedish employers in certain industries have been insisting upon a serious reduction in wages, and at the same time the Employers' Federation has been carrying on a systematic attack on the rights of trade unions to share in determining the wages and conditions of labor. To enforce their demands they locked out 80,000 men. The Federation of Trade Unions replied by proclaiming a general strike for Wednesday. There are about 530,000 workers employed in industry, commerce, and transport, of whom 230,000 are organised. Of the organised workers 161,000 belong to the Federation, and the remaining 70,000 are for the most part on friendly relations with the Federation, and many of them have joined the strike. Municipal and postal officials and tramwaymen have thrown in their lot with the Federation, and the railway men may do likewise. So general an industrial conflict is almost without precedent, and it could have been avoided but for the narrowness as well as the inexperience of the directors of Swedish industry, who are frequently lawyers.

On Wednesday, the Home Secretary introduced a Bill for the regulation of shop hours. It is not to be pushed through this session, and it is to be threshed out by the representatives of employers and workers with a view to an uncontested passage next year. The measure differs somewhat from Sir Charles Dilke's Bill, which forms the model for this kind of legislation. It sets up a sixty hours' normal week for shop assistants, exclusive of meals, allows a maximum of sixty hours' overtime in the course of the year, provides a weekly half-holiday for every shop, the day to be fixed by the local authority, and enacts general Sunday closing, subject to an exception in favor of Jewish traders. The Bill has, we hope, every chance of succeeding, for it means an immense gain to that national treasure, the time and health of the people. A million and a half of traders and assistants are concerned in it.

The result of the first bye-election in Germany since the passing of the Clerical-Agrarian finance "reform" scheme is very significant. It took place in Neustadt, a division of the Palatinate which had been held by the National Liberals for more than forty years. At the first ballot the Socialist received 8,300 votes (an increase of 2,000 on the Socialist poll in 1907) against 8,857 for the Liberal, 7,129 for the Clerical, and 2,088 for the Agrarian. The Agrarians were instructed to vote Liberal and the Clericals to abstain at the second ballot, but the Socialist carried the seat by 12,719 against the Liberals 11,765. The Socialists themselves admit that their victory is due to Clerical support. But the Press of all colors agrees that the return of the Socialist in this National Liberal stronghold is the strongest condemnation of the reactionary budget, which imposed the giant's share of the new burdens upon the working and middle classes. These, to express their resentment, have voted for the extreme party and the one which fought the budget most resolutely. This is an omen for us.

The "deadlock" between the Tariff Conference and Mr. Taft was rapidly arranged by slight reductions of duties, chiefly the duties on hides, coal, and iron. Even Mr. Payne, one of its sponsors, admits that the tariff in its final form increases duties on goods valued at £170,000,000, and decreases them on goods valued only at £90,000,000. The tariff finally passed the House of Representatives on Saturday after a hard fight. In two important divisions the majorities were five and twelve, and a hearty rally by the Democrats might have secured its rejection. Eighteen Western Republicans voted against their party, and two Southern Democrats, facts which indicate the movement of the West towards a low tariff and of the South towards high protection. The Senate entered on the final discussion of the tariff on Thursday. No difficulty is expected in getting it through. The sentiment of the country is dead against this new piratical tariff, and the Democrats are in high hopes of carrying the next Congress elections, which will take place after the new duties have produced their inevitable result of sensibly raising the cost of living.

The Neergard Cabinet has resigned, which probably means the end of an ambitious militarist policy in Denmark. For a generation, Danish Conservatives, inspired by memories of the war of 1864, have been agitating for an extensive system of fortifications against Germany, and encouraging the hope that, in the event of war between England and Germany, the lost provinces might be recovered. They managed to create a considerable uneasiness, and Mr. Neergard in February took up their scheme. He became Premier when the Christensen Cabinet was ruined by the Alberti scandals. Mr. Christensen, however, remained a power, and he was against the fortification of Copenhagen. The elections in May left the Cabinet in a minority, but Mr. Neergard hoped to get Mr. Christensen's support. It was refused, and the Cabinet had to retire. It is possible that a compromise may be arranged to suit Mr. Christensen, but more probably the whole fortification scheme will be dropped, and Danish politics be relieved of an absurd and dangerous nightmare.

On Monday Mr. Haldane stated the Government's plans for the study and development of aeronautics in application to war. Mr. Haldane explained that the work was divided between the Army and the Navy. The former were spending £36,000 a year, the latter £35,000. The Navy were dealing with the rigid dirigible machine, the Army with the non-rigid dirigible, a division of labor which but for the cachet attached to it by so clear a thinker as Mr. Haldane, might seem more than a little absurd. A great experimental apparatus has been provided and is working under the auspices of the differential calculus. We should have thought a still more urgent investigation for a Liberal Government was to discover whether mankind, having an ample experience of war on the land, was also to be plagued by war in the air. A phrase in a règlement attached to the Hague Convention of 1907 appears to prohibit the use of aerial bombs against undefended towns and habitations of men. But no general prohibition of aerial warfare has been secured. Is not this an object of the highest importance?

A remarkable admission, which ought not to be lost sight of, was made by Mr. Redford, on Friday week, in the course of his evidence before the Joint Committee on the Censorship. He stated, in answer to Mr. Harcourt, that he had sent a telegram to the manager of "The Follies," declaring that "no skit" would be "permitted" on "An Englishman's Home." He added that, in this matter, he had simply obeyed instructions, and had no personal initiative. We are thus driven back on to the Lord Chamberlain, a Court official, as the real power in the Censorship. In the instance of the production of "An Englishman's Home," this authority permits a play advocating conscription, and interdicts a caricature of this subject and its treatment. In the same way it licenses a play like "John Bull's Other Island" which is more or less a satire on Liberal ideas of Irish policy, and refuses to license a play called "Press Cuttings," which is, in the main, a satire at the expense of politicians of the type of Lord Roberts. This seems to us a point which politicians as well as literary men should keep in view.

THE FLIGHT OF THE OPPOSITION.

We ventured some weeks ago to predict that well before the great Day of Pheasants arrived the Landlords' Army would be retiring from the Battle of the Budget. But we certainly did not anticipate that it would be in full flight in the first week of August. Such, however, is the mournful truth. Whether it be the Limehouse speech, or the grouse, or the discovery of the Tariff Reformers that a millionaire is not an object of popular idolatry, or a ground landlord beloved from pole to pole of the British Isles, or whether it be a mixture of all these economic, political, prudential, and merely pleasurable calculations, is not for us to say. Suffice it to remark that the "Times," that ancient pilot of opportunism, has already discovered that there is a change in the political situation "comparable only to the turn of the tide upon an estuary when moored boats swing slowly round," and that the "Morning Post," while delicately hinting that "the bulk of the fighting over the land tax part of the Budget is over," laments that its opponents have concerned themselves "too much with the case of the large owners." Still nimbler has been the strategic movement of the "Daily Mail." That impartial organ of high and low life proclaimed the Budget, on the day after its appearance, to be not merely the "bankruptcy of free trade" and the "death-knell of a fetich," but "a vote-detaching agency." To-day its opinion has changed. Having discovered from researches in High Peak and elsewhere that the Budget's vote-attaching capacities were of no mean order, it devoted two columns of its space and the largest type at its disposal to a slightly belated but transparently sincere eulogy of the Budget, its "great" development scheme and large plans of "relief in sickness," its "scientific encouragement of rural industry," and its "practical help to the new population" which another Government measure, the Small Holdings Act, was placing on the land. Secure in the support of the people and of the "Daily Mail," Ministers are told that they can now go boldly forward, for the Opposition, save in the City, has "fallen flat," and "the defeat of the Budget will soon be past praying for." We are sorry not to be able at this moment to lay at Mr. Lloyd George's feet the late though heartfelt tribute of the "Spectator," but we have no doubt it will prove to be the choicest and most feeling of these offerings of repentance.

To most sober observers of politics it would seem as if this hysterical retreat, following on an equally hysterical agitation, were the appropriate mark of a bad cause, and of a false, violent, exaggerated, selfish, and unmanly propaganda. The Government may, indeed, count itself fortunate in such opponents as the Duke of Portland, whose family, enriched by the spoils of whole counties and the tribute of a city province, is henceforth, according to its chief, to suffer, not in any curtailment of its personal enjoyments, but through the losses of its humble dependents. A Mr. Maryon-Wilson, dropping the Duke's language of affected commiseration, has been so kind as to enumerate the special blessings of which he proposes to deprive other people because of the wounds that he thinks the Budget will inflict on himself. This father of his people announces that if the Budget becomes law he will discontinue (a) his system of sick pay to the workmen on his estate; (b) his distributions of Christmas beef; (c) all his local subscriptions; (d) all but necessary repairs on his farm, and (e) all improvements. Now, beneath this policy of intimidation rests the obvious thought, first, that a great landlord is a useful and necessary instrument in the economy of a modern countryside, and, secondly, that he has the power to shift taxation on his own rentals and superfluities on to the shoulders of the poor, with a great resulting loss of employment. Both these propositions happen to be untrue. Save in Ireland, there is no land system so bad as that of England, and no country has suffered more than our own from the decline of the independent peasant and yeoman classes whom the Howards and Bentincks drove out, and to whom they would never have dared to address such missives as the mean and minatory edicts of the last three months. But in fact the powers claimed by these masters of the countryside do not effectively reside in them. Economists do not agree with Lord Avebury that taxes on rent can easily be shifted. And we are entirely sceptical that anything worse will happen as the result of the petulant or the enforced dismissal of gardeners and footmen, and the selling of portions of over-loaded estates, than a temporary transference of labor from one kind of activity to another, and that from a less to a more useful and human activity. The taxes are the negative side of the Budget; the positive side is seen in the development fund, in the road taxes, in the old age pensions, in the plans of industrial insurance and rural progress. Even the new "Dreadnoughts" mean so many more engineers and shipwrights at work, while every one of the schemes we have mentioned implies a fructification of the national soil and the national resources. The pensions carry a relief of labor from a heavy burden of duty and habit; an immediate increase in the spending powers of thousands of villagers and townsfolk, and an expansion of the custom of the shops and stores that depend upon them, and upon the workmen on whom the new insurance schemes will confer fresh reserves of efficiency. What is this increase of the living and spending power of the masses but a national symbol of the rise of democracy, the aim of all those policies of "ransom" which modern statesmanship sets up? Even the "Morning Post" insists that its party would have had the same constructive ideas as the Liberals if the latter had not been so unkind as to take them away from it. The pinch and the passion to evade only come when the rich are asked to contribute their quota to this national insurance fund, instead of making the poor pay for it.

But, indeed, the popularity of the Budget and the hatred expressed for it—and the one feeling is the measure of the other—come from the fact that it has struck a deep vein of social injustice. We observe that Mr. Lloyd George's brilliant exposure to the people of Limehouse of the working of the leasehold system in London has drawn a reply which emphasises rather than diminishes its truth. The Chancellor did, indeed, compress a little the various dealings of the Duke of Westminster and others with the famous business established by Mr. Gorringe when he said that the few hundreds a year originally paid by Mr. Gorringe as ground rent to the Duke were run up to £4,000. So they were, but not in one lease. There was more than one renewal, and more than one "fine" for renewal. The "Times" has been so good as to unearth the terms of the lease of 1903. From this it appears that the Duke of Westminster was willing to renew the lease of the premises on condition of (1) an increase of £335 in the ground rent, (2) a "fine," present, or "premium," of £50,000, and (3) an engagement by Mr. Gorringe to rebuild a portion of the premises—i.e., to endow him with a renewed and ever renewable property—at a cost of £50,000, or, in the event of a longer lease, at a cost not exceeding £80,000. It is quite irrelevant for the "Times" to say that the Duke only did as other landlords, private or public, do, or that if he had not made all these claims and seizures, Mr. Gorringe would have appropriated them. The point is that Mr. Gorringe had earned some, though not all, of this increment, while the Duke had not earned one farthing, and would have been able to reap it just as well if an hour after the signature of the first lease he or his father had fallen into the miraculous slumber that overtook Mr. Wells's sleeper. Part of the increase belonged to Mr. Gorringe's business skill and that of his assistants and neighbors, part to the improvement of the situation, its growing populousness or desirability, to the nearness of Victoria station or Buckingham Palace, to the expenditure of the Westminster ratepayers on roads and drains and light, to the people who daily walked or drove past Mr. Gorringe's windows, to the country-folk who were attracted to shop there. The increment therefore should in equity have been divided among the State, the municipality, and Mr. Gorringe. Because the Duke of Westminster, and all landlords, tend to absorb the whole joint product of such exertions and expenditures, while they object to return even a modest contribution to the public purse, the popularity of the Budget, which makes this provision, grows and will grow the more the mass of the people understand it. It is this fact which explains the panic-stricken desire of the Opposition to have done with the discussion of a plan that has restored to Liberalism the mastery of the present situation and given it the promise of the future.

THE WOMEN'S WAR.

The women's war—with its mingling of self-sacrifice, wildness, and ardor—continues with unbroken fury. Every week provides fresh incidents, sometimes grotesque, sometimes violent, always defiant of convention and of mockery. Now megaphones shout through the roof of a meeting, women hide in cupboards, in order suddenly to burst out and create disturbance, men are plucked from pillars or chain themselves to chairs while they proclaim the watchwords of their cause. Now great meetings—orderly, enthusiastic, passionate—are addressed in dignified and convincing fashion by many of the same women who have been performing these queer antics. Now disturbers of order, refusing to give surety for good behavior, are sent to gaol: and from behind the prison walls comes news of scuffles and punishments and hunger-strikes, which baffle the authorities and excite pity and disapproval and concern in the hearts of the male supporters of the movement. It is the spectacle—diverting, perhaps, to any completely detached observer, but with a serious and not ignoble element also—of a small, but determined, company of women declaring war upon the Executive, and devoting all nimbleness of wit and ingenuity of contrivance in order to make that Executive impotent and ridiculous. Mr. Gladstone complained on Wednesday that, when placed as prisoners in the first division, they assert that they scorn all political privileges, and demand to be treated by the normal prison discipline. When placed as prisoners in the second division, they declare, or their friends declare, that they are political offenders—as they clearly are—subject to deliberate humiliations. Exasperation deepens as the struggle continues. Measures on both sides become more desperate; at large open-air meetings women reported to be "suffragettes" are nearly torn to pieces by the infuriated crowd, and their men supporters—and often the women themselves—are subjected to rough, and sometimes brutal, treatment as they are flung out of the halls and down the staircases. On the other hand, their cleverness in speech, above all their physical pluck, win them attentive audiences in many constituencies. Probably the mass of the public look on with curiosity. Some are converted by this determined and consistent guerilla warfare; others are alienated, and even filled with anger and scornful bitterness. Meantime a kind of chorus of comment and protest is kept up by the many distinguished supporters, who draw attention to the heroism and suffering thus so freely given, and ask, with increasing emphasis, why a Liberal Government does not end it all by giving the women the vote.

It is surely desirable to keep criticism or protest on the proper plane. It is asserted that women are being arrested for assaulting the police because they are preventing them from the legitimate right of presenting a petition to Mr. Asquith. But no women with a great cause at heart would be arrested for the sake of anything so mild as a petition to Mr. Asquith. If Mr. Asquith received the petition to-morrow they might boast a Pyrrhic victory. Their cause would not be advanced an iota. They are being arrested because they think the cause of women is aided by their being arrested; they are refusing surety for good behavior and choosing the alternative of imprisonment because they believe that by such imprisonment they are calling attention to the political disabilities of their sex. And the same is true of their treatment within the prison. Four distinguished literary men appealed in Wednesday's newspapers for the women who had undergone the "hunger strike." "They refused to submit to second division rules, because they claim the right, as political offenders, to conditions of imprisonment which do not inflict humiliation." This may be true, and, for our part, we prefer Gladstone's arguments against the degradation of political prisoners to his son's suggestion that the suffragettes are not true politicals. But in the main it is clear that the suffragettes are not thinking of the difference between first division and second division treatment. They are accepting such torture because they believe that by the manifestation of heroic and even reckless devotion they may be able to compel the indifferent passer-by to face the whole question of woman's emancipation, a question which he would fain avoid. They would, indeed, sit down and starve outside the gates of the House of Commons in presence of the crowd, if by that they could do service to the cause. We are faced with a proclamation of outlawry on the part of the women, determination, by some conspicuous acts of endurance and suffering, to arrest the attention of the cheery, tolerant, and contemptuous public. They are not proving by these methods the rightness of the women's cause. They are not proving the popularity of the women's cause. They are proving, once again, the latent power of martyrdom in the facing of ridicule and of physical pain, which many women have devoted in the past to many great and impersonal ideals.

It is questionable if at the moment they are advancing the ends which they desire. The evidence of the hundreds who are willing to immolate themselves, of the thousands of women adherents, of the support of the liberated and intellectual minds of this country is no evidence that they have yet converted the ordinary stolid male elector who decides the future of political and social change. They claim—in such letters as we have been publishing—to find everywhere a public transformation of attitude, a new admiration amongst the men, crowded meetings, respectful hearing. We can well believe that such a transformation may be possible, without at the same time any substantial progress having been made to the goal of their desire. We disagree with their interruption of public meetings, for it interferes with one of the most important of free rights to the common people—the right of the representative to be allowed to address upon political subjects those who have assembled to hear him. Such a policy is surely only justifiable in a war à outrance, in which women had not only proclaimed themselves outlaws, but had been proclaimed, by a male-elected Government, outside the law—free henceforth from its protection. We regard as entirely legitimate their bye-election policy, their assembling in meetings and demonstrations, their appeal to any body of electors against any Government which refuses them the vote. We offer no criticism upon the policy of hunger strikes. Prisoners who are prepared to go without food, in dark, solitary cells, for four or five days, have entered that class which is beyond criticism from the self-indulgent, comfortable life of normal citizenship. They belong to the kingdom of those who will find death for a cause. It is only the defence of some of their admirers—statements concerning "the reluctance to concede the honors of war to political offenders"—which could harm them by making them appear ridiculous. What, in the name of all desperate causes—the liberators of Italy, the brave men who choke up the Russian prisons—have "the honors of war" to do with serious efforts for the triumph of a movement towards freedom?

In fact, if Mr. Gladstone were to concede—as we hope he will concede—the "first division" to all "political" offenders, if Mr. Asquith were to set aside a casual quarter of an hour to receiving a deputation, there might be rejoicing over a personal success. Would the cause of women's suffrage be sensibly advanced? The obstacle to success is not the "natural wickedness" of the Liberal Government, nor the refusal of the 415 Liberal members to redeem their pledges. It is, first, the intense preoccupation of the public mind with other questions, and secondly the still unmoved conviction of probably the majority of the male electors of this country that the women should not be given the vote. The women's question at present—and we say this with no hostility, but as strong supporters of their cause—is not at the centre of the situation, just as Home Rule—for which many more men and women have suffered and died—is not at the centre of the situation. "The Budget raises vast issues," say the four correspondents of the "Daily News," "yet to our mind the emancipation of woman is an issue larger than the liberation of land." Yes; but to how many other minds? We may wish it otherwise; but it would be idle for any practical politician to assert that for 90 per cent. of Liberal, for 99 per cent. of Tory electors, the liberation of the land is not an issue at the present more vital than the emancipation of woman. The one is immediate, insistent, alive, a sudden challenge in which the choice is brief yet endless. Democracy is fighting for its life, and the issue of the next few months will settle the history of this country for the next half-century. As for the women, all but those to whom this cause has filled the whole political horizon are influenced by the thought that although the franchise is certain to come and is, indeed, an act of elemental justice, yet the world will not be shaken to its foundations if it comes to-morrow rather than to-day. They reason—the plain men of the street—that the women have endured for some considerable time without it; that many General Elections have passed without anything substantial having been said concerning it. They don't to-day care very much whether they possess the vote themselves, and they certainly are not going to be diverted from controversy concerning far-reaching social concerns and tariffs and land taxes to remedy immediately an injustice which has endured so long and so lightly. And the Liberal section of them resent an attack upon a Liberal Government at the moment when Liberalism has emerged with difficulty from twenty years of Tory reaction and scarcely yet has learnt to stand upright.

We do not give this view as our own. We give it as our diagnosis of such public opinion as exists upon this question. The walls of Jericho do not to-day fall by shouting: and there is no measure of the devotion which has to be expended, the sufferings voluntarily endured, before there is won any great and substantial advance in human progress. England, in refusing the suffrage, is in line with the European tradition as yet practically unbroken. The idea advanced by Mr. Zangwill and his colleagues that "it is necessary only for the Government to give a few days of debate" in order that a limited Woman's Suffrage Bill may be carried is an idea which belongs to the region of dreams. Such a Bill would be bitterly fought in the Commons, and no sane politician imagines that the House of Lords would pass such a message without first testing the verdict of the electorate. Would the electors declare for the woman's franchise on an ad hoc election? Would they declare for it on an election of confused issues? Home Rule for Ireland—judged by any test of human sacrifice—has also a large claim to "first place"; would the Irish waive such a claim? All these questions belong to the future. We rejoice at any evidence which can be ascertained that the cause of the suffrage is gaining adherents in this country. We regret, while at the same time we understand, the particular methods which some advocates of the suffrage adopt in order to fix attention on their claims. We are inclined to believe that, so far from the work drawing to a conclusion, it is only yet beginning. We are assured that when all the story is told and the ultimate triumph, which is inevitable, attained, due honor will be paid to those who first compelled a people—whether they would hear or whether they would forbear—to listen to a just claim for political freedom.

THE PRECEDENTS FOR THE LAND TAXES.

The English landed classes are at once the most conscientious and the worst educated of any of the land-owning classes of Western Europe. Typical products of our public school and University system, they only ask to be allowed to do their duty in that state of life to which it has pleased God to call them without interference from Government. They know nothing of any attack on their system by theory or practice—the theory, a consensus of opinion of experts on economics, the practice, a rapid development of special appropriations of landed increments or taxes on site values amongst all the civilised nations of the world. Modern economics is a sealed book to them; experience—outside these islands—negligible. At Cambridge the appearance of a fly-sheet of results of the "Political Economy Special" used to be a standing subject of ribaldry, the names of five distinguished professors being usually followed by the solemn announcement of results. Class I., None. Class 2. None. Class III., None. And the quite genuine astonishment, even of their leaders in the House of Commons, at hearing of special increment or site value taxes in Germany or America or Australasia reveals that the ignorance is real and not feigned. They have honestly thought that the terms "unprecedented," "robbery," "preposterous," "Socialistic," were correctly applicable to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's modest propositions which deal with land; that they are being treated as no other landed class has ever been treated before; that the Budget has been spewed out of the jaws of hell, and marks the beginning of the end. They are amazed and incredulous when they find (for example) that increment in land is regularly taxed in the German cities, that Lord Balfour of Burleigh has advocated a special rating of urban site values, or that the King, many Bishops, and Conservative statesmen were prepared to recommend, a generation ago, rating upon 4 per cent. of the capital value of the undeveloped land round the towns, less for the raising of revenue than for the better housing of the working classes.

A study of the Government Blue Book on "Taxation of Land, &c.," might reveal to them how much the world had moved while they had slept, that the present Government is merely following slowly, and at a distance, the effort of progressive communities within and without the Empire. The leaders of the English landlords in the House of Commons, when for the first time confronted with these novel and astonishing facts, were compelled to fall back upon the rather forlorn defence that no particular tax in any particular country was exactly similar in method and proportion to the taxes proposed by the Government. Such an argument is the greatest possible justification of the Government proposals. Mr. Lloyd George has taken something from Germany, something from Australia and New Zealand, something from America, something from our own national experience, endeavoring to eliminate, by this combination, special hardships and difficulties which have been realised in one or other of these systems. But in their main affirmations—in the vindication of what has been termed unjust, in the doing of what has been denounced as impossible—these official reports stand as a shattering reply to most of the fluent nonsense of this summer's debate.

We may classify the statements, before indicating the reply from experience.

The first is the assertion that it is unjust to distinguish "increment" on land from "increment" on other forms of property: that such a distinction is Socialistic in character, inimical to social order, intolerable to any sane Government.

The second is that any differentiation in towns between value of sites and value of building is impossible, or only to be accomplished at impossible expense; and that any tax laid upon such site values is a tax upon a "non-existent entity."

The third is that any separation of the value of land in the country from the value of buildings upon it is a grotesque idea, and that any further separation of the value of the land from the value of improvements in it is (in the elegant words of a leading Tory journal) "the idea of a maniac."

The fourth is that an impost laid upon the capital value of undeveloped land in the neighborhood of the towns is not only unjust in itself, but ruinous to the building trade, calculated to make land dearer instead of cheaper, and the "thin end of the wedge" of a universal Socialistic confiscation.

All these much maligned propositions are revealed in this Blue Book as in peaceful operation in contemporary contented civilised communities. Against the first criticism the Chancellor can appeal to the example of Germany, against the second to that of Australia, New Zealand, and America, against the third to New Zealand and Australia, against the fourth to Germany (once again) and America and almost the whole of the dominions of Britons beyond the sea.

For in Germany the "increment" tax is here revealed, originating in Frankfort, spreading to Hamburg, Dresden, and Cologne, and now, like wildfire, to all the German cities, so that many of them, even this summer, have passed the whole decree levying the tax in one afternoon. Here, as established in Frankfort, beyond the general charge of 2 per cent. on the purchase price in all cases, is the double method of scooping in a proportion of the increment for public purposes. If property has remained in the same hands for at least twenty years, land which is built over is charged a proportion, varying with the distance of time, of its purchase price. If it has remained unbuilt on it is charged a much higher proportion, the logical and cheerful Germans assuming "that an increase had accrued to the owner which could be estimated according to the number of years the property had remained in one hand." But where property has been rapidly changing hands a different and far higher scale of duty is applied. In Frankfort, which has been the model for others, the increment on the land is assumed to be deducible from the increased value of land and buildings, with deductions for any building which has taken place since the last sale. And in such a case, beginning at a 15 per cent. increase, a sliding scale takes the astonished landlord up from 2 per cent. of a small increase to 25 per cent. as a maximum if the land, in less than twenty years, has increased by 150 per cent. of its previous value. "Apportionment," which is treated by the Chancellor with delicate regard to vested interests, is there determined in simple and almost brutal fashion by mere arithmetical division. "The result," runs the report, "exceeded the expectation of the authors of the tax." "The theoretical difficulties which had appeared so formidable had largely disappeared in practice." "The tax was worked without friction, and it was specially commended on the ground of facility and cheapness of collection." "I asked a few independent Frankfort citizens what they thought of it. I did not discover any reprobation of it as 'Socialistic' or oppressive, or as having checked business transactions in real estate."

Yet how moderate Mr. Lloyd George's increment tax appears in comparison with this "unoppressive" impost! He starts from April, 1909, assuring all past increments to their present possessors. The German municipalities go back to seize increments of more than twenty years ago. Mr. Lloyd George only taxes increments on site value; with some deductions, the German cities tax increment on land and buildings alike. And at the higher end of the scale, in the case of land which has more than doubled in value since twenty years ago—no uncommon phenomenon in the neighborhood of a growing town—while the English landowner escapes with his whole booty intact up to this year, the German landowner finds one quarter of it suddenly seized by the municipality for communal purposes.

Nor is this the final story in this land of marvels, the Germany which has no "responsible" Government, which is fighting Socialism, and which is supposed easily to be maintaining an expanding navy upon the proceeds of Protection. Confronted with a huge deficit, in a situation not unlike our own, the Prussian Junkers have come forward with their proposals for an Imperial land increment tax. One could parallel the situation if one could imagine Mr. Balfour, Captain Pretyman, and Mr. Walter Long offering, as an alternative to the Government proposals, the following scheme. First, a tax on the transfer of land payable by any person acquiring land, whether built on or not, at ½ per cent. of its value—"to be collected in connection with the entry of the new owner's name in the Land Register." Second, a tax on the increment in land—the difference between the last price of acquisition and the price now realised, —(with some deductions for interest on land not used for agriculture or industry between the sales, and for stamps and legal expenses) at rates of 10 per cent. on increments of under 10 per cent., rising 10 per cent. for each increase of increment up to 150 per cent. at the end, above which a uniform 25 per cent. to be charged. The tax to be collected by the local authorities, who are to receive one-fifth of the spoil, and to pass on four-fifths to the Imperial Exchequer. The whole to be retrospective; and if land has not been sold since 1884 its value, "as determined by the purchase prices paid in 1884 for land of similar nature or position," is to be substituted for the "previous price."

These are the proposals of the Prussian Conservatives: reputed the most hidebound Tories in Europe. It would be interesting to hear Captain Pretyman expounding the justice and practicability of the last of these proposals—the calculation of land value twenty-five years ago and the mulcting on sale of increment accumulated since that remote date—to a wondering House of Commons and an approving House of Lords.

[We must reserve for a following article a treatment of the last three propositions of the critics of the land taxes.]

THE FUNCTION OF A MINORITY.

The Tsar has come and gone, but the sound which still echoes in the ear of the world is not the cannon of warships saluting our apprehensive guest in our guarded waters. The really English feature of this visit was the open letter to Sir Edward Grey which it called forth. Drafted with tolerance and moderation of phrasing, yet unflinching in its statement of fact, this document, which appeared in the world's Press on the day of the Tsar's arrival, set forth the sombre facts about the present state of Russia—the hangings, the courts martial, the banishments of untried suspects, the abominations of torture and ill-usage which make an inferno of the Russian gaols. The facts are familiar to our readers. They were drawn avowedly from Prince Kropotkin's pamphlet, which, in its turn, was based mainly on Russian Parliamentary documents. Had such a document come only from a handful of political Ishmaels, it might have been disregarded. But it was signed by over two hundred of the names which carry force in the world of free or Liberal opinion—the Bishops of Birmingham and Hereford, Canons Barnett and Scott Holland, nearly all the Nonconformist leaders, Lord Courtney, some eighty Liberal and Labor members of Parliament, including, under both heads, men who commonly shrink from rash action and whirling words, more than thirty University professors and men of science, including Sir Oliver Lodge, Dr. Muspratt and Professor Osler, and a group of literary men, with the rather unexpected name of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle at their head. To gauge the meaning of this manifestation one must go beyond the maladroit anger of the "Times," the embarrassed silence of other London papers, and the outspoken satisfaction of such a typical provincial Tory organ as the "Birmingham Mail." The measure of its importance is to be found in the astonishment of the French papers, several of which recognised its appearance as a European event. England has, after all, despite the decay of the old traditions at the centre of power, vindicated that right of plain speech of which we wrote last week, and fulfilled her function as a sort of Euripidean chorus in front of the Continental stage.

In most of the debates which have raged during the past two months over the ethics of the Anglo-Russian connection, one essential fact has been generally ignored on both sides. That fact is that the country is not unanimous. Had the entire nation, from the Court and the Foreign Office down to the demonstrators in Trafalgar Square, refused to have any dealings with the Russian Government, it is possible that the consequences dreaded in official circles might have come to pass—that Russia would have been thrown into the Kaiser's arms and isolated from all the better Western influences. If, on the other hand, official circles had had their way, if all protest had been silenced, all comment suppressed, and the masses so hypnotised that they would have acquiesced in a public visit of the Tsar to the City, then again it is certain that the worst consequences which we feared would have been realised—the Russian Government would have drawn the conclusion that it has nothing, even in England, to fear from public opinion. In the event, through that natural balance of forces which comes about in a free democracy, the Russian Government is in a position to form an accurate judgment of the prospects of its association with this country. It knows that for purely selfish and interested reasons our professional diplomatists and our Imperialists, driven by their haunting fear of Germany, are ready to conclude with the Russian despotism a close alliance without regard to its character and conduct. It knows also that among Liberals, "intellectuals," and in the churches there is a strong but perfectly reasonable current of opinion which insists that any entente cordiale must be delayed until the repression in Russia comes to an end, though it welcomes even now an abandonment of the old Imperial feud. It knows also that the masses, more direct and simple in their judgment, bitterly resent even the formal courtesies between the two Courts. With this nicely differentiated opinion it must reckon as best it may. Our friendship is to be had, but on terms and at a price. Let the repression cease, and our official world will be allowed to follow its own impulses. If it continues, not all the pressure from above can make an entente cordiale. How well this mechanism of opinion is understood by Russians, two fragments of evidence prove. The "Daily News" published on Tuesday a rather subtle interview with a Liberal of some standing (for obvious reasons unnamed) in the Tsar's entourage. "I am glad," he said, "that the visit has taken place, and I am also glad that your paper has made its protest." In a less paradoxical form, the "Russ," a very influential Liberal newspaper conducted on commercial lines, and free from party ties, put the same thought: "An improvement in the internal political conditions of Russia," it wrote, "would be the best guarantee of a durable entente with Great Britain."

It must be obvious, we think, that this protest, moderate yet plain-spoken, aimed not at the person of the Tsar but at the overt symptoms of his misrule, has put a powerful weapon into the hands of the Russian Liberals. It is true they did not and could not ask us to make it. Their heads are in the wolf's mouth. They have seen 237 members of the Duma imprisoned since its creation. They were bound in public to adopt the rather embarrassing and clearly calculated attitude of loyalty towards Nicholas II. which has been so unfairly exploited by some of their more simple-minded friends in this country. But, if they are unable to use this lever in order to oust the reactionary clique at court, they are either less competent than we suppose, or in so hopeless a position that no foreign friendship could possibly aid them. But this article in the "Russ" is a proof that they are already beginning to use it. The King's pointed reference to the Duma in his toast has also made this strategy more possible. The Kaiser hailed the Tsar as his fellow monarch by right Divine. King Edward said in effect that he was glad to welcome him because a deputation from the Duma had preceded him. We repeat that we are sceptical about the importance of any foreign factor in influencing the internal affairs of Russia. But, if any foreign influence can play a part, our own share is now free from the reproach of ambiguity. The credit is due to the English minority, which understood its functions as a minority, saved our diplomacy from itself, and counterbalanced the sinister influence of the "Times" and the anti-German fanatics. The protest, to achieve anything, must be maintained. We are not prepared to argue that there has been no sign of any improvement whatever in Russia during the last six months. There have been in a few districts some relaxations of martial law. The Black Hundreds, though still immune from punishment, are now less openly patronised by the Court. But the Liberal "Retch" has just published the figures of the hangings between January and June. They reach 347, which makes a proportionate total less formidable than that for 1908, but decidedly worse than those for 1906 and 1907. In the whole year 1906 there were only 144 executions, and in 1905 only 10. The persecution of the Press is still, as it shows, intense, and the system of administrative exile has received no check. The possibility of an entente cordiale with Russia is not yet in sight. The Foreign Office has moved too fast, and it has, as usual, minimised the importance of the moral factor in international affairs. It will, no doubt, persevere in its own course. But it cannot fetter public opinion. The booming of guns does not make a national welcome. The City's casket enshrines, perhaps, the hopes of our financiers. The nation's mind has expressed itself elsewhere.

THE PLACE OF MIRACLE.

To distinguish between means and ends, between the value of tools and the value of the purpose they serve, seems easy enough. Still easier does it seem to distinguish between a tool and its master. Nevertheless we do not find these distinctions at all easy except in very simple cases. Like certain logical fallacies, as soon as they become complicated they escape our control and entangle us.

Man is undoubtedly a tool-using animal, but his tools are by no means always simple or easily distinguished from himself. To begin with, he is not the only tool-using animal, and some of his tools, like those of other animals, are alive; they are elements in his own life. His peculiarity, in contrast with his lower fellows, is that he not only grows live tools as they do, but makes other kinds. And when he makes the other kinds he does, in fact, teach himself that he and the other animals and even the plants are tool-growing creatures. The creature who only grows tools never learns to know what they are. It is of man's pre-eminence to be able to see that chlorophyll is the tool of a tree, as surely as his own hands are tools of his intellectual life, like his typewriter and telescope.

Unfortunately he has been slow to use this privilege of interpretation. He is too often lost in the maze of himself, misled by the compulsion of his own primary needs; and, above all, dazzled by success. As a tool-grower he has no peer. His finest instrument, his admirable brain, has set him on a height of dominance. Nowhere else is there such a tool, actual or conceived, as the ample covering of "grey matter" which is folded and creased within the small compass of a human skull. It is this unique instrument that enables him to be a tool-maker and expand himself in the world, in a fashion different from that of any other creature.

Thus his dominion grows; his manner of life stretches out; he penetrates, by his action, ever more deeply into the continuity of the material sphere that surrounds him. And he divides it ever more minutely and exactly into parts that shall be instruments for new purposes, setting this by that in new arrangements for his convenience and interest. He has penetrated so far into his world by now that, if he chooses, he may live (like any astronomer or physicist) in the stars and the ether of space. Once he was "cabined and confined" among things that he could touch with bare hands and feet and put into his craving mouth.

But this craving mouth, these hands and feet, are still setting out the pattern of his action and even the pattern of his reflective and speculative thought. He began, long since, when his immediate animal needs of food and shelter were more or less easily satisfied, to reflect upon himself and his world. He brought the tools of his intellect (tools that he had made on the plan of those he found necessary as well as useful in dealing with material things) to bear upon himself, his life and its problems, his world and its problems. From action he turned to speculation, believing that he had nothing better to help him, when philosophising, than a set of conceptual instruments such as were fitted to geometrical space, where one thing lies side by side with another thing, and juxtaposition is the keyword to them all. His logic, his very language, his mathematics, his physics, his whole armament, are of a piece with hands and feet and craving mouth. Each owes its origin and its character to the need of action; each furthers action; each is of the intellect which is primarily one with developing action; and none is produced with a primary view to speculation. This is why, when he comes to speculate, he confounds means with ends, the value of tools with the value of life, and the instruments of life with life itself. This is one capital reason why the mysteries that envelop him, and in which he lives and moves and has his being, are either unseen or misunderstood in the lumen siccum of the intellect, and are hard even to speak of intelligibly. Man lives his mysteries, he lives out his truth—if it is truth at all—but when he comes to speculate upon either he is baffled. These wonders do not stand still to be analysed into parts which can be set side by side. Life is movement, continuity; and its keyword is interpenetration, not juxtaposition. When it is dissected it is dead.

The importance of all this in relation to the highest affairs of life is plain to see, from the moment that we discover the problem of the genesis of intellect, and of its peculiar tools.

That the highest affairs of life are at once philosophical and religious requires no proof except to the man who is beset by its lower affairs, or by choice given up to them. And it is especially in religion and in philosophy that we suffer from our ignorance of the snares which have held us fast, and have made our attempts to speculate so full of characteristic mistakes, so inadequate to give insight into the marvels of what we possess and are.

Here, above all, we confound means and ends, tools with the purpose that they serve. The history of religion, like that of philosophy, is a history of this confusion and its lamentable results. And philosophy, extricating itself at last, is lending a hand to its sister in misfortune. Monsieur Bergson, the first to give us an account of the genesis of intellect which enables us to understand, not only its claims and successes, but its failures and restrictions, is, by the way and quite unobtrusively, showing us a considerable part of the reason why Christians do not love one another, and why the world is growing content to pass them by without even taking the trouble to hate them.

The Christian tools, theological dogmas, and so on, have been of incalculable value—some are still of incalculable value—but they are nevertheless only tools. And men have quarrelled with them and about them, and have brandished them in the face of the world, as if each were an essential safeguard of religion. Misled by their utility, when that utility lessens or comes to a just end, and even becomes transformed into hindrance, Christian men cannot, or will not, face facts, because they are possessed by false theories. They believe that because men have, to their advantage, linked religious life with the use of these instruments, and have seen Christ by means of them, Christ and the religious life of Christians depend upon them. It is a radical confusion to which M. Bergson gives us the clue.

Religion is life, an end as well as means; experience, not statement about experience. It belongs to the mysteries that we live, not to the tools by which we help ourselves to live, or to the speculative pictures we make of life, as it looks to us when we try to dissect it. Religion is movement, continuity, power, interpenetration; it eludes logic and language, and every system we have made in the hope that now at last we shall enclose it for evermore.

Many of us are learning this lesson very fast—too fast for the scholastic systematisers; and too fast, it seems, for some men who are far from being systematisers of any kind. Dr. Figgis may represent a considerable number of Christians, or he may represent very few; but, in any case, his Hulsean Lectures on "The Gospel and Human Needs" give pathetic evidence of the way in which a tender heart, like a hard head, may hide the light in which life shall open out and grow. They show that there are men, be they few or many, among Christian teachers, who call upon us to retain, against our better judgment, certain religious tools that have been useful in the past, and even to regard them as necessary for religious life in the present, because to "the plain man" they are still handy and attractive. Dr. Figgis has devoted his powers, in these Hulsean Lectures, to an endeavor to persuade Christians that the stage in which miracles were a stumbling block to faith is at an end, and that they are once more "becoming a help," and are "indeed of the essence of revelation." "Dominated by sonorous commonplaces about irrevocable law and iron uniformity," he says, we may and do "find grave difficulty to faith in the miraculous." But "the plain man," just because he finds this "iron uniformity" pressing upon him, craves as he has always craved, when facing the obstinacy of things, for a helper to whom they are not obstinate. He will believe in God and repent of his sins, if God bends or breaks these things at His will. If He does not—what, says the plain man, is the good of Him, and why should I be sorry for my sins? "Instead of being a drag upon faith, the miraculous, or the idea of revelation, or whatever you choose to call it, is once more beginning to be a pillar of it. Miracles were easy of credit in days when personal agency was detected throughout nature, and the physical world was not conceived as an orderly whole. Belief was easy then, but it was also superfluous; for the miracle was simply a fact, like any other fact of daily life, and conveyed none but a particular lesson. Nowadays the belief is not easy, but it is essential; unless we are to be deprived of all faith in our own spiritual being, and driven to view the world as a vast system, which may, perhaps, be a living whole, but without any place for personalities, and with our own love and fear, our sin or sanctity, mere illusions, a sort of phosphorescent by-product of the outer world. The iron law of physical sequences is always with us; the pressure of the world, environment, heredity, is patent and appalling. What is a mere theory to the student is the most constant and oppressive of facts to the plain man. It is just this very thing he wants to escape from. It is only miracle, revelation, that can assure him that behind all this network of material forces there is a living will, while God manifest in Christ displays that will as Love. That is all he wants. That gives him a refuge, a home for the soul, whose deepest emotion and noblest desires may now be satisfied."

It is plain that Dr. Figgis does not mean mystery when he says miracle. His revelation is apocalyptic, his miracle is no more mysterious than any other fact of nature or history. For him revelation is of a piece with the writing on tables of stone; his miracle is for God what a steam-engine or a flying machine is for man—it is to man scientific achievement on a gigantic and humanly inaccessible scale. He plainly distinguishes between these things and mysteries. "Mystery," he says, "is, in fact, no less needful than miracle in our world of thought to-day. The one saves us from a world of cast-iron; the other from that profounder slavery of the mind to its own creations, from that superstition of the logical process, which is willing in its blindness to treat the real life of struggle and hope and joy as mere illusion, if only at the cost it may preserve its self-consistency. "This," he goes on—and the remark is significant—"this is to make an idol out of an instrument." In point of fact, there is no mystery at all about a miracle except the mystery of all action of any kind whatever, human or divine. A miracle is welcome to the plain man just because it has not even an air of mystery about it, and does not puzzle him by reminding him that there is such a thing to be considered. It is, as it were, a telephonic message from another world, telling him that there is a living person there who is ready to help him. The need to know of that person and to be helped makes him demand both apocalyptic teaching and this miraculous scientific achievement. The craving mouth, the longing ear, the desire to see and touch, taste and handle, govern him in this, now as ever. Here once more, too, he makes "an idol of an instrument." Miracle was for us all a good tool once, at least by its power of giving particular lessons; it is a good tool now—if he can use it—for a man oppressed by that concept of "iron uniformity" which as yet he does not know to be nothing but another of his tools. Apocalyptic revelation, tables of stone, an infallible heaven-sent book, an external heaven-guaranteed authority of one kind or another—all these are good tools for some times and places and men. But they are only tools; and men have made them in their own image and for their needs. Dr. Figgis comes too late. We are discovering mystery and life; we are feeling the wonder, the power, and the dependence of ourselves. Even the plain man is in his own way learning his lesson. He is beginning to find God, not at the end of a miraculous telephone, but as the Lord and giver and sharer of life, the worker in and with us all. And if he were not, Dr. Figgis is still too late. The tender heart that would shield men by his method from the shock of discovering their speculative mistakes, their intellectual errors, lest religion fail them, will succeed no better than if it were allied with a hard head and with that "superstition of logical process" which he now deplores. Where logical process has become "superstitious" it is because men have discovered the ways by which intellect has become what it is. They have only to consider those ways to find the place of miracle and of mystery, of an apocalyptic revelation and of the revelation that is life, in the economy of us all.

TENNYSON, 1809—1909.

Those who this week throw their minds back to Tennyson must feel as if they had stepped on to beautiful but half-forgotten ground, like an old college garden, where students walk, holding a copy of his poems, "between an annotated Euripides and a handbook of scholastic philosophy." They recall something between dreamland and real life, between a poet-scholar's delicate vision of his own world and his re-creation of the noblest or most appealing fancies of his forerunners. They find much of Virgil, a touch of Wordsworth, a hint of Spenser and Shelley, an atmosphere of nineteenth century science and moral thought. They are seized afresh with a feeling for the charm of England and the pleasures and consolations yielded by existence in this delightful land. Each of these impressions is agreeable. They admire the gravity and measure of the poet's style, his unfailing sense of music and fitness in the arrangement of words and the cadence of verse, his enrichment even of the great language he uses, his "pure and sovereign" voice. They observe again his sincere but free religious sentiment, springing from a heart touched but not overwhelmed with the scepticism of its age. They see that this famous singer chiefly loves what they, too, love in England—liberty, progress, and great service to the State in obedience to its laws. Hardly a harsh or difficult note surprises them in the harmonious development of the master's powers. An audience of pious, refined, well-meaning, and well-bred folk has been rarely entertained; and the stalls and the boxes resound with warm but discreet applause:—

> "The traveller (says Taine), the lover of archæology, has been pleased by the imitations of foreign and antique sentiment. The sportsman, the lover of the country, has relished the little country scenes and the rich rural pictures. The ladies have been charmed by his portraits of women; they are so exquisite and pure! He has laid such delicate blushes on those lovely cheeks! He has depicted so well the changing expression of those proud or candid eyes! They like him because they feel that he likes them. He even honors them, and rises in his nobility to the height of their purity. Young girls weep in listening to him; certainly when, a little while ago, we heard the legend of 'Elaine' or 'Enid' read, we saw the fair heads drooping under the flowers which adorned them, and white shoulders heaving with furtive emotion."

It is his singular, and a little inhuman, calm of mind which distinguishes Tennyson from nearly all his contemporaries among the imaginative writers of England and Europe—from Hugo, de Musset, Tolstoy, Ibsen, Tourgenieff, from Carlyle and Ruskin, and even from Arnold and Clough. Essentially he was fixed, like the pre-Raphaelites, in love of the past. He would not allow his intelligent but detached view of modern life either to disturb his quest of loveliness in classical or Christian art, or to qualify his intellectual serenity. Yet he had no certitude. He had imbibed too much of the speculative spirit of his times to make poetry, as Browning made it, the interpreter of evangelical theology. Newman might never have lived for aught that Tennyson says of him; he went to the Middle Ages for his coloring, but not for his creed. Faith was to him, in part, an effort of Christian stoicism, a refusal to despair of good or to shrink from death.

"Fear not thou the hidden purpose of that Power which alone is great, Nor the myriad world, His shadow, nor the silent Opener of the Gate."

In part, too, it was the fruit of his poet's vision of a world which lay behind the crude discoveries of sense, and of whose existence and laws his slightly effeminate saints—his Arthurs and Galahads and Percivales—were the delicate reporters. To a mind fixed to these images and ideas, the storms and controversies of his times brought little more than passing disquietude, or, as in "Maud," a flash of mid-century revolt. A strong and, indeed, mastering belief in evolution linked itself early to his broad Christianity, and made of the movement of history a "divine event" to which it advanced through universal peace and the perfection of mankind. From that amiable creed, slightly checked by the pessimism of age, he eliminated all that was harshest in the presentations of it with which his youth had made him familiar. No "deathless fire" could in future darken man's view of his Maker; through "honest doubt" he would rediscover the way of faith; Science, incompetent to fight his natural fears, would lead him onward, itself bound to the inner Wisdom of the Soul; the seeming waste of life would disappear when God had made the pile complete. But, divinely guided as was the world, man must find his way through it with caution: neither too fast nor too slow. Liberal-Conservatism should be his guide; authority watchful at one ear, liberty in attendance at the other.

To these tempered counsels the age of Tennyson listened the more readily because of the enchanting grace of the messenger. For Tennyson could not write ill, or only so wrote through an occasional superficiality of thought and triviality of theme. He could not speak with true feeling of the life of the people, as Wordsworth could speak of Lucy, and the leech-gatherer, and the country girl who heard the caged thrush in Wood Street. But thin or artificial as were some of his subjects, his style was magically true to its author's aim. It lacked Byron's breadth and force, nor was it a creature of light and air and high-soaring spiritual flight, like Shelley's. But it seemed always to reach the beautiful word without too much effort, to be simple and full of dignity, and yet to sparkle with jewel-like ornament. True to its author's exquisite ear and unfailing good taste, it excelled, among a thousand other felicities, in the rendering of sound, such as church bells heard in the distance:—

"The mellow lin-lan-lone of evening bells, Far, far, away"—

or in gathering twilight—

"Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark";

or the heavy splash of the weighted shroud sinking in the sea—

"His heavy-shotted, hammock shroud Drops in his vast and wandering grave"; or a sudden burst of wailing—

"A cry that shivered to the tingling stars
And as it were one voice, an agony
Of lamentation."

The same power is directed with equal certainty to the description of natural movement—of waterfalls that slide down the mountain like "slow dropping veils of thinnest lawn," or the water-liy which folds

"its sweetness up And slips into the bosom of the lake"— of the pace of the doubtful, conscience-laden man—

"And so strode back slow to the wounded King," contrasted with the rapid step of the same messenger when he has discharged his errand and lightened his mind—

"And lightly went the other to the King."

Such a master of style could open his theme with consummate ease, and evoke at once the picture that he wanted. He could sing of the poet's joy in nature—

"The rain had fallen; the poet arose," or the lover's impatience—

"Come into the garden, Maud,
For the black bat, night, has flown," and a shower of familiar images came into view—the swallow's hunting of a bee, the quick motion of a snake in the grass, or the opening clusters of half-seen flowers in an English garden, in all the dewy sweetness of a summer's dawn. But when he approached the scarred ground of human passion Tennyson drew back. Feeling the slightness of his grasp, and approving neither the tumult nor the depth of the soul, he seemed less to speak his own mind than to "fondle and gaze upon the ideas of others." Yet he could write with true emotion. The melancholy of the beautiful lines in "Maud,"

"O that 'twere possible
After long grief and pain
To find the arms of my true love Round me once again!"

is his own, for it touched his besetting sadness at the thought of the seeming eternity of the separation of death. But his Idas, his Orianas, his Gawains, his Lynettes, his Guineveres, are not real. They are figures in tapestry, embedded in flowers and surrounded with opulent scenery and joyous animals, but only seeming to hunt, or fight, or make love. Unlike the more truthful but not more gifted Wordsworth, Tennyson fell short of the whole duty of a poet. He was too fortunate in his lot, too cloistered in his retirement, too fastidious in his devotion to the refinements of poetry and scholarship, too tender in the almost feminine proprieties of his thought and speech to see life in the mass, and therefore to see it in its highest glory and its deepest gloom.

THE POVERTY OF THE COTTAGE.

There is in the world no more pathetic figure than the cottage mother who has to feed her small brood on fifteen shillings a week. As a country parson the writer of these lines has seen this strain and struggle at close hand, and knows of what he writes. Perhaps his view of the sufferings and needs of the poor is sharpened by the recollection of daily personal annoyances—as, for instance, of the woman who brought in his very modest lunch, putting a chop on the table with great emphasis, and saying at the same time, "Bobby's cryin'; he ain't had enough." She was the mother of eight. Her predecessor had had only one little boy, who at le déjeuner de M. le Curé had always appeared with a plate to carry off his portion; but with eight this was clearly impossible. It is to be feared that to the small, hungry-eyed crowd the parson must have appeared a Sardanapalus. At any rate, he often ate his lunch with compunction, thinking of the "dinners" the children had taken to school, and of the man who worked at a distance, wrapped up in a sack on wet days, drinking his cold tea in the rain.

The result of all this experience is that he believes the great need of the poor to be a sufficiency of good and wholesome food, and this is just what at present they do not get. There is, indeed, deep wisdom and truth in the remark of the late Lord Salisbury that what they need is "a circus." Who has a word to say against the circus? But let her know her place, she is the second, not the first. The First is Food. At present, let it be repeated, the children of the poor, the growing boys and girls, do not have enough to eat. "What does it matter if the people are half-starved, so long as the country forges ahead?" enquires the hero of a very brightly-written Tariff Reform novel. The present writer, for one, does not think that if the people are half-starved the country will forge very far. Again and again he has known young girls go to service as soon as they have left school, and after a month or two of blacking grates and carrying buckets up and down stairs come home spitting blood. "All these young gals has this 'ere 'neemyer," sagely commented the parish clerk, "comes o' drinkin' so much ginger-beer." It is probable, indeed, that stewed tea and temperance drinks do not do much towards building up the constitution unless accompanied by plenty of nourishment in a more solid form.

The cottage mother is too often distracted from the primary necessity of getting food for her children by the touching human desire to get more pleasure and brightness for them, to ornament their hard life a little. This is most natural and excusable, but on fifteen shillings a week it is fatal, and the indulgence must be paid for dearly. The packman comes, cheerfully breaking in on her lonely and monotonous day with his strings of pearls and coral, his rings and combs and watches, as the minstrels came to the castle amid all the dulness and deadness of the medieval winter, and he is seldom repulsed from the gate. In reality, the place of the packman has largely been taken by the "canvasser" of the instalment system, who persuades the cottage mother to buy some showy article of furniture or novel musical instrument, and pay for it by instalments. The purchase will be made with exultation. "To give Jojy an insight," the proud mother will exclaim. When it is seen that the instrument has to be paid for by the whole family having less food, a revulsion of feeling sets in and the tinklings cease.

The woman's failure to make both ends meet is a frequent source of trouble between the labourer and his wife. The writer has in mind the case of a young farm labourer, who, by the way, bore the name of a great Tractarian leader, marrying a very pretty girl, a slender, dark-eyed little thing, ten years younger than himself. The man was seven-and-twenty, the girl seventeen. "My poor John Henry," sighed Mrs. Newman, when she called at the vicar's cottage to announce her intention of forbidding the banns. "What can that child know of keeping a house?" She rehearsed the details of the scene with great unction. "As soon as you see me rise in my place, you'll lean forward and say, quietly, 'All right, Mrs. Newman, I'll see you in the vestry after service.'" The good lady did not appear, but her prevision was more than justified. The man was steadiness personified, for all practical purposes a teetotaller. He gave his wife thirteen shillings a week, keeping back two, with which he paid his club and bought all his clothes, besides providing such indulgence in alcohol and tobacco as he permitted himself. The poor child was quite unable to make the thirteen shillings "do," and used to run up bills unknown to her husband. When these were discovered there were "scenes," and it is to be feared, although he denied it, that he knocked her about. The consequence was that she ran home to her people in the next village. The husband went about his work and home to his cheerless cottage with an expression of comic misery on his honest but not too intelligent face. "Lonely 'tis, you know," he remarked, "no cooked food, you know." "Why don't you go and ask your wife to come back," the writer suggested. "They'll begin fightin'," he said, doubtfully. "I'll come with you," it was proposed. In the event they went together. The writer went to the cottage, and left John Henry Newman waiting outside in the lane, till a stage in the discussion had been reached when he might be introduced with safety. The door was opened by a one-armed man, gesticulating violently. It was at once evident that the atmosphere was very stormy. After a great deal of talk they were persuaded to see him quietly. The writer saw the man and the girl kiss at the gate, and went home to a well-earned meal. The next morning he met John Henry Newman in the road. "She's coom'd back," he exclaimed, one broad grin all over his face. Alas, in a year or two the same trouble broke out again, and she again ran off to her parents, now living in a town some little distance away. The writer went, but failed to see them, and then wrote, but only received, through a roundabout channel, the masterly, inactive answer that they were "going to receive all letters and answer none." For the moment the quarrel is patched up, but with quick coming babies, the task of making thirteen shillings a week "do" will probably not become any easier.

All sorts of expedients are resorted to in the desperate attempt to get enough to live upon. The taking in of lodgers is one of the first, and has often the worst results. One need not dwell on these. Nothing stirs up such a hornet's nest as any attempt to set the Sanitary Inspector on the track of an overcrowded cottage. "They must want poor people to starve," you will hear. "Holiday children" are a more harmless source of income, and a small town girl may be seen carrying a baby as big as herself, or a boy muffled up to his eyes in sacking, scrubbing the bricks, and counting the days till he can leave the cabbages and beehives and go back to London.

THE FRUITS OF COMMERCE.

Of old, when we lived in the country and played in a large garden, the fruits came to us in the way of nature, and never in the way of business. They were the kindly fruits of the earth, and in due time we enjoyed them; we never bought any, seldom forced any, had no commercial standards for them at all. Ordinarily we had plenty of all kinds; but their quality, their exact quantity, and the date of their arrival depended on sun, rain, and weather—not to mention slugs, blight, and bullfinches. No unexplored mechanism of trade dumped them suddenly before us on unintelligent plates; each stage of their coming—bud, blossom, leaf, and green fruit—had been noted, tended, discussed, guessed about, ever since spring re-awoke our interest in the plants and trees. The mere eating of them was a trifling part of their fascination and of the pleasure which they gave. The general frontiers of the realms of each were well understood; we never thought of having fruits out of their season (excepting bottled fruits in tarts); and all-the-year-round fruits like the foreign bananas, tomatoes, and apples of commerce were undreamed of. Indeed, the only foreign fresh fruit which penetrated to our village were oranges at Christmas; and they (such was the excellence of our winter pears and eating apples) were but little appreciated.

We lived (without knowing it) at a place and time fortunate in these respects. Three centuries ago the English garden was poorly stocked, and the English people were scurvy-ridden for want of fresh fruit and vegetables. Thirty years ago was the end of a notable evolution; the import of foreign fruits had not seriously begun, but the cultivation of home fruits had reached a kind of zenith. It was not commercial, and its development, like so many characteristically English developments, was chaotic and individualist. Here and there the gardeners of the great country houses, experimenting in the early days with apples or pears or currants or strawberries, had produced varieties which became widely current in the gardens of the countryside; and latterly the great seedsmen, with more system, had carried the standardising process a stage further. For all this, nothing was stereotyped; sameness was not an object in itself, as it becomes the instant you start selling things; on the contrary, we liked to have as many varieties as possible, and we tested each new variety by the surest of touchstones, not as sellers or as purchasers, but as ultimate consumers.

In this way we reached very different results from those which the shops reach. If you go now in the strawberry season into Covent Garden market, or examine the window or barrow of any fruit-seller in London, you will notice these features about the strawberries: first, that on any given day only two or three varieties are on sale; secondly, that all will be very bright red; thirdly, that nearly all are of large size. After you have made a purchase, you will remark another feature, to wit: fourthly, that scarcely any have more than a very poor flavor. You see they are grown to suit purchasers, and purchasers go by appearance, not by taste; so the grower chooses kinds which are red and big and have a strong, woody pulp, which will pack well and keep long without squashing; as for flavor, it is immaterial to him. The results are diametrically opposite to the best strawberries in our garden; which were palest pink and of no size, but were almost pure juice and had a fragrance like nectarines, only more so.

It is with apples, perhaps, that one notices the change most. Nowadays we have apples at all seasons and from all the world—from Canada, from the Cape, from Tasmania. What tempting sizes, what seductive shapes, what dazzling colors! "As beautiful as if they were painted," said a poor marketing housewife to us the other day, with a fine sense of the superiority of Art to Nature. Alas! all is not gold that glitters; and an apple whose fibre is tough enough to let it preserve its good looks for months, when jammed tight in a tub, will not prove a very tractable subject for the human digestion. How we pine in the city after good English garden apples! And how impossible it is to buy them with money!

Other fruits there are, which, from the failure of the market to discriminate between its huge supplies of them, have definitely lost caste. Such is the gooseberry, for which it is now almost vulgar to profess a liking. Years ago there was a solemn discussion upon the gooseberries in our garden, and four children unanimously found a verdict that with gooseberries there was more difference between the best and the worst than with any other fruits, and that the best gooseberries were the best small fruits in the garden. After which the four children garlanded the best gooseberry bush (whose fruits were neither large nor conspicuously colored) with a circlet of daisies and dandelions in token of its pre-eminence.

Of course, there is another side to the picture. At the time when we were in our garden, not a tomato nor a banana was on sale throughout East London. Now those fruits divide with kippers and bloaters the distinction of being the healthiest cheap foodstuffs that find their way into every poor city household. Commerce has done that, and must be thanked for it. Even in the villages there was little fruit to be had by those who had no gardens; and what little there is to-day comes mostly from the towns. All the same, with country land as cheap as it is now, there is no really material obstacle to the provision of gardens and allotments for all country people, where they could all grow fruit for themselves. What our reflections indicate is the superiority of "production for use" over "production for profit" in matters of this kind, wherever the former is possible. For here, at any rate, the labor spent is not a loss, but a gain in itself; the merit of every man's living "under his own vine and his own fig-tree" lies not merely in his getting better grapes and figs, but in his leading a jollier life from spring to fall. Go back to Covent Garden and consider the porters: go along the main streets and consider the barrow-sellers: theirs is the service whereby we get the fruits of commerce—how different!

LA GALERA.

At 5.30 of a hot summer morning the train—as usual in those latitudes, half an hour late—from Buenos Aires to Mendoza stopped at El Chajá and dropped a few worn-out, half-asleep, dust-covered passengers and their luggage. After a few minutes a small bell tinkled, a shrill whistle sounded, and the train resumed its monotonous journey across the Pampas.

The pure morning air revived our much-shaken bodies. We stretched ourselves, yawned, and walked along the platform, glad to be freed from our stuffy prison of the previous night; then, having picked up our belongings, we looked at the disappearing train—away in the horizon—with a feeling of relief mingled with sorrow, for it was the link which united us to civilisation, and we were now left stranded in a sea of grass.

El Chajá is one of the numerous villages which at regular intervals of so many kilometres, measured with mathematical exactness, have grown up along the railway lines which cross the Pampas in all directions, and, like them, it is ugly and depressing. It consists of half a dozen rectangular, flat-roofed, corrugated iron buildings, facing the road which runs alongside the railway. Each has a door, with long, striped curtains to keep out the heat, but few have windows, and in front of them all there is a palenque: that is, two or three poles of ñandubay threaded by a chain, to which the gauchos tie their horses.

Over one of the doors there is a coat-of-arms of the Republic. It is the police-station, and you can see two vigilantes in their tattered uniforms—their swords leaning against the wall—sitting on cows' skulls and sucking at their morning mate.

The largest building, measuring a frontage of a hundred yards or so, has a lengthy sign in big, clumsy letters painted with tar, which, partly due to the shaky hand of the artist, and partly to the scorching rays of the sun softening the tar, are twisted in all directions. "Tienda, Almacen Ferreteria, Corralon de Maderas, Deposito de lanas y Despacho de Bebidas," and below, with a little flourish in red lead at each side, "La Favorita." The owner was not far wrong in calling his shop "The Favorite," for it is the only one in El Chajá. The portentous sign means that the house is a trading encyclopædia. It is a Grocer's, a Draper's, and an Ironmonger's shop, a timber yard, a wool depôt, and a public-house. You can get in it anything from a drink to a coffin, all at "greatly reduced" fabulous prices. Needless to say, it is kept by a "gallego," the opprobrious name by which Spaniards are known in the Pampas.

Opposite "La Favorita" stood the galera, a dilapidated, mud-bespattered mail coach, which was to convey us to Los Arbolitos, a small village on the same lines as El Chajá, and about eighty miles distant from it. We brought our bags from the station, and, piling them up in the middle of the road, we stood smoking cigarettes and discussing the weather with some gauchos while one of them was busy harnessing the horses. He was a native in all but dress. His high cheek-bones, narrow forehead, and black, coarse, shiny hair indicated his Indian origin, but he had discarded the chiripá, and wore trousers, high, stiff boots, and broad-brimmed hat. He was in his shirt-sleeves, and stuck at his back through a broad leather belt, adorned with numerous silver coins, you could see his facon, a silver-handled knife with an elaborate leather sheath. Don Honorio took half an hour to finish harnessing, for a galera is drawn by at least seven horses, one on each side of the shafts, three—called cadeneros because their traces are cadenas, or chains—pulling from a cross-bar tied to the end of the shaft, and two laderos, or side horses. The number of laderos may be increased ad libitum. They are a distinctive feature of the vehicles of the Pampas. Their harness consists of the recado or native saddle, to one side of which is tied a single trace, so that the horse does not pull from the chest but from the body, and in so doing stands in an oblique line to the ground. The other end of the trace is fixed on any convenient part of the galera, preferably the protruding end of the axles. The laderos have no bit or reins, but simply a rope round their necks, which is tied to the neck of one of the cadeneros, or to another ladero, if there is one already.

When the horses were in their places Don Honorio had a look round, rubbed his hands with satisfaction, and, lighting a cigarette, which he stuck in one corner of his mouth, climbed up a portable ladder to the roof of the galera, and began to load on top of it—helped by the owner of the vehicle, an Americanised Italian—bags, trunks, some barrels, and a few agricultural implements from "La Favorita." The ignorance of dynamical principles exhibited by galera drivers has cost some passengers their lives, for, by thus loading the roofs of the galeras, they raise their centre of gravity to such a height that their equilibrium is well-nigh unstable, and the Pampero wind finds little difficulty in overturning them.

The galera had seen a long and honorable service, to judge by the scars, bashes, and mutilations which its body presented. The wheels, loosely fitting in the axles, seemed to shove up more than to support the box, and, by their obliquity, imitated the overwrought laderos. There was room in the interior for eight persons of ordinary dimensions, while beside the driver on the roof, at a height of ten feet above the ground, three persons could be seated. The luggage packed and a tarpaulin fastened over it, we took our places. A Spanish doctor, with his wife and two sons, occupied one side in the interior. He was a man of small stature, broad, well-set shoulders, scanty moustache, and bright, piercing eyes. His wife was a thin woman of delicate features and dark complexion, wrapped up in gauzes and veils. The railway journey had apparently worn her out, and she sank into one of the corners, closing her dreamy eyes, while her boys did their best to keep quiet under the stern glances of their father.

On the other side sat a provincial deputy, a half-caste of very dark complexion and blue eyes, coarse, thick moustache, which hung like a curtain over his mouth, and thin, nervous fingers, stained with the nicotine from an eternal cigarette. Next to him ourselves, then a young china of comely features, jet-black eyes, and long, thick tresses hanging down her back. She was dressed in a pink calico costume, and for headgear she wore a multicolored cotton neckerchief. By her side in the corner next to the door sat her mother. She was the infallible fat person who always gets into a 'bus or a tramway car, wedging in the unfortunate passengers to half their ordinary size. Her body was enormous. Her tightly-fitting robes threatened to burst at any moment, at any place. She looked like a gigantic pudding. Her head, with a prodigious growth of hair, was small by comparison, and seemed to have been placed on her shoulders by mistake. Her features, spite of her years, had all the freshness peculiar to obese people, and indicated that she had been a most acceptable young woman.

Panting and sweating, the Italian and Don Honorio pushed her into the corner, and with great difficulty closed the door. The galera creaked, the Spaniard smiled, his boys giggled. The half-caste looked at us, then, taking the cigarette from his lips, whispered into our ears:—

"Ojalá la derrita el sol!" (I wish the sun would melt her). Perhaps her daughter overheard him, for, turning round her head—any other movement being out of the question—she looked at us with pleading glance, and so sweet were her eyes and so soft her gaze that from the bottom of our hearts we forgave the intrusion of her voluminous parent.

Don Honorio and three gauchos climbed to their seats above. The whip—at least twenty feet long—cracked like a shot, and amidst the din of the bells round the necks of the cadeneros, the wails of the axles, which badly wanted a lubricant, and the barking of a host of mongrel dogs, we set off.

"Buen viaje!" shouted the inhabitants of El Chajá, waving, for want of handkerchiefs, their hats. "Gracias!" answered we. We soon lost sight of the houses. The horses, hurried by the repeated cracks of the whip, were going at full gallop, and the galera jumped up and down and swayed from side to side as it flew along the track—for it was not a road—cut through the grassy plain by repeated journeys.

The doctor slept. No doubt he was used to that way of travelling. The Spanish lady started at each bump of the galera, and let out a half-suppressed "Oh!" of fear. The boys, heedless of any danger, were only intent on the unchanging scenery of the Pampas, and welcomed with delight the sight of a wandering cow or sheep. The deputy smoked, and the china was busy fanning her panting mother. After driving four leagues, we came to a puesto, where we halted for fresh horses. The puesto was a mud hut, near which the horses were kept in a corral, which, instead of a fence, had a broad ditch dug round it to prevent the horses running away. While Don Honorio was changing our sweating, worn-out horses for fresh ones, the puestera, a wizened old woman, offered us some mate, which our bulky companion hailed with delight. Then the galera started again. Puesto after puesto was passed. The sun grew hotter and hotter, rendering the air in the interior of the galera almost unbearable. It was nearly dinner time, when we were suddenly startled from a slumber, into which the overbearing heat and the monotony of the landscape had thrown us, by an exclamation from the matron.

"Ay m'hija!" exclaimed she, closing her eyes. Her face turned as white as could be expected in a china, and she let her arms fall by her sides. She had fainted.

"Mama! mama!" cried her daughter, bursting into tears, trying at the same time to undo some of her garments.

The boys, the fear of some impending catastrophe painted on their faces, wakened up the doctor, who, with the help of some brandy, brought the old lady round.

Fortunately we were near an estancia, where we would get our dinners.

We arrived at the estancia at noon. The building—of the same pattern as those of El Chajá—was surrounded by willows. Under their welcome shadow a fire of peat had been lit, over which two lambs were undergoing a roasting process. The golden fat, dripping on to the embers, filled the air with what—to our hungry stomachs—seemed a delicious aroma. We left the galera sore and stiff, and, sitting on the ground—for chairs there were none—we soon dispatched the succulent roast, eating it in real gaucho style. This is done with great risk to your nose. A big piece of roast is held in the left hand with the fingers, for forks are a luxury in the Pampas, then a bite is taken, and the remainder of the piece is cut off by using the knife upwards. The roast was washed down by copious draughts of wine from a common porrón. Our repast finished, we lay down on the ground and slept our siesta, "como un angel," till Don Honorio wakened us at about one o'clock, and we resumed our journey.

The dinner and the siesta had given us all a new lease of vigor, and the old lady had completely recovered from her fit. But, alas! she was doomed to lead us into trouble.

We had only passed two puestos, when, half-way between the second and third, we had to cross a laguna, a great expanse of marshy ground, which for our sins was at the time entirely under water. Ducks and water fowls were swimming about, and a score of flamingoes were going through their soldier-like evolutions. The galera had gone into the laguna some hundred yards, and the water was beginning to flood the interior of the vehicle, when the horses se empacaron—that is, refused to move another inch. The merciless flagellation to which Don Honorio submitted them, and the foul curses which he poured forth, were ineffectual. At last he climbed down from his perch, and, wading with the water up to the waist, he passed some ungallant remarks about the weight of the old lady, and, without ceremony, asked us to leave the galera, and walk or swim to dry land.

The old lady looked helpless, her daughter cried and invoked the saints, the deputy lit another cigarette, and the doctor, jumping into the water, ordered his wife and boys to remain in the galera. The boys' faces grew sad, for they had been looking forward to the paddling, and they sat still, a furtive tear running down their cheeks. With the help of two of the gauchos, we succeeded in buoying the old lady to the shore, followed by her bewailing daughter; then the galera, freed from the enormous weight, turned back, and, amidst the splutter of the horses, reached dry land.

We resumed our seats, dripping with water and greatly refreshed by the bath. The galera went round the laguna, and in so doing lengthened our journey by three or four hours, and we eventually arrived at Los Arbolitos in the dead of night, soaked, hungry, sore, and shaken, and with our mind made up never to travel again in such an abominable conveyance.

We had always puzzled at the mail coach in the Pampas being called a galera, and we had attributed its name to that idiosyncrasy which has baffled philologists, by which Castilian words change meaning in the Argentine in the most arbitrary, stupid fashion; but after our journey we saw the explanation, and we could not help admiring the humor of whoever gave the mail coach of the Pampas its name.

Galera means a galley, and also the penalty of being condemned to the oars in a galley! So the mail coach of the Pampas is the ship of that sea of grass, and, like a ship, it pitches and rolls as it goes along, and its passengers suffer as any galley-slave.

ENERGETICS AND SOCIOLOGY.

SIR,—It is an old saying that there are as many philosophies as there are philosophers, and it seems as if the same jingle were applicable to sociology. Every season brings a number of new systems on the market, few wholly without merit, but none so new in substance that the new light they contain could not be represented and demonstrated in fewer pages than most of them comprise.

A book which has a claim to be classified under the exceptions has just been published by Wilhelm Ostwald, the renowned professor of physical chemistry, who until lately occupied a chair at the Leipzig University, and who now has retired into private life in order to devote his time to the explanation and exemplification of his philosophical views. Ostwald is known as one of the chief exponents of the philosophy of "energetics," a natural philosophy to which all the phenomena of the world are only movements and transformations of energy. The application of this conception to social life, and particularly to the questions of culture in the German sense of the word, is the object of his new book, published under the title "Energetic Foundations of the Science of Culture."*

Now, the attempt to dissolve social life into manifestations of biological or physico-mechanical forces is not in itself new. It has repeatedly been made, and the results have seldom been very satisfactory. For there has been too much recourse to forced and strained analogies. It is one of the pleasing features of the present book that it is free from this blemish. A man of the laboratory, who has mastered physical science in its different branches, Ostwald keeps on the terra firma of natural fact as it can be demonstrated to the average man, and in regard to the different manifestations of social life he has abstained from going more into details than is necessary for the purposes of illustration. On 184 widely printed pages he shows in thirteen lectures how the energetic principle serves to make us best understand and value life and human progress. According to him, all truly cultural work consists in "preserving free energy," i.e., in increasing the proportion of "useful energy" to the crude energies at the disposal of mankind.

It is very interesting to see a man of what Germans call the "exact"—i.e., the demonstrable sciences—reduce the involved sociological problems to mathematical equations. It is a kind of an economic interpretation of life, and, indeed, we are told by Ostwald that science is essentially economic. Science can, he says, "generally be characterised as the technology of systematic foretelling or prophesying, and only such knowledge is to be called sound science that can be shown to possess this 'prophetic' character." This sounds rather like crude utilitarianism, but in the application Ostwald shows that this standard of value fits also the higher manifestations of social culture, and he can with justice repel the reproach of general crudity of conception. But he is a utilitarian, if ever a utilitarian existed, and his unconventional appreciation of some branches of learning would have delighted Bentham.

It is an experience easily explained that sociological theories based on biology are mostly conservative, whilst those based on mechanical science lead to revolutionary deductions. Brave Menenius Agrippa was the father of the former; Ostwald's book is a good specimen of the latter. Biological exemplification is not on principle excluded—the demonstration would be inconclusive if it was—but it is restricted to those features of social life that quite evidently are of an organic nature. Society is an organism, but not everything in social life is in the same way and degree interdependent. There is free as well as bound-up energy in the conditions of social life. Without being a Socialist in every respect, our author would withdraw from the rule of the capitalists a good many sources of wealth, and also some commercial callings to-day under their sway.

Of particular interest are Professor Ostwald's views in regard to education and the learning of languages. In regard to school education he is a decided heretic. It is in his eyes to a great extent a most reprehensible waste of human energy. The rising generation is kept at school much too long. In a book on inventors and discoverers, also recently published by him,* he pleads for the ending of school years in the colleges where the subjects of instruction are compulsory at the age of 16 instead of 18 or 19, as at present in Germany. Keeping the young people longer in school and forcing them to learn things they don't like means robbing them of the best and most fruitful years of their life. And, particularly, Ostwald disparages the stuffing of the juvenile mind with philological knowledge. Preoccupation with ancient languages is all but complete dissipation, while the study of modern languages is of very restricted value, and should be greatly reduced.

It will surprise not a few people to hear a man who for twenty years has been an ornament of one of the most renowned German Universities speak like this. One is used to ascribe all the successes of Germany and Germans in science and practice to the spirit and system of the German schools, and here you have a severe indictment of them by one who, if not a German subject by birth, has from the beginning gone through the school career of a born German, and arrived at fame by great scientific achievements. Is he an eccentric in all other things but his speciality? I don't think so, although I admit that now and then he exaggerates. He does not speak at random, but adduces a good many conclusive facts, and it is advisable for non-Germans to weigh them well before too hastily imitating our institutions on the ground of successes that may be due to quite different causes. It makes you pause if you hear from Ostwald that the most celebrated German men of science were either bad or moderate pupils at school.

As a sociologist, Ostwald is to some extent influenced by the writings of a thinker who is little known outside of the German-speaking world, but who, although not a university man, has already made himself a name in the German philosophical world. It is the Austrian, Rudolf Goldscheid, a man of very advanced views, author of some very valuable books on the theory of will. Quite recently he published a book that deserves to be known by a wider public. Its title reads a little clumsy: "The Evolutionary Theory of Valuation, Evolutionary Economy, and Human Economy,"† but the book is not in the least clumsily written. On the contrary, Goldscheid, who started in literature as a writer of fiction, not only commands a most powerful pen, but has also a particular gift for giving his thoughts an epigrammatic turn. From one point of view the book is, as he puts it in the introduction, "a protest against the incredible waste of men that even in our days is still going on"; as a sociological theory it proclaims the clearing of Darwinism from its Malthusian admixture and the sophistries of the Weissmann schools. It is not Darwinism itself that is to-day breaking to pieces, but only the metaphysical teleology in the Darwinian system. Attacked for not having proved expediency in the working of nature, Darwin and the Darwinists have tried to prove considerably more of such expediency than really exists, and the Weissmann school have driven this teleology to extremes. "If you ask the Weissmannian why it is that so many suffer he will tell you that it is the natural result of not enough sufferings, and if you ask him, further, why so many die too early, he replies: 'Because not enough die early.'" This reactionary spirit must be fought with the greatest energy, in order to arrive at a consistent theory of an "upward evolution."

How can this be done? The first step is to cease stuffing Darwinism with VALUE. For the proving of variability and causality in the transformation of species —originally Darwin's main purpose—the material adduced by Darwin is quite sufficient. But it was not the intention of Darwin to lay down a law of evolution that will hold good for all eternity, and the best plan is to work out Darwinism as a theory free of valuation ("eine wertfreie Lehre").

In the same way the doctrine of the "will for power" must be thoroughly scrutinised. It is relativistic interpretation of the world and of history in the worst sense of the word. Not the mere will for power in itself, but the concerted will of the community for the mastery of nature is the principle of progressive evolution. And the watchword, instead of "Selection," is "Elevation."

English readers will here recall a much-quoted verse of one of their poets of democracy, and the principle proclaimed is certainly not new. But the enemies of democracy reappear in new dresses, with new doctrines, and the task is to fight them on their own ground, and with the enlarged knowledge of time, for the old purposes, and that is what Goldscheid does. We give here only some points of the programme of his book; we cannot enter into the deduction itself.

It was certainly a happy idea to take the question of human waste as the centre-point of the investigation. Take whatever phase you like of the great social and political questions of our time, and you will find at the bottom of it waste of human labor, waste of human progress, waste of human life. Much has been written and said in regard to the fearful waste represented by modern armaments. Everybody sees it, everybody complains of it, and yet its full amount is realised by few. The general public sees only the visible expenditure; it does not see the waste in knowledge, endeavor, and opportunities embodied in it.

Goldscheid is in this respect quite on the level of the philosopher of modern democracy. The will for power of nation over nation, the "HOLLOW PARADOX OF NATIONAL ADVANTAGE," to use his words, does not fare better with him than the "will for power" of individuals over others. It is a mistake to believe that this fight for national advantage must of necessity also work for social progress. The progress of Protection, of tariff walls—i.e., of the policy of the most indirect provision of goods—is one of the proofs that it works to-day more and more the other way; that waste of labor, and with it of human life, is here again increasing.

Conceived in this spirit, the science of economy is no longer the dismal science, but the science of life and redemption. Therefore our author calls it MENSCHEN-ÖKONOMIE, in opposition to political economy. It is revolutionary science. "The present national divisions," says Goldscheid—and it is a fit sentence to end a Whitsun letter with—"are the presupposition of capitalistic economy. For if the whole civilised world were one closed trading community, a different division and form of production, as well as a different organisation of consumption, would at once appear as the irresistible evolutionary condition of the well-being and the progress of the whole. In this way is the social question most narrowly connected with the international question, and not, as Marx believed, is the solution of the former at the same time the solution of the latter. On the contrary, progress in the solution of the international problem will step by step bring the social question nearer its solution."—Yours, &c.,

ROADS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The recent conference convened by the County Councils' Association and Mr. Lloyd George's Budget proposals has drawn attention to a subject of vast national importance—viz., our roads. Our highways, like the patient beasts that travel over them, render us immense service, but, being voiceless, receive far less consideration than they deserve. Facility of locomotion is necessary to the life of a people, whether that life be secured by business or by war. Transit is at the root of trade; if all commodities were at every man's hand there would be no occasion for buying and selling. There could be no army were there no means for collecting the units. The track is as essential to locomotion as is the vehicle; there can be no wheel where there is no way. A country's means of communication are like the blood-vessels of the body. The railways and waterways may correspond to the arteries and veins, but the roads are like the capillaries, and are as vital. In a matter of such paramount importance to the nation it seems absurdly unnecessary to urge that the Government should have direct control. The surveyors who took part in the Conference were not favorably disposed towards the setting up of a Roads Department, but their objections were apparently based on the same grounds as prompted the county surveyors to advocate county management of the roads, and the rural surveyors to preach the advantages of district control. These men are, not unnaturally, jealous of their powers and positions, and are not pleased at the possibility of official inspection. But their fears are probably groundless; local representatives, with knowledge of the local requirements and conditions, would be as necessary under a national department as now. Probably there would be as many berths as men qualified to fill them, and their official position would do much to rid them of undesirable parochial pressure. The multiplication of road authorities leads to the appointment of untrained surveyors, with bad engineering as a result. A national system would weed out the former and improve the latter.

Although the administrators of the new roads improvement fund are to be a mere body of disbursers, they will, in effect, act as advisors, for the simple reason that they will make no grants in aid of schemes that do not commend themselves to them; but it is sincerely to be hoped that this negative function will develop into a positive one, and that sooner or later an effective Government Roads Department will be evolved, so that the whole subject may receive the consideration and treatment its importance demands. It is often urged, especially by the local ratepayer, that those who use the roads should pay for them. And the argument is a sound one when properly understood. Who is it that really employs the tradesman's cart, the carrier's van, and the traction-engine? Is it not the private individual who wants his bread and meat brought from the shops, his trunks from the station, and the furniture from his old residence, or the bricks to build his new one? Does he not use the roads when he travels by omnibus or tram, by bicycle, or even on foot? And in other ways, more or less direct, we are all road-users, and more for business than for pleasure.

The call for better roads may have sounded like a selfish appeal from the motorist, but it is now readily admitted that the resulting benefit accrues to all road-users alike. Telford, Morin, Michelin, and others have shown that the tractive resistance of a bad macadam road is nearly double that of a similar road when it is hard, dry, and smooth. A tar-macadamised road presents as nearly smooth a surface as an asphalt one, the resistance offered by which latter is about half that of the best ordinary macadam, and, incidentally, less than that set up by tram rails—but of that more anon. Lower resistance to traction means less expenditure of force to accomplish the same results, and, consequently, a direct saving to all owners of vehicles using the improved roads, and an indirect saving to the ratepayer.

In many cases where no increase of funds is possible, far better results could be obtained at the same expenditure if proper methods were employed. It is time to enter an emphatic protest against "water-bound" macadam—against both the term and what it stands for. Some surveyors apparently believe that water acts as an adhesive for the stones and debris into which they pour it; others look upon the water merely as a vehicle for conveying the binding material into the interstices between the stones. But the result is, broadly, the same in the two cases. The stones, which should be jammed together as tightly as possible, are actually insulated by the water, and, as the liquid gradually dries out, the stones are left loose, and are soon dislodged. Most binding material should be used as sparsely as possible, not as a matrix in which the stones are to be individually isolated, but as wedges between stones the surfaces of which have already been made to contact as far as possible. No binding material which is not as hard as the stones themselves can be expected to serve its purpose efficiently. To lay any hay, manure, soil, or other rubbish on the road to the injury thereof is an offence under the Highways Act, and surveyors and road contractors who countenance the use of such matter as binding material might well be held liable accordingly. Section 56 of the same Act, which forbids surveyors to leave heaps of stone, or any other matter or thing whatsoever, on the road unguarded at night, should be rigidly enforced in the case of new metal unlighted and unrolled.

The use of soft stone is the worst economy. The stone should be hard enough to resist crushing by the heaviest pressure it will ever be subjected to, and that should be the pressure of the steam-roller. As a rule, the wheels of the roller are so large and so wide that the pressure per unit of surface is much less than that exerted by many narrow-tyred vehicles, and the road when left as finished is not properly consolidated. Stone that will not stand up to the traffic will soon be reduced to a state of mud or dust, according to the state of weather; and soft stones commonly produce a dangerously slippery class of mud.

A tar-macadam road has great advantages in the firm setting of the stones, the exclusion of water, and the prevention of dust; but great care is exercised in the sizing, laying, and rolling of the stones in successive layers, and if the same trouble were taken with ordinary macadam, greatly improved results would be obtained.

A properly laid and set tar-treated road is highly beneficial to health, both in minimising dust and also by reason of the wholesome odors arising from it. But it has a disadvantage at night, in its dead-black surface, and if a light finish can be given to it, it will contribute considerably to safety. A dark object throws no shadow on, and is practically invisible against a dead-black background, as the conjuror knows to his pecuniary advantage, and the driver and pedestrian to their mutual discomfort.

It is a common complaint against some classes of traffic that the roads were never intended for their use, the suggestion being that what was considered good enough in the past should be accepted without complaint now. But if this line of argument were followed to its logical conclusion, traffic would be confined to the pedestrian or, at most, the pack-horse. It is true that certain classes of traffic present grave difficulties, but if the roads are not equal to the reasonable requirements of any kind of legal vehicle, it is the owners of the vehicles who have the best right to complain. Traction engines certainly are a thorn in the side of the road surveyor, and when one sees a quarry-master hauling road metal with one of these monsters, and incidentally doing more damage to the road than his stones will do good, as sometimes occurs, the irony of the situation gives one cause to think.

But if a particular class of traffic calls for road treatment which acts as a hindrance and a danger to other classes, it is time the line were drawn. These charges, and a number of others, may be fairly brought against the tramcar and its track. It is readily conceded that the tram has been, and is, an immense convenience to a very large number of people; but its convenience is not because of, but in spite of, the track. The virtue of the rails lies in their smoothness and low traction resistance, but as already stated, this resistance is somewhat higher than that offered by asphalte, and it is considerably higher than that offered by the original "tramways." These consisted of long stone slabs set accurately end to end in the wheel tracks; and examples are still to be seen near Towcester and elsewhere. The grooving of the rail doubtless accounts for the extra friction, and this same grooving is the crux of the problem which perplexes the road engineer. If the rails are laid in the middle of the road, the trams obstruct the other traffic, and the passengers have to cross part of the road to get to and from the cars. (To reach the trams on the Victoria Embankment, every passenger has to cross practically the whole width of the roadway, to the great danger of themselves and other road users.) If, on the other hand, the lines are laid adjacent to or on an extension of the footpath, as was suggested by one or two writers at the recent Conference, carts and carriages would not be able to stop at houses or business premises without holding up the line of trams. One is almost forced to agree with the sardonic view that the proper place for tramways is down below. If a tittle of the money expended on installing a tramway system were devoted to the perfecting of the road surface, motor omnibuses could carry the public with as little or less noise and vibration, with more convenience to their patrons, and without obstructing other traffic. With a smooth, hard roadway, the necessity for rails, and the difficulties and dangers inseparable therefrom, would disappear.—Yours, &c.,

DOUGLAS LEECHMAN.

THE TROUBLES IN SPAIN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter of Señor de Maeztu, published in the NATION of yesterday, is almost enough to make one despair of Spain and the Spaniards Their "great writer, Joaquin Costa," has not only abused "la pérfida Inglaterra." He has declared that all his countrymen of this generation are emasculated. Don Joaquin was brought up to Madrid about a year ago by the Liberals, during the agitation against the Anarchist Bill, in order that his "leonine roar" might "terrify the jackals of reaction." That is how the Madrid papers put it in their figurative way. He was then, and had been before, copious on that same question of emasculation. If he is a good witness against us, Señor de Maeztu can hardly refuse him as an authority on his brother Spaniards, whom he has much better means of knowing. For my part, I, who am no Liberal, would scorn to defend Mr. Asquith and Sir E. Grey against the monstrous charge of having entered into a mean intrigue to force Spain to give a job to English shipbuilders. Such accusations are to be answered as Sir Robert Peel replied to the calumnies of Cobbett. Señor de Maeztu's letter is of value only because he does something to justify Costa's crude estimate of the Spaniards of to-day. According to Señor de Maeztu, they are so unmanly that they allow themselves to be committed to foolish adventures by base politicians, so wanting in foresight, in the capacity to see facts and conform to them, so easily befooled, that any foreigner can play on them as he pleases, use them as cats'-paws, and wear them as "noses of wax." If he is right, what hope can there be for such a people? They are given up to strong delusions, and to believe in lies. About a year ago, I was speaking in Spain with two Spanish gentlemen of the Woods and Forests Department. They were intelligent and vigorous men, keenly interested in science, and well acquainted with what was being done in their own line as far away as British India. One of them remarked to me: "You foreigners must look down upon us." When I denied it, he only replied, in a quiet tone: "Well, we look down upon ourselves." If Señor de Maeztu speaks for the majority of Spaniards, my friend, the Ingeniero de Montes, was not far wrong. In my opinion, the Ingeniero was unduly pessimistic, and the correspondent of the "Correspondencia" is misleading. Other explanations of the misfortunes of Spain can be found; but the psychology of the Spanish people (which alone supplies the true reading of the riddle) is a large subject.—Yours, &c.,

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION IN THE SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Some of the articles and letters in your paper have again brought before us the ever important subject of religious education in the schools.

This subject may for the present be more or less quiescent, but it is nevertheless as urgent as ever, and still as hopelessly unsolved.

The quiescence has been something to be thankful for.

The dust of controversy has been allowed to settle, various arguments have arranged themselves in balanced perspective, and the personal point of view has been given time to develop.

In looking back on all the different aspects of the question as brought forward by individuals of varied religious trainings and experiences, one is surprised to find how little the whole subject has been dealt with from the child's point of view. And yet this is the one point of view that really matters.

It would be interesting to collect together the chief exponents of the many leaders of thought on this subject, and to place "a little child in their midst."

Would not some of them then begin to realise, as they came face to face with that child of immature understanding, undeveloped brain, and innocent ways of meeting life's dealings, that they had been raising storms where no storms were needed, trying to build highways for feet not ready to walk, and attempting to prepare problems for minds entirely unfitted to grasp their meaning.

Our methods of action all need reversing. Instead of asking ourselves how certain ideals shall be taught, how certain religious conceptions shall be imparted, or how ancient doctrines of by-gone ages shall be re-engrafted, we must still place the children in our midst and ask ourselves what they are needing; what they are ready to do; and truly endeavor to find out in what way they point to us the method of their own education.

Not what or how much we can pour into them, but what and how much can be drawn out, so that their latent powers and capacities may be developed to the fullest and highest extent, should be our aim. When we face the problem from this side, we become aware that a large part of our present education of children stands condemned. At an age when children should spend the larger part of the day in playing, running, climbing, enquiring, experimenting, restless in all sorts of activity, we place them for a large portion of their waking hours on hard seats and bind them to attend to subjects which they are barely ready for, or else to which they are entirely averse.

Then, when their intellects should have arrived at the stage when some such treatment might be suitable to them, we turn them out of the schools to face the world as men and women.

There should be no surprise that our so-called educational methods have so little effect on the physical, mental, and moral character of the nation.

By the light of modern science and thought, we are now in a position to see that each normal human being in some way repeats historically the life of the human race; and by this light we are to see to it that children are as far as possible educated.

In their early years they are not idealists, nor are they capable of any worthy religious conceptions. Then why treat them as if they were?

In the rough and tumble of their child life they soon become capable of understanding what is fair, what is true, and what is kind, and they are ready on these lines to be educated. But it is in the home, nursery, or playground that these activities come into play, and not on the school bench. When in the freedom of a life of play and experiment they have got hold of these ideas by living them, they have then somewhat to build on when in later days the Bible or history lesson is to be taught, or ideas of social life are to be implanted.

At present the tendency is to starve their lives of what they really need and to feed them on moral and religious ideas for which they are quite unready, which is mentally and morally just as poisonous as it would be to feed newborn babes on beef steaks.

We must remember that "the greatest of the poets and the ethical teachers of all times" were not writing or preaching to the children of their times or of any other time. It is for us to see that the children so grow physically, mentally, and morally, that such teaching may meet their needs when the needs arise, but not before.

It would require too much of your space even to hint at the ideal lines we ought to work upon; but it is in the hope that the child's point of view may receive more consideration that this letter has been written. When the right methods have been found and applied, we shall have young men and women leaving our schools ready and fit to judge for themselves the best religious expression of that which lies within them.

It may well be that a rational secular education will be found to be the diviner method of helping the child.—Yours, &c.,

CATHERINE RYLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—Professor Muirhead's last letter shows that we are getting at the heart of the subject, and I specially thank him for his agreement with the proposal to reduce the hours of religious instruction.

But is it true (a) that every teacher is able, or will under any system of training be able, to give the kind of instruction which Professor Muirhead desires, or, (b) that even the best teachers can give such instruction if they are confined to the exposition of the Bible, or, (c) that any teacher, in expounding, e.g., the Epistles, will find, as Professor Muirhead implies, that the question whether St. Paul "ever wrote anything at all" is irrelevant?—Yours, &c.,

GRAHAM WALLAS.

THE WORKING OF THE LAND TAXES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am bound to say that your article of July 24th has impressed me pretty much in the same way as "Leodensis."

You maintain in reply to him that land, contrary to all articles of commerce, can have two values at the same time. This, to my mind, appears an impossibility.

A piece of agricultural land worth £100 is worth that sum because it is not a blackened waste, but productive in agriculture. It is not worth £40, or any other fictitious sum; it is worth nothing for building until a demand springs up, which enables the speculative builder to pay more than £100 for it. Then, as you say, the agricultural value disappears, but not before this new site value of £100 or more has been liquidated.

The attempt to disassociate the value of land from the uses by which that value has been created and maintained is quite incomprehensible to me, and I am sure to others, as it is certain that it will not be put to other uses without the prospect of a more profitable return. But I am ready to learn.—Yours, &c.,

G. A. SEEBOHM.

Townend, Knutsford,

---

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I thank you for your comments in response to my letter. But I must still suggest that if land has an agricultural value of, say, £100 per acre, it cannot have a "prospective" building value of £40 any more than a present value of £40, unless upon the assumption that the agricultural value will fall to the lower figure. For, clearly, if land is worth £100 an acre for any purpose whatsoever—that is, if it has a market value, as fixed by the relationship of demand to supply, of £100—there can be no sellers at £40, and therefore there can be no such value. When the sale price in the open market—for whatever purpose—was £100, it would be just as easy to fix any other value—at £10 as at £40; for in neither case would there be any supply, and all economists have taught us that if there is no supply there can be no price.

So, too, if the building value, as you premise, overtops the agricultural price, the latter entirely disappears. It is quite true that, let for agricultural purposes, land may only yield a fraction of interest upon such a capital price as it would fetch if it were put up for sale in the open market. Most of us know that during many years—in the seventies, for instance—the mass of agricultural land in this country, that was sold, found purchasers willing to invest at 2 per cent. or even less, and to endeavor to estimate the capital value of agricultural land by means of its annual value, may be, and frequently is, entirely misleading. If your proposition were that land has an annual value and a capital value which may be of variable ratios, I should entirely agree with you. My proposition is that any lower, supposed, capital value is entirely merged and swallowed up in the higher, actual price, and that, therefore, to talk of the lower one as if it were existent is a pure fallacy. The capital value of land, as of everything else, is surely the price for which it will sell, and it cannot have any other. I scarcely think you can dispute this simple proposition.

As to the rise in prices, which in your illustration drives up the price of agricultural land from £50 to £100, of course I meant, as you did, the prices of agricultural produce in the open market. I was not referring to any rise in the price of land itself, due to a combination of owners, but to the rise in the price of land due to rise in the price of produce. I do not think there is or has been any such combination of owners, although ordinary and other considerations may have an influence in preventing owners, as a rule, from desiring to sell land. But it is quite possible—and, indeed, there are plenty of cases in which the possibility is realised—that we may have combinations of sellers of agricultural produce to raise prices. When the prices of agricultural produce are so raised, this is not due to any activity on the part of the man who cultivates the land. How far it is due to any action or enterprise of the community itself, is, I think further, a moot question. For example, when Mr. Leiter, or any other American, corners the wheat market, and sends up the price of wheat so that, possibly, an acre of wheat land may go up in value, is that due to any activity and exertion on the part of the community at large? If so, the verdict upon the community must be "mostly fools" for putting up the price of wheat against themselves. In this case, I think, the rise in the value of the wheat land, so far as it is due to any enterprise or industry, is due to Mr. Leiter or other organisers of "corners," and the increment in value, upon the hypothesis of enterprise and industry, ought really to be paid over to them. If, however, we look at the situation from another point of view, and find that the community in this country has been forced to pay the increased price which sets up the capital value, then, if the unearned increment theory which you state is to apply at all as a "principle," the community ought to share the increased value of this agricultural land. But the Government have expressly excluded agricultural land, and this, I think, not in reply to any plea ad misericordiam. Rather, they have held that it is not just and fair that any increment arising from any "general" rise in the price of agricultural commodities should be treated as unearned increment. Indeed, they especially differentiate between increment arising in this manner and increment which, as they put it, may lead to an increased local value in agricultural produce—such as, for example, might possibly arise through the sinking of a coal mine and the bringing together a number of workpeople. In this case, they hold that the increased agricultural value ought to be subject to the tax on unearned increment; yet it seems to me that with this increment in value the "community," as such, could have had nothing whatever to do.

The "community" does not sink a coal mine where there was none before. On the contrary, this is done by a few individual capitalists working for their own ends. They collect a number of workpeople, who, it may be supposed, move to the neighborhood of the colliery, and so improve the local market for agricultural produce, because they are better off in this new position than they were previously. That is to say, they gain their advantage beforehand; they follow where good wages are offered them; and if they could obtain their agricultural produce free, or at the previous (ex hypothesi lower) prices, they would, according to all economic argument, be ready to accept lower wages, and the additional profit would go into the pockets of their capitalist employers. It seems to me, therefore, that in this case the intermediaries—the "community," if you will—that is, the mining population who come to the colliery, have no claim upon this unearned increment. They have done nothing to create it, since as consumers they have merely transferred their custom from one district to another, and have done this for their own benefit; whereas the colliery owner may really be said to have done something. The point is, however, that in this latter case the Government had proposed to tax the agricultural increment; whereas in the case of a general rise in prices, engineered, it may be, from the United States or through some other form of capitalist combination, the resulting increment, as they hold, is not to be subject to taxation.

Where the rise in the agricultural value is due to a movement of population of the kind I have indicated, it can scarcely be said that the population pay more for their agricultural produce than they did previously; probably, indeed, they pay somewhat less, and so gain an advantage. Where the rise is due to the "organisation" of trade by a trust or combine, then the public are undoubtedly plundered—that is, they contribute largely to any rise in the capital value of agricultural land. Where, however, the rise is not realised, but, as in the case of the "undeveloped" building land, exists merely in the form of surveyors' estimates, which may or may not be approved in an eventual sale, it surely cannot be said that the population have contributed a penny-piece towards such value. They have not paid anything at all, and they cannot possibly pay until, and if, the supposed higher price is realised—and when this is done, under our present system, the higher price of the land becomes subject to rating; the community thus taking its share.

As to the final point—of the discrepancies between the estimates of valuers; have we any guarantee that a State valuer would be more accurate than those whom I instanced, who, on the one side, set up the valuation of £235,000, and, on the other, of £32,000? For myself, I think that State valuers would be liable to error equally with either of these sets of honorable gentlemen, and, if that is the case, what justification could there be for making their valuation the subject of enforced taxation? In the case of death duties, the executors can realise, if they please, and if the will (or settlement) does not prevent this. If the will prevents, that is the voluntary act of the testator, and there can be no reasonable complaint of a Government valuation. But there is no such option where taxes are levied as is now proposed. I do not complain of any taxation of the wealthy in proportion to their ability to pay. I should be one of the last to do this; but that is another matter.

I do not know that I could raise any theoretical objection to a change from yearly value to capital value as a basis of rating, though this would have to be guarded very carefully if it were not to inflict serious injustice. It would also include the property as it stands, and not simply one portion of the property—for reasons which, if you allow me space, and I can find time, I may enlarge upon on some future occasion. But my present purpose is to deal with the "principle" of the increment tax as "one of extreme simplicity," and not to enter upon the general question.—Yours, &c.,

LEODIENSIS.

THE TACTICS OF THE SUFFRAGETTES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is a very large class of electors who, while heartily in favor of giving the vote to women, are being so sickened by the behavior of the Suffragettes (as distinguished from Suffragists) that they are nearing the point of refusing all support to the movement. Meeting as I do with many of this class, I can vouch for what I say, and can assure the Suffragettes that they are doing not good, but harm, to the cause they profess to have at heart.

May I, through the medium of THE NATION, put to any of your militant readers a very few straight questions, the answers to which many electors would be greatly interested in reading?

(1) It will, of course, be admitted that the granting of the vote to women would be a far-reaching and important step?

(2) Assuming this to be granted, was the last General Election fought mainly on Female Suffrage?

(3) As the answer to this question can only be in the negative, I then ask, how is it that directly a newly-elected Government comes into power, from an election admittedly not fought on the franchise question, you at once begin to make what you grant to be a big and important demand, and, failing to obtain satisfaction, attempt to harass the Government at elections, public meetings, and otherwise? Did you seriously suppose that this Government, elected for specific purposes, was going to abandon its programme and appeal once more to the electors upon your pet subject?

(4) You claim, and rightly, equality with man—not only in the matter of the vote, but in many other (perhaps all other) matters. If a man assaults a policeman or breaks a window, he goes to gaol, and if he does not behave himself there, he has extra punishment. When you do these things, and it is proposed to treat you in the same way (or in even a milder way), you protest most vehemently and cause questions to be asked in the House. Do you see any logic in all this, and do you think your behavior is likely to attract the support and admiration of the men upon whose votes it will rest as to whether you get the vote or not?

These questions, Sir, indicate the difficulties that present themselves to a logical mind. I should much like to see full and satisfying replies to them.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was surprised to read in this week's NATION a letter so impolite and arrogant in tone as Mr. Roxburgh's reply to Mrs. Brailsford's moderately stated appreciation of the W.S.P.U. Surely it is very apparent that in a brief letter one cannot state more than a few of the many incidents which go to form an impression. In reply, it is not impertinent to ask what extensive knowledge of the movement led Mr. Roxburgh to sum up the action of "those suffragettes" in a brief sentence worthy of a Harmsworth journal. May I even copy his example, and tabulate this impressive list:—

1. "Dog-whips at the Albert Hall." (Unfortunately there was only one, and it certainly was wielded with dignity.)
2. "Downing-street padlocks."
3. "Slapped inspectors." (If Mr. Roxburgh refers to Mrs. Pankhurst's recent action, he should have read Countess Lytton's admirable letter in the "Times," in which she explained that Mrs. Pankhurst so acted in order to save the older members of the deputation from a prolonged struggle with the police.)
4. "Bitten inspectors." (This still remains an infamous myth.)
5. "All the long roll of their past achievements"!

If Mr. Roxburgh, instead of buttressing up his opinions by the reading of unscrupulous journalistic reports in a comfortable college study, would "come down" to London, attend a few suffragette meetings, visit 4, Clement's Inn, and, when he returned to his arm-chair, would read the reports in "Votes for Women" as well as those in more "spicy" journals, I should respect his opinion—which probably would be different from the one he expresses in Saturday's NATION. At least, would he kindly believe that the suffragettes are "militants" not because they enjoy a tussle with the police and a few months in prison, but because they believe that the militant policy will best advance their cause—and they are right. While their actions shock arm-chair critics, their arguments and courage convince all who meet them.

Like many others, I used to be a zealous critic of the suffragettes, but have been converted—against my inclination—by an intimate knowledge of the W.S.P.U. to be a sincere admirer of its members.—Yours, &c.,

LESLIE STANNARD HUNTER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I most willingly excuse the pretty temper shown by your two Liberal correspondents. It must, indeed, be annoying to feel obliged to answer at such length a letter so foolish and unreasonable as mine.

I see that I have given a wrong impression by stating that I am a new member of the Women's Social and Political Union. I am not a "convert," but have followed and approved this movement from its beginning, though I only recently found myself in a position to become a member. It was thus with considerable understanding of the movement that I wrote of its bye-election work, of which the practical details alone were unfamiliar to me.

I should like to thank Mr. J. Fergusson Roxburgh, of Cambridge, for tabulating the instances I gave of the kind of facts that come before the members of the Union every day in great numbers; and to express gratitude to both my critics for summarising my letter, and thus practically republishing it. I have read their letters with care and consideration, and I wish they had attacked me with some definite arguments. They have put me in the position of having to reply to a state of mind.

The main points in Mr. J. Fergusson Roxburgh's criticism seem to be (1) that he is troubled because we have no dignity; (2) that he thinks our methods retard our cause.

As to the first point, I am sure that he knows quite well the meaning of what I said. If women (or men) imprisoned in the course of an agitation for their political rights submit to be treated as common criminals, they do tacitly lower "the dignity of their cause." In striking against the second division treatment, these women are asserting that dignity by the only means open to them. With regard to the instances given of "undignified" action, I could answer each of them in detail and at length, but they seem to me unimportant. It constantly happens in life that a merely physical dignity has to be sacrificed to a dignity of principle or emotion that makes the other appear trivial. But I have never heard that the possession of dignity or any other virtue, aesthetic or otherwise, was an argument for or against the granting of the franchise; and anyone who has stood at a polling booth and watched the electors reeling in, already drunk at ten in the morning, would be amazed by such a proposition.

As to the second point, if the militant Suffragists are not forwarding their own cause, how are we to account for their numbers, for their popularity (I re-assert this) wherever they go, for the rapidity with which they are winning adherents all over the country? What other party could fill every week for ten months of the year the large Queen's Hall and the St. James's Hall, besides holding innumerable smaller meetings? And this is done in the face of a Press boycott. Meetings held by Suffragettes are not reported even when they fill the Albert Hall to overflowing. Their actions are misrepresented in the papers, and letters of explanation or correction are repressed. Any small point against them is given wide publicity, but of the hard educational work carried on ceaselessly by the Union no report is ever published. It would be foolish to resent ill-informed criticism; for where is information to be found? Mr. Wm. S. Campbell says that we have a friend in what he calls the "Yellow Press." I should be glad, indeed, to know which of its organs does support or has supported us. Of course, in one sense, the very unfairness of the Press has helped this movement. It has had to depend on its own inherent vitality; and that is why no external opposition can possibly check it. But I think that any student of social life, even if hostile not only to our methods but to our aims, must by now begin to feel that this agitation is at least an interesting phenomenon, and worth an effort of the understanding. The futility of most of the criticism directed against the W.S.P.U. is due to the fact that our critics don't know what they are criticising. It is very strange that they should at the same time think a movement of sufficient importance for them to denounce, yet not of sufficient importance for their investigation. If I wanted to criticise, say, the Budget, I should read it up; I should go to Mr. Lloyd George's meetings (disguised, of course, as a man) and try to understand it before I talked about it. Is it too much to suggest that Liberals, and even members of Parliament, might, when the big weekly meetings begin again in the autumn, attend some of them, hear our leaders, and judge for themselves the character of this movement; and that meantime they might get a few of their pamphlets and take the weekly paper, "Votes for Women," which gives the history of the movement from day to day, details of the work being done in the country, and verbatim reports of the police-court trials? When any one has honestly taken the trouble to follow and understand this agitation, then only is his criticism likely to be helpful. We can, of course, get on without our opponents taking this intelligent trouble, but an uninformed hostility is only prolonging the struggle, the suffering, and the waste of energies and of lives. One of your correspondents, Sir, implies that, by showing their readiness to struggle for political freedom, women prove their unfitness for its possession. No doubt similar things were said during the tumultuous years when working men were having their struggle for the same end. Are women to show their fitness for the franchise by their acquiesence in doing without it? If this were a movement of some unenfranchised body of men, every advanced paper in the country would be applauding their rebellion and supporting their claim. As it is, our Liberal press, terrified at the prospect of granting political freedom to British women, spends its eloquence upon alien tyrannies and injustices that are safely distant.

I hope that I misunderstand Mr. Campbell when I take him to mean that, if women are opposed to the Licensing Bill, they ought not to have the vote. But I am not sure; for papers which call themselves Liberal too often write as if, unless women can prove that they are all Liberals, they have no right to enfranchisement. On this line of reasoning, how many men is Mr. Campbell prepared to deprive of their voting power? Surely many "agents of the drink traffic" are among our electors, and I should like to know on what principle of vices and virtues Mr. Campbell would have voting power conceded or denied. Will someone formulate this new "Liberal" doctrine of the franchise? I confess it passes my reasoning powers.

As a matter of fact, the W.S.P.U. did not oppose the Licensing Bill. It has nothing to do with any Bills, good or bad, until a Woman's Franchise Bill is passed or promised. Until then it is in opposition to whatever Government may be in power. We are told that this opposition is of no importance. Why, then, are party Liberals so angry, and why, in spite of this exceedingly popular Budget, do their majorities continue to decrease?

Since last Friday twelve more women have gone to prison. They also are carrying out the hunger-strike. And they are doing this after hearing from the lips of their released friends what suffering the hunger-strike involves. I need say no more. Here is a spirit that nothing can crush, and it is spreading itself like a flame.—I am, yours, &c.,

J. E. M. Brailsford.

Hampstead, August 3rd, 1909.

THE YOUNG CUCKOO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In his interesting article on the cuckoo, your contributor writes of "the ingratiating habits of the young bird." Like many other young birds, "only more so," the young cuckoo soon brings to it new foster parents should the first pair come to an untimely end or be worn out by their nurse-child's voracity. This, however, does not seem to have been noted as going to such length of late years as was once or twice recorded by our ancestors. Two instances are given in the "Gentleman's Magazine" for 1806. In one a young cuckoo is said to have been fed by more than twenty titlarks, and in the other by no fewer than forty-eight wagtails! Some of these one would think must have deserted their own offspring to feed, not a foster nestling, but a strange monster crying for food.—Yours, &c.,

"DISAFFECTION" IN INDIA.

Sir,—It is a matter of no great importance to Dhingra whether we hang him or not. He would probably prefer to have it over. But the serious matter is what lies behind his crime, and nobody seems willing to see it, and nobody appears to believe in the sanity or sincerity of his speech before the magistrate, and, moreover, no one seems able to understand that an educated and awakened nation, however hitherto placid, may be maddened by foreign rule—absolute and inexorable, and specially absolute and inexorable in excluding it from any of the elementary rights of national life. Think of it, and think how Englishmen would feel if Germany were doing here what we are doing in India. Dhingra was quite right about that. And now we are told that the grip is going to be tightened as against "disaffection." Have we lost our reason, or are we only going to eat up every political doctrine we have ever professed, and every national right we have ever claimed?

"Disaffection!" Are we, then, going to tell all India that it must love us and not object to be governed by us with the sword, on pain of deportation or imprisonment? Lord Morley used to be good at definitions and discriminations. Will he turn his attention to "disaffection"? And, while he is about it, will he tell us what right we have to expect affection from a disinherited people, "our subjects" by force of arms, and helots in their own land?—Yours, &c.,

July 27th, 1909.

[Mr. Page Hopps forgets that the reforms of Lord Morley go some considerable way to removing this condition of "disinheritance." Dhingra's crime was committed in full view of them, and probably in hostility to them.—Ed., Nation.]

SHAKESPEARE AND BEETHOVEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May not the mystery of Shakespeare's personality be explained by the possibility that his life, as a creative artist, was a record, like that of Beethoven, "of mental isolation and spiritual reserve"? Did he care to discuss his plays with anyone? To say what he thought about them, or why he wrote this speech or that one? All that was great and original in the poet's mind went into his poems and his plays. Apart from these, to his friends, he may have appeared a trifle prosaic, somewhat characterless, and not above indulging in small talk. While, unlike Beethoven in the outward prosperity of his life, the inward spiritual forces of the two men may have been similar. Baconians, please take note!—Yours, &c.,

William Poel.

OPPORTUNITY.

"But who art thou, with curious beauty graced,
Strange woman, stamped with some bright heavenly seal?
Why go thy feet on wings? Why in such haste?"
"I am that maid whose secret few can steal, Called Opportunity. I hasten by
Because my feet are treading on a wheel,
And so I run more swift than birds can fly.
And rightly on my feet my wings I wear,
To blind the sight of those who track and spy:
Rightly in front I hold my scattered hair
To veil my face and down my breast to fall,
Lest men should know my name when I am there;
And leave behind my back no wisp at all,
For eager folk to clutch, what time I glide
So near, and turn, and pass beyond recall."
"Tell me, who is that figure at thy side?"
"Penitence: mark this well, that by decree
Who lets me go, must keep her for his bride.
And thou hast spent much time in talk with me,
Busied with thoughts and fancies vainly grand,
Nor hast remarked, O fool, neither dost see
How lightly I have fled beneath thy hand."

THE HISTORIAN OF MODERN FRANCE.*

"The fall and death of Gambetta," says M. Hanotaux, "closes the first period of the story of the Third Republic—what he himself termed 'the heroic age.'" It is the story of this "heroic age," which is recounted in the great work on "Contemporary France," concluded in this fourth volume. The events are epical in character; from the vast ruin of the war and the subsequent breaking up of civil society in Paris, through years of economic recovery and political tumult, until, at the end, a restored nation definitely (and, as it seems, finally) proclaims its adherence to the Republic. With this historian they advance as a drama concentrated round one single figure. It passes through a series of great incidents; but in all there appears the dominating personality of one man. To M. Hanotaux, Gambetta is the creator of the Constitution, the saviour of his country in a dark hour. More than ever, in this fourth volume, he stands out as patriot and hero; now driving forward with feverish energy, now standing aside if self-abnegation is necessary; at the last "beaten down by lesser men," and dying at the age of forty-four, suddenly torn away from too brief happiness, but with his work complete.

The record afterwards sinks to a lower level; the age of giants is over, the age of the politicians succeeds. "Nations do not live by politics alone," was the watchword, "they want material interests." M. Hanotaux evidently feels that it would be wearisome to trace the subsequent period of complicated political intrigue and growing comfort and content. A force has been withdrawn from the world; a star has set. "The power of organisation, the faculty of command, the gift of eloquence, was his beyond measure. He explained his generation to itself; at the sound of his words France understood herself and her desires. It is hard to be a prophet in one's own country, but such minds as his draw men on towards progress."

Much of this volume is occupied with the history of Europe, especially the complications of the Balkan question, the Russo-Turkish War, and the Congress of Berlin. M. Hanotaux, as ex-Foreign Minister, can here provide material—some of it new—of international interest. But all this stands apart from the main stream of the narrative, continued from the struggles of the previous volumes: the gradual breaking of the Reaction, the final triumph of the Republic. The story opens here with the Reactionary coup d'état of MacMahon on May 16th—the challenge by the united forces of Church, Army, and Anti-Republic bloc against the 363 Republican deputies. In the six months between this violent action and the elections of October, 1877, the destinies of France were settled. It was by defiant unity, an unexampled suppression of individual ambitions, and a determination before which the physical force party finally collapsed, that the Republic was saved. The situation was in many respects similar to the situation that might arise in this country if (say) the House of Lords threw out the Finance Bill. That is to say, Reaction appealed against an overwhelming Radical majority in the Chamber; it had in its favor wealth, family tradition, bourgeois timidity, the Church, with (for trump card) the possibility of Radical dissensions. The Republican Party was fused together on one solitary "plank" of policy—the return of the "363." The Reaction actually gained seats, as they would gain seats in England to-morrow. But the gain only amounted to some fifty: and for success they required three-fold that number. M. Hanotaux, in one of his vivid pictures, exhibits the Ministers gathered together on October 14th to hear the result. "A dark and rainy October night annihilated the hopes which had blossomed in May." "Men of action rarely have the faculty of foreseeing defeat." "The last telegrams accumulated in disorderly piles before the pale, discouraged faces of the ten responsible men—men who had compromised and lost a System and a Past."

A final effort was made to appeal to force. MacMahon—a sincere patriot—refused. The Republic was assured. The next effort was the opening by the Education Laws of that long conflict with the Church which had fought for the cause of the dead Kings, whose end is not even now entirely assured.

Yet in the whole of this earlier struggle there is a large air, a disinterestedness on one side and the other, which commands respect from all observers. M. Hanotaux makes no secret of his sympathies and desires, but he does full justice to those who fought cleanly and bravely for a doomed and passing race. "Universal Suffrage," Emile de Girardin had written, "this is the real enemy. To use the royal sceptre in order to root up Universal Suffrage out of France—such is our doctrine and our task."

Gambetta hurled back his defence in the famous speech at Lille. "Do not imagine that when these millions of Frenchmen—peasants, artisans, electors of the free French land—have made their choice and declared their will—do not fancy that, when all these have spoken, there will be found any to revile them, however high on the ladder of politics or administration he may stand." Behind the Right—and a not altogether welcome ally, for France then, still Catholic, was impatient of clericalism—stood the Church. "Be assured," cried Pius IX.—eighty-five years old—"be assured that the Church will triumph and that the Revolution will perish." M. Thiers died in the middle of the struggle. He was eighty-four years old—his eye undimmed, his force unabated. "The most illustrious, the most sagacious, the most obstinate of bourgeois"—so M. Hanotaux terms him—he was happy in the time of his passing—still able to cherish the ideal of the "Conservative Republic." "1830-1848-1852-1870—the echoing dates of the century—marched with the so lightly-laden bier towards the Père-Lachaise." The struggle continued undiminished—only one great fighter had fallen out. On the Radical side "all the programmes could be summarised in the cry of 'Vive la Republique!' and in the formula 'Re-election of the 363.'" "The union of all good Frenchmen—Liberals, Republicans, by conviction or birth, artisans, peasants, civilians—will keep us reasonable and render us invincible." Such was Gambetta's formula; his confession—self-abnegation. "I remain in the ranks with no desire to rise. I claim but one title—that of an impassioned supporter of Democracy."

At the end the defenders of a lost cause proved not unworthy of its large and splendid past. There was no weakness or cowardice in the exit from the stage of the Duc de Broglie and his allies. They had played for triumph in great issues, and they had lost. "He did not plead guilty," says M. Hanotaux. "He haughtily claimed the responsibility and honor of the struggle; he brought a summons against his adversaries, the eternal suit of Radicalism! "The Republic, in herself," he declared, "is no instrument of salvation. She can only redeem herself in so far as she redeems the social structure."

> "You have succeeded in influencing the masses, alarmed for their security and family interests. At this price you have obtained your imperfect triumphs. I do not know whether this is what was called the other day the emancipation and virility of Universal Suffrage. I only know that there are three million six hundred thousand Frenchmen who have not yielded to this seduction, and who are glad to find some still in power who, like themselves, have stood aloof, and who remain to protect them from the despotism of a new Convention. And now make, or do not make, your inquiry. Summon, or do not summon, your prejudiced witnesses. As a Government we protest, in the name of the law: as citizens we appeal to the equity of History and the justice of the land."

"I ask for no indulgence from our adversaries," he said later, on being brought to trial. "I have never expected anything from their justice, I do not fear their vengeance." Will Reaction in England—when it comes to a similar end—make as dignified and courageous an exit from the history of the world?

The style of M. Hanotaux—supple, picturesque, and at times eloquent—loses something by translation. It is rather cold and restrained. One regrets the fiery rhetoric and sense of eternal issues in human affairs, with which such a writer as Carlyle, or even Chateaubriand, would have encompassed the death-chamber of Gambetta or the passing of the final hopes of the French Monarchy. The book is studded with apothegms of political wisdom; a little cynical, a little sorrowful. The man who has essayed the world of affairs, and returned to the region of literature, comes back always disillusioned, perhaps disappointed, wondering at the amazing ways of men. The admiration of M. Hanotaux for Gambetta is in part the admiration of the student for the man of action. Of the French failure in Egypt Gambetta "had not forgotten the dictum of M. Thiers. "Above all, never abandon Egypt." "He had to learn," is M. Hanotaux's comment, "that one cannot in France defend French interests with impunity." Of Leo XIII., "the generosity of his spirit," is the verdict, "was stirred but little by sufferings close at hand, greatly by woes vast and impersonal, the woes of the masses. In this, again, he showed the politician." The historian is bitter on the bourgeois; with "no knowledge of the great world that was being opened out to men, he knew nothing of international life, nothing of the big things of existence." The war over the children in the schools anticipates—on a higher, more logical level—the war in England to-day. "Our first duty," said the spokesman of the anti-clericals, "is to save the soul of the new generation from the influence of those who disdain the political and social order of the world." Against such a policy Jules Simon elevated the ideal of "Liberty." "Liberty must be loved, even when she stands on the side of one's opponents. He who loves Liberty for what she does for him alone does not love her aright; he is not worthy of loving her; he cannot even understand her." Upon which M. Hanotaux comments: "There can be no "freedom of thought' in the schoolroom; there can be nothing but impregnation of thought." His last word is of hope—serene, if a little hesitating. "The troubles and anxieties"—of France—"will not have been endured in vain, if her high ideals for the human race can be fulfilled."

A MASTER OF NAVAL HISTORY.*

In these days when journalists who have dipped into the "Naval Annual" and steamed round a fleet in an excursion steamer are ready to lay down the law on naval policy and tactics, one cannot help admiring Mr. Thursfield's self-depreciating modesty. He protests that he has no wish to pose as a "naval expert," and that only a sailor can claim the title. His disclaimer is probably the result of his contempt for the self-advertising "naval experts" of the party newspaper and the political platform. But he certainly has a good right to speak with authority on naval questions. There is probably no man living who has a deeper and wider knowledge of naval history, and few even of our Admirals have so often seen great fleets at work in manœuvres, making practical experiments on the problems of maritime war. And he brings to the consideration of the questions he discusses not only a rich store of knowledge and experience, but also a judicial mind. He is no partisan, and cares little for the popular cry of the moment. And what he has to say he sets down in plain, vigorous English. Clear thought finds expression in clear words, and he is sufficiently master of his subject to realise the difficulties of the non-technical reader, and takes care to explain, in terms that any educated man can understand, the special conditions of war upon the sea. His book is therefore too good to require any commendation. To show what a valuable contribution it is to our current naval literature, all that need be done is to note its contents and some of the points of interest which it discusses.

The book is mainly a collection of articles published originally in the "Times," the "Quarterly," and "National" Reviews, the "United Service Magazine," and the "Naval Annual." The one exception is a most interesting essay on the career of John Paul Jones. It is based largely on Mr. Buell's standard biography; but Mr. Thursfield also makes use of a life of Jones published anonymously in 1825, which he considers to be an early work of Disraeli, the Lord Beaconsfield of later days. This is an interesting literary discovery. The story of Paul Jones's career reads like a romance, and its lessons are worth attention even now. Mr. Thursfield holds that he has been unduly depreciated by all English writers except Disraeli:—

> "It is (he says) because Paul Jones has been so often misjudged in this country that I too have sought to bespeak for him a rehearing of the whole case. I may have mistaken his character. It may have been as 'detestable" as Sir John Laughton says it was. But his acts speak for themselves. The man who founded the American Navy and showed it how to fight; who set before it the high standard of conduct, attainment and efficiency which still inspires it; who propounded views of naval warfare and its conduct, which anticipated the teaching of Clerk of Eldin in the eighteenth century, and that of Captain Mahan in our own days, and were conceived in the very spirit of Nelson himself; who baffled all the diplomacy of England at the Texel, and alone achieved a diplomatic triumph of which even Franklin had despaired, is certainly not a man to be dismissed from the court of history as a mere adventurer, a person of no importance, even if he cannot leave it without a stain upon his character."

There is an essay on Duncan, which gives us a living picture of the great Admiral, and is a plea for more historic importance being attributed to his destruction of the Dutch armament at Camperdown. But the most valuable chapters, and those that give the book its title, are devoted to Nelson and his methods. It is a strange fact that a century after Trafalgar the most divergent views still exist as to how the battle was fought. It is a problem of history that may never be finally solved, in the sense that there will be no room left for doubt or cavil. Mr. Thursfield discusses the whole available evidence very fully, and incidentally shows from incidents at manœuvres how difficult it is to speak with certainty as to the actual formation of a great fleet under way at sea at any given moment. The phrase, "the Nelson touch," has become historic in connection with Trafalgar. Nelson certainly explained both verbally and in a memorandum to his captains the plan on which he meant to act. There was something novel and striking about it, for it called forth general enthusiasm in that "band of brothers." But the plan of attack as set forth in the memorandum, however we read it, is so unlike anything in the traditional plans of the battle, or the large model to be seen at the Royal United Service Institution (a model made, by the way, while many of Nelson's captains were still living), that there has been a disposition either to try to read the traditional story of the fight into the memorandum, or to hold that at the last moment Nelson abandoned his cherished scheme.

Quite apart from his conclusions, Mr. Thursfield's investigation of the question is worth reading as a model of historical criticism. He explains the conditions under which fleets fought in the days of sailing ships, and the theories of naval tactics up to Nelson's time. Then he carefully examines the famous memorandum, and brings a plain meaning out of it in the light of the conditions and traditions of the period. Then he shows that the method set forth in the memorandum was followed as nearly as any general plan can be realised under the changing conditions of an actual encounter. One point he proves beyond all reasonable doubt. The plans of Trafalgar, to be found in so many of our histories, and shown in the famous model, are mere misleading diagrams. Whatever happened, there was no attack of two parallel lines of ships in "line ahead," one led by Nelson, the other by Collingwood, against the centre of an allied line, roughly at right angles to their course. There was no "mad perpendicular attack." To describe in popular phrase what really happened, it would seem that the two English lines approached the enemy on a course making a very sharp angle with his general direction. As the attack closed on them, the allies were not in straight line, but in one that had become slightly convex towards it. While Collingwood flung his division almost simultaneously on the rearward ships of the enemy, Nelson, after a feint at their van, which kept them uncertain as to what was coming, altered his course, and, no longer in line ahead, but with every ship doing its best to close on the enemy, dashed at the allied centre, and broke into it. The ships of the enemy's rear were thus overwhelmed and mastered before the van could beat back against the wind to their assistance. The theory is borne out by remarkably interesting plans of the fight, drawn by one of the Spanish Admirals, which Mr. Thursfield reproduces as illustrations of his essay. Another interesting illustration is the frontispiece, a full-length portrait of Nelson painted during his stay at Naples, and now in the possession of the Admiralty. It shows with vivid realism a man broken by illness and suffering, and Mr. Thursfield suggests that it affords some evidence that, during the painful episodes that followed the capitulation of Naples, Nelson was, from physical causes, not entirely master of himself.

T. FISHER UNWIN,
1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

The following letter has been received from the Bishop of Hereford by the publisher of Mr. H. de Vere Stacpoole's novel "THE POOLS OF SILENCE."

The Palace, Hereford,
July 12th, 1909.

"DEAR MR. FISHER UNWIN,

"I have found the copy of Mr. Stacpoole's 'Pools of Silence' waiting for me on my return from Germany, and I have just read it; and I hope it may be widely read, and may help to rouse all England to a proper sense of our share of responsibility for the abominations which, as we are informed, are still allowed to continue in the Congo territory.

"King Leopold stands condemned before the Christian world for his part in these abominations. One is tempted to say of him—may the Lord reward him according to his works!

"And it is sad to see that the Belgian Government and people seem to be in imminent danger of coming under the same condemnation.

"I sincerely hope that our Government may be stirred up to save us from any longer sharing in the disgrace brought upon Western civilisation by Congo mis-rule, and may do something adequate for the relief of those unhappy natives who are suffering under it.—Believe me, Yours sincerely,

"J. HEREFORD."

The concluding essays deal with the conditions of naval war and the principles of imperial defence at the present day. The practical lesson these essays teach is further enforced in a lengthy preface, in which Mr. Thursfield deals most effectively with the invasion panic-mongers, and speaks in very plain language of the exaggerated militarism of Lord Roberts and his school. He realises, of course, that there must be a home defence army. He puts the matter in a nutshell when he says:—

> "I hold what is now the official doctrine as quite recently expounded in Parliament by the Secretary of State for War, that the military forces of the Crown available for home defence should at all times be sufficient in numbers—and, of course, efficient enough in training, equipment, and organisation—to compel any enemy who projects an invasion of this country to come in such force that he cannot come by stealth."

But multiplying armies on land will not secure us, and there is no logical reason for the exaggerations of the militarists. Their whole argument for universal service assumes that "no sufficiency of naval force can insure this country against invasion." But as Mr. Thursfield convincingly puts it:—

> "Either the fleet, so long as it is maintained in sufficiency, can henceforth, as heretofore, be trusted to keep the invader at bay, in which case our military defences can be strictly adjusted to the measure and the conditions of our sea power; or it cannot, in which case not all the adult manhood in arms will suffice to defend our homes."

The whole argument, and the whole book, of which it is the practical message, are well worth attentive study.

THE LOST WORD.*

The writer once saw a curious ornament which has already served him well as the text of discourse, both public and private; he hopes that any readers of The Nation who have made acquaintance with the object referred to will pardon a second or a third exhibition. The ornament in question is a jewel—a ring. It was made some three or four or five or six years ago by negroes dwelling by the Zambesi river; in the regions where "She" once held her terrible and flame-girded court, where the secret of "King Solomon's Mines" was formerly preserved. The materials of which this ring is made are simply the stiff and wiry hairs of the elephant's tail, and a little gold, found by the blacks and worked up by them into an odd, fantastic pattern with rude tools of their own making. The ring is by no means a masterpiece of exquisite and supreme beauty; it may be rather compared with the iron-work of a village tavern sign, casually hammered out by some ignorant country blacksmith in the early eighteenth century, or with the rough, effective ornament of which every common carpenter had the secret once upon a time. The ring is queer, barbaric, slight enough in idea and in execution; and yet if a great doomsday of all the art work of the world were preconised, if every object and device that man has made were brought before the judgment seat, then that odd fantasy of the ignorant black fellow would take its very lowly place beside the great masters, beside the work of Botticelli, beside the work of the Gothic architects, beside the sculpture of Greece, beside the Plays of Shakespeare! And, on the other hand, the jewelry of our modern shops, priceless with gems, adorned with the aid of the most expensive tools that science and money can procure: all this would be banished into the horrible Gehenna of oleographs, and cast-iron fenders, and "art furniture," and sham Gothic, and modern Italian pottery, and the plays and poems and novels of—whomsoever you please. In other words, the negro's ring is in its quite minor fashion to be set in the class of beautiful things; while modern civilisation has, in fact, become in the true sense of the word a barbarism, an inarticulate and savage utterance. With certain definite exceptions, it has lost the faculty of artistic—that is, beautiful—speech; and, when it speaks well, it does so after the parrot's fashion—that is, by minute though unintelligent copying of another's tones and syllables. Indeed, William Morris questioned even this parrot-like or ape-like accomplishment. Somewhere or other in his works, he asks us why we try to build Gothic cathedrals, since we cannot even build a plain wall as a thirteenth-century mason would build it. Still, this, bad as it is, is the best that we can do. And the question arises: why is it that the savage black fellow can surpass the civilised European?

Some such question as this, one presumes, has perplexed the mind of Vernon Lee, whose "Laurus Nobilis" is a long discourse of the Beauty that was once and now is not, and an eloquent aspiration for better days to come. In the first place it may be well to quote the author of "Laurus Nobilis" on the state of so-called decorative art to-day; so that it may be seen that the writer of this article is not denouncing without authority the miserable decadence of modern craftsmanship.

> "No better illustration of this (decadence) could be found than the sections of the Paris Exhibition which came under the heading of 'Decorative Art.'
> "Decoration. But decoration of what? In reality of nothing. All the objects—from the jewelry and enamels to the furniture and hangings—which this decorative art is supposed to decorate, are the merest excuse and sham. Not one of them is the least useful, or at all events useful once it is decorated. And nobody wants it to be useful. What is wanted is a pretext for doing art on the side of the artist, for buying costly things on the side of the public. And behind this pretext there is absolutely no genuine demand for any definite object serving any definite use; none of that insistence (which we see in the past) that the shape, material, and color should be the very best for practical purposes; and of that other insistence, marvellously blended with the requirements of utility, that the shape, material, and color should also be as beautiful as possible. . . . (there was) a certain cupboard, visibly incapable of holding either linen or garments, or crockery, or books, but shaped like a packing-case, and displaying with marvellous impartiality two exquisitely cast and chased doorguard plates of far-fetched, many-tinted alloys of silver, and a set of hinges, a lock and a key, such as the village ironmonger supplies in blue paper parcels of a dozen."

And, to sum up the whole position, the author declares all the "Decorative Art" that she saw to be "full of quite incredibly gross barbarism." And, if we think that this position is somewhat extreme; if we believe that after viewing the packing-case with the penny lock and the twopenny hinges some more cunning workman might devise a chest that would, at a pinch, hold a book or two or a great-coat, and might see that the hinges and the lock were of better craft and stuff—well, then, we get the speech of the intelligent parrot as compared with the unintelligent. Some birds muddle up the sentences that they have heard into hopeless confusion and unintelligibility; others are very fairly audible and comprehensible. And we must remember that Morris, though he declared that no one could build a thirteenth-century wall, was yet of opinion that he himself could print a fifteenth-century book. Whether he succeeded in his task or not must be a matter of opinion; but after making due deduction for various imbecilities mentioned by Vernon Lee—such as "the sickly imitation, in a brandnew piece of work, of the effects of time, weather, and of every manner of accident or deterioration"—we must perhaps allow to the present age a certain capacity in the art of the replica.

This is not extravagant praise; but it has been said that there are certain exceptions to our common barbarism. Some there are who can say more than a mere βάρ βάρ; who may be justly classed with articulate-speaking men. These men Vernon Lee calls the "tiny little knots of voluntary outlaws from a civilisation which could not understand them"; but the writer would prefer—though the meaning is much the same—to call these men the fakirs, the saints, the ascetics of the arts. Hardly, one would say, can such men be found at all in the crafts; one can scarcely conceive of a man making a mangle, for use in his own laundry, on gracious and beautiful lines. Hardly are such men to be found in the great art of architecture; modern buildings are of many styles, but of no style. Still, in literature and in painting there have been true and great artists, even in these latter days; we can name, with the author, Turner and Rossetti, Watts, Manet, Degas, Whistler, and Rodin; and such men as these are the true hermits and saints of the art that they profess. "If their work has shown lapses and failings (says the author); if it has been, alas! lacking at times in health or joy or dignity or harmony, let us ask ourselves what the greatest individualities of Antiquity and the Middle Ages would have produced if cut off from the tradition of the Past and the suggestion of the Present—if reduced to exercise art outside the atmosphere of life." And, just as the saint must despise the world, and live apart from it in spirit, and refuse to heed its commands, and reject all its ideals, and welcome its contempt and abhorrence if need be; so must the artist in words or in form and color of to-day abjure and despise and reject all the standards set up on every side of him, all the judgments, and decisions, and excommunications of the popular voice, all the absurdities and profanities which are proposed for his respect and adoration. Almost, as it were, he has to work in vacuo; he has rather to create his own atmosphere, to spin his golden and scarlet and multi-colored web of glamor and beauty out of his own vitals. And perhaps the question of the negro jeweller's capacity and the European decorator's incapacity is now answered: the black man works as every man breathes—by nature. But, if the white man would do great things, he must work a miracle; he must be as a man who has acquired by prayer and fasting and meditation the art of living without breathing; since the air about him is a mephitic and deadly gas. So it is not wonderful that great artists are few and that craftsmen are non-existent, since craft is essentially the art of the common man, his natural and inevitable mode of expression. No doubt the designers, the architects, of the Gothic cathedrals were supreme artists, but the men who carried out the design were simple laborers, who, having learnt the use of their tools by apprenticeship, could no more help doing beautiful work than an English child can help speaking English after a few years of apprenticeship to its mother and father.

The Sunday Chronicle in devoting three columns to noticing the book says: "A great fascinating and picturesque romance."

Scotsman says: "The narrative is pervaded by human sentiment, the atmosphere of the Florence of the Day is happily reproduced, and his 'reconstruction' of the scene in the Convent in which the 'Glad Friar' as he was called, falls a victim to the charms of his model, has an air of verisimilitude which some of the older accounts do not possess."

Globe says: "The ways and manners of Florence and Prato during the middle of the Fifteenth Century are portrayed with carefulness and the central figures of the story are well and clearly defined. The book should recommend itself to all interested in romance and in the life of the Friar Artist. Its illustrations are excellently reproduced."

And still, having answered one question, we are confronted by another. Why is it that the modern European is at a disadvantage in these matters, compared with such a comparatively low type of savage as the African? On the whole, Vernon Lee would seem to answer this question by a reference to social and monetary inequality, by recording her dislike of our present social system which doubtless—it may be said in parenthesis—is pretty well as bad as it can be. Still, one cannot think that inequality, either in money affairs or in social position is a satisfactory solution to the problem. Society in the middle ages was deliberately and designedly ordered on a basis of inequality, and the feudal lord was, undoubtedly, a very much richer man than the stone mason. Yet, as the author of "Laurus Nobilis" would allow, the arts and the crafts flourished in the middle ages as they have never done before or since; and so, it seems, inequality in fortune or position cannot be the primary cause of artistic decadence. It is probable that the true explanation of the matter is to be sought in the text which declares it to be impossible to serve God and Mammon. Beauty, says Vernon Lee, is a great "world power"; it might be preferable to declare that Beauty is one of the most shining facets of the Great World Power; that the quest of Beauty is one of the chief aspects of the quest for God. So the matter appeared to the Persian Mystic who said:—

> "Thou art Absolute Being; all else is naught but a Phantasm,
> For in Thy Universe all things are one.
> Thy world-captivating Beauty, to display its perfections,
> Appears in thousands of mirrors, but it is one.
> Although Thy Beauty accompanies all the beautiful,
> In truth the Unique and Incomparable Heart-enslaver is one.*"

And one cannot serve this God and the mammon of materialism. If a nation deliberately organises its life on a "rational" and material basis; if it puts before it as an ideal "sound business methods"; if it sets up on a high place "the plain practical man of affairs"; if it adopts as its supreme criterion of good and evil, right and wrong, sense and nonsense the question, "Will it pay?" if it lives for material ease, comfort, and luxury, and desires "all these things" of beauty to be added unto it—well, it will be vastly disappointed. It will descend, little by little, by slow but perceptible degrees, from the heights to the depths, losing year by year some of the faculties of its soul, some of those senses which reach out to an invisible and ideal world. It will descend from the miracle of the cathedral to the sumptuous Tudor and Elizabethan mansion, from the gracious lines of the Elizabethan house to the well decorated and stately Caroline dwelling, from the rich state of Charles II. to the bare but pleasing severity of Queen Anne's reign: and then headlong, till we find ourselves at last in Gower Street. And then the reaction: the frantic endeavor to recover the Lost Word of Hiram Abiff; these efforts beginning, naturally enough, before the deepest depth was reached. Firstly, the Georgian magnate would be "calm and classical" (like Mrs. Jarley's waxwork), so we had a fox-hunting, beef-eating, port-consuming squire dwelling in a Greek Temple, behind twenty Ionic columns. Then he would be rude and "Gothick" and romantic; and Horace Walpole chatters gossip from his preposterous battlements at Strawberry Hill. Then he would inhabit an Italian villa; and a bad imitation of something that was marble, its stucco walls black with rain and green with the weeping of dank trees. And now we try to live in houses which are half-a-dozen styles at once, which make a pleasant English landscape seem as if a mad scene-painter had made it; and if any beautiful thing be left in our streets we take it away and hide it in a museum—temple of the dead god, Beauty—for weary crowds to gape at unintelligently. And almost the only good metal work we can do now is to be found on the harness of cart-horses in the country, and in the great copper jars which vintners use in taverns.

VIRTUE UNASSUAGED.*

While insincerity is a word not applicable to Lucas Malet's sensational style, one asks oneself why it is that stories so crude in artistic feeling, so over-colored and over-emphasised as "The Score," should be popular among educated and not unintelligent readers. The answer would seem to be, simply, that a critical taste in literature, as in music or painting or architecture, implies a justness of perception which is rudimentary or dormant in the majority. It seems natural, indeed, that melodrama should be preferred to tragedy, or glaring discords in color to a subtle harmony of tones, by people who create or accept complacently the staring vulgarity or flat mediocrity of our London streets. Our vast public, with little or no artistic training, demands excitants in the theatre or in fiction to thrill its indolent attention, and so it comes about that the doings of heroes as preposterous as Sir Richard Calmady are gravely discussed in all quarters of the empire by grown men and women.

Of the two stories in "The Score," the second, "The Courage of Her Convictions," shows a certain honesty of artistic aim which contrasts favorably with the romantic falsity of "Miserere Nobis." In the former, three characters meet, talk and separate, the beautiful and famous actress, Miss Poppy St. John, the "darling of the Anglo-American play-going public," her plump man-about-town bachelor friend, Anthony Hammond, the successful dramatist, and, thirdly, Mr. Lucius Denier, the young fighting politician, whose overpowering savage personality has a dangerous fascination for Poppy's imagination. The figure of Anthony Hammond is, indeed, not badly indicated. Devoted only to his own round of frivolous amusements, this elderly butterfly has had for years a half-hearted intention of proposing marriage to Poppy, but his bachelor caution and fear of a rebuff have left him, when the story opens, still hovering on the brink. Poppy St. John, a more ambitious character, is naturally less easy to draw, and it is not surprising that the author, in trying to paint the actress's caprice, charming freedom of spirit and unconventional manners, should have made her vulgar, slangy, and irritatingly ill-bred. Mr. Lucius Denier, the man of masterful and indomitable will, "the volcanic young politician," is one of those impossible figures which the fond feminine heart loves to conceive as the alluring embodiment of masculine force. He is the Rochester of "Jane Eyre" brought up to date, and stiffened with an infusion of Superman. The situation that develops in the Chine Hotel at Compton Regis, where Poppy St. John is recruiting, is simple. Anthony Hammond, who is dining with the actress, finds her distraite, and while his curiosity is leading him to discover whether her feeling for Denier is serious or not, the young politician arrives on the scene, travel-stained and weary from his impressive election victory at Westchurch, a "huge, dominating urgent" hero, with grimly set jaw, "a rough, strenuous, and, in a sense, dangerous figure," who will not take no for an answer. The elderly philanderer soon leaves the field to his rival, and the young politician rushes into the breach with a savage violence that a wooer of the Stone Age might envy. The question for Poppy St. John is—what will her life be with Denier if she accepts him?—a situation always worthy of artistic treatment if the analysis of the woman's feelings be exact in its truth. Lucas Malet, however, is not satisfied with depicting the play of natural feelings; and conversations that are true to life are quite beyond her powers of expression. At every pause in the situation she seizes occasion to turn the limelight full on to her figures, who have dropped, like fourth-rate actors, into effective poses. We hear the gallery burst into applause when Poppy is made to strike the attitude of outraged virtue, and, affecting to misunderstand the politician's offer of marriage, cries "Do you reckon with what your words imply, Denny? . . . If so, stop right away at once. I'll forget it—tell myself you were a little off your balance, tell myself you were a little drunk. You have time to unsay them honorably yet, as far as I am concerned, time to turn back." And how finely, in its simple truth to nature, does the young premier take up his cue and respond: "But, Great Heavens!" he answered, his face working with excitement, "there is nothing," he waited for a second—"no, nothing to unsay. I want to go on, not to go back. Marry me, marry me—can I put it more coarsely plainly that that? All I have, all I am, all I ever may be—well—my dear, it is yours." What can Poppy do, by the rules of the game, after this but "gaze at him with unfathomable eyes, and say, "very softly: 'God bless you, Denny! You know how to love,' and her voice broke." Obviously, her voice must break at this stage crisis, and we can watch her simple figure "turning away," while, with her mind working at lightning speed, she evolves the appropriate answer: "Let me be for an hour, dear old boy," she went on, huskily. "This is unexpected. It is complicated. I must have time to think." And the curtain goes down on her effective exit from the room, as she passes out into the night, "with its disquieting, fortifying influences," and, to key us all up into sympathy with the young politician's surging tides of passion, we are told that "with a slightly daring gesture, she whipped the train of her tea-gown over her left arm—thus revealing a froth of white silk and lace petticoat frills, and a pair of pink paste-buckled, high-heeled shoes."

In her exaltation, standing in the space at the head of the descending steps, a graceful, pale-glistening figure, looking seaward, Poppy spreads her arms wide, and cries: "Ah! it is good to be loved, to be loved, to be loved!" she cried, half-aloud exultantly. "Whatever the end of the story, it is good to be loved; to know your own power and the worth of your womanhood, and to play the great game once again." This is highly typical of the lyrical gush of our author's art, just as the following passage, in all its naïvely pretentious unreality, reaches the heights of romantic falsity at which she aims:—

> For a few seconds Denier suffered as acutely as it is given to man to suffer Then he ranged himself, steadying his nerves, steadying his temper by an immense exercise of will; and, taking up her words, turned them, not without praiseworthy chivalry, to her advantage.
> "Probably the Hampstead Heath methods are as good as any others, darling," he said. "They have the sanction of hoary antiquity, in any case. From the dawn of human history man and woman must have sat, as we now sit, in the clear night under the stars, hearing the song of the surf and the wind and the woodland; and have felt, with a lovely and terrible yearning, that whatever the years might bring them of fame, and wealth, and power, this—this lingering in the forecourt of the temple of love, this sacred preface to the consummated drama of the beloved and the lover—is still the most exquisite, the most divinely perfect flower of human existence."
> The poetry of his speech appealed to Poppy, charming her. But she had felt him wince, thereby betraying a dissonance in his thought towards her. And with that repose fled, self-protective cynicism taking its place within her.
> "So the preface is the best of the book, Denny?" she said, half bitterly, half sadly. "Then, obviously, it is the part of the wise to rest content with the preface and read no further." . .
> . . . With a superb courage she rallied all her virtue, all her seriousness, invoking the help of the departed friend who, when living, had done so much to strengthen her against self-indulgence, self-seeking, license and light-loves.
> "I am cramped, dear old boy," she said gravely and quietly to Denier, turning her head and looking him full in the face. "I think we have had enough of this. It only leads to the edge of a certain precipice down which it would be contemptible for you and me, swine-like, to fall headlong at this time of day. Let me go."
> But for all answer Denier stared back at her with savage bloodshot eyes, his countenance strangely disfigured; while, spreading his hand wide over her heart, his grip tightened until she felt her ribs must crack and splinter under the strain. She turned sick from the suffocating anguish, and her sight grew blurred. It came to her how many hundred times upon the stage she had played at death, before an audience moved to tears by her counterfeit presentment. Now she felt death incarnate play with her, iron-handed, threatening to crush her out of earthly existence as wantonly as she herself might crush some fragile airy-dancing gnat. Still she would die game, if die she must. Throwing all the sarcasm of which it was capable into her voice, she cried defiantly:—
> "I'm not your wife after all, remember, Denny—so you've no cause, no right, to kill me—yet. To kill me won't help you one little bit."
> For the moment the taunt merely fed the madness of Denier's passion. While his left hand still crushed her heart, his right leapt out and spanned the round of her throat. All attempt at struggle against such strength was futile, ludicrous. Poppy resigned herself, and that without flinching. But she was thankful her vision had become too clouded for her any longer to see his face, since she divined it to be hideous as that of some huge, rufous, predatory beast, ranging, blood-hungry, through the dimness of the wild. She had known man's love under most fair and gracious aspects, and did not covet, therefore, to leave this world with such a picture of it as that stamped on her retina. Then, just as consciousness was ebbing wholly, Denier's grasp relaxed, his hand ceased to throttle, his arm dropped away from her; and Poppy's life, turning, began slowly blindly to stagger back up the awful terror-ridden track whose terminus is dissolution.
> Denier had flung away to the far end of the stone bench. He sat there bowed double, his shoulders heaving convulsively, his feet planted wide apart, his face in his hands right down between his knees.

It is the mark of Lucas Malet's characters to suffer from these recurring spasms of unassuaged desires. Her heroines are maddeningly seductive in their dainty charms, to the savage and masterful heroes, "satyrs, idealists, and fighting men," but after dallying with the luscious fruit they always, like Poppy, become "bitterly certain of the purity of their purpose." Then they turn away sighing, while "the vibrant tone of stinging suppressed passion" dies out of their voices; and "with tears starting hot and scalding" into their eyes they declare, "No, Denny, dear. It wouldn't work, dear old boy. I love you too much, far too much to queer your pitch." With such characters as Poppy St. John and Lucius Denier the public can indulge itself in an enervating bath of emotionalism, knowing that the virtue of these modern St. Anthonys is guaranteed from the beginning. For our part we must own that the virtuous heroine's powers of resistance seem indistinguishable from her delight in her sensuous inclinations. The ethical problem it presents will doubtless help, however, the circulation of the novel. The first story, "Miserere Nobis," is so charged with lurid exaggerations that it reads like a caricature of the author's method.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

A PROMISING sign for the future of religion in Scotland is the width of the membership of a new society formed in the University of Glasgow. The advantage of separate societies already in existence is fully recognised, but the Society of St. Ninian has been formed for the study of religion from many points of view by exposition and discussion on terms of mutual sympathy and respect. The first session of the society has been held, and a selection from the papers read is presented in the volume, "Religion and the Modern Mind: Ten Lectures Delivered Before the Glasgow University Society of St. Ninian" (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s., net), with a note of introduction by the new Principal of the University, Sir Donald MacAlister. How wide is the range becomes apparent when we find writers on what we may call the extreme Right, two Jesuit Fathers, Crofton and Power; and on the extreme Left, Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P.; with various points in the Centre occupied by six Presbyterians and a Scottish Episcopalian. Mr. Johnstone Ross, the Presbyterian minister at Cambridge, offers a warm greeting from religion to science, grateful for its contribution teaches a philosophy that is well worth knowing. Its fine qualities have a pleasing and soothing effect, minimising the little troubles and difficulties of life. It never obtrudes and it never palls, but, week in and week out, is the one tobacco that gives to most men the greatest pleasure in smoking—a pleasure which only the right tobacco for their palate can give. It is cool—always cool—and burns evenly to the last shred with a rich and pleasing aroma. . . . . ."

to our belief in unity, law, and progress; while Father Crofton puts in a plea for the conservative attitude of the Roman See in preference to the Modernism which he fears is weakening landmarks without really appeasing whatever in the sciences is hostile to the Christian faith. On comparative religion and its effects on the claim of Christianity to be a special revelation, Mr. J. M. Robertson sets out five alternative grounds for the claim, and concludes, for himself, at least, that no one of them is established, that there is no special prerogative, but that Christianity must be content to stand with all other religions before the tribunal of Reason. In the very next paper Canon McCulloch works on one of the alternatives indicated by Mr. Robertson, that of the character of Christianity as the culmination of all that is true and good in the world's religions. Mr. Gordon Clark follows with a sketch of the historical development of religions, with the same conclusion as that of Mr. McCulloch. Mr. Carnegie Simpson has a brief paper on Agnosticism as a general method, and Father Power gives a statement of Rationalism in comparison with Agnosticism. There are three papers on Christian doctrines. Professor Cooper vindicates the doctrine of the Holy Trinity on familiar lines, as the formulation at which the early Church soon arrived. Mr. Cameron sets the doctrine of the Divinity of Christ in the light of the idealism which he learnt in the class-room of the great Glasgow professor, Edward Caird, and claims that this offers a far more satisfactory vindication than is to be found in the method of Ritschl and Harnack. This paper is, as is natural, the strongest in the volume in intellectual fibre. Dr. David Smith deals with the same doctrine in close application to the historical character of the founder of Christianity. We cannot but congratulate the writers, and, we presume, the whole society, upon the tone and temper in which they have addressed themselves to this communication of their convictions upon what lies so much at the centre of their several modes of religious thought.

A somewhat indifferent specimen of modern book-making is afforded by the volume on "Old English Towns" (Werner Laurie, 6s. net), written by Mr. William Andrews. No finer subject for an imaginative pen could have been chosen than the twenty-seven towns treated here; but it would be encouraging false hopes in the prospective reader to suggest that Mr. Andrews's treatment is anything but very ordinary. From the beginning of the first chapter, on Winchester, to the end of the last, on Chester, there is little or no attempt to visualise the character of the towns passed in review, neither can it be said that the sprinkling of entertaining anecdote introduced compensates one for the general atmosphere of uninspired guide-bookiness. Unfortunately, too, the individual chapters are too short to impart much of that solid information which is the raison d'être of a good guide-book, while in examples of purely superficial observation they contain much that allies them with the bad one. The best part of the volume appears to us to be the illustrations, all of which, with the exception of the frontispiece, are from old prints, and are thoroughly well reproduced. We cannot, however, alter our opinion of the letterpress on this account. Apart from its banalities, the author's style is slipshod, the punctuation is childish, and there are many misprints.

The Bank Holidays send the City to sleep, and for some time afterwards its marts and exchanges are half empty. All the leading magnates are at play, and even speculation (as a rule) ceases. And yet the first half of August is, perhaps, to labor the most important period of the whole year. In a great part of America and Europe the crops are ripening. It is just now that the harvest of North-West Canada is in suspense. It may be a bumper crop this year; or, if the frosts attack it at the critical moment (the first week or ten days of August), it may prove a dismal failure. Here in England the hay harvest has been largely spoilt by the weather; but the wheat and barley promise to be an unusually heavy crop, if only there are sunny days for ripening the harvest. The experts are not hopeful of any substantial reduction in the price of grain, as stocks are very low all over the world. Nevertheless, the outlook for trade and employment is far from gloomy. The settlement of the coal strike has brought intense relief—not least to the home railway market—and even the "Times" has been compelled to pay reluctant tribute to Mr. Churchill's skill as a conciliator. The settlement of the American tariff will also be favorable to English trade, as the maximum and minimum clauses will benefit our exports as compared with Germany's. Moreover, there are some quite substantial reductions on some parts of the Dingley Tariff, thanks to President Taft's personal exertions—though Senator Aldrich has managed to maintain the protective heights of his own special favorites—the woollen and cotton schedules.

The American Market.

Perhaps there is more interest in this market on the London Stock Exchange just now than in any other. But it is recognised that its future depends entirely upon the New York bankers and financiers. The fact that many new issues of bonds and stock are impending makes it probable that these powerful interests will try to maintain the high prices now existing, and even to hoist a few favored stocks still higher. Otherwise the "bears" would probably predominate, as the intrinsic values hardly warrant the present high level of prices. A good deal depends on the future of money, and banking opinion in the City now rather inclines to expect a certain amount of stringency in the autumn.

Loans for the Young Turks.

If the Young Turks succeed in inspiring the confidence necessary to raise the large sums which they want to borrow for irrigation purposes in Asia Minor, they will in all probability get a very handsome return in the future; for there is no country that more urgently requires it. At present, writes a correspondent who has recently travelled through Mesopotamia, the Euphrates and Tigris run almost entirely to waste. They have a fringe of date palms and cornfields, about half a mile broad on either bank, where the Arabs have cut short trenches, but the vast extent of Mesopotamia is practically all mud desert, which might, if it could be irrigated and populated, become one of the biggest granaries of the world. Asia Minor also has equally good prospects under settled government. In 1907 the Anatolian Railway Company agreed to advance to the Turkish Government £800,000 for irrigation works round Konia, which are to be undertaken by a German firm and completed within five years. Konia is already served by the Baghdad Railway, and the railway system of Asia Minor is well advanced. In 1906 Turkey exported to England £1,150,000 of barley, and the capacity of the Asiatic provinces for corn-growing appear to be unlimited. The produce of cotton in Anatolia is now only 500,000 bales; but Professor Dunstan, who has been investigating the subject, declares that Anatolia may rival Egypt, and Mesopotamia the United States as cotton-growing lands. Much cotton is grown on unirrigated tracts; for it is a hardy plant and will thrive without a great amount of moisture; but with irrigation the cotton area might be enormous. A beginning is being made with 200,000 acres at Konia, as aforesaid. Another great desideratum is a survey of the mineral resources of the Turkish Empire, which should be accompanied by an amendment and consolidation of mining law. Nothing of the sort has ever been attempted, and there is a belief that the mineral wealth is very great. In every respect the two Turkeys are by nature among the wealthiest countries in the world, and with the pushing forward of railways and irrigation, there is undoubtedly a great future before them. For the moment, however, Turkish credit in London is not very good, owing to anxiety about troubles in Crete and to a fear that the Young Turks may spend all their resources upon military and naval armaments.

MAN AND MASTER
By LAWRENCE L. LYNCH.

"An extremely clever book, and to those who enjoy a thrilling detective story we can confidently recommend it."—Liverpool Courier.

AN EYE EOR AN EYE
By
MARIE CONNOR LEIGHTON.

A Romance of Love, by the ever-popular Author of 'Convict 99,' &c.

THE MESSAGE
By LOUIS TRACY.

A delightfully exciting romance of adventure, love, and intrigue. In a particularly breezy opening scene—Cowes Regatta—we are introduced to all the characters in the story, and then the tale proceeds with a rush of incident and adventure until its finish in the wilds of Nigeria.

JEANNE OF THE MARSHES
By E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM.

By FLORENCE WARDEN.

"'Lady Rodway's Ordeal' should prove an ideal novel for the holidays."—Chiswick Express.

SARAH TULDON'S LOVERS
By ORME AGNUS.

"Sarah Tuldon is a creation in the full sense of the word; a thing afire with life and the energy of a fearless paganism that is yet clean as the open hills. Splendour is the word that most naturally links itself with her—splendour in courage, mastery, and laughter."
—Manchester Guardian.

THE VAN DYLK DIAMONDS
By ARTHUR APPLIN.

A story of powerful interest by the author of "The Chorus Girl," "The Butcher of Bruton Street," &c.

THE SOLITARY FARM
By FERGUS HUME.

A murder mystery story in its author's best vein, and not since "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab" has the author written a story of such breathless interest or one with such an entrancing and powerful love interest.

Diary of the Week.

On Wednesday the Prime Minister, in Mr. Lloyd George's absence, announced two anticipated changes in the structure of the Finance Bill. One is the substitution for the tax on ungotten minerals of a 5 per cent. duty on mineral rent, royalties, and wayleaves, and the second is the transference of the expense of compiling the new Domesday Book from the land-owner to the State. The cost of the land valuation is slightly larger than we had anticipated. The whole expense will be about two millions, £300,000 of which will fall into the current financial year, and the whole process will be complete in between three and four years. The estimated first yield of the new duty on royalties is £350,000, making a total result for the new land taxes of £675,000.

The change is a concession to the Tories, but Mr. Austen Chamberlain promptly charged the Government with constructing "a new Budget," and Mr. Balfour, by doubling the cost of collection, halving the receipts of the duties, and omitting the tax on minerals, made out that on the first year the Government would be £438,000 to the bad. On this arithmetical basis Mr. Balfour constructed a charge that the valuing side of the Finance Bill was unconstitutional and revolutionary, while ninety-six members of the Opposition, having previously protested against making the landlords pay for valuation, now voted in favor of making them do it. Of course, as the new taxes fructify, the proportionate yearly cost of the machinery—£150,000—will be insignificant. Meanwhile, the Government have made good progress during the week. They have added clauses 9, 10, 11, 13, and 14 to the Bill. The Chancellor has now given in five acres of garden free of development tax. We are afraid this lets out Devonshire House.

Meanwhile, the process of faint and dubious signalling to the Lords goes on. Improving on Mr. Balfour, Lord Lansdowne, speaking to his Wiltshire tenants, repudiated the Liberal doctrine (which was also the great Duke of Wellington's) that the House of Lords should yield to repeated decisions of the House of Commons. He contrasted with it the House of Lords' "more moderate" theory, namely, that they should supply the people with "full opportunity" of expressing their will on a subject. In other words, he demanded the right of forcing a plébiscite. Lord Lansdowne did not say who gave the Lords this right, or that he only proposed to apply it to Liberal Bills. On that issue he declared they were "ready to try conclusions," even if it turned upon finance. Probably Lord Lansdowne, a dabbler in most things (including war), merely means to dabble in revolution. But the question is whether these half-words, like similar half-words on Protection, are not encouraging his following to plunge headlong into it. On this point we note that Professor Dicey, after arguing, as a strong Tory partisan, against the Budget, concludes, as a constitutional authority, that there is a "special disadvantage in any policy which seems to attack any privilege of the House of Commons."

The clause of the Budget Bill setting up the ½d. tax on undeveloped land was carried on Tuesday by a majority of 104, only three or four members of the disappearing "cave" opposing it, while Moderates like Mr. Cecil Harmsworth, who dwell on its borders, strongly supported it. Mr. Balfour's hostile criticism should be repeated in Bingley Hall. It was a song of "Proputty, proputty, proputty," from end to end. He defended the holding up of land against the needs of the community by saying that no man should be induced to sell what belonged to him at a smaller price than he would naturally get for it. The fact that property depended on the community was not an argument for taxing it. All increment on all property was unearned, dividends as well as rent—a Socialistic argument, qualified by Mr. Balfour's evident corollary that as the masses make all the wealth, they should pay all the taxes. Mr. Balfour again bewailed the ruin of the market gardener—who is exempted from the development tax—but relieved his hearers' minds by adding that its proceeds would be so small as to be "absolutely ridiculous."

Sir Edward Grey, in an interesting speech at Leeds on Tuesday, made an amusing and effective reply to Lord Lansdowne, who had compared the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Government to the "robber gulls," which do not fish for themselves, but swoop down on the birds which do, and snatch away their spoil. Sir Edward Grey suggested a more exact parallel. In Lord Lansdowne's simile the "robber gull" should be, not the Government, but the ground landlord. If a plan were devised for taking from the "robber gull," for the benefit of the gull community, a fifth of the fish he had torn from the working gulls, the parallel to the increment tax would be complete. Certainly the "robber gull" had no resemblance to the Government, which put the tax, not into its own pocket, but into that of the community.

The "Daily Chronicle" is doing excellent service in exhibiting the grosser cases of under-assessment of the mansions and properties of the men who are endeavoring to destroy the Budget, as compared with the assessment of business premises in their immediate neighborhood. Thus Lansdowne House and grounds, estimated to be worth £8 per square foot, are assessed at 7½d.; the Bath Club, on the other side of the street, is assessed at 5s. 6½d. per square foot. The rateable value of Devonshire House is about 6d. a square foot; that of the Ritz Hotel, on the opposite side of Piccadilly, 12s. a square foot. We note, by the way, that the Earl of Derby has withdrawn his subscription from the Cheshire Agricultural Society, though his family has made its scores of thousands out of the labors of the people of Cheshire, and its hundreds of thousands out of the work of Lancashire. It is not surprising that a Manchester Tory writes to the "Times," imploring Mr. Balfour to give his dukes a hint to "put away their pocket-handkerchiefs."

The "Spectator" has been somewhat unfortunate in its treatment of the transaction between the Duke of Northumberland and the Northumberland County Council. Mr. Lloyd George had said that the Duke had "demanded" £900 an acre for land that the County Council wanted for a school site. This statement, says the "Spectator," filled it with indignation and disgust. The Duke had not demanded this sum, an impartial arbitrator awarded it. According to Mr. Tebbutt, the Editor of the "North Mail," neither of these statements has any foundation in fact, while Mr. Lloyd George's assertion is only inaccurate in so far as it fell short of the truth. Actually the Duke demanded not £900, but £1,210 an acre, and the arbitrator only gave him £698 15s. 6d. Even the arbitrator's figure seems to have been an outside one, for while he reduced the Duke's claim from 5s. to 3s. 6d. a square yard, a competent valuer fixed its worth at only 3d. a yard. The "Spectator," after grossly misstating the facts, suggests that Mr. Lloyd George has been guilty of "bad taste," "gross injustice," "malignant insult," and "inverted snobbery." From which it would appear that some trifling intellectual (not to say moral) defects attend on snobbery of the older sort.

Order is now restored in Catalonia, but on Monday a general strike was threatened to secure the release of the prisoners. There are said to be over 700 workmen in the various gaols, and the number is being increased daily. They are being tried by court-martial, but it is denied that any have been shot. The strike was frustrated by a stringent proclamation from the military governor. The Spanish politicians and newspapers are making wild assertions as to the causes of the outbreak. They are all agreed to put it down to the "Anarchists," so as to relieve themselves from responsibility, but they have to admit that life and secular property were respected, and only ecclesiastical property attacked. All advanced movements in Spain are necessarily anti-Clerical, and "Anarchism" is there simply an unpleasant name for advanced politics. That the situation is not permanently improved may be inferred from the fact that the Spanish Queen is to make a long stay in England. There has been more fighting at Melilla, where the Spaniards are collecting a considerable army, with the reported object of advancing to Tetuan rather than into the Riff country.

On Friday the Stockholm gas and electricity workers, though specially exempted, in the strike proclamation, stopped work, but their places have been taken by an organisation of strike-breakers, called the Civic Guard. The compositors came out on Monday, causing a suspension of the newspapers, in spite of the Government's appeal to them not to commit a breach of their industrial agreement. Some 10,000 laborers are said to have promised to strike when the harvest is ripe. The railway men, on the other hand, have postponed taking a decision. Reports from Stockholm suggest that the workers are tiring. The papers are coming out, trams running again, and traffic filling the street. Against these perhaps partial accounts must be set the admitted fact that the trade unionists are resolutely loyal to their leaders, and the strike is already the most general and stubborn on record. The Government has refused to intervene in the dispute, and the assistance towards a settlement offered by a private association was rejected by the employers.

President Taft, having signed the Tariff Bill, announces that it involves a "substantial revision downwards," but, knowing the public mind, adds that "it is not a perfect bill or in complete compliance with the promises made, strictly interpreted." Most of the newspapers put the case much more bluntly, and the Western States are beginning to talk of fighting the "stand-patters." Mr. Cummins, Republican Senator for Iowa, who voted throughout against the Tariff Bill, says that the tariff is the fundamental issue in his party, and that the extreme Protectionists must be driven out of control of the party. Other Westerners are demanding that "the West shall throw off the shackles of the East," but these advanced Republicans are tender enough in their attitude towards the tariff. They expect to have Mr. Taft on their side, but Mr. Taft does not seem to have the makings of the leader of a revolt. He signed the Tariff Bill despite protestations, and, if we may judge from Mr. Dooley, the man in the street is beginning to contrast unfavorably his "broad smile" with Mr. Roosevelt's "big stick."

We publish elsewhere a powerful plea for the removal of the color disqualification from the Union of Africa Bill, by Mr. Tengo Jabavu, the ablest of the native journalists in South Africa, and a generally respected leader of native opinion. The case is undoubtedly a difficult one for a British Liberal, anxious to see the seal set on an act of Liberal policy. But we confess our deep regret that the Government have not seen their way to one simple solution which was offered to them by the South African delegates themselves, namely, the elimination of the Schedule. The Schedule was the work of Lord Selborne, to whom, as far as we can see, the Government are under no obligation whatever. Its excision would have given all parties the breathing space they desired, and would have been a set-off to the illiberal portions of the Bill, which were, in the main, the work not of the Dutch representatives, or even of the Progressives, but of pressure from Natal. We do not believe that either the British or the Union Parliament desires to take its native policy from such a quarter. As far as we can see, the House of Commons could reject the Schedule without either hurting the Bill or displeasing the delegates, and we cannot but hope, in view of the news which reaches us of serious unrest in native South Africa, that this may be possible.

Lord Kitchener has been appointed High Commissioner and Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean in succession to the Duke of Connaught. We thought that the Duke resigned because the office gave him too little to do. This is not to be the case with his successor. The military correspondent of the "Times" has kindly mapped out for him a plan of campaign more befitting the servant of a Continental military Power than of an insular and naval one. Lord Kitchener is to "watch" the "naval programmes" of Germany's allies, i.e., Austria and Italy, the latter a devoted friend of England. He is to have in mind a display of "efficient and military force in the Mediterranean." He is to organise the "heterogeneous Anglo-African forces which are now scattered throughout the length and breadth of Africa." He is to bethink himself of a vast concentration of British and Colonial forces in the Middle Sea. In the intervals of these duties he will attend the meetings of the Defence Committee, and as an "expert horticulturalist," will look after the "gardens of the Palace at Valetta." By all means let Lord Kitchener "cultivate his garden"—and keep out of other peoples'.

The Cretan question appears to be settling down. Last week the Turkish Government made a thoroughly false move. The Turkish Minister at Athens read to the Greek Premier a very undiplomatic note or memorandum, which, while almost giving the Greek Government the lie, called upon it for assurances that it had no intention of either annexing or invading Crete, and to disavow any act pointing to such a course. Failing such assurances, the Ottoman Minister would leave Athens. The effect of this semi-ultimatum, sternly criticised in the European Press, has happily been small. The Greek Government, which has behaved admirably, replied in a conciliatory way, referring her case to the Protecting Powers. The result has been a sensible modification of the Porte's official tone, and some slackening of the popular anti-Greek agitation. Meanwhile, the Greek flag at Canea has been lowered, but the diplomatic inexperience of the Young Turks, and the spirit of extreme Mohammedan nationalism behind them, are a serious side of the situation.

Fenid Pasha, Turkish Minister of the Interior, has resigned. He was disliked and distrusted by Hilmi and his colleagues, suspected as an ingrained servant of the old order, and bitterly attacked in the Press for trying to stifle the inquiry into the Adana massacres. He is succeeded by Talaat Bey, Vice-President of the Chamber, chief of the deputation of members which visited England, and a leading light of the Young Turk Party. The whole Cabinet will be reconstituted shortly, with a view to putting Young Turks into the various offices, though Hilmi will probably remain Grand Vizier. It must be admitted that the present Cabinet has not done much in the way of practical reorganisation, and it is to be hoped that the Young Turks, when themselves in charge, will prove more vigorous. They have still to convince the world of their constructive statesmanship. In so far as they constitute a majority of the Chamber they are responsible for some illiberal legislation with regard to the right of combination, and they cannot escape blame for so drastic a step as the suppression of the "Yeni Gazeta," merely because it published the opinions of foreign papers on the retention of martial law.

The last of the Test matches was played at the Oval and ended, as most experienced critics of the game expected it to end, in a draw. The Selection Committee, untaught by past experience, declined to provide a fast bowler on a pitch which, under the conditions of the weather now prevailing, is more suited to him than any in England. The masters of English cricket do not appear to have heard of Lockwood and Richardson. The result of the game leaves the cricket premiership in the hands of Australia, which has now won two games to our one, the other two being drawn. Her success is due more specifically to her batting and fielding than to her bowling; but it is also the triumph of an eleven which, on the whole, understands the tactics of the game more thoroughly than a crack English eleven. Nevertheless, we retain the opinion that, properly managed and selected, the best English material is superior.

Perhaps the best definition of the effect of the Censorship on the literary British Drama was given by Mr. Henry James, in a letter to Mr. Galsworthy, quoted at Thursday's sitting of the Joint Committee:—

> "It is difficult to express the depth of dismay and disgust with which an author of books in this country finds it impressed upon him, in passing into the province of the theatre with the view of laboring there, that he has to reckon anxiously with an obscure and irresponsible Mr. So-and-So, who may, by law, peremptorily demand of him that he shall make his work square, at vital points, with Mr. So-and-So's personal and, intellectually and critically speaking, wholly unauthoritative preferences, prejudices, and ignorances, and that the less original, the less important, and the less interesting it is, and the more vulgar and superficial and futile, the more it is likely so to square. He thus encounters an arrogation of critical authority and the critical veto, with the power to enforce its decisions, that is without a parallel in any other civilised country, and which has in this one the effect of relegating the theatre to the position of a mean minor art, and of condemning it to ignoble dependences, poverties, and pusillanimities."

The objection of the literary craft to an illiterate office could not be more powerfully expressed.

We much regret to record the early death of Mrs. Mary Davies, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's only sister, to whom he was attached not only by close association in youth and early manhood, but by the sweetness and strength of her character.—On Wednesday Dr. Lefroy, the Dean of Norwich, died at the Riffelalp, his favorite summer resort, at the age of seventy-three. Dean Lefroy was one of the ablest of the Evangelical school, and one of the best organisers in the Anglican Church, but he did more by the energy and force of his personality than by strictly intellectual qualities. He was a vigorous preacher of a colloquial type, and his capacity as a man of business would have made him an excellent ruler of a diocese.—Readers of The Nation will regret the death of Mr. A. H. Beesly, the author of the poem, "A Sussex Churchyard," which appeared in these columns three weeks ago. Mr. Beesly was a brother of the Positivist thinker and writer, Mr. E. S. Beesly, but he left a mark of his own as a much beloved master of Marlborough School, as the author of some very scholarly work in poetry, and as a powerful Radical controversialist.

THE CONFUSION OF THE CRITICS.

As the controversy on the Budget proceeds, it is interesting to note how the Tory case for the intervention of the Lords crumbles away. There was the plea that the Budget was unpopular. The by-elections have silenced that argument. There was the expectation that it would be forced through the Commons by the guillotine, exercised in the most ruthless fashion. That, again, has been falsified by the method under which the Opposition suffers from nothing more serious than the fatigue of its own eloquence. There was the hope of a divided Cabinet and party. The only thing which the Budget has distracted is the counsels of the Opposition. The hostile agitation in the country has failed. The character and direction of the attack on the Budget are the object of contemptuous criticism from the rank and file of the Tory party, and the popular section of its Press. Finally, the more reasonable grounds of opposition have been cut off. The industry of agriculture comes out of the Budget with a handsome balance in its favor. Mr. Balfour's market gardener and Mr. Pretyman's small holder are safe, though the rage of their tutelary gods is quite unappeased. Every class of landlord is relieved from the burden of valuation, and from taxation on the smaller increments. It would be impossible for the Government to exhibit a more complete absence of vindictiveness. The new land taxes, moderate in themselves, have been made more moderate than ever, only to meet the petulantly dishonest retort that they are all but useless for revenue.

Thus baulked of the power to present a plausible case for violent action by the peers, the Opposition has become a chorus of confused and self-destroying rhetoricians. The leader whom his own want of character has driven on to a taxing system in which duties fail of their purpose just so far as they produce revenue, pretends to arraign the undeveloped land tax because, though it aims at revenue, one of its objects is also the relief of town congestion. Each one of Mr. Balfour's propositions annuls another. The land taxes are so small that they are not worth the cost of valuation: they are so large that they will endanger capital, produce unemployment, and force men with scores of thousands a year to make themselves odious to the community by "taking it out" of the weakest and humblest of their "bedesmen." They are Socialistic because they take toll of one kind of unearned increment, when, in fact, all increment on all "property" is unearned, and the world is managed by a set of drones fit only for expropriation. It is bad to make the landlords pay for valuation; it is worse to make the State pay for it. It is cruel to tax the small holder; it is unjust to exempt him. It is scandalous to tax the rich; it is also absurd, because the rich can easily shift their burdens on to the shoulders of the poor. The private landlord has a right to take for himself what he does not earn, and to deny the State a contribution, because when the State is itself a landlord it takes for the people what belongs to them. Through this tangle of sophistry a small body of rich men stumble along, making converts for the Budget with each fresh illustration of the selfishness of privilege.

But if the case against the Budget falls through the skilless anger of its critics, it falls also by the purely anti-democratic tone and temper of the hostile argument. Just as the action of the dukes in cutting down not their footmen, but their doles to the sick and infirm, are making thoughtful people realise the badness of a system which spoils the characters both of dukes and of dependents, so the attitude of the Opposition reveals their complete indifference to the social problem. The debate on the tax on undeveloped land showed them to be concerned for one kind of material interest only—that of property in land, and the amenities and enjoyments which its possession brings to the rich. What, cried Mr. Ashley, would be the position of Devonshire House and Holland House?—both of them, let us say, enjoyed exclusively, or all but exclusively, by a single family, and grossly under-assessed to the local rates. What would happen to the land round Harrow school? And what, echoed Mr. Balfour, must happen to a State which induces a man to sell his land for less than he might otherwise get for it, and taxes the increase which comes to him through the work of the community? If there were no congestion in London worse than that of Harrow school, we might, indeed, let Harrow landowners "hold up" their land indefinitely. But we imagine that when Mr. Lloyd George proposed the tax on undeveloped land, he was thinking more of the boys of Hoxton than of Harrow. The aim of the tax and its recorded effect, wherever it has been applied, are to diminish the characteristic evil of our town life—the massing of the people in dense central blocks and rookeries and in suburban slums. And that evil is repeating the old trouble of over-crowding under conditions which the constructors of many modern cities, with the help of this tax, have avoided. For the relief of these conditions Mr. Balfour expresses no concern. Probably he has never heard of it, though for years it has been the basis of the argument for the tax on occupied land in the neighborhood of towns. The same exclusive concern for landlords explains the fact that the proposal to value land at the cost of the State is as heartily resented as the earlier scheme of the Bill. It is valuation, a national record of land values, which the landlords resent. That simple plan means the ending at a stroke of the process which has "held up" municipalities, railways, traders, school authorities, manufacturers, the building industry. We might be back in the 'thirties for all the care that the Tory party, Protectionists, Balfourites, neo-democrats, and the rest, have shown for any one of these interests.

But it is when we examine the political end of the opposition to the Budget, enfeebled and divided as it now is, that we get the real measure of its meanness. The defeat of the Budget is sought so that the way may be clear for Protection. And the only way to that end is through the House of Lords. On this point there is already a conflict of counsels. The landlords want the land clauses eliminated. The extreme Protectionists, realising that this would not secure their purpose, and might even bring it to irreparable ruin, ask for the rejection of the whole Bill. In other words, they want to use the House of Lords, which is constitutionally debarred from touching taxes at all, as the instrument of a complete change in our fiscal system, to the advantage of the rich and the crushing disadvantage of the poor, perhaps their permanent submergence. If this plan succeeded English history would present no more direct invitation to revolution. The Commons would be crushed under the foot of the hereditary House, and the power for which Hampden fought would be lost, not to a King, but to an oligarchy.

Let us premise that every step in statement and argument that leads up to such a conclusion is false and unconstitutional. It is false to suggest, as Lord Lansdowne suggests, that the House of Lords has any right to report on the state of the nation, and to vote down any Bill of which it disapproves in order to bring about a plébiscite. It is false to say that a body which can set nine Tories against each Whig it contains, and is a landlord's House before even it is a Tory House, is equipped for any such task. But it is mere impudence to claim that the House of Lords retains a vestige of right to touch taxation, either by repealing or refusing a tax, imposing a tax, passing a tax and rejecting the machinery for collecting it, or throwing out a Budget Bill and thus confounding the hundreds of thousands of people who have paid over taxes on the faith of the resolutions passed by the taxing assembly. We fear to labor the point, but the disappearance of the last shreds of the power of the Lords on finance in 1861 and 1894—two almost equally important dates—is so clearly noted by Professor Redlich, the last authoritative Continental writer on English Parliamentary law, that we think it well to transcribe his statement:—

> "All the Government's proposals as to taxation (in 1861) were combined into a single Bill, and laid before the House as a whole. The provisions of the previous session's Bill for repealing the paper duties were revived as part of the complete scheme, and the House of Lords was forced into the position of having to accept or reject the financial proposals of the Commons as a whole. Amendment of the single Money Bill was constitutionally impossible. For two hundred years the House of Lords had ceased to claim any such right. In face of the alternative presented to them, the Lords could do nothing else than accede to the aggregate of financial proposals without exception. They would not bring themselves to reject the whole financial scheme of the year. And so the matter ended. For more than a generation now the Commons' right to sole management of the country's finance has been asserted in this way; it is now both true in fact and accepted as a principle of Constitutional law that the House of Lords is excluded from influence on money matters, and it can never expect to reassert a claim to possess any. The immensely important Constitution Reform, carried through as described, was completed without alteration or enactment of a single rule of law, and its establishment vividly illustrates the incomparable elasticity of the British Constitution and its contempt for juristic construction and dogmatic formulation.
> "In 1894 the title of the annual Bill regulating all the taxes for the year and other periodical measures of finance, was changed from "Customs and Inland Revenue Bill" to the more accurate "Finance Bill." At the same time the scope of its provisions was enlarged. The Budget for that year introduced certain permanent changes in relation to the reduction of the national debt, and instead of dealing with them separately, the Government included them in their annual Finance Bill. The innovation was made with the concurrence of both political parties in the House of Commons, and again was allowed to pass without challenge by the Lords, who thereby sealed their final act of abdication of all right to interfere in granting taxes."—Redlich, "The Procedure of the House of Commons."

If, then, the Lords disavow their own act, and try to regain their surrendered crown, they yield us every advantage that a democratic party could wish to have. They unite the Liberals, the Labor men, and the Irish. They put forward as their champions the most unpopular members of their class, while they give us the whole range of the social problem as a battle-ground. They constitute us the defenders and themselves the assailants of the British Constitution, and of the House of Commons in its greatest historical function. And if they thus give Liberalism the best platform it has had since the struggle over the first Reform Bill, and Toryism the worst, let us first express our deep acknowledgments to their leaders, and then fight one of the greatest battles of English politics—to a finish.

THE RUTHLESSNESS OF JAPAN.

In the rapid transformation of the East which is likely to be in any world history the salient fact of the first quarter of our century, the most doubtful, and probably the most eventful chapter will be that which deals with the fortunes of China. Turkey and Persia, we are now assured, will have their chance, and if they fail, it will be mainly through their own fault. The evolution of India and Egypt may be slower, but already the road of their advance is being levelled and mapped out. But over the destinies of China there brood some darker possibilities. Can the great mass lumber into rapid motion without falling into discordant fragments? Will enough of the old Empire survive the greed of rival Powers to make a powerful nation? Will the need of developing first of all their military strength in order to resist the ambitions of their neighbors, allow the Chinese to bestow due attention to their civil and intellectual re-organisation? That is the sort of question which springs to the mind in view of the sudden crisis between China and Japan, which has been settled this week in South-Eastern Manchuria. It exposed the hopeless military weakness of the Empire. To the Japanese demands no resistance was even for a moment conceivable, and Japan was accordingly able, merely by announcing her will, to have it executed. The actual question at stake was not perhaps of the first importance. But the right was by no means clearly on the Japanese side, and even had it been so, her procedure was none the less objectionable for its crude appeal to force. What has been due in this case may be repeated in the future ad infinitum. It makes a precedent which other Powers may copy. In the end one asks how much of China will be left intact. And if a moment should arrive at which China should feel herself capable of some resistance, the effort might only serve to make a pretext for a definite and final conquest.

The dispute over the Antung-Mukden railway had its origin principally in the utter disregard which the Japanese have invariably shown alike in Korea and in Manchuria for the rights and susceptibilities of the conquered. To facilitate their invasion of Manchuria they constructed a short narrow-gauge Decauville railway, from Antung on the Yalu to Mukden. It was hastily built, and negotiated the mountains by detours and sharply graded ascents. So soon as the war authorised their virtual annexation of Korea, and the "penetration" of southern Manchuria, they determined to make this line commercially useful as a link between the Korean and Manchurian systems. It gives a direct overland route from Siberia to the Straits of Tsushima, and is an indispensable detail in the shortening of the Continental approach to Japan. A clause in the Peking Convention of 1905 authorised Japan to make this railway "fit for the conveyance of commercial and industrial goods of all nations." The phrase was vague. The Japanese were not unduly straining its meaning when they claimed that it gave them the right to convert the gauge of the line, and to substitute tunnels for the existing detours and sharp gradients. The Chinese may have been within the letter of the law when they urged that alterations so extensive as the Japanese proposed went beyond anything which had been explicitly conceded. But the real quarrel turned on more substantial issues. The Japanese, as even the "Times" admits, had built this line under military rule, through good corn lands and through villages, without deigning to pay any compensation whatever to the Chinese owners. There they followed the ruthless precedents of Korea, where the corvée was used to force the natives to build roads and railways over their own lands for the benefit of their Japanese conquerors. The fact that Koreans and Manchoos belong to the same racial family as the Japanese, and were a generation ago on the same level of culture, in no way prevents these Asiatic Imperialists from treating the "natives" very much as European adventurers treat African Moslems in Morocco. Moreover, the Japanese argued that the right to construct the line involved the right to police it with some 4,000 of their troops. Nobody in Peking, we can well believe, cared whether the gauge of the Antung-Mukden line was narrow or broad—indeed, it was clearly an advantage that it should be broad. But Peking did care, and rightly cared that the rights of the inhabitants should be respected, and that this area of their vanishing dominions should not be occupied by Japanese troops. The Chinese Government made its stand on the somewhat pedantic objection that the actual wording of the Peking Convention did not specify the complete reconstruction of the railway, simply because this legal point (which may well have been technically sound) was the only weapon that lay to its hand wherewith to resist the substantial injustice on which this railway was based.

The issue of the conflict has simply confirmed the right of the stronger. The Japanese announced that they proposed to ignore the Chinese protest and proceed with the reconstruction of the railway, whereupon the Chinese Government made the best of a hard necessity by accepting the situation. A foreign army with rails and engineers came into its territory, appropriated its soil without compensation, planted a garrison, and is now proceeding, without leave, and in the face of a formal protest, to drive new tunnels in fresh places and and to annex fresh fields on which to lay its line. A more lawless procedure could hardly be conceived. We do not know whether in the course of these particular negotiations the Chinese Government suggested arbitration. It would in any event have been a quite useless suggestion. A few months ago it invited Japan to lay the still more doubtful case of the Fakumen Railway before the Hague Tribunal. Japan categorically refused. Both in Korea and Manchuria the brute force of the Japanese conquest is trampling beneath it all the higher morality of civilisation for the sake of imposing its externals. Few of the real facts about the Japanese occupation of Korea are allowed to penetrate the European Press, but we know enough to realise that the country is being ruthlessly exploited for the sake of Japanese trade and Japanese immigrants. Western civilisation under Japanese leadership is more than repeating the history of wrong which has dogged the "opening-up" of the Far East, from the Opium War onwards. Indeed, the Japanese are so closely repeating Western precedents that they have even revived the cultivation of opium in the regions of Manchuria which they control, despite the manifestly sincere efforts of China to check the use and sale of the drug. A brutal stimulus may serve as well as another to galvanise China into "a new way of life." But with the stimulus to be as strong as the foreigner, will come an equal impulse to hate and resist the foreigner. These aggressions may end by rendering obsolete the traditional Chinese contempt for militarism, but with the incentive to arm they will also prepare the race-conflicts of the future. It is the invaders rather than the Chinese who are making a yellow peril—the invaders whom we gaily introduced into the comity of civilisation, and in whose interests we helped to compass the temporary ruin of Russia.

A STRIKE OF HALF A MILLION MEN.

WHETHER or not the general strike in Sweden which was begun on Wednesday week proves successful, it has already, both by its extent and its duration, gained a serious place in the history of the labor movement. All the wheels have not stopped, not even all the wheels which it was intended should stop, but industry has been crippled in every town in Sweden. Sweden is mainly an agricultural country, and of the population of five-and-half millions little more than half-a-million are engaged in industry, commerce, and transport. Of this half-a-million 300,000 are active in the conflict, 80,000 were locked out by the employers, and over 200,000 obeyed the summons of the labor leaders to lay down their work. When it is remembered that less than a quarter of a million Swedish workers are organised, the comprehensive character of the strike and the extent to which it has affected workers outside the trade unions will be appreciated. The strike proclamation called out all organised workers except those occupied in tending the sick or in the care of animals or municipal employees engaged in lighting, water supply, and sanitation. Some of the municipal employees have been more ardent than their leaders. The gas and electricity workers have struck on the pretext that soldiers were stationed in the works, but really out of solidarity. On the other hand, the railway men, the postmen, and the telegraphists have remained on duty, though considerable pressure is being brought to bear upon them. But, partial though it is, the strike is general enough to have transformed the aspect of the cities. The factories are closed, the ships in the harbors remain unloaded, the trams have almost ceased to run, the streets are nearly empty of carts and cabs, even the very undertakers have stopped burying the dead. And in this crisis the Swedish people are almost wholly without news as to how the battle is going. Since Monday the compositors have joined in the strike, despite their agreements with the employers, and apart from flysheets the only newspaper which appears is the organ of the Strike Committee. But though the pulse of industrial life has almost stopped beating, there has been no disorder. The Government has planted soldiers everywhere and more wisely stopped the sale of alcohol. The strike leaders, on their part, have enjoined the strictest discipline and have formed a guard to preserve order. The wilder spirits in the labor ranks, the Young Socialists, who correspond in Sweden with the followers of M. Hervé in France, are urging direct action, the coercion of non-strikers, the destruction of machinery. But the leaders have no desire to forfeit public sympathy or compromise the future of the labor movement by recklessness or violence, and so long as funds hold out and the employers do not introduce foreign laborers, there is no likelihood that prudent counsels will be neglected.

The chronology of the events which led up to the present disastrous conflict is easier to disentangle than the causes. The world-wide trade depression has affected Sweden as other countries, and the Swedish employers insisted upon heavy reductions in wages. The workers in the pulp and tailoring trades resisted the demand, and the employers locked them out to the number of 13,000. The employers have recently formed a general federation, and this general federation issued an ultimatum to the effect that the lock-out would be extended on July 26th to the woodworkers and textile trades, and on August 2nd to the ironworkers unless the employers' conditions were accepted. If these measures were not effective, the lock-out was to be extended yet further. Failing to reach a compromise the Trade Unions decided to reply with a general strike, and when, on August 2nd, the locked-out workers numbered 80,000, the general strike was proclaimed for the 4th. Such are the events, and behind them there lay two causes. In the first place the Trade Unionists put forward against the demand of the employers to reduce wages indefinitely in times of bad trade the right of the workers to a minimum wage below which wages should fall for no cause whatever. The workers insist that a minimum wage, the employers that a minimum profit, should be a first charge upon industry. The difference is in theory considerable, but, inasmuch as the workers had not fixed precisely what they meant by a minimum wage, or the employers what they meant by a minimum profit, and as both might have found salvation in shifting the burden upon the consumer, it need not have occasioned a bitter and widespread conflict and resort to the heaviest artillery of industrial war. For that the explanation must be sought in the social conditions of Sweden. Sweden is very largely feudal in spirit and traditions, and class distinctions are very marked. The gulf which separates the middle from the working classes is wide. The employers are largely recruited from civil servants and lawyers. To the paternalism of class in their dealings with their men is added the stiffness of bureaucracy. The men, on the other hand, have learnt combination under the auspices of Socialism. They are more pronouncedly political, definitely anti-clerical, for instance, and more advanced than English trade unionists, just as Swedish employers are more stiff-necked and less enlightened than English employers. These are natural enough conditions where industry is still in its infancy, and the social transformation it involves hardly understood. The lack of sympathy between the disputants encouraged the strongly organised employers to think that they could break trade unionism, just as it encouraged the trade unionists to think that they could win a great concession for labor through a single intense struggle.

It is hard to say yet whether the men or the employers are winning. The employers have, with fair success, organised substitutes to take the place of the strikers in the gas and electricity works and on the tramways. But the railwaymen and the postal servants may, in part at least, come out, and the strike has already touched the rural laborers and may spread among them to the damage of the harvest. The Swedish Trade Unionists have already carried matters farther than trade unionists in any other country. The general strike declared in France a short time ago came to very little; a general strike in Holland in 1904 affected only a few trades and collapsed in three or four days; and general strikes in Italy have never been more than of restricted area. The Swedish strike has affected every industrial centre and it has lasted ten days already, and it may spread further. But it is still very far from the ideal of stopping all the wheels of industry—as did the Russian strike which was not economic and was not the product of an elaborate trade union organisation. And it is not likely to reach this end. Yet it is difficult to see how the strike can bring the employers to their knees unless it suspends communications and all productive activity. A general strike is inevitably brief, and to be successful it must be all embracing. It is brief because trade unionism has not the resources for a prolonged general abstention from work, and, it must be practically all-embracing because otherwise it is not compulsive. The "Young Socialists" appreciate this, and hence their plan to make the strike universal by hook or by crook. The probability is that surrender in Sweden will have to come from the men rather than from the employers. It does not follow, however, that in that case the trade unions will have lost completely. The example of Russia in the political field suggests that even a really universal and apparently successful strike brings a dubious and insecure victory. What has been won has to be maintained, and a general strike is so drastic and extreme a measure that it can hardly be repeated except at long intervals.

Even, therefore, though the Swedish strike were universal, one might doubt whether its fruits could be preserved. On the other hand a partial strike does not mean defeat, because it is a signal lesson. The Swedish trade unions have demonstrated their power and their discipline, and the Swedish employers will be very unenlightened if they still cherish the notion that organised labor can be treated as less than an equal in determining the conditions of employment. It would be natural to expect the struggle to end in a real, if not apparent, division of the honors. On the one hand, we might expect Swedish trade unionism to be more conciliatory in its manner and more modest in its demands; on the other, we might ask Swedish employers to realise that feudalism has no place in a modern industrial community.

THE PRECEDENTS FOR THE LAND TAXES.

II.

We pass to the second of the four "intolerable" propositions of the land taxes, with the first of which we dealt last week—the impossibility of ascertaining "site value." Here the evidence is conclusive and overwhelming. Of the towns, "we think," says Lord Balfour of Burleigh in the Minority Report of the Local Taxation Commission, "that a valuation of sites, sufficiently accurate for the purpose, and not inferior to the present valuation of hereditaments, could be made without undue labor and expense. The evidence afforded by sales and leases of sites constitutes, we believe, an adequate basis for an expert's judgment." Mr. Harper declares that the assessment of each separate site in the County of London could be carried out accurately for £40,000. In New York a separate assessment of site value and total value was required in 1904. "The time required for the assessment was no greater than in prior years, and no greater amount of time was allowed by law." The first assessment of real estate in Queens when joined to the old city (with 113,000 separate parcels) cost about £5,000, of which the bulk of expense "resulted from the measurement of the buildings." "If the assessment had been confined to the land alone, the expense would have been very much less." "In the light of my experience," is the summary, "I may say unhesitatingly that it is perfectly possible, with proper administration and a sufficient appropriation, to secure an assessment of the value of land which will be so accurate that there is no reasonable ground for complaint—certainly far more accurate than the assessment of any other class of property."

Colonial experience laughs, again, at the assumed impracticability of valuing agricultural land apart from improvements. Mr. Reeves gives a picture of the hubbub amongst landowners when the graduated tax on unimproved values was first passed in New Zealand, which singularly resembles the hubbub of to-day. "Cooler-headed opponents of the measure declared that it overstepped the line where taxation ends and confiscation begins. 'Punitive,' 'absolutely ferocious,' 'grossly tyrannical,' 'vindictive,' 'crushing,' 'murderous,' were some of the epithets flung at the new tax. The promise of the Government to exempt improvements was met with the complaint that a fair separation of the value of improvements from the ground value of real estate was impossible. Human ingenuity, it was said, could not cope with the task of discerning and calculating the true value of improvements, gradually effected by the labor and capital of many years. Even the most honest and merciful of assessors might fail to estimate accurately the increased value given by improvements which might be scarcely visible to the eye of the casual inspector. Moreover, who could be certain that the assessors—servants of a Radical Government much in need of money—would be merciful or even just?" It sounds like the correspondence columns of the "Times" of August, 1909. It records a similar panic amongst the landowners of New Zealand sixteen years ago. New Zealand, under such an impost, stands to-day, no devouring brood of Anarchist aliens, but the breeding place of men of the English-speaking race, who present, out of the proceeds of such "murderous confiscations," and amid the applause of the home-grown Imperialist, resisting land increment taxation, a "Dreadnought" to the British Navy.

Lastly, we come to the universal consensus of approval, from three Continents who have attempted it, of the beneficial effects, especially on the building trade and in connection with better houses for the people, of an impost levied upon the capital value of undeveloped land. In Frankfort the normal land tax (not to be identified with the increment tax) was revised in 1904 because, "while it took in taxation a proportion of the regular increase in ground values, it was not effective in checking the holding of land out of the market for speculative purposes." So a modification was contrived by which, if the old proprietors held on to the land, they would be hit by a gradually increasing land tax; and if they sold to speculators, the speculators would be hit unless they commenced building at once. Once again, here, the brutal German demand for efficiency and public welfare overrides private interests. But from the United States (least Socialistic of all civilised communities) comes the same testimony. "The effect of the taxation of real estate in the City of New York," says the President of the Department of Taxes, "so far as the tax falls upon the land, is undoubtedly the same as that described by John Stuart Mill and other writers upon political economy. That is to say, that a tax on the land, being paid wholly by the owner, does not increase rentals, but decreases selling value." Anyone familiar with New York conditions would say that the tax tends to induce a better improvement of valuable sites than would be the case if there were no such tax. "In New Zealand there is scarcely a case," says Mr. Reeves, "of any district reverting to the old method (rating on full capital value or annual value) after adopting the new (rating on unimproved value, which includes the capital value of undeveloped land). It is claimed for the latter that it tends to discourage the speculative holding of land for a rise: that it forces urban and suburban land into the market, and obliges the owner to build on their lots or dispose of them.

Generally, it is thought to encourage improvements and prevent crowding or congestion. . . . It has not hindered land speculation; on the other hand, it seems to have caused little hardship to individuals." "Predictions," says the Agent-General of New South Wales, "have been falsified. Landowners have been wise enough to see that it is only the unproductive land that feels the burden of the tax, and there is a general agreement that the first effect of placing rates on land has been to force much hitherto unproductive land into use. . . . The people of New South Wales are well satisfied with the change that has taken place, and the holders of idle land do not complain, as they perceive that the remedy for a condition of which they may be tempted to complain lies in their own hands."

Here, then, in organised civilisations, many of our own blood held up in Imperialist vision, for our example, are Increment Land Taxes, Undeveloped Land Taxes, taxes on the capital value of land, site valuation, in smooth and effective operation. Is it surprising, as we examine such evidences as these, that Europe and our Colonies alike gaze with amazement at the angry tumult now excited amongst the landed classes of this country against the very modest proposals of the present Budget? The "younger nations," whom, as the Poet Laureate of Empire has declared, we "fawn on," for "men who can shoot or ride," have built systems of far more drastic land taxation into the heart of their civilisation. An old, and as yet undemocratic, State, such as that of Germany, not only approves a more drastic increment taxation carried out by anti-Socialistic municipalities, but also a more drastic Imperial increment tax offered by the landlords to the Government, and condemned as inadequate. Small wonder that to these contemporary observers this country appears as a people throttled by a landed interest, powerful in the House of Commons, omnipotent in the House of Lords. Mr. Macdonald has told of the rough dogmatism of his Cologne professor, as he looks over the North Sea. "A certain John Smith came over with the Conqueror and got land; a certain Tom Brown helped to destroy the secular power of the Church and took land; a certain Jack Robinson promoted Enclosure Bills and appropriated land. So England to-day is bound hand and foot. And the reasons, 'I have been bound hand and foot for generations, and to unbind myself would do a grave injustice to those who have held the ropes.' So she will not move."

This may be a prejudiced verdict, all the clearer because of the envious foreigner. It may, on the other hand, be a verdict detached from the heat and violence of the immediate controversy. But, whatever the issue, this is the kind of question which is being excited in the minds of people at home as well as people abroad, as they contemplate the prolonged and bitter struggle of the landed classes to escape from the land taxes of the present Budget. And, once such questions are excited, they are not easily allayed.

Life and Letters.

THE TEMPTER OF STATES.

If an exact analysis of the distribution of wealth in the modern world were possible, it would be found that a large and the most rapidly increasing share went to moneylenders, brokers, company promoters, and other financiers. More and more the practical manipulation of the capitalistic system falls into their hands. This arose inevitably when joint-stock businesses came to absorb whole provinces of industry, including transport by sea and land, mining, the great staple manufactures, wholesale, and in large part retail, distribution, and the new work of insurance. The modern man can seldom employ his small or his large savings in his own trade or profession: he must buy shares in some organised joint-stock operation. The makers, managers, and manipulators of this co-operative credit thus come to occupy the place of government in the industrial system. They direct and organise the flow of industrial power into the various trades and areas of the industrial world. In the performance of this public service they are often able to obtain private gains which may be excessive. For their craft is essentially a secret one. In the conversion of concrete businesses into share capital, in the original flotation of a company, in the manipulation of the money market, in the arts of syndication and of reconstruction, many opportunities are afforded for extracting either from the share capital paid in, for gambling operations on the Stock Exchange, or from the earnings of companies, excessive payments for financial services. It is primarily the business of the financier to persuade as many people as possible to lend and borrow money. He lives by thus working the credit system. Now, this system, highly elaborated in modern society, is socially, as well as individually, useful: it is even indispensable. But it is evidently open to abuses. For it may profit a financier to promote rotten than to promote sound joint-stock enterprises, to sell bad than to sell good securities; it is often to his interest artificially to make markets for otherwise unsaleable shares, and, by express contrivance, to stimulate or depress stocks. Where finance is very highly organised, it may be profitable by railway or shipping combines, or by financial operations, to control whole areas of industry, imposing on producers or consumers monopoly rates or prices.

The ordinary investor is a simple-minded person, knowing little of the business in which he puts his money, still less of the art of finance: the ordinary speculative gambler in stocks and shares, who everywhere abounds, is quite as ignorant. The professional financier is able, by his superior skill, knowledge, and power of combination, to absorb a large proportion of the money of the investing and speculating classes, which passes through his hands. The proportion varies with the degree of education in the investing public, and with the legal rules of the financial game. When financiers wield great political power, as in the United States, these legal rules are either lax or practically negligible. Even in England, where company laws are more rigorous, financiers enjoy very profitable privileges. But, though great waste attends this working of the credit system in private enterprise, its operation in public finance is fraught with graver injuries.

Excessive and reckless borrowing is the besetting sin of modern States. Such, at any rate, is the judgment of Mr. A. J. Wilson, one of our most experienced students of practical finance, elaborated in his new volume, entitled "An Empire in Pawn" (Fisher Unwin). "Agents provocateurs," in the shape of banking and financial syndicates, are always at hand to stimulate public bodies and politicians to new acts of borrowing. To these able manipulators, who are sometimes the agents of a genuine industrial advance, a State or a municipality means primarily a borrowing instrument upon which it is their profitable business to play. The modern State and the modern city develops many new needs and functions which involve large capital expenditure: the modern politician who seeks to express his personality in some showy public service is easily led into extravagance: the permanent official services are always pulling at the public purse for extensions and improvements. In every modern State war scares and the military spirit are fostered by the interested pressure of those who handle the millions spent on armaments. But behind all these forces of public extravagance, directing them, according to Mr. Wilson, stands the financier. The Tempter takes every Statesman to an exceeding high place, shows him an illimitable field of personal ambition, disguised as public service, which is his on condition that he enters a career of public loans. With your enterprising Mayor and Council the same game is played. Appeals are made to civic pride, zeal for sanitation, education, recreation; every motive for improvement, heedless of past or of present resources, is used to drive cities into increased indebtedness.

Mr. Wilson presents the process in detail by an investigation of the recent finance of India and our self-governing Colonies, showing by concrete illustration how the demoralising habit grows by a sort of logical necessity when once it has got strong root. Given credit to start with (and wherever there is taxing power there is credit), it is so much easier to borrow than to pay out of current income. When times are good, a spirit of confidence drives States into new developments which they can easily finance by loans, for money is cheap; when times are bad, they are obliged to borrow more, partly to conceal their depressed state, partly to pay interest. Thus they are brought into an entanglement of unsound finance, extrication from which becomes more difficult. They are driven to conceal their condition; partly by such jugglery of public accounts as prevails in Russia, and to a smaller extent in this country; partly by an excessive exhibition of "productive assets," which is necessary both to meet adverse criticism and to support credit.

Borrowing thus passes into a chronic disease. How India is affected by this incessant growth of debt in one shape or another, and, therefore, of public obligations, is partly seen in the amounts she has to remit home every year—amounts which have now grown so heavy as to render borrowing an absolute necessity of the State. But though India suffers worst, because of the poverty of her people and the extravagance of her Government, such borrowing is no mere malady of autocracy. The democracies of Australia and New Zealand plunge with no less facility into this down grade finance, loading their necks with debts that grow far faster than their population or their productive wealth. But the classical example of unscrupulous finance is, of course, Rhodesia, where a little group of financial adventurers, bribed another little group of titled guineapigs to procure by social and political wire-pulling the stamp of an Imperial Charter, enabling them to utilise the British flag in order to draw vast sums of money, not, indeed, from Rhodesia itself, for that is little other than an empty shell, but out of the crowd of simple investors at home. This exploit forms a particularly instructive chapter in the history of quasi-public finance.

Abuses of private finance may be remedied by restrictive legislation honestly administered. But against the extravagances of States legal securities seem inadequate, for no State will limit its own liberty. Mr. Wilson paints a dark picture. If class government and democracy alike succumb to the tempter; if each act of borrowing brings another in its train, debt piled on debt, like Pelion on Ossa, the world seems heading for a great financial catastrophe, a general collapse of false public credit, which, after a violent convulsion, will sweep away illusory wealth and put every nation on the firm basis of its real assets. Such a "lesson," however, would be terrible in its teaching, and even Mr. Wilson admits that by repenting now, while there is time, we may escape the storm. A temperance vow must be taken by Governments; all future borrowing must be confined to works of vital emergency and immediate productivity, borrowing for speculative development and competitive armaments being rigorously eschewed. Some bad debts should be written off, other inflated assets should be written down. The mere suspension of further unproductive borrowing would give time for slowly ripening, but genuinely productive, assets to mature. So by methods familiar to those experienced in the nursing of a weakly, over-capitalised business, statesmen may recover modern States from this disease of financial profligacy.

THE HUMOR OF THE UNDERMAN.

There is a humor of the Uebermensch, or Superman, which is direct, axiomatic, and self-assertive; it springs from knowledge and intuition, as in Shakespeare and Nietzsche, often reasoned, full of a certain moral significance, ironical, sarcastic, and even cynical. It stands for the consciousness of intellectual power; it is personal. But the humor of Uncle Remus is impersonal, for it represents the underworld of the Underman, without a conscious philosophy and without applied art. In the hands of the great poets and writers humor is allied to criticism. In the stories of Uncle Remus humor is untrammelled by learning and unfettered by ordinary rules of ethics. The unfathomable charm lies in simplicity and naturalness, in the relation established between the mind of the ignorant Underman and the primitive things of the natural world.

There are moods which become identical with Nature. A tree in leaf, a flower in bloom, is nature in dreamland; but the poet is one who gives a form to a mood, and interprets the dreams. In the stories of the negro, as told in Uncle Remus, instinct takes the place of reason. In his hands instinct grapples with mystery and artlessness fills the place of art. It is here that the Underman rises to the plane of the Overman. The higher we go in the realm of words the simpler the words and expressions become. In the supremest moments in all poetry and prose art is drowned in instinct. Wonder and emotion rise to the surface with the impulsion of a cork to the top of a troubled sea. Simplicity of mind becomes identified with the mysteries of natural things, and the imminence of the instinctive mood renders ingenuity impossible and reason superfluous. At such moments the soul has neither the time nor the inclination to reason about conventions of art; the instinct is swift and the words brief. Simple emotion makes Hamlet say: "Oh, that this too, too solid flesh would melt." There would be no instinctive charm if he made use of the words: "Oh, that this materialistic flesh would dissolve and evaporate." Words of more than three syllables are fatal to direct and simple emotions, but in much of the greatest prose and poetry words of one syllable evoke the most potent charm and the most haunting images. The shortest words are closest to Nature, the longest pertain to philosophy and science. Pedantry makes naïveté impossible, and philosophy makes reason a bore. The primitive words were created in obedience to a natural law in the world of sound. The first words were invented to imitate noises and musical tones; with them came expressions of want, fear, instinctive desires and feelings. The long words came with the first metaphysicians, and modern science added to the list by bringing into poetry a vocabulary of hard, unsympathetic, and often meaningless expressions. There is such a thing as poetic science, but no such thing as scientific poetry. Materialism, scepticism, philosophic doubt, scientific vaporings, have done their utmost to make the true poetic mood impossible.

Most of the vital words belong to the primitive world of sentiment and sensation, and this is why dialect is always more intimate and insinuating than classical prose. "Put your ear to the earth," says Lamennais, "and you will feel the throbbing of the world"; and this is what the Underman has done in the stories of Uncle Remus. The people of Nature's world hear the right sound, and sense the right mood; the interpretation is simple, direct, naïve, agreeing with the habits, the humor, and the cunning of the animals of the same world; for the negro, left to himself, without any schooling, is, or was, the most entertaining of humorists, because the most natural and the most unconscious. He lives with his finger on the pulse of Nature. With learning, humor becomes strained or cynical. Uncle Remus is as wily as Brer Fox and as simple as Brer Rabbit. His humors, fears, interpretations, and superstitions contain all the sensuous wisdom of the underworld, as when he says: "Come down to dat, Brer Ab, dere ain't nothin' dat ain't cu'us." He sounds the note of universal philosophy, the note that made Aristotle a profound observer of the seeming little things in order to understand some of the apparent great ones. At the head as well as at the foot of human nature the impulse of curiosity is the dominant factor. Indeed, the saying, "There is nothing that is not curious," is the beginning of Aristotelian science and the end of Shakespearean philosophy. It is the all in all; here the Overlord descends to the level of the Underman, and the philosophical seer is no nearer Nature than Uncle Remus in all his ignorance and seeming blindness. Uncle Remus and his kin are close observers of natural things, the things our superficial scientists overlook as insignificant or without meaning; for science, in our day, has, in a large measure, skipped the alphabet of life to arrive at a vocabulary of negatives. Men fail in business, in science, in art, in religion, as soon as they skip the small things to grasp the bulky. Greatness does not consist in bulk. It was the inverted idea of greatness that made Napoleon Bonaparte, the first Uebermensch of modern politics, lose his crown, Bismarck his prestige, and Nietzsche his reason.

What these Overlords needed was a little of Brer Rabbit's wisdom—namely, "to lie low an' say nuffin"—that is, after they had attained the attainable. Ambition at the intellectual top is far more dangerous than superstition at the illiterate bottom. There is plenty of superstition in Uncle Remus, but it is delightful and harmless, and certainly there is nothing delightful in the agonies of Napoleon, the humiliation of Bismarck, and the disease of Nietzsche. In the realm of mystery the Underman is the peer of Hamlet in the grave scene, and in the same predicament as Macbeth in the presence of the witches. Uncle Remus says he "despises fer ter heah dogs a-howlin' an' squinch owls havin' de ague, out in de woods," and that these things make his "bones cold and his flesh creep." Even the redoubtable Lady Macbeth halts on the threshold and listens to the owl's scream. At such times the phantasmagoria of the night crowd into one brief moment, stars and planets are forgotten, celestial symbols give place to portents of the earth, the bosom of the underworld begins to heave, Nature assumes a voice, every sound becomes prophetic, in the moonlight of the imagination the curtains of mystery sway and shift, a realm of the mind is disclosed beyond the limits of category, a world without the semblance of a name and without the quality of number. FRANCIS GRIERSON.

WHAT HE WAS LIKE.

OLD acquaintance is the heart of friendship. We think of some friendships that began before memory began. Other friends we remember making—how and where we met them first, and the impression they made on us. Sometimes the contrast between first impression and the knowledge of years is ludicrous. The mind was on the alert when we met the stranger; it was quick and eager to master his outlook and his ways of thought, to see what he was, and to get his right size; we wanted to know where we were, in short. So it is always with new faces. But, as time goes on, we notice less and less; as we see more of the man, we study him less, it would seem. Yet it is this careless intercourse that counts. The mind is off guard, and, so far as it is conscious of it, it is doing nothing. In reality, it is receiving a host of unnoticed impressions, which in the long run may have extraordinary influence.

Cannot many a man point to some long and pleasant, easy-going friendship, a continuous source of interest and ease of mind, which went on without much reflection, till one day he woke up and found himself another man—re-made by another's personality, in the ordinary round of life, in work and play and talk, in talk of books and business, of neighbors and old memories? Slowly one has reached the other's point of view; his life has been learned piece-meal as he tells of its crises, and how he felt at this great moment and that; how he was disappointed at first, but soon came to another mind; how after that he found a great joy, and lived on it for years; and then how it was taken away, but nothing could keep him from living on it still. Stage by stage, by unconscious and freely given sympathy, one has lived the other man's life; one has seen things and felt them as he saw and felt them; one has slipped unawares into his language, and by degrees into his thoughts. Then comes a great separation, perhaps—the friend dies, or duty sends us different ways; the ocean lies between us; one comes back to the old home, and there, alone among one's original friends, among familiar scenes, one finds oneself the strange figure; for the real intimate is across the sea, or beyond the grave. And then with surprise one realises how close had been the identification with the friend now far away.

The task comes of telling others what has happened to us, and we begin to make trials at biography.

> "Here's my case; of old I used to love him."

But what was he? What was he not? What are we to say? Most of us break down when it comes to the systematic evolution of a character. If our friends to-day want to know what the great man was of whom they hear so much, they have really to repeat our experience, and gather him up piecemeal. And it is really a wonderful thing how much the mind can absorb in this way, quite unconsciously, how much it can keep, and how well, without effort, it can co-ordinate what it keeps into a general idea.

The next stage is the written biography. But what are we to put into that? Some people have recourse to adjectives, and the result is idle and flavorless. Some confine themselves to the great thoughts and the great labors, till the man is lost in the hero, and not easily distinguishable, perhaps, from an abstract idea. And then a man comes, who is such a fool as not to be able to tell the significant from the insignificant, and he babbles away in volume after volume about odd and irrelevant things—gestures, orange-peel, paving stones, wigs, lodgings, quips, nonsense, all mixed hopelessly together with things of real moment—till we are not quite sure whether the writer is a total fool or only a partial one, but somehow we read on and re-read, and Boswell's Dr. Johnson becomes an intimate of our own.

Now to pass to another region. The greatest change the world has seen was brought about by an intimacy and a biography. "He goeth up into a mountain, and calleth unto him whom he would: and they came unto him. And he ordained twelve, that they should be with him." So runs the oldest account of it in Mark's Gospel. Under the necessity of compression for the sake of working in more material, Matthew and Luke abridge this, and the needless phrase "that they should be with him" is cut away. A quite needless phrase, like many more in Mark, which are also omitted, and yet how essential! The thing is implied by the other writers, but are not the quiet and unobtrusive words worth remembering? Do they not contain the gist of the whole matter? In epitome what else would the history of Christianity be—of Christianity, that is, so far as it is a real thing, a force and a factor, and not a logomachy or a label?

One thing is worth noting at once. The writers of the first three gospels—probably all three, certainly two of them—had little or no first-hand intercourse with Jesus. They are using other men's reminiscences. This makes it more remarkable how little of the adjective there is in their work—no compliment, no eulogy, no great passages of encomium or commendation. "Why callest thou me good?" So it is recorded that Jesus asked a man once; and it looks as if the mood had passed over into his intimates. They did not "call him good"; they had no adjectives for him, any more than a man has adjectives for his father or his wife or his child when they mean most to him. The lips may tighten, and say more so than any adjective could achieve. The men who were with Jesus were too full of him for the facile relief of praise. How had it come about?

These men consorted with him in a life of wandering and often of weariness. One vivid incident survives of a day's travel. Once, after the day's march—and that no ordinary one, for it was full of a marked tension, his face was "set"—he and his friends came to a village where they expected to rest. But the messengers whom they had sent on ahead met them with no pleasant news—they would not be received. No one who has not known what it is to be refused bread when hungry and weary will quite guess what it meant. Now it is such moments that show the man, for then he is off his guard. There was nothing to be done but to tramp on; so on they tramped. There were angry looks and hot words—all futile; old stories came back—if one had Elijah's power now, and could call fire from Heaven —"But he turned and rebuked them, and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." After this, the evangelist says simply: "And they went to another village"—a quiet ending, but full of significance. So they lived. "The Son of Man had not where to lay his head." It is such a life, stripped of all padding, that shows the real man.

But many another day's ending is lost to us. What was the talk, as they sat at the night's meal? Was it always intense? Did he never (in our rather foolish phrase) "unbend"? Was he gay or bright—if men can be so without ceasing to be earnest, which some seem to doubt? As they broke bread among themselves, when there were no crowds, on what did their talk run? Had he what we call "little ways"? "I know you by the waggling of your head," says someone in Shakespeare. "You could never do him so ill-well, unless you were the very man. Here's his dry hand up and down: you are he, you are he!" One thing of this kind survives in the narratives—the fixed gaze and the pause which came when he was going to speak with effect. There are also one or two special words which are quoted as his. There must have been much else as familiar. They must have known him through and through—the inflexions of his voice, his characteristic movements, his step in the darkness, the hang of his clothes, and all such things. Did he speak quickly or slowly? Parables, aphorisms—how dull the set terms sound, when they are labels tied to his words! What proportion have we of all he spoke? And how and when and where did he speak this or that? Was it in a long talk, or suddenly, flashed out with gaze and pause as prelude?

What subjects occupied their leisure? Herods, Roman governors, zealots, Custom House memories, tales of the fisherman's life on the lake, stories of neighbors and of home, what not? What failed to interest him? One cannot picture him as other than deeply read in human experience.

But it is when we reach the heart of the story that imagination fails. The problem is hard. Here are these men, a commonplace, uneducated, and miscellaneous group, dull, as he found and, as he said, at taking in his deepest thoughts, a quite impossible and impracticable regiment for a crusade. And then, a few years later, what do we find? Something has happened to them; they are magnetic with a new power, and draw strong men and wise about them, and foolish men, too, and depraved, it may be, and hopeless—any creature that is human and capable of conceiving that there may be something he does not know. Set down in black and white, what they had to say looked odd and doubtful; some saw at a glance that it was folly. But the spoken word was another thing; the man behind the message gave it a life that went beyond anything that could have been guessed. Elders and scribes and high priests, we read—and it is true of a great many more—"took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus."

The problem is to find what made the transformation, and the two passages with the same phrase give the answer clearly enough. They had "been with him" —and the answer grows stranger the more we realise it. It was not what he said, nor exactly how he said it, nor what he did, but the whole effect of Himself. No one will readily understand this who has not had a great intimacy with someone else, with someone of clear mind and kindly heart, richly gifted with the aptitudes that go to make experience and character.

Criticism is the easiest and sorriest trade a beginner can learn in a twinkling. Disraeli spoke of critics as those who have failed; the more drastic sort have never begun. But criticism that is to count must rest on experience; and if the gospels and the movement connected with them are to be criticised, as of course they must be by every intelligent person who is confronted with them, they, too, must be criticised on the basis of knowledge. But here the knowledge, to be of much use, cannot be got from book or books, but it must be gathered, slowly and half-unconsciously, in the original way from an intimacy. Even a political opponent is beyond criticism till one can understand how a human mind can have reached his conclusions and been content with them—till we have identified ourselves with him. What are we to say of a personality which represents no mere movement of a day, but the gradual and progressive transformation of the world, of the individual and society? Some deeper identification of critic and criticised seems needful in such a case. It was from an intimacy that it began; in an intimacy it has gone on, and goes on; and only in an intimacy can it be judged aright.

THE PUCKERIDGE.

At last this untoward summer has given us a really hot day. The sun has ridden through the heavens triumphantly, sending the birds into the thickets for the midday siesta as they have not been sent before this summer. It has been a day for the insects and the lizards, and this night shall be one through which the adder hunts the field mouse with a zest increased by a ten hours' bask in baking sun. As the first cool shadow descends on the hot leaves of the wood, and the cold lamps of the glow-worm are beginning to peep in the bank under the hazels, the crooning rattle of the night-jar trembles. Trembles where? It is not in the thicket of guelder rose and spindle wood; not in the larch spinney; not in the mowing-field; nor in the shrubbery, the orchard, the warren, or the chestnut avenue. It is everywhere. It is the air that rattles, the night, the universe that resounds like a piano when the bird chooses to spin its song tuned to the echo of everything.

It comes pouring down as if from the larch spinney, but sounding like a late mowing-machine at work several miles away in that direction. It comes down on to another gear and reels on and on till surely the bird's lungs must collapse for want of breath. Then it breaks suddenly as the singer's mate dashes by and the singer flies after her on muffled wing. We shall be nearer them in the wood of guelder roses, where the lamps of the glow-worms are twinkling. It is a haunted wood. Now the reeling is on the right, now, without any interval for changing, on the left; now just beneath us among the hazels, now far away across the stream; now clicking like a new winch, now purring like a very long-winded cat. Then surely someone is sitting in a quiet bush to startle us by clapping together his hollowed hands, while a confederate highwayman acknowledges the signal with a cry of "Co-ic, co-ic" from another bush. It is just the fairies of the wood making the most of a very balmy night following the first hot day of the year. We lean very quietly against a gate between the wood and the mowing-field, where a little light smudges the dark alleyway, and wait for the fairies to declare themselves a little less ambiguously.

"Co-ic, co-ic," the mellow cry breaks out suddenly close under our feet. There is something sitting in the light-smudged alleyway and croaking thus mellowly. A toad for certain. It does not stand up on its legs, but sprawls on its stomach. It shuffles a little further into the light, and again cries "Co-ic, co-ic." But we can now see that though it has no legs it is bird-shaped.

We can even make out the big, soft, lunar markings resembling the stains and lines on dead wood, that belong to the night-jar; we even think we can see a little of the bristles that fringe its mouth and enable it to catch its flying food so easily. Then, having croaked once or twice more, it lifts itself from the ground in some miraculous way—for it takes no run or spring as other birds have to do—skims over the gate on which we lean, and away through the hay field. At the same moment its mate flies from the thicket and pursues the croaking one, striking his wings together over his back, and producing that hollow-handed clapping that had made us think of something human lurking under the bushes.

Everything that the puckeridge does gives it an air of distinction among birds. Just before this evening purring begins, we usually see a bird with lobed wings, like those of the lammergeier, wheeling high in the air. There is no other English bird like that; it is the puckeridge, perhaps on its way from one of its day haunts to the scene of its night gambols, perhaps sweeping the heavens for the same minute insect-life that sustains the swallow. Everyone who writes of the night-jar has something about its "hawking for moths in the bracken," or "wheeling around trees, capturing ghost moths." It is a thing we have never seen, though we have seen night-jars and bats hunting the same district, and have over and over again seen the bats thus enjoying the pleasures of the chase. We have no doubt that many have written of this thing who have not seen it. It is so easily imagined that a bird of this size should require larger food than midges, yet the fact remains that the night-jar's wide mouth, with the fringe of stiff bristles round it, is exquisitely designed for sweeping in tiny beetles, gnats, and the other trifles that swallows feed on by similar means.

"It beats to and fro," says Mr. Charles Dixon, "over the open heaths and fern-brakes, under the trees and round about feeding cattle, in quest of the moths, beetles, and other night-flying insects upon which it subsists." It was its close attention to cattle that earned it the name of "goat-sucker," our forefathers thinking that it must suck the goats, if not the cows. The cow is a favorite ally of the yellow wagtail, which subsists on the small insects that frequent the neighborhood of cattle or are stirred up by them from their rest in the long grass. The swarm of small life will thicken round the great warm bodies by night as well as by day, and the night-swallow will sweep by again and again.

When does the puckeridge sleep? At early dusk it becomes active, chasing its life-long, but ever-wooed, mate about in the silent flight of the owls, humorously broken with wild clappings. Then it settles down to a night of reeling of such continuous energy that we cannot see how it leaves time to catch its food. And by day, when we walk in the woods, as likely as not we come upon the night-jars as ready as ever to fly off when we come too near to their resting-place. It is then that the one vanity of their plumage becomes fully conspicuous. The tail is tipped with white at the outside corners, and there are white notches on the wings which mark their rise and fall, as though this were the bird of all others that had set itself the task of showing man just how flight is managed. And by day it shows us how that clapping is accomplished, for we can see the wing-tips meet overhead at the time when the sound comes—though not with the eerie resonance that it acquires in the silent night.

What it does not show us is how the bird throat can produce the prolonged reeling, jarring, churring, or purring that is its speciality. Here comes in that further mystification, the "comb" with which the nightjar's foot is furnished. Not knowing what other purpose the comb could serve, it was the delight of naturalists not many years ago to fancy that the night-jar blew its music through a comb (the usual tissue paper not being specified). But the night-jar can with care be seen at song clearly enough for us to be sure that it does not sing with its foot in its mouth. The comb, no doubt, serves the same purpose as the similarly armed foot of the bee—to clean the night-jar's whiskers—and its music is purely vocal. After all, we have one more inhabitant of England's summer woods with a song of the same kind—the turtle-dove. The fern-owl sings the turtle-dove's song, not openly as the dove does, but as though through the clenched teeth and, to follow the same simile, it thereby holds its breath better and sings perhaps ten times as long without appearing to take breath. It churrs on a high note till we think it has reached the utmost limit of endurance, then without a pause it gives us equal measure on a low note. It seems, indeed, that it would never stop, if it were not that its volatile mate swoops by and interrupts with an invitation to a game of touch. Our woods would seem empty indeed on summer evenings, if they should lack the droning, playful puckeridge.

WHITHER?

Some day, perhaps, some philosopher who deems mankind worthy of study will enquire into the origin of the migratory instinct that seizes us during the month of August. If the writer may speak, the desire for fresh fields is potentially far stronger in spring, but in modern conditions it does not become operative till August. If we were completely weatherwise, the season of general holiday would be a movable one, and if the average of recent seasons prevails for many years more, we must seriously consider the advisability of making September instead of August the month of recuperation and preparation for winter. This year, however, August is August with a vengeance. After dreary months of rain the sun is baking us helter-skelter out of the towns and pouring us as through in a molten stream over the face of the country in search of coolness.

That question of "Whither?" however, is one to be answered not at all lightly. "To the sea," says one paterfamilias, taking up last year's spade and heading his flock, whose perspective tails off to the fat baby just out of arms. But to which of the three seas, not to mention the many channels, arms, estuaries, and coasts, each of which is certain to have its quota of faithful visitors? The south does not beckon as exclusively as it did in spring, when the sun was more there than anywhere else. It even repels the more strenuous, who must have bracing air, though it attracts more than ever those who think—and perhaps rightly—that the dolce far niente is just what they themselves require. The west is mainly the rainy side, and rain is the bête noire this year. Nevertheless, there are tens of thousands of us who will seek again in the west the imperishable delights of former years. The east has at least its equal number of votaries. There is sea enough, and, if we should draw lines parallel to the seaboard inland at distances of, say, five miles, we should find that there was land equally rich in delights, twenty times as extensive as the coast. There is only one word that connotes the whither of the annual holiday flight—away. Away from the scenes with which we are too familiar to new scenes, new air, and new occupation.

In old times, the footpad in search of adventure (when honest men as well as rogues were footpads) used to set his stick at the first cross-roads, and let it fall which way it would, following the omen by walking in that direction. Such a plan is out of date. The nearest contemporary approach to it is to shut the eyes and bring down a finger on the map, then seek a railway guide and get there. Wherever it is, we shall find natural beauty there, change of people and change of interest, and wherever it is we are very likely indeed to find other holiday-makers there.

We have the whole of the United Kingdom fairly at our disposal, for it is scarcely worth while to say anything just now of places beyond the borders of our own beautiful and only partially explored land. A study of the railway literature reveals the astonishing fact that we can get almost anywhere for an average hundred mile fare or thereabouts. That is not a precise fact at present, but it is one that tends to become more and more true. The wand of the railway director is rapidly bringing England, Scotland, and Ireland into the shape of a circle, with their holiday places equi-distant from the workshop. Monstrous engines thunder over the long distances in somewhat the same time as is consumed by the trains, less agitated by competition, that serve the shorter spaces. It is a development that makes more difficult than ever the choice of our holiday place.

Westward we have many pleasant recollections. The Thames is for most of us week-end ground, but it holds great possibilities for an extended water-gypsying with a light camp that we can move up or down in a rowing-boat, and perhaps explore the winding, ever-surprising mirror right up to Cricklade. Then there comes up to the eye of memory the pleasant places of those Cotswold Hills, with limpid trout streams burbling over rock or sucking caves for two-pounders under flower-roofed banks. There is the quiet grey farmhouse in a land flowing with milk and honey, deep green woods to wander in, and all that flower and other wild life to enjoy, that is so rich on the limestone. But the train drags us on through the mountains and valleys of South Wales with wilder, yet more picturesque, delights beckoning to us from many a glen; or we dash through the tumbled green velvet of Westbury and all the country of King Arthur, through the quaintly tumbled hill land below Bristol or the small mountains that surround Bath. Somerset, which is for scenery a part of Devonshire, clutches at us and takes many a holiday-maker that has been charmed in former years or enthused by the description of those who have found heaven there. Then the seaside glories of Weymouth, red Dawlish, Torquay, and that crescendo of preciosity that runs through Fowey and Hooe and Mevagissy, the very names of which make even the stranger quake with anticipation. Because we must bring up somewhere short of the Atlantic, perhaps we stop on the north coast of Cornwall, where the great green rollers rush in and scoop caves for us in the basalt cliffs, and ask how we can have been away from them so long.

Meanwhile, those who have resisted South Wales have sped through emerald miles of Ireland, and have come to Killarney and all the pleasant land of Kerry. For Killarney is but one spot upon one flank of the Macgillicuddies, and miles and miles of the Kenmare estuary, of the shore round Dingle Bay, and right round the Atlantic coast to the Giant's Causeway and many inland miles beside, simply teem with a magnificence of beauty and inspiration.

Let us go northward as far as we can for the clamoring memories to right and left. How the Broads of Norfolk pull, especially this year, when every shallow has been filled again and again with sweet water from the sluices of heaven, to lie now and reflect the ardor of heaven in a languorous ecstasy that only belongs to Broadland; what a tug there is when we find ourselves near Sheringham, with its almost indefinable charm, its northern air, though it is so palpably a part of low-lying East Anglia; or perhaps we are taken through Buxton and tumbling Dove Dale, just as distracting as the Dales of Wharfe and Ure and the infinite possibilities of Yorkshire, and having at its back the call of all North Wales, for which Dolgelly stands just for a jewelled symbol. Fortunately, we have not to run the direct gauntlet of the Lakes, or we should never come to Scotland at all. The moods of Derwent Water and Ullesmere are endless and endlessly fascinating, and the holidays that have been spent there are so many yards added to the spiritual stature. But the English Lakes are behind us, and we speed through the rock-girt tarns and land-captured fiords of Scotland. A bare-footed milk-girl standing at a level crossing is just the nymph of one glen, or the lady of one lake, of thousands of lakes and glens, each worthy dwelling places of dryads and naiads. Where to stop in such a panorama of fairyland? Let it be at such a place as Oban, with its teeming, transparent sea and flower-strewn islets, or shall we go on to Inverness, which Ruskin said was "a jewel clasping the folds of the mountains to the blue zone of the sea."

It is not of the greatest places that we have the most clinging memories. We like to discover the most beautiful place for ourselves, and who can discover Brighton, or even Tenby? We find our heaven, and vow that we will come again and again, but when the next year comes we pursue some new love, discover some new heaven, to become next year another unrenewed memory. On the other hand, there are some who keep their one holiday place for years, and the joy of coming back to the old views and the old welcoming faces is by no means the least of all joys. Life is not long enough to make us acquainted with a tithe of the beauties of our small islands, nor is it long enough to exhaust the pleasures of any one of them.

FABLES OF KRUILOV.*

The Lonely Man and the Bear.

The friendly aid of a kindly fool on occasion can hurt far more than the treachery of the keenest foe. A certain lonely man had neither wife nor child, kith nor kin. Solitude, as we all know, is not everyone's business. For although you may live at your ease in the forest depths and wander at your will through the coolest glades over green stretches of soft grass with the little hillocks and the running streams all for your own—still, all these can be sad and lonesome and dreary, if you've never a soul near to murmur a word to. You may possess a sorrow in silence, but a joy you need to share. So our lonely man away in the forest roamed far in search of acquaintanceship. The only acquaintances to be met with in forests are wolves and bears, and a few of the lesser animal folk; and for that reason strange friendships can be clinched there, such as would never come to a meeting in a town; and, as it happened, the man did fall in with a huge bear. The two stopped and faced each other. Then the man slowly and courteously doffed his hat, and slowly and courteously the bear held out an amiable paw. Their acquaintance began then and there. It ripened surely into friendship, till at last these two loved each other so dearly that they could scarce be parted for so long as an hour. The man was hardly of a talkative nature, and bears, as we know, come of a silent race. Nevertheless, these two, man and beast, were such right kindred spirits, that they communed with each other as none better, and the lonely man rejoiced greatly, thanking heaven for this first treasure of a friend. One day the two set out together on a walking tour by hill and dale. A man, if he covers the ground quicker than a bear, all the same, is never so strong. The mid-day sun of summer burnt hot and sharp; and presently the bear noticed his friend lagging slower and slower. "Lie down, little brother," he said, "lie down and rest—have a bit of a sleep. Trust me to guard and watch you as long as ever you will."

The weary man was prevailed upon. He stretched himself at full length. He yawned awhile. Then in an instant he slept fast. Friend Mishka watched faithfully. Nor had he time to sit lazy; on the man's nose there settled a fly. Mishka waved it gently away. But now there's another fly right on the man's nose. Mishka flicks it off softly. But there are two more on his cheeks. . . . . This went on for an hour. The bear reflected. Flicking off these flies was clearly no good at all. This was a matter for cure, not prevention. And look, the wretched flies were buzzing in a swarm over the man's forehead. They must be killed right off. Mishka uttered no sound. He held his breath. He bent swiftly forward. He stooped. He picked up a heavy stone, and his aim, as he came down clean and straight with the stone grasped in both paws, was so deadly true, that he cut the skull of his friend in two. You may guess that the lonely man's rest was a long one.

Trishka's Coat.

Trishka's coat was all out at elbows. But that certainly could not bother him long. To patch up the rents, he just slashed off a bit from each sleeve. His elbows were mended, but now our Trishka's arms were half bare. Whenever the women-folk and the children saw him coming along the village street, they set to giggling and sniggering.

"I'm not such a fool as they think," muttered Trishka. "When I want to, I can help myself out of a muddle better than any of them, maybe"; and with that he nipped off the tails of his coat and lengthened each of his sleeves. His coat did not reach to his waist, but his sleeves hung down to his calves. There are a good many of us, I fancy, who go snip, slap, dash, and crash through life. I suppose we are wearing Trishka's coat.

The Peasant and the Elephant.

A peasant went to the Natural History Museum. He wandered at his will, and stayed there three hours or more.

"Well, Ivan," asked his friend Misha, "what did you see?"

"See! Why, I saw everything they've got, of course. Really, it's a marvel, that place. Just think, Misha, little brother, of the birds and the butterflies and the beetles, and wee, wee-est, wee-est little insects. Why, some of them actually arn't as big as a pin's head."

"Yes, yes, little uncle, but did you see the elephant? That must be a grand sight. I suppose it's like looking at a mountain, isn't it?"

"Elephant, bratetz (little brother), elephant? Are you sure they've got one?"

"Yes, yes, dear little dove, I'm quite sure."

"Well, bratetz, you mustn't be too hard on me—now, indeed you mustn't; but, to tell you God's honest truth, I must have managed somehow to miss the elephant."

The Squirrel.

A brisk, jolly little squirrel became servant to a lordly, pompous lion. To serve a lion, as everyone knows, is not a common affair. The little squirrel was overjoyed at its good fortune. In payment, the lion promised it a whole waggon full of nuts.

Promised, yes, but when? Meanwhile, time passes and drags along slowly. The poor little squirrel often goes hungry. There are tears dimming its eyes. It sees all its former comrades hopping and skipping about the woods, high up and free in the trees. Sometimes it thinks it must run away and escape. Then it gets frightened. It has got so into the habit of serving the lion that it can do nothing else. At last the squirrel began to grow old and feeble. The lion settled that he must seek a younger servant. He was true to his promise, though, and pensioned off the squirrel with a generous load of beautiful nuts, the finest to be had. Yes. But, as ill-luck would have it, the squirrel had long ago lost all its teeth.

The Mirror and the Monkey.

A monkey suddenly caught sight of its own reflection in a mirror.

"Just do come and look here, Gossip Mishka," he called to his friend the Bear. "Just do look at this awful, grimacing, gibbering beast, now. Oh, dear! I'd strangle myself if I were half as ugly and ridiculous. You and I could both count up a few like him amongst our friends, though, couldn't we?"

"Why bother to count up our friends?" asked Mishka. "Wouldn't it be as well to look at yourself a bit first?"

But somehow the monkey never found time to take the bear's advice.

The Favored Elephant.

It so happened that the elephant won the special favor of the Tsar of the forest, the lion. This greatly puzzled the other animals. "He's certainly no beauty," they declared, "and no one could possibly call him amusing. His manners are appalling and his habits quite undiscussable."

"Yes," put in the fox; "if he'd got my nice bushy tail, now, I could have understood the lion's fancy. But his tail! What a miserable, wretched, little, wiry apology!"

"Or," said the bear, "if he had claws! But, as we all know, the poor thing hasn't any."

"Isn't it, perhaps, his tusks that have captivated the lion?" suddenly suggested the ox. "His Majesty must have mistaken them for horns."

"What, you don't know?" asked the donkey. "Well, you are a set of duffers. Why, I saw at once why the lion loves the elephant. It's because of the elephant's long ears, of course."

Present-Day Problems.

THE CASE OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVES.

Next week the House of Commons will be called upon to sanction disqualifications of the natives of Cape Colony, based solely on race or color. These are embodied in the Draft South Africa Bill (Sections 25 (d), 44 (c), and 35 (i) and (ii)). The proposals have occasioned deep and wide-spread alarm and anxiety among the natives from one end to the other of South Africa. Civilised and uncivilised, black and colored (half-castes); partisans of opposing parties in politics; men, women, and children—in a word, elements that have never worked together—have been united in a manner they have never been before by a common grievance: the attack on their color, qua color. For be the color line drawn where it may in the new Constitution—at the Union Parliament or at future disfranchisement—the fact alone that an advantage is being taken of the natives on the ground of color is enough to arouse the deepest feeling in every member of the injured race. In order to enter an earnest protest against the offensive clauses, the people have readily subscribed to a fund to send a large deputation to the Imperial Government and Parliament, representative of all the various tribes and people concerned. In short, the native communities of South Africa have never been moved by any political act as they have been on this occasion. And the great fear and concern of those who occupy leading positions among them is that the poison that is being injected into the South African native body politic will develop and cause much mischief in the land. To those who, like the members of the native deputation, fervently desired to see the peaceful and gradual civilisation of their people carried on with the co-operation of white and black, each section in its sphere, to make South Africa happy, prosperous, and great, the check administered by these proposals is lamentable in the extreme, and is deeply deplored as giving a false start to the Union.

But apart from the deprivation of Cape natives of rights on the ground of color, these people feel that the clauses complained of involve a flagrant breach of faith. Many of those represented by the native delegation came voluntarily under British rule, and not by conquest. They were assured by governors, governors' agents, officials, and missionaries of the absolute justice, freedom, and liberty, without discrimination of color, they would enjoy under the British Government. Treaties exist which promised them just and even-handed treatment if they did not rebel. These engagements have been observed by them in letter and spirit. British assurances of good government were capped by a despatch of Lord Aberdeen's Liberal Government, covering the Ordinance constituting the Cape Parliament, when the Secretary of

> "Her Majesty's Government have come to this conclusion from a conviction that in conferring upon the Colony the boon of a representative Constitution, it is exceedingly undesirable that the franchise should be so restricted as to leave those of the colored classes who in point of intelligence are qualified for the exercise of political power practically unrepresented, and that any particular portion of the community should be deprived of its share of the management of its local affairs by restrictions which, so far as the imperfect statistics in our possession authorise the forming of a judgment, it would, it is to be feared, establish too great a political preponderance in one class of the population."
> "It is the earnest desire of her Majesty's Government that all her subjects at the Cape, without distinction of class or color, should be united by one bond of loyalty and a common interest, and we believe that the exercise of political rights enjoyed by all alike will prove one of the best methods of attaining this object."

The natives have hugged the foregoing, believing the undertaking as inviolable as the laws of the Medes and Persians which cannot be broken. It is unnecessary here to recapitulate the good results of the policy of trusting the natives, of which the foundations were then laid at the Cape. Suffice it to say that ex-President Steyn acknowledged them in a speech to his people at Winburg, O.R.C., last February, when he said, "There was the Cape, where the colored people had for fifty years enjoyed the franchise and, according to the testimony of Africanders as well as Englishmen, had never abused that right." And it may be added that the friendly relations between white and black in Cape Colony had so improved that as late as 1898 Mr. van der Walt, M.L.A. for Colesberg (of the type usually known as a back veldt Boer), stated in the course of a debate in the Assembly that if the present writer were elected to Parliament by any constituency he should make him a place by his side. And again in 1903 the writer declined a safe seat offered by the Africander Bond of Fort Beaufort; and let it here be stated that in no constituency in the Cape is the native vote alone sufficient to return a member, even were it not divided on party lines. So much for the charge that natives have not used the right to elect a member of their own color. But what cruel irony of fate that the abrogation of rights granted by a Liberal Government to natives, in her Majesty's name, should now be torn up by a Liberal Government in the name of his Majesty, assisted by a powerful Liberal Parliament!

Yet a further ground for the apprehension of the natives from the enactment of the non-European descent phrase lies in the fact that the Imperial Parliament is being asked to establish a bad precedent in the differential treatment of the natives in South Africa, a precedent that will affect the future legislation of the Union Parliament, as having its high sanction and authority from the Imperial Parliament. For instance, there has been for some time past before the Cape Parliament a Bill, promoted by law practitioners, which sought to enact that only those of "European descent" should plead before magistrates and instruct counsel in cases coming before the Superior Courts. Heretofore the promoters have not had the courage to push it through for fear of the veto of the Imperial Government. It is very easy to see that if the Imperial Parliament is prevailed upon to establish the precedent of discriminating against natives, native practitioners at law will be barred; so will doctors and those of other professions desirous of making their livelihood be excluded by the "European descent" qualification, as the phrase is easily capable of being applied to varied and various callings. Is it fair, is it right for the people of England, through their Parliament, in devolving their responsibilities thus to bind the natives hand and foot and hurl them into the furnace of archaic prejudices and all uncharitableness? We do beseech and implore the Imperial Parliament to pause long before giving the great force of its sanction to these ill-omened, clauses that will have such far-reaching and disastrous effects on the fortunes and future prospects of the native races of South Africa.

In urging the plea for amendment one is always met with the statement that if right were done in this matter Union would be wrecked. How can this happen, in view of the solemn declarations of South African politicians that the Union Bill should not tamper with the existing rights of the natives, and with which natives have no reason to complain? All the natives ask for is that they should enter the Union with their rights unimpaired. Can anything be fairer? All the Cape delegates to the Convention concede this. General Botha, in a speech at Pretoria last February, frankly stated that they were for maintaining the status quo in the Cape and elsewhere, and expected the Imperial Government and Parliament would not be satisfied with anything short of this. So high an opinion had the gallant gentleman of the justice of the Imperial Government and Parliament that he said: "The native franchise had been forced on the Cape [by the Imperial Government]. He knew it was impossible for Britain to take back what it had given. The Cape Parliament would not have agreed to it, and neither would the British Government, and who was prepared to enter into a conflict with the latter on the subject?" It thus seems that General Botha had a better opinion of the Imperial Government and Parliament than it would appear they have of themselves. Ex-President Steyn was equally explicit on the point of maintaining the existing rights at the Cape. For at Winburg, O.R.C., he said: "The Convention had resolved to let the existing laws remain as they were, so that the colored people would retain the franchise at the Cape, but would not be allowed to vote elsewhere nor exercise any influence on the politics of South Africa beyond their vote at the Cape. That was the way out of the difficulty proposed by the Convention, in drawing up which they also had to consider the views of the British Government. The Act had to pass through the British Parliament as well as through the local ones, and in these there were men who made it their special duty to guard the interests of the natives."

Sir George Farrar, the leader of the Opposition in the Transvaal, followed on the same lines. "Every one," said Sir George, "would agree with him that rights once given under any constitution, whether to whites or blacks, could not be taken away unless something was given in their place. The Cape Franchise was given by his Majesty's Government, and if they expect his Majesty's Government to accept the Constitution they could not ask it—nor could any one in the Cape—to take away rights which had been once bestowed."

Such, then, being the views of South African statesmen, how can it be seriously maintained that a correction of the excesses of an over-zealous draftsman by Parliament, to make the Bill tally with South African opinion, white and colored, would jeopardise so important an affair as the Union which all desire? It simply becomes a matter for the legal advisers of the Crown to say whether or not the clauses in the Bill maintain the existing rights of the Cape natives, and whether the schedule with its clumsy bureaucratic provisions does not menace in a grave degree the peace and happiness of Basutoland and the Protectorates. To say, then, in the face of such facts that Union would be wrecked by the Imperial Parliament in trying to make the Bill correspond with the expressed wishes and desires of South African statesmen and people is simply to bluff the Imperial Government and Parliament out of the path of duty, which is the path of safety, in this as in all other matters. Slight amendments such as those proposed by Lord Courtney of Penrith in the Lords, which are not against the quoted declarations of General Botha and ex-President Steyn, and are acceptable to natives, would not only allay great anxiety, but would be a message of peace and goodwill to the natives from the British nation on the inauguration of a momentous undertaking such as the Union, which should spell peace and co-operation among all the various peoples of South Africa, white and black.

Delegate of the Cape Natives.

THE TROUBLES IN SPAIN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I thank you for your comments in response to my letter. It was, unfortunately, necessary that some voice in authority should deny the current story of the responsibility of the English Government for the Spanish campaign in the Riff. Mr. David Hannay is right when he says that my countrymen are "given up to strong delusions and to believe in lies." I am also obliged to Mr. Hannay for his letter. Both documents will prove to be valuable weapons in the hands of the enemies of this miserable war. Perhaps your readers will be glad to know that we have already obtained the suspension of the law which permitted rich and middle-class recruits to redeem themselves from military service by paying £50 to the Treasury. We hope that their fathers will now think twice before they place their children's blood at the services of mining adventurers.

I am afraid that Mr. Hannay's kind suggestions as to the psychology of the Spanish people, contained in Mr. Hannay's letter, will not prove equally useful for us. It seems to me that Mr. Hannay accepts, at the same time, the statement of Señor Costa about the "emasculation" of modern Spaniards and the classical theory, for he says that the Spanish people "are given up to strong delusions." But we Spaniards must either be one thing or the other. If we are "emasculated," our condition is hopeless. If, on the other hand, we are "given up to strong delusions, and to believe in lies," there is a hope for us—it lies in education. For talk about our "emasculation" implies a belief in the primacy of that mysterious thing called energy, or will-power; such, indeed, is the creed of pragmatists, voluntarists, vitalists, and all the other fatalists. To say that "we are given up to strong delusions," &c., implies the belief in the primacy of intellect. Such is the belief of intellectualists, rationalists, or idealists. The history of twenty-five centuries of European thought is the history of this dispute between pragmatists and idealists. If Mr. Hannay is able to reconcile his two statements and unite both schools in one consistent system, he will find no difficulty in reading the riddle of the psychology of the Spanish people.—Yours, &c.,

"NOT AS THESE PUBLICANS!"

SIR,—Ha! St. George for Merry England!

Poor, unfortunate Spaniards! "What hope can there be for such a people? They are given up to strong delusions and to believe in lies." A Briton come to judgment! Poor Mr. Maeztu! He, too, is put into the general ban. Still, he is perhaps the best known of Spanish journalists, whether in Spain or "the Indies." True, he has done more to form Spanish opinion and to let in light upon the mis-doings of the Riff Mines (sic) gang than any three men in Spain.

What of that? There is nothing like your sweeping generalisation as an answer to a careful article full of facts.

If you have no counter facts to oppose (supposing the article is not to your liking), generalise, and damn a whole nation.

Mr. Maeztu, as far as I can see, in no wise agrees with the two patriots, who remarked, "Well, we look down upon churches." He seems to me only to look down upon the Riff money-grubbing crew who, after taking a concession from a Moorish Rob Roy, have helped to plunge their country into a disastrous filibustering expedition. Surely Mr. Hannay must see that the proper way for honest men to have acted would have been to get a concession to work mines from the Sultan of Morocco, and not from a rebel against his authority. Especially when we remember that Spain was a signatory to the Act of Algeciras. Poor Spaniards—yet memory goes back to a time when a nation sent apparently by God himself, to correct His errors in the scheme of creation, were used by a band of capitalists, headed by a duke or two, as catspaws, and certainly were committed in the Transvaal to a "foolish adventure," and worn as "noses of wax" by men whose names are not precisely honored by the British public nowadays.

It is strange how similar the Riff and the Transvaal adventures look when gazed on through fairly achromatic glasses.—Yours, &c.,

R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I read with very much interest last week your careful, and, on the whole, sympathetic review of the present situation between the women and the Government.

With much of it I am prepared to agree. I think you are correct in calling attention to the fact that the right of a deputation to see Mr. Asquith and the right to treatment as political prisoners are only side issues of the struggle, though I submit that as Mr. Asquith and Mr. Gladstone have selected to fight in these outer entrenchments, which are the least defensible, Liberals cannot complain because the fight at present rages hottest there.

On the other hand, I think you are wrong in regarding the band of Women Suffragists as a small company of women, and also in reverting to the trite suggestion that the present methods are not advancing the ends which they have in view; but these are matters on which only a host of facts would convince, and I do not propose to weary you or your readers by a recital of them.

It is with your conclusion that I wish to join issue and to prove to you that, even granting your premises, you arrive at a wrong result. Your argument amounts to this—that however right Woman Suffrage may be, yet, because the question is not the uppermost one at the present time in the public mind, the settlement of it ought to be left to be dealt with in years to come. Surely you must see that the public mind is almost invariably occupied with that question, which, by common consent of politicians and Press, is placed in the front rank. The astonishing fact to-day is that, in spite of the complete boycott by both parties of politicians, and the partial boycott by the daily Press, Woman Suffrage does actually stand (with the possible exception of the Budget) in the very front rank of the political issues of the day.

As regards the Budget, women suffragists have already recognised that the present Session is so occupied that it is useless to press for their question to be dealt with this year, but they demand that, if the Liberal Party weather the Budget storm this autumn, Woman Suffrage shall be included among the Government measures of the Session of 1910. Your advice to the party, if I understand it aright, is, on the other hand, that they can afford to exclude it from their programme, and to go to the next General Election without having placed a Woman Suffrage measure on the Statute Book.

Politicians are influenced by two motives—principle and expediency. As to the first, a sentence in your own article is the key to the situation. You say, "Democracy is fighting for its life, and the issue of the next few months will settle the history of this country for the next half-century." That statement applies equally to the question of Woman Suffrage as to the issue between the Commons and the Lords, and with regard to the former I wish to add a conclusion which you probably had in your mind when you wrote the sentence, "and that issue can end in only one way."

It is one of the fundamental principles of Democracy that whenever a section of an unenfranchised class earnestly and vigorously demands the vote, that vote cannot be withheld, whether that section be a majority or a minority of the unenfranchised class. You are bound to recognise that when women care so much for the franchise that 500 of them have gone to prison, when they have put up between them a Campaign Fund of nearly £50,000, when they have carried the circulation of their paper to a weekly issue of 30,000 copies, the demand for the vote has been expressed earnestly and vigorously. Yet you suggest that a Liberal Government can go comfortably jogging along and face another General Election without giving the vote to women. Surely this is a negation of principle unworthy of your previous record.

Expediency points in the same direction. In this matter I am happy to find myself in agreement with the Prime Minister, who stated emphatically, in his recent speech at the Eighty Club, that a Liberal Party which was false to its own principles could not continue to exist. But, apart from this general ground for following the dictates of principle, many direct considerations point to the same course. In the present letter I have only space to refer to one of them. In the ranks of the Women's Social and Political Union are a very great number of ex-Liberal women. Every day that the Liberal Government withhold the Suffrage from women, the estrangement between them and their party grows more and more serious, and other Liberal women are following their example. If the Liberal Party were to go to another General Election before granting Woman Suffrage, they would find themselves faced by the desertion of all the more intelligent of those Liberal women who, trusting to the sense of honor and justice of Mr. Asquith and his Cabinet, still remain.

Is the Liberal Party prepared to face with equanimity this wholesale desertion; is it prepared to lose, in many cases permanently, so large a source of strength and inspiration within its ranks? I cannot believe that you will so counsel it to its own certain ruin.—Yours, &c.,

F. W. Pethick Lawrence.

"THE WOMEN'S WAR."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your judicious article on this subject, and the wise conclusions you draw from the facts of the case, will gain a ready assent from all who are interested, whether they be opponents or friends of the ladies' cause. I fail, however, to see how those ladies should be classed as political offenders, with all their privileges. I will take two local cases to illustrate my point. A year ago Mr. Lloyd-George came to Edinburgh to speak on a special subject—Temperance—in the King's Theatre. The ladies made a deliberate attempt to keep him from being heard, with results disastrous to themselves and all concerned. What is the difference between this so-called political offence and the rowdy who commits a criminal offence by a breach of the peace in some public street?

It appears to me the first crime is the more serious of the two, as we live in a free State, and the right of undisturbed public meeting is essential to its very life. If we are to tolerate or palliate the action of any section of the community in deliberately attempting to prevent the principal political leaders from addressing the nation, a serious blow has been struck at one of the foundations of the State.

My second case is Mr. Churchill's meeting in the same place about a month ago. The militant ladies were excluded, but two leaders held a meeting outside the theatre, and after addressing the people proposed they should go and demand entrance. This they attempted to do, but owing to well-organised police arrangements nothing serious happened. Now, unless the ladies were fooling, they intended what they said, and it was only because their cause was not popular that nothing happened. If their cause had had the mob to support it, and they had overpowered the police and rushed the theatre, did they commit a political or a criminal offence?

A gentleman friend of my own, who was passing at the time, was thus addressed by a lady sympathiser: "You coward, why do you stand and see ladies treated like that?" If he had thus come into conflict with the police, would he be labelled a criminal or political prisoner?

I should be glad if you would define what laws or rules of State a political offender is allowed to break before he becomes a criminal offender. If there is not some very clear line drawn, it appears to me the adoption of the women's tactics as a method of political warfare would certainly mean the loss of some of our most cherished liberties.—Yours, &c.,

John M. Hogge.

Sir,—In your article on "The Women's War" in your issue of August 7th, you say: "Mr. Gladstone complained on Wednesday that, when placed as prisoners in the first division, they assert that they scorn all political privileges, and demand to be treated by the normal prison discipline. When placed as prisoners in the second division, they declare, or their friends declare, that they are political offenders—as they certainly are—subject to deliberate humiliation."

Can you inform us with certainty whether, when Mr. Gladstone transferred the imprisoned Suffragettes to the first division, he did so in definite recognition of the fact that they were political offenders, or as a privilege to ladies? I understand from reports of his answers to questions in the House of Commons, that they were so transferred on the ground that they were ladies, and could not be expected to stand the severe discipline judged necessary for women of lower classes, and that probably mere confinement in the first division would suffice to bring ladies to a docile frame of mind. Finding that ladies are not so amenable as he supposed, he has upheld severer measures, and even gone so far on the road to democracy as to plead that ladies ought not to be accorded privileges over other women and men. The Suffragettes appear to be entirely in accord with Mr. Gladstone upon this last point. They claim to be put in the first division, not as a privilege to ladies, but in recognition of the fact that they are political offenders. To recognise women definitely as political offenders, however, would surely imply a recognition of them as political persons. But the refusal to allow women to vote is grounded on the refusal to recognise them as persons. How, then, can Mr. Gladstone recognise women as political offenders, while the Government of which he is a member refuses to recognise them as persons? But if he placed them in the first division as ladies, and not as political offenders, how can Mr. Gladstone complain if Suffragettes scorn the privilege? Surely, to cease trading on the privileges of ladies and to strive for a recognition of the rights and responsibilities of women is the very essence of the movement for the enfranchisement of women. How to strive is the point upon which we are not agreed.—Yours, &c.,

Erie Evans.

Sir,—It is very delightful for one guilty of an "impolite and arrogant" expression of opinion to find his fault pointed out in a letter which will serve as a model of courtesy, and the writer of a sentence "worthy of a Harmsworth journal" must indeed be grateful to Mr. Hunter for those faultless periods of his which are at once a criticism of error and a matter of perfection.

A model of good manners and good prose Mr. Hunter most generously gives for nothing to the world and to myself, and he will add the priceless boon to his respect for my opinion if I will but humor him in a few small points which he details. It is knowledge only that I need, and I am to "come down" from my "comfortable College study," attend a few Suffragette meetings, call at 4, Clement's Inn, and return to my armchair to read "Votes for Women." Those who are interested in the psychology of enthusiasms have remarked as typical of the least reasonable class of enthusiasts an airy conviction that those who differ from them have necessarily no knowledge of the matter in dispute. Such people think that only ignorance can account for disagreement with themselves, and Mr. Hunter assumes, because I disagree with him on the question of Suffragettism, that I have no acquaintance whatever with Suffragette oratory or Suffragette literature. That I differ from Mr. Hunter is my (most regrettable) misfortune, but I call my newsagent to witness that it is not my fault. I do not think that if I learnt my "Votes for Women" every week by heart, I should be any nearer to agreement with him. For if I assume no more than he leaves unchallenged on my list—a dog-whip (not dog-whips), the Downing Street padlocks, and one single slapped inspector, these remain to me—and even should my test dog-whip be taken from me, and the inspector prove to have been patted and not slapped, I should not be one whit less convinced that the militant methods are unworthy and unwise. I am tempted, indeed, to supplement my list with recollections of rudeness in private drawing-rooms, and the abuse of a Member's courtesy in the House, but the fear of another Harmsworth sentence, and the censure that it must bring, forbids.

However, let anyone read the accounts of the Albert Hall meeting in December last, let him consider what was the occasion of the meeting, and the purpose of Mr. Lloyd-George's presence there; then let him estimate the worthiness and the wisdom of the militant tactics, as exemplified at least on that great day. The Albert Hall meeting drove sane supporters of the Suffrage to the borders of despair, and the harm that it did to the cause throughout the country was, I believe, incalculably great. If only armchair critics disapproved, then, indeed, there must be many such. If Mr. Hunter will not accept the "Times" accounts, I can supply him with dozens of instances from the impeccable columns of "Votes for Women" itself to illustrate the notorious fact that the rank and file of the Suffragettes at least work by methods which make their cause ridiculous, by indiscriminate interruptions of public meetings, and generally by the infliction of petty annoyances on others and minor martyrdoms on themselves. This week's "Votes for Women" is delighted with the achievement of a supporter at Limehouse—this time, tragically enough, a perverted man—who climbed a pillar in the hall and unfurled therefrom "the banner of purple and white and green," and three delicious columns rapturously describe such exploits as the production of silly noises outside the windows of the hall. Surely a great cause deserves something better than this. Am I wrong to speak of methods lacking dignity?

Mrs. Brailsford pertinently asks how, if their methods are not wise, the Suffragettes fill great meetings every week through ten months of the year. The answer lies surely in the goodness of their cause. They have one of the greatest reform projects to battle for, and one that is popular enough to thrive in spite of many obstacles. Much of their campaigning too—"hard educational work," as Mrs. Brailsford says—is well and wisely done, and helps not a little to forward an evidently righteous cause. The pluck of which Mrs. Brailsford speaks is also an undoubted asset—for it is certain that a five days' "hunger strike" needs pluck to carry through—and a British crowd will always look kindly on a party or person that fights gamely for whatever end. But from all these gains there are huge losses to deduct, and my contention simply is that the losses greatly exceed the gains. To quote one single item, every meeting which the Suffragettes interrupt means the loss of great numbers of supporters in the audience which they victimise. People do not go to Budget meetings to hear the Suffragettes say "Votes for Women," and though a great audience may be amused by noisy child-tricks for a time, the continual interruption of the speeches exasperates it very soon. At Limehouse, as the only infallible journal relates with seeming pride, the Chancellor's hearers were goaded to fury by the ceaseless and silly interruptions, and set upon the offenders with all the vigor of a thoroughly angry crowd. Many thousands of electors will never forgive the Suffragettes for the ruin of meetings to which they have given precious shillings and still more precious time. And there is always a great body of opinion which dislikes, on general grounds, the doubtful logic and unwomanly character of the policy of nails and noise.

Mrs. Brailsford has replied with such patience and good humor to my letter that I am half ashamed of its lack of seriousness; but I cannot admit that her arguments have altered the views which it—faultily enough—set forth.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Your article on the "Women's War" would have been perfect had it offered a little practical help to the brave women who are fighting against tremendous odds. At present its coldness strikes me as one of the best justifications of the unhappy militant tactics.

You admit the Suffragists have the "support of the liberated and intellectual minds of the country." Your main objection is "the stolid male elector." By what methods would you convince him? And do you think this war should continue till all are convinced?

The Budget is the predominating question; and Democracy is fighting for its life. That is true, but is that any reason why the strongest Government of modern times should refuse to give a pledge to enfranchise, or to attempt the enfranchisement of the women, who are equally affected as men?

Was it not Mr. Asquith himself who proclaimed that "taxation without representation is tyranny"?

You rejoice at evidence that the cause of the suffrage is gaining adherents; you predict honor and triumph some day. Meanwhile you foresee more trouble, more suffering, and the question I ask in all humility is—you who have such power to help the cause you admire—What are you doing, and what will you do to stop the suffering and hasten the triumph?—Yours, &c., W. R. Snow.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I be permitted to make a few observations on this question?

The movement itself, we are told, was originally decided upon mainly on the ground that the case for the Suffrage was universally accepted and the time for argument had passed. (S. Pankhurst—History in "Votes for Women.") Since then has arisen the Anti-Suffrage League with its famous petition of 254,000 signatures collected in six months—the largest single petition on the question that has been scrutinised by the Petition Office. Is it still held that the time for argument is passed?—and if not, what becomes of the main ground for militant measures?

As regards signs of success—Mrs. Arthur Somerville at the annual meeting of the above League was quite as optimistic on her side, and, from the facts she gave, with very good reason. The "Polite Attention" argument is weak. The Suffragettes are women, and are treated with the male electors' customary indulgence toward the fair sex. The "Bad Temper" of Liberals is no sign of Suffragette success. What irritation there may be is as nothing to the feeling excited by the murder of Sir Curzon Wyllie, but does that suggest that the young Indians' "cause" is prospering?

How does Mrs. Brailsford know that the Budget is popular, if not from the fact of the Government having done well at recent bye-elections? Yet in the same breath she suggests that it is doing badly in them. She says that when she is going to talk about a subject she studies it. Surely she must have made an exception when she referred to decreased Liberal majorities as proving the power of Woman Suffrage in elections. The circumstances of the last General Election were admittedly quite exceptional—it was a Liberal boom. Booms indicate abnormal conditions and must necessarily subside sooner or later. When, too, the Suffragettes talk of these contests, let them not quite forget the help they received from the Tariff Reformers, Coal Consumers, Brewers, and such others as wanted (and have since got) "Eight"—they all talked and spent money against the Government candidate.

May I ask Mrs. Brailsford how it is that Messrs. Brailsford, Hueffer, Forbes-Robertson, and Zangwill asked the "Daily News" a few days ago to insist that "amid the turmoil of the Budget fight It shall not be IGNORED." "It" was "Votes for Women," a cry which makes Cabinet Ministers tremble (?)—yet the editor of the above paper is implored to get electors to listen to it.

In the Cleveland election Mrs. Pankhurst published a letter in which criticisms appeared of the Miners' Act, and distributed it among the electors. Mrs. Brailsford says that "the W.S.P.U. has nothing to do with any Bills, good or bad, until a Women's Franchise Bill is passed or promised."—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having read in your issue of the 7th inst. the inquiries of "S.," Harrogate, about "The Tactics of the Suffragettes," I suggest the following answers:—

(1) The granting of the vote to women is undoubtedly a far-reaching and important step; but it must also be admitted that it is a step which will not infringe upon the rights, or injure the lives or property, of any class or party.

(2) Admitted that the last General Election was not fought mainly on female suffrage, yet the majority of those elected were known to be in favor of the measure.

(3) I have yet to learn that the Government is denied the right of passing any measure save those two or three (or possibly only one) upon which the election is mainly fought. I should have thought that when a Liberal is sent to Parliament he has the sympathy and sanction of his constituents in the introduction of any Act which carries out a widely recognised Liberal principle—such as giving the suffrage to those who pay taxes. Moreover, it appears to me that there would have been very little opposition to the measure, had the women been treated with ordinary fairness and consideration by the Government.

(4) Yes, we claim equality with man—not only in the right to punishment when we deserve it, but also in the right to be heard when we have a grievance. Since our claims to the vote and to petition Parliament have been ignored and denied, we use the only ways of protest against this unequal treatment which are open to us. Men have done similar, and worse, things many times. As to the support and admiration of the men upon whose votes it will rest as to whether we get the vote or not, we have not yet lost all faith in Englishmen, and we believe there are still a vast number of them who can overlook the relatively small incidents of stone-throwing, &c., and see the justice and urgency of our demand.

Doubtless the attitude of the Government and the misrepresentations of the ignorant have influenced many men against us. I believe the idea of many still is that if women had the vote on the same terms as men there would come an era of the subjection of men, when the growing tendency of womanhood would be to despise and injure men as far as they were able! Of course, such a thought is quite ridiculous. But if men desire the admiration and respect of women they must show themselves eager to do them justice, and not be so cowardly as to delay until that justice is wrested from them.—Yours, &c.,

A LIBERAL WOMAN.

SIR,—As you have bravely raised the siege of the women's question by opening your columns for its better understanding, I venture to offer my testimony in support of Mrs. Brailsford and the writer of your article.

The "antis" who persuade themselves that society depends for its welfare upon force are enraged to find what every materialist has found from all time, that ideas which have become watchwords can neither be destroyed by soldiers nor suppressed by policemen. The divine right of equality for women before the law and in the constitution is one of those illuminating ideas which, having once shone upon the world, can never be extinguished, and in the end is bound to be manifested in legislation.

Mr. Gladstone quite understands this, and is, theoretically, in favor of the idea, but he has not realised its force. He has therefore yielded to the less enlightened of his colleagues and allowed himself to repress the movement in its support, at least, till a convenient season. For this purpose he has permitted trifling offences of an obviously political character to be vindictively prosecuted as serious breaches of the law, and he has accepted without demur vindictive sentences passed upon women by magistrates who properly reflect the common-place spirit of material force. The result was inevitable. His prosecutions have had the fructifying effect of persecution, and his punishments have not only shocked the moral sense of thoughtful people, but have also provoked the victims of injustice to an heroic and effective defiance. Such a position is intolerable and dangerous in the highest degree to the Government, and, as I think, to the Liberal Party.

What, then, may be done to save the situation? In the first place, the political character of the agitation must be frankly and honestly recognised, and punishments as for ordinary offences must cease. In the second place, the leaders of the movement must be treated with the respect due to those who can command attention, and their request for a hearing, as well as for a definite pledge of support, must be conceded. There may be room for discussion as to the place which the removal of sex disability should occupy in the Liberal programme. But for a true Liberal, whose creed is based upon the force of moral ideals, there can be nothing less.—Yours, &c.,

RUSSIAN LIBERALS AND THE TSAR'S VISIT.

SIR,—For three years I have charged myself with the duty of defending the Russian Liberals, many of whom are my personal friends, against the misrepresentations of certain English adherents of the extreme Revolutionary Section in Russia. For reasons which I need not recapitulate here, the Russian Liberals are unanimously and strongly in favor of the Anglo-Russian entente, and viewed with approval both the visit of King Edward to Reval and the more recent return visit of the Tsar to Cowes. The justification of their attitude is seen in the effect, in Russia, of King Edward's references to the Duma. The Reactionaries are almost inarticulate with fury. I have repeatedly frustrated the attempts of a certain small knot of journalists in this country, who adhere to the extreme revolutionary section in Russia, to bolster up their agitation against the entente by representing that they were expressing the views of the Russian Liberals. Their position on certain Liberal papers made my task more difficult, for they were able to suppress, not only my protests, but also those which were made by Russian Liberals themselves. Fortunately, however, your columns, and those of the English Press in general, have never been closed for the free expression of opinion, even when it differs from your own, and the conspiracy, for I can call it nothing else, of misrepresentation has failed. It is admitted now, on every hand, that the Russian Liberals are in favor of the Anglo-Russian entente, and the opponents of the entente have now taken new ground and state we must disregard the views of the Russian Liberals and consider the question solely from some peculiar British standard of ethics. That is the view which you yourself took in an extremely able leading article a few weeks ago. It is not my view, but I have no doubt there is a great deal to be said for it. I am distressed, however, to find that the old misrepresentation, which I had thought finally disposed of, crops up again in one of your leading articles this week. Commenting upon the declarations in favor of the Tsar's visit, which were recently made by the Russian Liberal leaders during their visit to this country, the article continues:—

> "They were bound in public to adopt the rather embarrassing and clearly calculated attitude of loyalty towards Nicholas II. which has been so unfairly exploited by some of their more simple-minded friends in this country."

The innuendo is not only that the Russian Liberal leaders, like Professor Milyukoff, spoke falsely when they said that they approved of the Tsar's visit, but that they did so from motives of cowardice. I am able to say that they expressed in private even more strongly the same views that they expressed in public. While they were in this country, Professor Milyukoff and other Liberal leaders had several private interviews with those who were running the agitation against the Tsar's visit, and appealed to them to abandon their attitude.—Yours, &c.,

A. MacCallum Scott.

THE FUTURE OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Replying to Mr. Graham Wallas's questions, (a) I do not think that every teacher will be able to give a good religious or moral lesson. What I am anxious to avoid is a special class of scripture or religious teachers drawn either from within or without the school. Not to give the lesson required of the syllabus in these subjects I should like to be the exception and not the rule.

(b) I should be the last to confine the word Scripture to the books that happen to belong to the church canon. Yet, I cannot but think that the better a teacher was prepared to use other Scriptures for the purpose in view, the less would he feel it a limitation to be nominally confined to the Bible.

(c) In reference to Mr. Wallas's third question, my point, of course, was that the training college should aim at producing men who can use Gospel or Pauline teaching as a spiritual inspiration, and as a means of touching the feelings for what is best in life, not at turning out Scripture scholars.

My object in writing again is to suggest that if reformers are in any wise at one, as I think they are, on the points that this correspondence, under Mr. Wallas's leadership, has brought out, the way is open for some practical proposals. Accepting his suggestion, might we agree to something like the following as the next step:—

1. While there is much, perhaps all, in favor of the daily opening of school with some short form of hymn and reading, there is little or nothing to be said for the daily lesson according to the syllabus, as at present given. It is too often a mere piece of routine for the teacher, worse than routine for the scholar. With the view, then, not of turning the Scripture lesson out, but of turning it to better account, might we not advocate making it twice or thrice a week, instead of every day? This would be amply sufficient to give the children a real familiarity with the story of Israel, its heroes and its prophets, and with the Gospel narrative and the essentials of its teaching—serving at once as an instrument of historical, imaginative, moral, and religious culture.

2. Of what remains of the time that present arrangements put at our disposal, part might, with the greatest profit, be used for the purpose indicated in Mr. Wallas's second article—a lesson or a story, a poem, a picture, a current incident, which the teacher should be left entirely free to treat in his own way, but in which his object, as in the Scripture lesson, would be to give the children something of the sense of imaginative pleasure or of spiritual enlargement that the thing has given himself.

3. The other day, or two days, might be utilised on the lines advocated by the Moral Education League, in the attempt to give something systematic in the way of ethical instruction. The main point, and here perhaps I should differ from some advocates of "moral instruction," is that it should be in connection with some concrete material, the care of the body, or the duties of citizenship. But as things are, this would be all very tentative, and the extent to which it was practicable at all would depend upon the interests and acquirements of the individual members of the staff. There might very well be place here for the specialisation that Mr. Wallas desires, though even here, so far as the training college is concerned, I should, I think, be jealous of any suggestion that would exclude the principles of good citizenship from the ordinary curriculum for all.

We shall probably be told that a programme of this kind would be hard to carry out, and that we are only "adding to the burdens of the teacher." I believe it would be difficult, as all improvements are; but it is, I believe, a difficulty that the best teachers are themselves anxious to face—a burden they are willing to take up. One advantage of agreement among reformers on the suggested lines would be that by giving a definite lead it would strengthen the hands of training-college teachers in their efforts to substitute something more useful and sustaining for much that is formal in present prescribed courses on psychology and logic.—Yours, &c., J. H. Muirhead.

Birmingham, August 8th, 1909.

[Professor Muirhead has shown me his letter. I agree that the daily scripture lessons ought to be cut down, because they would be thereby improved, time would be saved for other subjects, and it would be more difficult for Mr. Runciman to make daily lessons compulsory by Act of Parliament, as he very nearly did in 1908. The Lords, who believe that secular education leads to Socialist Budgets, would never allow such an Act to be repealed. As to his proposals (2) and (3), I would allow much to local variation. But American experience seems to show that a good course of English literature gives, on the whole, the best opportunity for a sincere and unforced contact between the deeper feelings of teacher and taught. Finally, I would urge that the line which divides the peacemaker from him who "cries peace when there is no peace" is a delicate one. I cannot help thinking that Professor Muirhead crosses that line when he speaks of the teacher being "nominally confined to the Bible."—Graham Wallas.]

"THE LOST LIBERTY OF THE ROAD."

Sir,—I have followed with interest the series of able and vigorous articles upon this subject, which have appeared from time to time in The Nation, and the many letters which these articles have evoked. Much correspondence has also appeared in other papers, containing expressions of indignation, in more or less forcible English, against the abuses of motor traffic, together with the suggestion of innumerable remedies which range freely between the practicable and the impossible.

But, Sir, I would point out that all the strong feeling which finds vent in these letters to the Press is of little use in combating the evil for the reason that it is individual and unorganised. Each writer has his own particular remedy, but, however excellent it may be, and however great his ability in setting it forth, or the potential energy he might bring to bear upon its execution, beyond the relief to his own feelings (no doubt considerable) resulting from their public expression and the echoes aroused in a certain number of sympathetic readers, nothing further comes of it.

My own object in this particular letter is to suggest that it is not only possible but urgently desirable to prevent the evaporation of all this righteous indignation, and to utilise it in some more organised attempt than has yet been made to combat the evil.

The abuses and dangers to life and limb connected with motoring as at present conducted are the direct result of public apathy in the past and of the fatal lack of sufficient imagination, on the part of the people, to realise the advantake likely to be taken of the attitude of indulgent, gaping curiosity with which the new locomotion was at first received.

Step by step the motorist has encroached, and step by step he has gone unchallenged, until now at last the people are stirring in their sleep and trying in vain to shake off the terrors of the nightmare that has fastened itself upon them.

Things ought never to have been allowed to go so far, but, as they have, it is idle to suppose that a few sporadic letters to the Press can prove of any real efficacy in coping with the evil. It is the part of wisdom to recognise that the present dangers of our highways, both urban and rural, constitute a very grave situation—a situation which, having come about with gradual insidiousness, cannot be either hastily or easily remedied, and will require an infinite amount of painstaking, united work from the joined ranks of indignant letter-writers and all others who realise it. It will be at best an uphill struggle, and those who are in earnest should lose no time in beginning the fight.

My suggestion is this: that all who are in sympathy with its aims (set forth some months ago in a letter to your paper) should become members of the Road Union, thereby enabling it, by increased financial support, to extend its work in the following ways:—

(1) The appointment of an organising secretary, who would form branches of the Road Union all over the country, beginning in places situated upon the chief highways where, as upon the Brighton road, accidents are most frequent.

(2) The arranging of public meetings where local committees were strong and the providing of speakers who should explain the aims and work of the society.

(3) The retention of the services of a legal adviser, who would hold a watching brief for the Road Union in cases where deaths or serious accidents from motoring occur.

In these, and many other ways, the Road Union might extend its work, were adequate financial aid forthcoming. Those in sympathy with such a crusade against the abuses of motoring, and who desire fuller information, should read the excellent pamphlet by Dr. Arthur Shadwell (founder and chairman of the Road Union) upon "The Motor Traffic and the Public," which can be obtained at the offices of the society at 47, Victoria Street, London, S.W.—Yours, &c.,

BETSY HOBSON.

Limpsfield, Surrey.

"THE BREAK-UP OF THE POOR LAW."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If you will allow me space to continue this correspondence, there are a few more considerations which I should like to add. I cannot but feel that there is a difference in practice between the present feeding of school children by the Education Committee, or the granting of pensions by the Pensions Committee, and the power on the part of many different Committees to grant home aliment which is suggested by the Minority Report. The reasons that special difficulties attach to outdoor relief are, first, that constant supervision is necessary to see that the relief is being expended in the way intended, and, secondly, that, as it is a form of relief which everyone is anxious to receive, it is likely to grow, and, if not abused, to lead to an excessive amount of charge and recovery. With the feeding of children at school we avoid the first difficulty, as there is no question but that the children receive the food as intended; in the case of pensions there is no elasticity possible, as far as the local Committee is concerned, and the recipients are obviously unable to repay as their working days are over. The Minority Report points out how completely the attempts of public authorities to establish a satisfactory and uniform system of recovery have failed in the past; may not the reason be that it is a bad business to get money from people for what they have already consumed, and it is surely likely to be a worse one when the recipient had made no application for the relief which has been given him?

It is, I think, doubtful whether an essential difference between the Majority and Minority Reports is the question whether it is the duty of a public authority to endeavor to prevent destitution. For myself I should not hesitate to say that it is their duty to attempt to do so where possible; it is difficult to discover exactly what are the principles of the Majority Report, but it does state that the system of public assistance which it establishes is to include processes of help which would be "preventive," and it drops the word "destitute" as defining those who are proper recipients of public relief and substitutes "necessitous."

Mrs. Sidney Webb suggests a possible compromise in the substitution of a Committee in place of a Registrar. In many ways it is probable that a Committee (composed of representatives from the various Committees at work in the relief of the poor) would be a more effective check and co-ordinator than a salaried official could be. There would be a closer personal touch, and a stronger and healthier public opinion would be brought to bear on the work; if such a committee were truly representative there would be less likelihood of friction in cases of disagreement, and it would be better able than an official to prevent the expert from running his theories against the general interest. What exactly should be its position and powers is no doubt a matter of controversy. The aim should surely be to co-ordinate and make the utmost use of the work of the different Committees—of the Health Visitor, the School Attendance Officer, and the expert from the Lunacy Authority—so as to ensure the action of preventive authorities at the right time, and also to promote the organisation of private and endowed charities, the provision of provident societies (the Minority wish to encourage insurance against unemployment; why not also insurance against sickness?), and the care and consideration of the family as a whole. These are essential, if preventive measures are to be really effective, or if those already destitute are to be set again upon their feet.—Yours, &c.,

(Mrs.) C. D. RACKHAM (P.L.G.).

FATHER TYRRELL'S POSITION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letters of Mr. Delisle Burns and Mr. J. A. Walker do not, if I may say so, in the least, give definite answers to my queries. Mr. Walker suggests, indeed, that Father Tyrrell's problem was a sectional one. He says the issues raised in Father Tyrrell's books "affect not only all Roman Catholics, but men of all denominations—in fact, many hundreds of millions of Christians." Precisely. But millions of Christians even do not exhaust more than a fraction of the human race. Nay, more important still, a solution which reconciles all Christians will still leave outside a good half of the intellect and moral worth of Europe, to-day—that is, of what is nominally Christendom. What is the good of ignoring these truths, when you set out to serve truth? Nothing is more amazing than the way in which writers, especially in the English Press, go on talking on the assumption that those outside the Christian fold to-day in Europe are either negligible in point of numbers, or negligible in point of moral and intellectual influence.

Personally, I have, perhaps, no special claim to appraise Father Tyrrell's influence, but as everyone is giving his opinion on the subject at present, I may as well set down mine, especially as it is at variance with most of those I have seen in print. To me, then, Father Tyrrell appears as personally a very attractive and sincere figure, of much personal charm. He was probably groping towards a humanism which he never succeeded in reaching, the stage at which he would have realised that his own "reformed" Catholic Church no more furnished a solution than the Church of the Cardinals. As to his literary style, it is, I think, absurdly over-praised by a coterie in England. It was of that kind which constantly substitutes nebulosity for clearness, and obscures the meaning in a cloud of words. Mr. Walker says that Father Tyrrell's position "cannot be defined as simply as a place on the map." Some of us would add that not a little of Father Tyrrell's own writing seems designed to render this geographical problem gratuitously difficult. But, when all appreciation is made, Father Tyrrell appears in religion something of what Lord Hugh Cecil is in politics. Everybody respects Lord Hugh's sincerity, his seriousness, and his charm. But Lord Hugh, with his medievalism, his High Church—Free Trade Toryism, no more represents any lasting position in modern politics than Father Tyrrell represented any stable position in modern religious thought. People who go as far as he will to-day inevitably go farther.

Take, for instance, Father Tyrrell's appeal to the professor, in the "Much Abused Letter," to stay within the Catholic Church in order not to shut himself off from its communion. That kind of appeal might be intelligible a few centuries ago, when the Church did embrace all society. But surely to-day, when three-fourths of one's best friends are outside the Catholic "communion," when being outside involves no social or other penalty, even in the most Catholic countries, such an appeal is rather unintelligible. Half the men, I repeat, whom Father Tyrrell must have met in Europe are outside this Catholic "communion." The pathos of the appeal, therefore, rings rather false. Or take, again, the proceedings at Father Tyrrell's funeral. Does any serious mind to-day think that there exists a Being, either in the Universe or outside, whose attitude to Father Tyrrell will be determined in any wise by the fact of whether he obtained "absolution" or not, or whether or no certain formulas were repeated over his grave?

My own impression, in fact, is that half the people who are "sympathetic" to Father Tyrrell's case are interested in his personal drama, and are very little affected by his dreams.—Yours, &c., F. R.

EMILE DE GIRARDIN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The review of M. Hanotaux's "Contemporary France" in your last number contains (p. 683, col. 2) a reference to Emile de Girardin which might lead the ill-informed reader to suppose that that great journalist was on the side of reaction. Girardin was at the time editor of "La France," and the campaign which during the summer of 1877 he carried on against the promoters of the "Seize Mai" is, I have no hesitation in affirming, the most admirably effective example of journalistic fighting in the 150 years of press history. Other pressmen may have shown more adroitness, more real courage, as Prevost-Paradoe in the "Débats" of the 'sixties, or Cornély in his pro-Dreyfus articles in the "Figaro." Rochefort and Clemenceau at their best have been more brilliant. No journalist ever displayed such deadly adequacy, such entire command of all the arts that ensure success. I can but recommend any Liberal journalist who wishes to master, in so far as such things can be mastered by study, the secret of effective fighting, to study the file of "La France" for the months of June and July, 1897. There were many other first-rate fighting men in the Republican ranks. I would cite Hébraid, Henry Maret, Sigismond Lacroix in very different styles and representing very diverse shades of Republican opinion, but the most telling and mortal blows came from Emile de Girardin.—Yours, &c., N.

"THE POVERTY OF THE COTTAGE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The article on the "Poverty of the Cottage," which appeared in your issue of Saturday last, will, I hope, be widely read and seriously considered, for it is more than possible that many of your readers are acquainted with the rural poor and their surroundings only by passing through our villages, chatting with some of the people here and there, and admiring, on a beautiful summer's day, the trimness of the cottage and garden, the cool-looking thatched roof, the small diamond-paned windows, and the green sward opposite, with its hen-coops and poultry.

To such people I will, with your permission, give a few particulars concerning this part of the County of Essex, which may be styled purely agricultural.

Some few months ago I was present at a parish meeting in one of our neighboring villages, when a discussion took place on the housing problem. The interest shown by the residents was remarkable, and I was given to understand that with two or three exceptions every male adult was present. It was with difficulty that we prevailed upon these sturdy, stolid men to give their views and experiences, but eventually one by one they rose and quietly, modestly, and briefly made a few remarks. Splendid specimens of English manhood some of them were—tall, broad-shouldered, and muscular, with the fair hair and light blue eyes of the Anglo-Saxon. We were told by several of the younger men that they were waiting, and had been waiting a long time, to get married, and that they were unable to enter into matrimony because they could not obtain cottages. Some of the married men, with grown-up sons at home, told us that they had to sleep in a room in which it was impossible to stand upright, that three or four of them shared one tiny attic, through the thatch of which, in wet weather, the rain dripped into the room, necessitating the use of umbrellas as shields for those in bed, while buckets were placed to catch the water in the corners of the room. The sanitary arrangements I will not describe, for they are too disgusting.

Another grievance was that, owing to a lack of cottage accommodation, several men were compelled to live in neighboring villages three and four miles distant from their work.

The accuracy of these statements was not challenged, and a resolution was unanimously passed, calling on the District Council to provide the necessary accommodation. The Council does not see its way clear to do this. Councils can build cottages, certainly, but the investment, owing to the small rents that can be paid, means a loss to be borne by an already highly-rated community. Councils can also condemn these dwellings, but if they do, where are the people to live? It avails little to cry out against overcrowding, unless additional accommodation is forthcoming.

In my opinion an independent survey should be made, and the money required to erect new dwellings should be advanced by the Government at a low rate of interest. The wages earned will not allow of a rent of more than 1s. 6d. or 2s. per week being paid, so it will be evident that as a commercial enterprise building would be a folly. But even if the State lost 1 per cent. on the outlay, the expenditure would be an invaluable investment, for it would be the means of closing the present huts and giving to the people homes in which they could live better and more healthful lives.

Your contributor considers that good food is what our cottagers most need. I do not dispute this, but I do say most emphatically that better housing accommodation is quite as necessary. I have heard it said that the people are strong and healthy in spite of their surroundings. However true that may be, it is a cruel and insulting remark. Surely there is all the more reason in caring for them, because they are such a hardy and splendid race!

I am intimately acquainted with a large circle of these cottagers, and I daily see them marching along life's road manfully, cheerfully, and triumphantly. Their way is strewn with bitter hardships, yet it is rare, indeed, to meet a grumbler in their ranks. It is, however, by no means rare to find them lightening each other's burdens in a chivalrous spirit.

I have heard some of the older men tell of the days when they married on seven shillings a week. Ask them how they managed to exist, and they can scarcely tell you. The father of a large family recently told me that his daily allowance was often eaten at breakfast. "Hard times, too hard, they were, God knows how we got through." So said this man, and he is a type of scores whose friendship I value. He has brought up healthy children, most of whom are doing well in life, and let it not be forgotten—for more than fifty years he paid into a benefit club and provided himself with a small pension. I know, of a certainty, that his wages never exceeded 15s. a week, and frequently they were less. And we allow such brave souls to have such surroundings as I have described!

Sir, the service, self-denial, and exemplary conduct shown by our agricultural laborers is a great national asset. Is it sufficiently appreciated or valued? Evidently not. If it were, I am sure the country would not rest until the dark spots and blemishes on our beautiful countryside were removed.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think I may truthfully say that my sympathies with the poor are as strong as those of the writer of the very interesting article with the above title in THE NATION of August 7th. That he is writing to the best of his knowledge what is true I do not for a moment dispute, but as a matter of simple fact it is not true. The special case he mentions is a strong ad misericordiam argument; the solution is, I rather think, very simple: The girl had been taught (?) on modern lines, and, of course, knew nothing. If ever a stupendous folly was invented, it is modern education: it is worse than folly, it is a crime, for it is the deliberate and cold-blooded extinction of the race who have been the very marrow and backbone of the nation. Ask the people themselves, north, south, east, and west, and they will tell you in plain language what they think of the tom-fooleries forced upon them and their children.

A week or two ago there was placarded on the walls of this town a large poster exhibiting the items of an actual grocer's bill of seventy years ago, side by side with the same bill at Lipton's now. The old bill amounted to about 27s., and the present-day cost of the same items to between 6s. and 7s. Bearing in mind that wages seventy years ago were scarcely more than half what they are now, we have a monetary position about eight to nine times as good now as it was then. If, then, people are anæmic and sickly now, how did they exist then? Someone may say: "They didn't exist; they died." Not so; they are alive now, hale and strong, many of them, and I will undertake to produce them, if required.

In the village where I recently ministered there were about three or four families who might justly be called poor, out of a total of about fifty families, all told; that is, they averaged 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. per head, per week. Others ranged upward to, probably, 7s. or more per head. One working family of seven people, living close to me, must have had even more than this, from all that I could gather, I should say, over £130 per annum. Everyone had his allotment, and could have more if he wished, from which the whole family was superabundantly supplied the whole year round; butcher's meat was largely consumed; the tea-table was usually supplied with marmalade, jam, &c., besides fresh butter; the numerous empty salmon-tins on the village dust-heap testified that luxuries were not unknown.

Thirteen shillings a week is quite enough to keep four people in reasonable comfort; a frugal and capable housewife would save money out of it. No, sir, the agricultural laborer and his family are under no necessity to starve, or to go short of anything they can reasonably wish for. The root of the mischief is the senseless thing misnamed "education," which is fast ruining our country; and I don't think I would grieve very deeply over the decay of a country which has proved itself so undiscerning, if it were not that that ruin, in other words, means the ruin and extinction of my beloved laboring classes. They are not gone yet, but between education and machinery they are well-nigh crushed, and the next generation, probably, will know them no more. They know it, and testify to it themselves. Let any unprejudiced deputation, with heads on their shoulders, be sent out to gather information, and if they don't testify that what I say is true, I will eat my words—whatever that means.—Yours, &c.,

SENEX QUIDAM PRESBYTER.

Poetry.

NOW.

WHEN I was in yon town, and had
  Stones all around me, hard and cold,
My flesh was firm, my sight was keen,
  And still I felt my heart grow old.

But now, with this green world around,
  By my great love for it! I swear,
Though my flesh shrink, and my sight fail,
  My heart will not grow old with care.

When I do hear these joyful birds,
  I cannot sit with my heart dumb;
I cannot walk among these flowers,
  But I must help the bees to hum.

My heart has echoes for all things,
  The wind, the rain, the bird and bee;
'Tis I that—now—can carry Time,
  Who in that town must carry me.

I see not now the great coke fire
  With ten men seated there, or more,
Like frogs on logs; and one man fall
  Dying across the boarded floor.

I see instead the flowers and clouds,
  I hear the rills, the birds and bees:
The squirrel flies before the storm
  He makes himself in leafy trees.

Reviews.

THE HISTORY OF THE ENCLOSURES.*

MR. JOHNSON has taken as the subject of his Ford Lectures a question that has attracted considerable interest in recent years. The very important books published by Dr. Hasbach on the "English Agricultural Laborer," and by Dr. Gilbert Slater on the "Enclosure of the Common Fields," has thrown a new light on the significance of the enclosures, and they appeared at a time when the deserted country was beginning to force itself on the public mind. Each of these works makes an important contribution to our understanding of the circumstances and the consequences of a process which ended by making England so different a society from her neighbors. Mr. Johnson's work, we fear, cannot be placed in the same category, and those who turn to these pages for the elucidation of some of the vexed problems of enclosure will be disappointed. Mr. Johnson's main contribution to the discussion of enclosures relates to the history of the closing years of the eighteenth century. On this subject Mr. Johnson thinks he has made what he calls a remarkable discovery. He has come to the conclusion that, whereas during the period from 1688 to 1785 enclosures were followed by the absorption of small holdings, during the years 1785-1802 this was not generally the case; and also that during those years there was an increase in the numbers of yeomen. This opinion he bases on the evidence of the Land Tax assessments. It occurred to him that a study of these assessments would throw some light on the periods at which these changes took place, and he therefore sent a circular letter to all the English counties, asking for leave to inspect these records. Every county except Essex agreed, and Mr. Johnson thus found access to what he calls a "perfect mine of evidence," and a mine that nobody else had quarried. It is as a result of the examination of this evidence that Mr. Johnson is brought to the conclusion which has caused him such surprise.

Unfortunately, when we come to weigh Mr. Johnson's evidence, it is seen to be too slender to warrant any general conclusion at all. We do not question at the moment the authority of the records themselves, though Mr. Johnson warns us that the assessments are not uniform or complete, and that some do not distinguish between owners and occupiers. Let us suppose, however, that the records are full and unimpeachable. The ground of our complaint against Mr. Johnson is that the startling conclusion to which he comes—that between 1785-1802 enclosure did not lead to consolidation—is based on an analysis of the records of less than three per cent. of the parishes of England. There are 15,000 parishes, and he deals with some 400, taken from four counties. Surely it stands to reason that no generalisation as to the increase or decline of yeomen, and as to the effect of enclosures, can be founded on such fragmentary statistics as these. Further, we should have thought that anybody who wanted to trace the effects of enclosure at a given time would take, not the bare returns, but the returns in relation to the enclosures; that is to say that he would ask, not merely whether the number of owners grew or shrank in a particular parish at a particular time, but whether and when that parish had been enclosed. Mr. Johnson does not seem to appreciate the importance of establishing this connection, for after arguing that enclosures during the period 1785-1802 were not followed by consolidation, he remarks: "It is also worth noting that Kent, where there were certainly no common fields in 1803, and where there probably were never many, is one of the favorite haunts of the small owner." Further, Kent supplies a remarkable case of the increase of small holders in the period Mr. Johnson is discussing. Now Kent was enclosed, as Dr. Slater pointed out, so early that there has never been an enclosure of common fields by Act of Parliament in the whole county. It follows, therefore, that the experience of Kent between the years 1785 and 1802 throws no light at all on the effect of the contemporary enclosures; any inference to be drawn from it would apply only to enclosures much earlier than the 18th century, a very different question from that which Mr. Johnson is discussing. Mr. Johnson seems, indeed, to have curious ideas of the value of evidence, for he appeals to his evidence against William Marshall's statement that the yeomen were declining in Norfolk in 1790, and he then goes on to admit that his returns come from 13 out of 736 parishes, and that they relate not to the years when Marshall wrote, but to the years 1792-1814. Further, we notice that Mr. Johnson quotes Marshall as saying of the Midlands in 1790 that there was "a species of frenzy, terramania, forty years' purchase being often given by small owners." Now anybody who turns to Marshall's volume on the Midlands will find that what he says there is this: "Some years back, the same species of frenzy—Terramania—showed itself here, as it did in other districts. Forty years' purchase was then not unfrequently given. Now (1785) thirty years' purchase, on a fair rental value, is esteemed a good price." As Mr. Johnson's period begins at 1785, the difference is not unimportant. By the way, is Mr. Johnson correct in saying that (p. 102) it was not until 1801 that there was an appeal from the award of Commissioners? The fact that there was an appeal to Quarter Sessions is mentioned in the anonymous pamphlet of 1787; the author showing at the same time that it was worthless.

Mr. Johnson's general conclusion is that the small owner has survived in England when the circumstances were favorable. "His disappearance has been due not so much to artificial, as to natural circumstances, but the circumstances—political, social, and economical—have, since the seventeenth century, been against him." It is in the adjustment of responsibility between natural and artificial circumstances that the controversies over this subject arise. Mr. Johnson, though he grants that the aristocratic Government of England made a good deal of difference, so far commits himself to the theory of economical inevitability as to predict that the rest of Europe is now about to enter on the process through which England passed in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, a conclusion that will seem as sweeping to most of his readers as the discovery into which he has been surprised by his examination of the assessments. "In short, on the Continent the fabric of rural society is undergoing the same process of disintegration which England first underwent at the close of the fifteenth century, and our agricultural problem is beginning to arise there." The evidence Mr. Johnson offers in support of this view seems to us very far from convincing, and the only case where our example is being copied on a large scale, the break-up of the Russian Mir, would be regarded by many as an illustration of the political, and not of the natural, origin of the events that destroyed the old English village. For M. Stolypin's policy might perhaps be described as an attempt to telescope three centuries of English agrarian history, in order to create, before representative institutions develop, a species of society amenable to the direction and authority which he seeks to impose. For the rest it is safe, we think, to predict that whatever view we take of the evidence as to the persistence of the peasantry in Europe, the particular species of society which was the result of the English enclosures is not likely to emerge in any country where the poor have any power of resistance. That is, after all, the main significance of the history of the enclosures in England. Such economic development and progress as resulted from the enclosures might have been secured without the reckless sacrifice of the poor. The form of the agrarian revolution in England was determined by the character of its government. Mr. Johnson says that in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries the Crown tried, though with poor success, to stand between the rich and the poor, but, after the landowning classes had reached their zenith with the Restoration and Revolution, no effort was made to stem or control the enclosure movement, or to modify or restrict its disturbing social consequences. Further, as Miss Leonard has pointed out, the changes that took place in the legal formalities of enclosures were all to the prejudice of the poor man, and put, unchecked, the power in the hands of the big landowner. We know from Arthur Young himself how enclosures were carried out in the days when the landowning class was omnipotent. "The proprietors of large estates generally agree upon the measure, adjust the principal points among themselves, and fix upon their attorney before they appoint any general meeting of all the proprietors. The small proprietor . . has little or no weight in regulating the clauses of the Act of Parliament." Landlords, clergy, lawyers, comprised a formidable contribution, and it is not surprising that Arthur Young had to report in 1801 that "by nineteen Enclosure Acts out of twenty the poor are injured, in some cases greatly injured." Protests were made, but they were practically unheeded by an aristocracy too much absorbed in making its fortune to give a thought to the ruin of the classes that were losing their little inheritance in the common fields or the common waste.

A general account of the enclosure movement is given in Mr. Curtler's excellent little volume, "A Short History of English Agriculture." Mr. Curtler has strong opinions on many controversial subjects, and they peep out from these pages. We gather that he resents very warmly the freedom with which many of us speak of landowners, and that he thinks that neither their property nor their public services are treated with due respect. But his brief history is an excellent description of the general course of events, and though we should not accept his verdict in all cases (he does less than justice, we think, to the common field system) it cannot be said that his book has been unduly disturbed by his personal prepossessions. He tells us, for example, with a candor that does credit to his impartiality, in view of the discussion raging round the Budget, that one of the causes of the dissolution of the Board of Agriculture in 1822 was that "the landed interest thought the surveys were intended for taxation." He traces the effects of the momentous change that followed the creation of family settlements at the Restoration. From the end of the 15th century, when the famous Taltarums case enabled entailed estates to be barred, until the Restoration, land passed more freely than ever before or since. "For these two hundred years the courts of law and Parliament resisted every effort to re-establish the system of entails; the owners of land constantly multiplied, and this tendency must have counteracted the displacement of the small holder by enclosure. Sir Thomas Smith, writing towards the end of the 16th century, says that it was the yeomen who bought the land of "unthrifty gentlemen," and Moryson tells us that "the buyers (excepting lawyers) are for the most part citizens and vulgar men." After the Restoration all this was changed. All the ingenuity of the lawyers was spent on devices for re-establishing the Family Law, which the great landowners had tried in vain to restore in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The times and powers were now more propitious, and the system of strict family settlements, which then was devised, was largely responsible, as Mr. Curtler says, for the disappearance of the small freeholder. Mr. Curtler deals, of course, with the general history of agriculture, and not merely with the history of land tenures, and he is to be congratulated on producing a very interesting and useful book, on a complicated and difficult subject.

Among the May meetings—better known a generation ago than now—there is one which deserves more recognition than it probably receives. The Society of Friends is a small body, and it does not advertise itself. But from its yearly conference a voice goes out that speaks with no uncertain sound for spiritual religion and social justice, and is a power for good in English life.

For Quakers, at least, the Spirit has never, like Matthew Arnold's third Lord Shaftesbury, "kept very much in the background." The distinctive note of the society has been the assertion of His prominence in national and individual life. In its first days this assertion was characteristic of Christianity. How great is the place assigned to the Spirit and spiritual gifts in the Pauline writings, and in the literature of the Apostolic and sub-Apostolic Church! And, when a too rugged bark formed over the sap, the stream of life, though checked, was not arrested. "In the general ruin that attended the long death agonies of the Roman Empire, the Church survived, not merely through strength of organisation, but because, with all its faults, it was the one living, heroic institution left in Western Europe."

The life of mankind, however, was more vigorous and developed more rapidly than that of the Church. Hence friction and finally rupture between the two. "The Reformation was a natural and necessary movement of emancipation": it resulted from a moral need It did not give the intellectual freedom demanded to-day; to look for this in the sixteenth century would be an anachronism. But the substitution of the appeal to scripture for that to the Church was an immense step in advance. Scripture implied interpretation, and interpretation research; the key of knowledge once given could not be withdrawn. Melancholy, indeed, is the record of Protestant intolerance. But it was in the teeth of Protestant principles, and of necessity its time was short. It was necessary, however, even in Protestantism, to assert the freedom of the Spirit. What the Montanists had done in the Early Church, what Hubmaier and Franck had done in Germany, Fox and his followers did in England. "To Fox, religion was fundamentally the revelation in the heart of the living Spirit of Christ, witnessed to, and accepted by, the spiritual faculties of man."

> "Now the Lord opened to me (he says) by his invisible power that every man was enlightened by the divine light of Christ, and I saw it shine through all. And they that believed on it came out of condemnation to the light of life, and became the children of God; but they that hated it, and did not believe in it, were condemned by it, though they made a profession of Christ."

There was no privilege, be it noticed, and no exclusion. The distinction was not between those who possessed and those who did not possess the light, but between those who availed and those who did not avail themselves of it; the illumination, if differing in measure, was common to all.

This view of religion was not new: it was a return to primitive teaching. But it involved a radical change of attitude towards ecclesiastical institutions; these became relative, secondary, subordinate to the inward word. It was a re-affirmation by men who had striven in vain for peace, by the way of ordinances, of the truth that the kingdom of God is not in these things.

> "If (said Francis Howgill, 1652) you build on anything or have confidence in anything which stands in time, and is on this side eternity and the Being of beings, your foundation will be swept away, and night will come upon you, and all your gathered-in things and taken-on and imitated will all fail you. . . . Why gad you about? Why trim yourselves with the Saints' words, when you are ignorant of the life? Return, return to Him that is the first love, and the firstborn of every creature, Who is the light of the world. . . . Return home to within: sweep your houses all: the groat is there."

Was it necessary, it may be asked, from this standpoint, to reject the exterior fabric of Christendom—the ministry, the sacraments, and the historic order of the Church? In itself, it was not. These things might have been retained in a changed perspective, and their rejection hindered the expansion of Quakerism, which, though its principles are of universal application, has been found to appeal to men of exceptional rather than average temperament. On the other hand, it is easy, taking human nature as it is, to see how it came about. A note, if it is to be heard in the bustle of life, must be struck strongly: an element of paradox is found in every great teaching, from the Sermon on the Mount downwards, that has influenced men. And at a time when the burden of the letter lay on Christendom as heavily as in the seventeenth century, the violence of the recoil need not surprise us; the bow, over-bent, snapped under the strain. The result was a want of perspective, and at times of balance. Side by side with the great results of the revival was "an intolerance in controversy, a depreciation of the value of intellectual gifts, and a frequent extravagance of conduct under supposed divine impulse." It is to the credit of the society that no moral laxity made its way, under the pretext of spiritual guidance, among its members. There could be no guidance of the Spirit, it was recognised, apart from a walking in the light. In other subject matter discernment was a difficulty. The principle was to leave the responsibility of his action to the individual. Aberration and follies there were, but they were the exception: the endeavor to develop sensitiveness to interior leading was made with what must be pronounced to be singular success. This was so in public, as well as private, life.

> "The continuous effort to refer all things to the guidance of the Spirit gave Friends, just as it gave the Hebrew prophets, a wonderfully clear perception of moral issues. Fox, for example, at a time when the penal code was savage beyond belief, wrote to the judges about the iniquity of putting men to death for small thefts. At Mansfield he spoke to the justices against the oppression caused by their fixing a legal wage for the farm-labourer below what was equitable. He frequently spoke in the markets against deceitful merchandise. As early as the year 1657, he wrote to the Friends beyond sea, who had blacks and Indian slaves, that all had their being in God, Who was the God of the spirits of all flesh, and had made all nations of one blood."

Human nature is much the same under all conditions; there has been a tendency in Quakerism, as elsewhere, to subject initiative to tradition, to regard standards rather than standard bearers. In a society which was founded on a breach with tradition, this tendency was peculiarly mischievous; it stereotyped not the mind of the race, a period, or a nation, but the devisings of a sect. It was temporary: in our own day in no religious body is freedom less fettered and learning less suspect. The risk of individualism on the one hand and of theorising on the other is met, not by authority, but by the gradual working of the common reason, and, on the religious side, of the Spirit. The confidence in human nature which the acceptance of this standpoint implies has, on the whole, been justified: "The light within is just as much a human faculty as is reason in its widest sense; it is the power of a self-conscious person to enter into communion with God. It is also divine, for it is God revealing Himself within us. In the depth of every person the divine and the human meet. As Dr. Rufus Jones has said, "Our souls open inwardly into God." This is what the older Churches and the world at large have to learn from the Friends. The great want of the time in which we live is that of outstanding personalities; if the general level is higher, excellence is rarer than of old. In religious, as in political and social life, opportunism will take us far—for concrete issues depend to a greater extent than moralists readily admit on circumstances—but without conviction opportunism is invertebrate: "It is easy to be broad but shallow, and full of expedients but empty of experience." Against this pseudo-breadth the retirement into the inner sanctuary, familiar to Quakerism, is a preservative.

> "There is nothing better able to clarify the confused half light in which we seem to live than the resolute application of that inward light which shines in the waiting heart. The man who follows this light is learning all the time to have faith in truth, and to accept its dominion over the whole area of life. . . . Further, the conviction of our fathers that opportunity must be made for cultivating the faculty of spiritual vision is a matter of still greater moment in the crowded life of our twentieth century. Meditation was, perhaps, a luxury in more deliberate days; it is a necessity in ours."

THE SCIENCE AND PRACTICE OF INVESTMENTS.

If, as John Morley once said to some enthusiasts for higher education, the first duty of a young man is to learn how to earn his living, perhaps we may be allowed to say (following the same line of thought) that his second duty is to learn how to save, and his third to learn how to invest. Of course, there are hosts of people who can't save, and more who won't. But to the average middle-class man who does not wish to beg or borrow his way through life these remarks are applicable. To live so well within your income that you are able in normal times to save substantial sums is to win economic independence, and with it the materialistic groundwork upon which a higher life can be built. The man who spends more than he has is never his own master. He is economically dependent; and being economically dependent, he can never attain that full measure of social and political freedom to which every good citizen must aspire. Unluckily it often happens that those who have acquired the art of thrift, those who have the ability and strength of mind to save, fail altogether when it comes to the investment of their money.

Many, no doubt, evade the difficulty by insurance—an excellent plan in multitudes of cases. But, even where insurance is essential, the insurer should be careful not to overburden himself with premiums. He should leave a margin for investment, so that he may have at any rate a little liquid capital available in case he is thrown out of work. Insurance against sickness and injury is a very useful and much neglected precaution which costs very little in comparison with insurance against death.

But what about investment? It is really astonishing how many careful, thrifty people lose the whole, or a large part, of their hard-earned savings by mere carelessness. A person who by hard work and thrift manages to save a hundred or two in the course of a year will very likely not give a day's serious thought to the question: "Where shall I place, or to whom shall I lend this money?" Probably as often as not he is persuaded by some untrustworthy acquaintance, or tempted by a bucket-shop advertisement, to buy some rubbishy security, which depreciates until it becomes almost, or entirely, worthless. Even of those who watch the stock markets with interest a goodly number make bad selections and wish too late that, instead of trying to be clever, they had been content with the sweet, but uninteresting, simplicity of a three per cent. security backed by the national guarantee. Yet anyone with common sense and intelligence who cares to devote a little time to what may be called the science or art of investment could probably obtain an average yield of 4½ per cent., together with a fair chance of considerable improvement in capital values.

Unfortunately this art or science of investment is not very easy to learn. Most of its professors have acquired it by sad experience, and some people are so sanguine and impulsive, or so possessed by the gambling mania, that they slip and come to grief over and over again. In fact, the history of Stock Exchange prices—the long, gradual ascents and sharp breaks or rapid slumps—are reflections, as it were, of the speculative careers of individual gamblers. Oddly enough, few theoretical books have been written on the subject, though hundreds of cunning pamphlets, with all the air of scientific treatises, have been composed by the hirelings of bucket shops and similar institutions to relieve innocents of their hard won and easily lost savings. It is therefore with real pleasure that we welcome "A Plain Guide to Investment and Finance,"* which fulfils fairly well the requirements of the man we have been thinking of—the man who knows how to save, but does not know how to invest. Mr. Young, the author, has been even more unfortunate than might have been expected, for, to judge from the absence of citations, it would seem that he has learned nothing from his predecessors. But happily (whether consciously or unconsciously) he follows a beaten track and discovers on his way a great number of fairly obvious, but very practical, truths. This is just what is wanted, and we cordially recommend the book. It contains plenty of valuable information (some of which could not easily be found elsewhere) and a goodly assortment of warnings and precepts. Mr. Young knows something about the Bank of England and the Money Market, something about crises and panics, something about national credit and the causes of its decline, something about the consequences of war, both to trade and securities. He describes the advantage of inscribed stock over bonds, and shows how you can tell from a railway balance sheet the degree of security with which you can count on your interest in the various debentures and preferences.

Perhaps partly by way of summarising, partly of supplementing Mr. Young's praiseworthy work, it may be not impertinent to make one or two additional observations. In the first place it should be observed that first-class Government stocks and bonds, whether home, colonial, or foreign, afford the nearest approach to perfect security. Although your capital may fluctuate, you can count on your fixed interest as a certainty. Nor will such investments necessarily fluctuate in value more than the gold by which they are measured. The taxpayer in a stable country hardly ever fails, however incompetent the ruler for the time being, however wasteful the parliament, however reckless the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is a good deal of ruin in a nation, as Adam Smith once remarked. But a flourishing industrial company may be ruined in a single year by the incompetence, or worse, of its managing director; and a railroad, especially an American railroad, may pass in a single decade from the ranks of the good dividend payers into the hands of a receiver. Except in special cases where the debentures are amply secured by land or buildings, which could not under any readily conceivable circumstances fail to yield the required value, it seems absurd to compare industrial, or even railway debentures, with British Consols, French Rentes, or even German Government bonds. Wars and financial mismanagement may, however, produce very serious depreciation in Government stocks, and it is well to make your investment in times of depression. Again, if foreign loans are chosen, you should distribute your risks so that the losses suffered in one part of the world may be reduced or recovered by gains in another. The most important maxim of all is never to borrow money for the purpose of "investment." It looks an easy way of making money, but those who try it, whether amateurs or professionals, almost invariably come to grief sooner or later. Besides, whoever wishes to enjoy life should have his savings invested in securities which do not cause uneasy nights or feverish yearnings after morning and evening prices.

VISIONS AND VOYAGES.*

An informing method is followed by the scholars whose work Mr. Nutt publishes in the Grimm Library. A typical product of the human mind is given, and round it is grouped a series of studies dealing with its relationships in myth, folk-lore, and literature. The theme of the latest volume of the Grimm Library is the Vision ascribed to Saint Adamnán, and the comparative studies deal with the conceptions of the Other World culminating in the Divine Comedy. Traditions, classical, Oriental, and ecclesiastical, are discussed and related, and the influence of the Irish Imrama and Fisi on the literary tradition is revealed. "An Irish Precursor of Dante" should be read in conjunction with another series of studies in the Grimm Library—"The Voyage of Bran," by Kuno Meyer and Alfred Nutt, for the Fis or Vision developed out of the Imram or Voyage. The Imrama were romances of contact with non-mortal worlds conceived as islands in the West. Such voyages were popular in Irish romance; they were treated with imagination and often with exquisite detail. Christian eschatology came into the Celtic Elysiums; national culture became influenced by the apocalyptic writings, and so the Wonder-Voyage developed into ecclesiastical vision. Both Vision and Voyage had an effect on the literary tradition of Europe. "The Voyage of Saint Brendan" and "The Vision of Tundale" were widely translated.

"The Vision of Adamnán" has many picturesque details. "Six guarded doors confront all of mortal race who would reach the kingdom. At the door of that Heaven which is nearest on the hither side sits the archangel Michael, and with him two youths with iron rods in their laps to scourge and smite the sinners as they pass through this, the first grief and torment of the path they have to tread." The Divine Omnipresence is suggested by a quaint but impressive image. "Now to describe the mighty lord that is upon the throne is not for any, unless He Himself should do so, or should so direct the Heavenly dignitaries . . . Whoso should stand facing about him, East and West, South and North, would behold on each side of him, a majestic countenance, seven times as radiant as the sun. No human form thereto, with head or foot, may be discerned, but a fiery mass burning on for ever." In the Middle World the entrance is closed by a veil of fire and a veil of ice, smiting perpetually, the one against the other. "Faint and dazed are the wicked at the din, howbeit on the side of the Heavenly Host nought is heard of that rude discord save a very little only, and that sweeter than any music." Some details recall passages in Dante. Certain of the damned are fettered to fiery columns, a sea of fire up to the chins, and about their middles fiery chains in the shape of vipers. Rain of fire descends upon some, while others stand in mire up to their girdles, cowls of ice across their faces. There is a river with a whirlpool in which the spirits of those not yet condemned turn round and round. "As soon as the due time cometh for the sinners to be released thereout, the angel strikes the water with a rod, hard as though it were of stone, and uplifts the spirit with the end of the rod."

It is not suggested that Dante had access to "The Vision of Adamnán." The thesis established is that the Irish school created a literary fashion and furnished the Middle Ages with a subject that commended itself to Dante's genius. The criticism of the text would go to prove that the Fis Adamnán was of composite authorship; the original being the well-ordered composition of a powerful and cultured mind. As it has come down to us, the Vision is ascribed to the eleventh, tenth, and ninth centuries. Mr. Boswell's criticism would place the composition near the epoch of the scholar whose name it is associated with. Adamnán is best known as the biographer of Saint Columba (Colm Cille), from whom he was ninth in descent as Abbot of Iona. He died in 704, having figured largely in secular and ecclesiastical affairs. Bede speaks of him as "Vir bonus, et sapiens, et scientia scripturarum nobilissime instructus."

BEFORE AND AFTER.*

In his second novel of colonial life Mr. Hyatt, we are glad to recognise, holds the balance fairly level between white man and black, a feat which he was far from achieving in "Little Brown Brother." His account of Rhodesian life, before and after the war, is typical of the changes that come about in the opening up and settling of new territories in many parts of the globe. The pioneers, explorers, and prospectors escape from civilisation, which they idealise when it is no longer within cry of them, and after taking all the risks of a savage environment and doing all the hard work, the day comes when they are thrust on one side by a crowd of newcomers who reap what they have not sown. The pioneers find they have been the means of introducing a shoddy edition of the civilisation at home. They drift away, for the most part broken men, and, perhaps, begin the same process in another part of the world.

Allingham, the hero, is a Rhodesian transport-rider, who has been out eight years from England, first as a mining engineer in the company's service, and next as a transporter of freight, by bullock wagon, for the mines and townships, through the veldt. His mining experience and natural toughness have stood him in good stead, and he has put by a good sum of money gained in his business and in successful speculations. The story opens with Allingham's arrival at the Marvel mine, where he receives a hint from the manager's wife, Mrs. Ingram, that he is not to speculate on the sanguine tip given him by her husband. The general picture of life on the road is well indicated, with its attractions of roving freedom, sport, good fellowship, and self-reliance, and its negative side, monotony, discomfort, fever, drink, and lack of white women's society. Allingham's meeting with the newly-arrived white woman, Mrs. Ingram, sets going in him a subtle train of discontent, and when he is asked to take down to the Great Ruins two passengers, Mr. Carden, the archæologist, and his daughter Hilary, who have come out at the company's expense to report on the ancient gold workings, he is more than willing. We may say at once that the motive of the novel indicated by the title, "The Marriage of Hilary Carden," though treated in a fairly convincing manner, is of no special artistic interest. Mr. Hyatt's novel is of value, because it offers us many life-like sketches of veld life, and a comparison, carefully drawn, between the old-time conditions and the new. The love plot and the feminine interest merely serve as a framework to hold the series of sketches together. So far as it goes, the picture of the girl Hilary's relations with Allingham is typical enough. Patronage and subtle pity for his lack of "culture" and refinement soon give place to a true understanding of his masculine worth, and then, after her imagination has been fired by his strength and resourcefulness in trekking, the inevitable accident to the transport-rider precipitates her into love. Allingham, who has been knocked down and trampled on by his bullocks, is lamed for life, and when he winds up his affairs and sails for the Old Country it is with the understanding that he and Hilary will marry and settle down to English home life. Mr. Carden, the peevish scholar, who, wrapped up in a sense of the importance of his own archæological researches, is "let in" badly over the Marvel mine, and borrows money from his son-in-law, which he forgets to repay, is also true to life, but as he and his London circle of young scholars, architects, art critics, minor poets, &c., form the background for Allingham's general boredom with English society, they need not detain us. A character of more significance, though a little stiff in drawing, is Cuthbert Lestrange, the grim director of the Marvel mine, who, by opening the mines, and bringing the railway up country, breaks the pioneers and early prospectors and traders, who cannot compete with the Government and the big companies. Of the old-time pioneers we have some capital thumb-nail sketches, such as Father Martin, the oldest inhabitant and original founder of Fort Alexandra, with his mixed functions of "coach agent, auctioneer, cattle dealer, and general financier to the township," and Kerridge, the old prospector who has discovered and pegged out hundreds of claims in the Marvel district, and then, as he has had no money to pay the big Government inspection fees, has seen all his titles lapse and the claims re-pegged in the big companies' names. A third is Daddy Hurst, the commission agent, who is always waiting for the boom to come to Fort Alexandra, when everyone will reap a large profit on their land investments. Hurst, with two other men, all that remain of the old crowd who knew Jack Allingham, is left, on the last page, drinking good-luck to Jack's child, and saying "We ought to be able to do something handsome for her when the boom comes, eh?" Fort Alexandra itself, no doubt a typical Rhodesian town, consisted, in the official plan, of six streets crossed by ten avenues and a market square with stands for a church, market-hall, school, and museum. But, in fact, the town, which boasted of a population of seventy-two whites and a cemetery with a hundred and fifty graves, consists of a hotel, a coach agent's office, two red brick trading stores, a grass hut, two tin shanties, six brick and tin buildings, and some wattle-and-dab huts. The methods of Leary & Co., the chief traders, who got the small settlers "heavily into their debt, took over the grain in settlement at a starvation rate, and insisted on paying any balance, not in cash, but in trading goods or Port Elizabeth whisky—i.e., raw potato spirit," are illustrated by the story of a ruined white trader, who has died in a deserted camp which Allingham and the Cardens pass when on trek. The poor devil has had his gun taken by Leary & Co. for part of his debt, and, trying to live on mealie meal and sugar, gets two attacks of fever, while Leary & Co., do not stir a finger to aid him. The sequel is told in Kerridge's words: "When a transport-rider came down a week later a hyæna ran out of the hut."

It is difficult to gather from Mr. Hyatt's pages a clear view of native life and what the Mashona tribes may have gained or lost under white rule. He gives us a sympathetic sketch of old Swartboy, Allingham's Basuto head driver, who foretells that the mines and the railway will drive away the game and break up the life of the road, and who, on meeting his Baas again, after the Transvaal War, sums up the situation thus, "All they know is meat and trains and machines-which-never-stop-making-a-noise." The picture of the decline of Buluwayo market, if we are to accept it, is certainly disillusioning: "Instead of the four hundred white men he had expected, there were half-a-dozen down-at-heel Britishers standing on the outskirts of a little crowd of Greeks, Russian Jews, coolies, and natives." And more gloomy still is the narrative of the fate of the village and family of Malongesa, the Mashona, after the Marvel mine starts operations, and the boys are working in the compound and the native women are "wanting to see things." It is scarcely a tribute to Mr. Hyatt's art that all the characters whom we meet in the first part of his story should, after an interim of five years, turn up casually and conveniently in the last to recount their experiences; but, as the book is one with a purpose, we readily grant that his writing is as workmanlike as the pictures themselves are humanly interesting:—

> The white man leaned forward to catch his words.
> "So you have been in prison, Malongesa? What was that for?"
> Malongesa looked away. "You remember my daughters, chief?" he said at last. "You chased two white men away from them, and had you stayed, all would have been well. But when you were gone those same white men came, many, many times, though I knew nothing of it, until at last I found there would still be children." He paused, and stared at the ground, then went on again. "I found that out, and yet, as you know, both were promised in marriage, and I had already got some of the cattle to be paid for them. I was disgraced, chief, all the country-side knew it; and I could not return the cattle, for one I had already sold to pay taxes to the mine."
> "What did you do?" Allingham asked, gently.
> Malongesa's bleary eyes flashed for a moment, then the fire died away again. "One of my daughters escaped, but one I found and slew, according to our law. Then the police took me, and I heard I should be hanged in the white man's way; but the great chief at the mine"—he mentioned Lestrange's native name—"he interfered, and, instead, they put me in prison for three years; at least they said it was three years. All I know is, I was old like this when I came out of the stone walls." He tried to draw his bit of blanket round him, and, though the day was warm, he shivered, possibly at the recollection of the awful confinement in the close prison, infinitely more terrible to a savage than to a civilised man. "I came back here," he went on, in a low monotone, "and found my village like this. They thought they would never see me again, and they fled down to the low country. But my wife had died of sorrow for me, and I had no children left. So I stayed here, in a little creek behind that great boulder, and there I shall die. My food, chief? There is another village in those hills near by, and the women bring me food, secretly. If the police knew I was here they would drive me out, because, they say, every man must live in a village, so that he can be made to pay taxes. But this is my village, chief. Here I was born, as my father, and my father's father before him, and here I shall die. I know no other place, and I am no more alone here than I should be anywhere else. . . . Am I not afraid of lions, chief? Why should I be? There are no lions now; the machine which never stops has driven away all the game, just as it has driven away the black folk."
> Allingham got up abruptly, and paced to and fro. He was in a raging passion against everyone connected with the mines, but most of all against Philip Carden, Hilary's own brother, who had done this vile thing. As he looked round at the desolate village, and the broken-down figure squatting on the ground, he was bitterly ashamed of the men of his own color. Suddenly there came back to him all the hopeful platitudes he had heard from the lips of Mr. Carden and his kind, about Civilisation and the March of Progress, and light in Darkest Africa. And this was typical of the results of progress—some piles of ashes, a tangle of wild pumpkins, a childless, heartbroken old man, shivering under the remnant of a shoddy trade blanket, and in the distance the Marvel mine grinding out dividends for shareholders six thousand miles away."

Lestrange holds that this stage of economic development is only transitional. Men who will build homes are to people Rhodesia. "We shall have settlers instead of employés; British traders instead of Greeks and Germans." We hope so; but much depends on whether the mines hold out, and how long.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

The current "Quarterly Review" contains plenty of authoritative matter. Prof. Poulton writes on "The Centenary of Darwin: Darwin and his Modern Critics," giving an interesting account of the intellectual public's reception of the "Origin of Species," and other works, and reviewing the theories, on Darwinian lines, of Weismann, De Vries, and Mendel. "A Journal of the French Revolution," by Mr. Austin Dobson, is the memoir of Cléry, the faithful Royalist attendant who witnessed the last days of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. An article by the late Father Tyrrell, on "The Mystical Element of Religion," which is àpropos of three recent works by Baron F. von Hügel, Miss Caroline Stephen, and Mr. Edward Grubb, is a fine literary exposition of an elusive subject. Mr. F. Y. Eccles writes with authority on "Recent French Poetry," uttering a plea for a wider English recognition of the French poetic genius; Sir Martin Conway deals historically with "Early Flemish Painters"; and the Hon. Maurice Baring contrasts Tolstoy and Turgenieff. There are two articles devoted to the Budget, and one, Mr. Malkin's "Privileges of the House of Commons," is closely connected with that subject. The more important of the other two is Sir R. Giffen's "Recent Finance and the Budget." He takes the, by this time, more or less obvious view that the Finance Bill is not so revolutionary as its rejection by the Lords would be, and counsels the Upper House to adopt a "Fabian policy" "for the sake of the Conservative and Unionist party, as well as for the good of the State." Mr. J. A. R. Marriott writes on "Canning and his Friends." The second and concluding article on the "Centenary of the Quarterly Review" is illustrated with photographs of Gladstone, the late Lord Salisbury, the third John Murray, and other famous men connected with the publication in the past.

Writing in the "Fortnightly Review," "Excubitor" criticises the qualifications of "Lord Charles Beresford as Naval Expert," and his article, well reasoned and extremely moderate in tone, sheds a good deal of fresh light on the Beresford-Fisher controversy. Under the title of "Political Assassination in London," Mr. J. D. Rees inveighs against the friends and supporters of Indian freedom in the British Parliament, and is ironical on the subject of Mr. Bannerjee, without, however, proving more than what most people know already, viz., that a quantity of intemperate writing is published in the "Indian Sociologist" and other nationalist papers. The literary articles are more interesting than the political. Mr. B. W. Matz's reminiscences of "George Meredith as Publisher's Reader" are full of good things. Meredith became reader to Messrs. Chapman & Hall in 1860 and retained this position until about twelve years ago. His standard was "tremendously high"; many living authors, whose work has since gained much popular favor, have had their MSS. rejected by him. His "opinions," here revealed, are full of piquant and often caustic comment. Mr. Francis Gribble writes with his usual power to charm on "Chateaubriand's Third and Fourth Loves"—Madame de Custine and Madame de Noailles; the Rev. H. W. Clark has a well-balanced and well-written article on Tennyson; Mrs. Arthur Harter traces the "Influence of Italy on the Poetry of the Brownings"; Mr. Maurice Hewlett continues his "Letters to Sanchia"; Prof. W. Rhys Roberts defends "Porson and Jebb" as real men of letters, and not the mere verbalists which German and some English critics have sometimes thought them; and Mr. Kaufmann Spiers contributes a poem in blank verse, "The Madness of Launcelot."

The "Nineteenth Century and After," poorer and thinner than under its founder's rule, begins with an article on the "Foundations of Indian Loyalty," written by Sir Bampfylde Fuller, late Lieutenant-Governor of Eastern Bengal. The subjects with which he deals chiefly are the partition of Bengal, the reforms of the Indian Constitution, and the claims of the Mohammedans; and he endeavors to show that our present troubles in India, with which these subjects are closely connected, have proceeded from "a change in our views as to the claims which England has upon India's loyalty. Until recently it has been our assumption that we were obeyed because we deserved our obedience. We have now been apprehending that obedience can only be secured by negotiation, by the grant of concessions to those that may clamor for them." Concerning the changes made by Lord Morley, "there can be no question of their untimeliness, and of the harm which has been caused by the method of their introduction." Sir Bampfylde Fuller, it will be remembered, resigned on account of a difference of opinion on the Bengal question with the home Government, and it is therefore quite natural that he should write that "it was really almost suicidal to abandon an officer who had come to be regarded as standing for the maintenance of law and order." Mr. J. A. R. Marriott divides his article on "The House of Lords and the Budget" into two sections, the first of which asks, "What can the Lords do with the Budget, and the second, "What ought they to do?" Under the former he gives a resumé of the constitutional history affecting this question, and under the latter urges the Upper House to treat the land clauses as a separate Bill, and reject them, and to revise, or, on the same grounds, reject the proposal to abolish the Sinking Fund. The advice, in view of recent events, will probably be very well weighed before it is followed, especially as it is tendered without authority. Dr. Dillon writes much on Russia, never convincingly. The Tennyson Centenary is the subject of an essay by Mr. Frederic Harrison; in "The 'Native' Problem and Sane Imperialism," Mr. H. H. Johnston makes a temperate plea for a Liberal policy in India and Africa; Mr. Roderick Jones takes the opposite view in "South African Union and the Color Question"; Sir Edward Sullivan writes on Francis Bacon as a poet, the Hon. John Collier on the "slump" in modern art, and Mr. W. H. Mallock has a third article on "The Missing Essentials in Economic Science."

Only in the "Contemporary Review" is the subject of "The Lords and the Budget" given first place. Mr. Harold Spender is the writer. Beginning with a division of Tory politicians into "elder" and "younger" sections, he analyses the opposition displayed by both, and explains the constitutional effects of the rejection of the Bill; emphasises the value of precedents, and meets the "tacking argument" and others brought forward by the opponents of the measure. The other articles of social or political significance are the third of an admirable series on "The Causes of Unemployment," by Mr. H. Stanley Jevons, and a quaint sketch of "Foreign Affairs," by Dr. Dillon. Mr. Jevons discusses "Trade Fluctuations and Solar Activity" in their relation to unemployment, elaborating his theory of the physical influence of weather upon trade depression and its opposite with tables of statistics and graphs. In a short article Mr. W. Maxwell-Lyte indicates the main differences between Belgian and British Oarsmanship; Mr. W. A. Moore gives a spirited account of the "Siege of Tabriz"; the translation of an address to the representatives of British Churches, delivered by Dr. Adolf Harnack at Berlin University, treats of "International and National Christian Literature"; a Chinese character study, entitled "A Chinese Solomon," is contributed by Sir J. George Scott; the Count S C. de Soissons writes on Brunetière, and Dr. W. R. Hadwen on "Malta Fever and Goats' Milk." The translation of a letter to Count Tolstoy from Vladimir Solovieff, the Russian philosopher, has a strong religious interest. It was written in 1894-5, when Tolstoy's religious opinions were not as definite as now, and is designed to prove the logical necessity of the Resurrection.

In the "National Review" the first place is given to an article entitled, "The Surrender of the Sea Lords," by "Navalis," in which the author sets out to show "how, with the full consent of these distinguished officers the British Fleet has been steadily whittled down as the German Fleet has been steadily increased." Sea power having been "sacrificed to satisfy the Socialists," nothing apparently will content "Navalis" but the resignation of all the officers concerned. The article is concluded with a tabulated statement designed to show the relative strength of the German and British Fleets in 1904 and 1909, examination of which reveals it as a shining example of the arbitrary manipulation of figures. Sir J. Bampfylde Fuller follows with "The New Dispensation in Turkey." The author is of opinion that the Greek inhabitants will give trouble in the matter of compulsory military service, pointing out that the Constitution scheme of mixing troops of all religions in the ranks is unacceptable to the Greek Christian. He suggests the formation of class companies as a solution of the difficulty. His forecast in regard to the Cretan question is borne out by recent happenings. The compulsory teaching of Turkish in the schools is also opposed by the Greek section of the population. "The Emperor of To-morrow," by Mr. André Mévil, deals with the political prospects of Prince Franz Ferdinand, the probable successor to the Emperor Francis Joseph; Mr. Frank Fox, commiserating "The Burdened Landowner of England," draws a somewhat fantastic comparison between English and Australian conditions of land occupation, in order to emphasise his contention that the British Government should subsidise the farmer; in "The Eternal Servant Problem" Miss Elizabeth Tytler advocates a Domestic Servant Trade Union; and "The Pampering of Prisoners," by "One of the Pampered," is a plea for their "more hard and more dour" treatment. Mr. A. Maurice Low contributes a general article on "American Affairs" and American temperament, and the last item of importance is Mr. J. A. Hobson's enquiry, "Can Protection Cure Unemployment?"—in which he proves very conclusively that Tariff Reform cannot.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond is the most distinguished living lady climber, and has been elected to the position of the President of the new Ladies' Alpine Club, which will some day doubtless put the old Alpine Club into the shade. She has produced a large number of very readable Alpine books, mainly consisting of collections of famous Alpine stories. But in "Mountaineering in the Land of the Midnight Sun" (Unwin, 10s. 6d. net), she gives us an account of original adventures in the far North. Mrs. Le Blond's book is a delightful, easy, record of easy adventures with little that is very thrilling, and fortunately free from that element of death and disaster which some writers seem to think must be brought into every book about the mountains. Driven from the Alps by the lamentable death of young Imboden on the Lyskamm, the writer some years ago found her way to Lapland, as a relief and change, and she has visited it every year since that time. The climbs seem to be of that middle order which are neither dull nor dangerous, and afford a certain amount of pleasurable activity both on snow and rock, combined with a large amount of beautiful scenery. The country has some obvious advantages. During the summer the sun never sets, and therefore you can climb either by night or by day. For where the sun is there you can rest without danger. That alone is a tremendous attraction. Another advantage of Norwegian climbing is that you reach the snow much more rapidly than in Switzerland. The snow level varies in every part of the world, from 15,000 feet in Southern America to 8,000 feet in Switzerland and 4,000 feet in Norway. Those, therefore, who love snow-climbing, will find the northern part of Norway a Paradise. They will, perhaps, miss the gigantic splendor of the higher Alps, but they will be able to spend days and nights on the snow without that terrible fatigue which is the drawback of Alpine climbing with so many people. Another great attraction attached to climbing in Norway is the charm and simplicity of the country. Norway is the home of "plain living and high thinking," and in these northern parts the ancient rules of hospitality still prevail. Southern Norway has, of course, been terribly invaded of recent years by the touristry of Europe; but the Far North is still little touched by the vulgarity of the southern world. The streams are still packed with trout which you can get for the fishing. You may still camp on the hills without being warned off as a trespasser. Above all, you are not divided from the people by that screen of hotel life which debars the modern tourist from bringing back any knowledge from his tours, as effectually as a gilded cage debars a bird from knowing the world. Mrs. Le Blond's book should attract more climbers to that region. It is excellently illustrated, simply written, and attractively got up.

The "Speaker's Commentary," in its New Testament section, only produced three contributions of any permanent value, Dr. E. H. Gifford's edition of Romans, Canon Evans' notes on First Corinthians, and Bishop Westcott's commentary upon John's Gospel. A work of this kind is inevitably unequal. Its parts vary in value, "one of a hundred oxen's price, the other but of nine"; and perhaps the "Speaker's Commentary" did not fall very far below the average of such literary enterprises. These three items, at any rate, saved it from disrepute by their accurate scholarship and distinction of treatment. The late Dr. Brooke Foss Westcott's commentary, "The Gospel According to St. John" (Murray, two volumes, 24s. net.), which was soon reprinted in separate form, became one of his most popular books. He was too verbal and too timid in intellect to be a mystic, but there was a tinge in his mind of what may be called—for lack of any better term—a Christian "mysticism," a sensitiveness to the inward bearing of doctrines, and the subtler elements of the Fourth Gospel formed a fairly congenial sphere for the exercise of this quality. Westcott's strength did not lie in commenting, but his "John" is better than any other of his editions. The basis of this commentary, however, was the Authorised Version. Now, West-

Those who are desirous of choosing a profession, either for themselves or those connected with them, cannot do better at the present time than direct their thoughts towards the path of Journalism. The modern spread of education has resulted in a demand for reading matter of every description, covering every conceivable subject, and appealing to every possible class. In consequence, there has been a marvellous increase in the output of British literary matter, but still the supply is not equal to the demand.

cott had already undertaken the Johannine writings for the tripartite commentary upon the Greek New Testament, which he had planned in conjunction with Hort and Lightfoot. He continued to work spasmodically at this project, recasting his English notes. But barely half of the notes were revised, when he died. The work, as now issued, contains the introduction, practically unaltered, and the commentary in its partially unrevised form. His son, who has performed the pious task of editing the work, has printed the Revised Version, in addition to the Greek text, and added selected readings from the Greek uncial manuscripts. The publication of unfinished work after an author's death is always a risk to his reputation. The issue of these two expensive volumes of Westcott's "John" raises a stubborn doubt. Do these volumes really contain anything of permanent value, which could not be got from the shorter and cheaper English edition? Frankly, we are obliged to answer in the negative. Had the learned author been able to complete the work, and especially to re-cast the Introduction, in view of the vast amount of contemporary research into the Johannine problem, it would have been another matter, although even then one is very doubtful whether Westcott's mind was sufficiently elastic and penetrating to face the newer problems of Johannine criticism. As it is, however, this commentary is by no means satisfactory. It is neither adequate in method nor up to date. Anything Westcott had to say upon the Fourth Gospel can be got more easily and economically in his English commentary, and the English student who wants notes on the Greek text must be referred to Dr. Plummer's compact edition in the "Cambridge Greek Testament," until Dr. Bernard's volume in the "International Critical Commentary" appears. The ordinary scholar will turn over the pages of this work with a certain surprise; few things will make him realise more forcibly how rapid has been the advance in the criticism of the Fourth Gospel throughout this country since the days when "Westcott's John" was hailed as the high-water mark of English scholarship in this department.

The last few days have brought much encouragement. A spell of ideal weather has ripened the harvest, and we can almost count on an exceptionally heavy wheat and barley crop. The latest telegrams from the United States, as well as from Canadian corn belt, are also most promising, and there is now good reason to hope that more moderate prices for food will prevail in the ensuing autumn and winter. Equally encouraging are the July returns of the Board of Trade, showing an increase of nearly $6\frac{1}{2}$ millions over last July, and an improvement of nearly a million over June. We now stand midway between the boom of midsummer, 1907, and the depression of midsummer, 1908. Our exports of textiles are over a million up, of iron and steel goods £300,000, while electrical goods, apparel, chemicals and leather all show substantial advances.

Home Railway Economies.

Perhaps the most surprising feature of this year's business on the Stock Exchange has been the activity of speculation as opposed to investment. The speculative markets were the first to benefit from cheap money, and all through the spring and summer business has been far brisker in the gambling sections of the Stock Exchange than elsewhere. A good illustration of this is found in the American and the Home Railway markets, in the first of which prices are constantly rising without any obviously sound reason, while in the second, in spite of a whole batch of "bull" points the stocks are still hopelessly neglected. I do not think that this neglect can last much longer, for the working of the last half-year was really wonderfully good, and the working of the present half is likely to be a good deal better. The economies that have been effected are quite remarkable, and, in spite of the heavy decline in traffic, net receipts are well above those of the first six months of 1908. According to a rough calculation based on a number of reports, the average proportion of working expenses to gross receipts has fallen from about 70 to about 65 per cent.—a very welcome change from the recent records of English railways. Of course, the fall in the price of coal has helped the companies enormously, and this particular economy is not likely to last long with a recovery of trade; but there is a more substantial and more permanent change in the reduction of mileage, the average difference between the number of miles run last half-year and in the corresponding half of 1908 being roughly about 3 per cent. It is to be hoped that this change denotes better management and more business-like control. The wages bill has fallen, too, and as the rates of wages have not been cut down, there must have been a considerable "retrenchment" in the number of hands. Whether this policy of reducing the staffs can be maintained seems doubtful, as one or two lines have already carried it to rather a dangerous point. Altogether, the small rise in Home railway prices seems out of proportion to the large saving in Home railway expenses.

President Diaz.

As Mr. Enoch reminds us in his book on Mexico (recently published by Mr. Fisher Unwin), General Porfirio Diaz is now serving his seventh term as President of the Mexican Republic. He is nearly eighty years of age, and one is not surprised to see fresh rumors of his impending retirement. The story is that, after his re-election this autumn, he will make a voyage to Europe and then resign. But this plan depends upon his friend, Señor Corral, being elected to the Vice-Presidency; a contingency by no means certain, as a strong popular faction is supporting the claims of a certain General Reyes, who is popular in his own province of Jualisca, and appears to hold the affections of the Mexican mob in many of the towns. A great amount of French, English and American capital is now invested in the railways, mines, and industrial undertakings of Mexico, owing to the confidence engendered by the firm and rather stern dictatorship of Diaz. It would be a real misfortune if an unprincipled adventurer were to lead the still uneducated and ignorant natives into an anti-foreign campaign. But there is certainly a risk of it. There has already been some serious rioting in a town with an unpronounceable name, and reports show that the "Reyists" were in an immense majority. British investors in Mexico are very badly served by the news agencies, and they would do well to take stock of the situation.

From the United States.

To judge by a recent report from Pittsburg, conditions in the United States are favorable to a revival in trade. The advent of August, it is said, finds general business and financial conditions fairly satisfactory. In the month just closed the weather was favorable for the maturity of two crops of a market value exceeding $1,000,000,000—winter wheat and hay being harvested under favorable conditions. The yield and quality of winter wheat were much above expectations, while the yield of hay was above the average. As at present indicated, the yield of maize and oats will establish a high record. The critical period for maize is August and September—the former month being liable to drought and the latter to early frost. At the present time, however, the average condition is so high and the acreage so largely in excess of the previous records, that there is ample margin of safety to cover any ordinary adverse development which may attend the maturity of the crop. Cotton is the only important crop that is likely to fall below the average, but the recent advance in market value of the staple will bring the total value of a reduced crop up to the average of former years. Summarising agricultural conditions and prospects, it is said that they are "almost ideal," from a producer's standpoint. Nevertheless, bankers on the other side hold that a very big advance in trade has already been discounted by Wall Street quotations.

Diary of the Week.

Something like a political earthquake has passed over the land, which has almost submerged Tariff Reform, and left the Budget the most conspicuous object in the landscape. A great volume of evidence testifies to its sensational popularity. The Limehouse speech has, perhaps, produced a keener popular interest than any public utterance since Gladstone's Home Rule orations, or John Bright's addresses to the people of Birmingham. Hundreds of thousands of copies of it have been struck off the press and sold as rapidly as they have been printed, and the total sale has passed three-quarters of a million. From all parts of the country come reports of the complete failure of the hostile agitation. A great protest meeting at Manchester was practically broken up, and Mr. Joynson Hicks's speech abandoned, while from various centres Conservative organisers have seen resolutions carried against them, or only passed by narrow majorities. The Editor of the "Ulster Guardian" writes to the "Manchester Guardian" to say that the Unionist workmen of Ulster support the land taxes, and that many of their leaders are with them. A weight of testimony, indeed, confirms the wisdom of the "Daily Mail" in withdrawing its forces in time from a lost cause. It seems probable that, though the Lords may not throw out the Budget, an appeal to the country will not be delayed much beyond the opening of the New Year.

Meanwhile, the Budget is making steady and significant progress through the House. The date for its passage is fixed at September 17th, or October 2nd. The new series of taxes on mineral royalties have been postponed to the end of the Committee, and, as they must then be assimilated to the land taxes, their discussion cannot fail to be important. The debates on the land taxes are practically over, thanks largely to an heroic sitting of eighteen hours, which lasted from Tuesday afternoon to nine o'clock on Wednesday morning, and in which seven clauses were passed. The duties on liquor licences, which come next, will be chiefly defended in the House by the Prime Minister. The Opposition's chief argument has been Mr. Pretyman's and Mr. Balfour's contention that the cost of valuation would destroy, or nearly destroy, the first year's yield of the land taxes. The Prime Minister's answer was, even if this were true, the House had a perfect right to set up machinery more costly than the preliminary yield of a tax, and that it actually did this in the case of the legacy and succession duties. Such expenditure is, of course, no more uneconomic than the laying down of plant in a cotton-mill, or the building of compounds for the reception of Chinese or Kaffir mine laborers.

On Friday week the Prime Minister, at a great open-air meeting at Bletchley, made a brilliant and uncompromising defence of the Budget, in which he declared that finance held the key both to the present and the future of politics. The Budget looked well into the future, and it called on all forms of property to make an equitable but not an excessive contribution to its needs. The land taxes had been safe-guarded not only against abuse, but even unintentional mistake. He treated as "nonsense" Mr. Balfour's argument that because the Finance Bill provided the machinery as well as the source of taxation, it was therefore unconstitutional. The Commons' power to tax would be meaningless unless it were coupled with the power to devise the means to tax. Such a complaint was specially foolish in the mouth of the Protectionists, the collection of whose taxes involved the preliminary employment of "an army of officials and spies."

The Union of South Africa Bill has been passed through all its stages in the House of Commons as well as the House of Lords, and emerges unchanged in intent and wording. This result, however, was only achieved by the hardest riding on the part of the Government, for the House and the majority, deeply sympathetic to the policy and the act of union, pronounced an absolutely unanimous disapproval of the color bar, and by the mouth of the Prime Minister made a direct appeal to South African statesmanship to abolish it.

On the other hand, the Bill was treated throughout as under the rule of verbal inspiration. The Ministerial whip contained a plain statement that the Government would accept no amendments, and Mr. Asquith revealed a communication from Mr. Merriman, the Cape Premier, saying that the delegates had no power to adopt any amendment removing the color bar, and that any such change must be referred to the local legislatures, which might not accept it, and to a referendum in Natal—whose policy has been the main origin of the trouble. Even with this strong lead, 55 Liberals, Nationalists, and Labor men voted for an amendment of Mr. Barnes, limiting the disqualification for senators of the Union Parliament to the Transvaal and the Orange Colony, and removing it from the Cape and Natal, where it does not now exist. 155 members supported the Government. Perhaps the most impressive phrase in the debate was used by Mr. Cox, who said that the insertion of the color bar "would have excluded the founders of every great religion in the world. No great religion had been founded by men of European descent. Ex Oriente lux." Sir Charles Dilke also said that the Empire had turned its back, probably for ever, on "its great past," while others asked whether, if troubles arose with the South African natives, British troops would be employed to settle them. But the third reading was passed without a division, subject to an informal appeal to white South Africa. The Prince of Wales is to open the Union Parliament.

THE Imperial Defence Conference closed on Thursday, and the independent Colonial point of view has prevailed. Both Canada and Australia are to develop their own local navies and have them under their own control, though in time of war they may decide to transfer them to the Admiralty. The Canadian scheme is to embrace both Pacific and Atlantic defence—a point not without bearing on the Anglo-Japanese alliance. The offer of "Dreadnoughts" from Australia and New Zealand is modified. Both Colonies are to contribute fast cruisers instead, the "Australian" to be part of the Australian Navy, the "New Zealand" part of the Pacific Squadron. This change is wholly sound. The offer of "Dreadnoughts" was made under a complete misapprehension of the naval situation, induced by a grotesque agitation; it was disliked in Australia; it imposed a heavy burden, and the belief was widely held that the money would be better spent on establishing a local navy. The new scheme has the advantage of satisfying Colonial nationalism and Colonial control while providing for Imperial training and co-ordination.

THE sub-Committee of the Committee of Defence appointed to consider Lord Charles Beresford's complaints of naval organisation during his command of the Channel Fleet (1907 to 1909) have found against him on all three counts—that the fleet was unorganised for war, that it was too weak through the excessive dispersion of force and withdrawal of ships for repair, and that it was not subject to a general strategical plan. The Committee conclude that the country was in no danger from any of these causes, though they admit difficulties arising from a general plan of re-organisation, and say that the existing forces were always much stronger than any possible enemy. The one unsatisfactory point seems to be that in September, 1908, the number of battleships was reduced from fourteen to six. This does not suggest good management.

WE observe that some Liberal criticism of two recent changes in the Budget is based on misapprehensions which it is necessary to correct. It is not true, for example, to suggest that the transference of the cost of valuation from the landowner to the State does away with the case for the franking of the first 10 per cent. increment. It is fair to remember that Mr. Lloyd George allowed these exemptions on the ground that it was proper to make some allowance for legal charges and for interest. His concession on this score is less sweeping than that made by the city of Frankfort, which allows 4 per cent. for interest, 5 per cent. for legal charges, and also 15 per cent. from the total value. The Chancellor's reduction of 10 per cent., on the other hand, is merely on the site value. It is the recurring franking of 10 per cent. increments which strikes us as now unnecessary, and we hope this will be eliminated.

THERE has been a similar misconstruction of the pledge to exempt five acres of garden from the undeveloped land tax, though not from the increment duty. There is no absolute exemption, and the incidence of the tax will depend on the proportion which the value of the garden space bears to the value of the house. Only if that proportion be a low one, will the owner secure exemption. The exact line of taxation is discovered by reference to the valuation under Schedule A. Thus, suppose a house and garden is valued under Schedule A at £200 a year. Multiplied by 20 this gives a capital value of £4,000. If the separate value of the five acres of garden is found not to exceed £4,000, they will be exempt. If it exceeds that sum they will be liable to the development tax. The tax thus puts the greater burden on site value than on bricks and mortar, which seems to be entirely just.

THE Duke of Northumberland has entered into an amusing controversy with Sir Edward Grey. After expressing his delight that he has to deal with "a gentleman" [this is the Duke's satire], he asks Sir Edward to be so good as to tell him how he and his brother Dukes can possibly recoup themselves from the taxation of the Budget by expenditure that will not press hardly on others, and inquires whether he is to do this by saving on his deer, his home farms, his gardens, his houses, his game, or his subscription to the hunt. In return, Sir Edward Grey presents him, and other large owners of his type, with several such ways of recoupment. Thus he can give up or sub-let his Scottish sporting rights, let or sell his superfluous houses, turn some sporting rights or amenities into cash, or, in the last resort, go to work himself. Sir Edward adds that none of these retrenchments will involve as serious personal hardship as the poor man's abstinence from tobacco or alcohol. As for the general effect of diminishing expenditure on luxuries, unemployment need not occur in cases where land held wholly or partly for pleasure and sport would be used wholly for profit. The Duke retorts that the only one of Sir Edward's suggestions which he can follow is to let or sell one of his houses or estates, or let the shooting or fishing in his park, and adds that his tenants might object to the first, and that no large sum could accrue from the second.

THE Cretan difficulty has probably been settled. On Wednesday four bluejackets, representing each of the protecting Powers, cut down the mast of the Greek flag at Canea, the populace assenting. At Candia, on the other hand, some Cretan gendarmes who removed the flag were opposed by a body of revolting Cretan militia. They re-hoisted the flag, which is now guarded by the populace. Probably the four bluejackets will be again requisitioned. Turkey is said to be dropping her menacing language to Greece, and none too soon, though the boycott of Greek goods at Smyrna—which is largely a Greek city—and elsewhere continues. The Powers are said to have presented the Turkish Government with a strong Note of remonstrance. It is clear that Turkey will not be allowed to make war on Greece.

THE strike in Sweden continues, and it is clear that the early reports of the collapse or defeat of the strikers were exaggerated. Much, for instance, was made of the running of the trams and the re-appearance of cabs in the streets, but it turns out that the cabmen were forced to work by the police threatening to withdraw their licenses, and that the trams running are few and their passengers in many cases paid to travel. The strikers who have returned to work are not numerous, and they are all non-union men; the unionists remain loyal to their leaders. The union strike funds have hardly been touched yet, for the men have been living on their savings, and the prohibition of the sale of liquor has helped them to husband their resources. Considerable help, too, is coming from abroad. The strikers can hold out for a long time yet, and even their strongest critics are realising that a one-sided victory by the masters is hardly possible. That fact, and the heavy loss to industry, are provoking a movement in favor of Government or Parliamentary intervention.

The new Mahdi in the Yemen, Mohammed Idris, is causing serious trouble. He has wiped out a detachment of Turkish troops, and compelled the Government to send large reinforcements. This disturbance comes just at the moment when the Parliamentary Commission has evolved a system of autonomy for the Yemen which satisfies the Imam Yahiya, who led the rebellions of 1904-8. The Yemen is to be divided into two provinces, one including the mountain districts, the other the plain and the sea-coast. The first is to be ruled by the Imam, the second by a governor appointed by the Sultan. In both provinces the judges and officials are to be popularly elected, and the revenue is to be devoted to local purposes, though the Budgets are to be approved by the Central Government. This is an ample scheme of autonomy, which is bound to be used as an argument by the Christian nationalities. These, unlike the Arabs of the Yemen, have not territorial homogeneity, and cannot expect political autonomy; but they are claiming liberty of language and education, and it will be hard for the Young Turks to deny this to Armenians, Greeks and Bulgarians, when they offer so much more to Arabs.

A few weeks ago, when the Spanish and French Special Missions to Fez were finding the Sultan hard to squeeze, the Press was full of telegrams to the effect that the Roghi was on the outskirts of the capital and the fall of Mulai Hafid imminent. The latest news is that the Sultan's forces have smashed the Roghi, whose power is completely broken. Clearly both the strength and the revolution of Mulai Hafid have been grossly under-rated, a point of great importance if, as appears to be the case, he has protested to the Powers against the Spanish advance into the Riff country. The Spanish, however, are paying no heed to his protests. They have now 30,000 men at Melilla, and are about to enter on extensive, though undisclosed, operations. Mr. Harris, the well-known "Times" Tangier correspondent, claims that in this piratical adventure on behalf of a couple of shady mining speculations, Spain is the banner-bearer of Christian Europe.

The Sultan has given special permission for the passage through the Dardanelles of the Russian warships which are to escort the Tsar to Italy. Relaxations of the general veto have been frequently made before; the German Press, however, declares that the permanent opening of the Dardanelles to Russian warships was discussed at Cowes. This has been semi-officially denied, but the "Temps" says that though no agreement was made at Cowes an agreement was contemplated. If the "Temps'" information is correct, the Cowes meeting is raised from an affair of courtesy to an affair of international importance. It indicates the drawing tighter of the relations between this country and Russia, and an effort to convert the entente into something a good deal more intimate. The opening of the Dardanelles would mean the abandonment by England in deference to Russia of a principle to which she has clung for a century.

Dhingra, the murderer of Sir Curzon Wylie, was executed on Tuesday morning, the Press being excluded. It appears that he made a statement rejecting the idea of conspiracy, and declaring that he had acted in revenge for the hangings and deportations of "patriotic Indian youths." "I have," he said, "consulted none but my own conscience: I have conspired with none but my own duty." Mr. Mackarness points out in the "Times" that this accords with the expressed official view of the Indian Government, that Dhingra's crime was "the isolated action of a fanatic."

New Zealand has adult suffrage, and at the General Election in 1905 there were 263,597 male voters, as against 212,876 female voters. The latest figures show a rapid increase in the number of women voters, and it is calculated that in twenty-five years they will be in a majority. This prediction is necessarily venturesome, but already in 17 constituencies the women voters outnumber the men. The New Zealand Attorney-General has been discussing the effect of female suffrage on politics and on the position of women. At present the chief political interest of the women is temperance, but when that is accomplished they will take up other social problems. He notes a growing distaste for mere domesticity. Women are becoming citizens as well as wives or household drudges. The "Times" inevitably deplores this change, but the New Zealand statesman welcomes it as widening women's sympathies and activities.

Sir Theodore Martin died on Wednesday morning at Llangollen in his ninety-third year. Part author of the "Bon Gaultier Ballads" and of some very pleasant translations of the "Odes of Horace," he could not fairly be described as other than a literary man of parts. His "Life of the Prince Consort," produced under the close supervision and with the warm concurrence of Queen Victoria, raised a Radical storm on account of its partial endorsement of Baron Stockmar's views of the place of the monarch in the Constitution. The same view was emphasised in Lord Esher's lecture and in the authorised "Letters of Queen Victoria." Sir Theodore's "Life" was a somewhat long-winded essay in courtliness. He set up a theory of constitutional government which, so far as we know, no Liberal or Conservative statesman has ever accepted.

The approaching visit of the Tsar to the King of Italy, our Rome correspondent writes, is the occasion of demonstrations against autocratic government even more pronounced than those of England and France. Their meaning should not be misunderstood. No one in Italy desires them to take an anti-Russian complexion. The protests aim only at Nicholas II. as the personification of the most tyrannical rule known to Europe. On the day in which the yacht of the Tsar enters Italian waters a general strike will be proclaimed throughout the Peninsula, which will last only one day, as a sign of national condemnation of his rule, and of the sympathy of the Italian nation with the Russian people.

LOWERING THE FLAG.

"How were they to expect the Dutch to refrain from considering whether the political instrument which the Government were now giving them could be made a substitute for the arms and the military organisation which brought them honorably into the field only four years ago? There was nothing to prevent the new Assembly making every preparation constitutionally, quietly, and without external interference, for a new war. The Transvaal was not less desirous of getting rid of Downing Street than Downing Street was desirous of geting rid of the Transvaal. (Interruption.) I don't know which proposition is disputed by the Prime Minister. Both are right; and that being so, there is no ground for making this experiment months and years before it ought to have been made. (Ministerial cries of: 'Which?' and 'Months or years?') That entirely depends upon how rapidly the wounds inflicted by the war heal, and the Government have not considered that at all. It is because I see no security that the powers to be conferred will not be used to establish a condition of things which will make some future action against this country possible, probable, and dangerous, that the Opposition will refuse to make themselves responsible with the Government for what I regard as the most reckless experiment ever tried in the development of a great Colonial policy. . . ." —Mr. Balfour, July 31st, 1906.

"The leaders of opinion in South Africa . . . have never allowed the bitterness incident to such a strife as that on which they entered in 1898—they have never allowed, on whichever side they fought, that bitterness to interfere with their clear vision of what was absolutely necessary for the good of all the white population in that country; and you have men of the most widely divergent past and possibly widely divergent opinions as to the present, men who have fought in battle, meeting in amity round the council board and agreeing as to what was best for the men of their own race, and coming to the conclusion, which has been common property here from time immemorial, that the only possible way by which South Africa was to play its part in the world, as it most assuredly will, was by a system of equal rights and that freedom which we have given now in full measure to every colony in which the European race is predominant to-day."—Mr. Balfour, August 16th, 1909.

The public have short memories; and if we contrast, at the head of this article, the reckless words in which three years ago Mr. Balfour predicted a violent and faithless use of the gift of political freedom by the Dutch people in South Africa, with the speech in which on Monday last he acclaimed their wisdom and integrity, we do so for no factious purpose, but in order to drive home the clear moral of the situation. No man could say positively in 1906 that the grant of self-government would bring to South Africa the peace and unity which in fact it has secured. Liberal statesmanship could only appeal to its theoretical belief in the value of free institutions, to its practical experience of them as a cure for the wounds of war, and to its faith in the good sense, placable character, and powerful practical vision of the Dutch population. Its victory over Mr. Balfour's sceptical fears has thus been complete. We have to point out how immeasurably greater is the gain to the British Empire which the policy of self-government has brought about than that achieved by the war, to say nothing of the deliberate scheme of Dutch subordination to the British element which Lord Milner devised. So long as the Dutch were unreconciled, South Africa must have remained a constant preoccupation of our politics. Within a year of the close of the war the two white races were fast coming together. It was merely a question whether they would unite against us or for us. The late Prime Minister fixed his eyes on the latter alternative, and adopted the only possible means of realising it. To-day his wisdom is acclaimed by all parties in South Africa and Great Britain, and by the civilised world itself. It was Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman who, in conjunction with Mr. Chamberlain and the Ministries of Canada and Australia, helped to save the Cape Constitution from Lord Milner's deliberate attack upon it. It was he who, when the time was ripe, and he had full power of choice, added to a free Cape Government the two units of self-government in the Transvaal and the Orange Colony, and thus created the force that has made South Africa one.

How much more fortunate would it have been if the white peoples of South Africa had presented to the Imperial Parliament a plan for establishing not only equality among themselves, but equality of opportunity for the native and colored races of the sub-continent! Unfortunately the Union Bill bears a totally different aspect. For the first time in the history of the British Empire the Imperial Parliament will not only assent to racial inequality, but will establish it, and will stamp a color disability on all those races, African and Asiatic, who constitute most of the subjects of its oversea dominions. In the act of admitting Indians to a further share in the Government of India, it will put them under a ban in South Africa. It signs away the right of the South African native to all share in the administration of the two northern Colonies, and transfers his existing privileges in Cape Colony—carefully guarded as they are—to the will of two-thirds of the Union Parliament. The enemies of a native franchise will only have to divert a small fraction of the Cape representation in order to reduce to votelessness the entire colored population of South Africa. Unless the phrase, "European descent," is held to cover half-castes as well as Jews, we shall have decreed that no black or colored man shall sit in the Union Parliament. We hope that Colonel Seely and the Prime Minister are correct in thinking that the Imperial Government has the power of reserving legislation which will cancel the native and colored franchises in the Cape. In any case, it seems probable that when the Protectorates have been transferred to a strict form of bureaucratic rule, there will be no guarantee against the break-up of the powerful and carefully isolated unit of Government known as Basutoland. Tribesman and graduate of Lovedale College, "blanket" Kaffirs and personalities of the type of Dr. Abdurrahman and Mr. Jabavu, will all come under the new stigma of helotry, which is to replace Mr. Rhodes's ideal of equal rights for all civilised men south of the Zambesi. These things are to be our act; and when they are done and admitted, we must shoulder afresh the burden of managing as best we may scores of millions of colored men marked with this brand of inferiority. For the first time the Imperial power witholds the full opportunities of citizenship from British subjects, living under constitutional rule in their own land.

Mr. Balfour finds this flat denial of human rights preferable to the abstract admission of them in the American Constitution, combining, as it did, in the custom of the early Republic, "a very crude a priori statement of the equality of mankind, and the brutal application of the principles of slavery." We cannot take this view. Eighteenth century theory may have gone further than nineteenth century practice was willing to go. But chattel slavery was wiped out of the United States by the most tremendous struggle of the age, and when that effort has done its full work, the fraudulent withdrawal of civil rights from the North American negro will be wiped out, too. With what face can a great British Commonwealth start its career under an instrument which, in the interests of a million white settlers, proclaims servitude for at least five millions of colored men, mainly aborigines? We cannot forget that these ominous provisions were inserted in the Act of Union by the pressure of Natal, which shocked both parties in the Empire by its treatment of the Zulu nation, and remains to-day little better than a planter State. The Transvaal and the Orange Colony exhibit a more enlightened spirit, but they possess neither the graduated color scale of Cape Colony, nor its color franchise, nor its educational institutions for the natives, nor the practice of common political life which qualifes the color prejudice. On the other hand, the northern native finds himself practically forbidden to rise in the scale of citizenship by virtue of the dilemma that while he is too near to barbarism to understand the meaning of civilised life, the little of Christianity and civilisation that he can assimilate destroys the rude virtue of the savage character. Add to this a rigid code of regulative law, which forbids him free locomotion, free settlement, and free labor, and a stiff imposition of social habit, which decrees in the main that the white man shall work with his head, and the black man with his hands at only the meaner forms of manual toil, and you have a condition unfavorable to the removal of the disabilities imposed by the Bill of Union. No hope of a moderate native policy resides in the conventional Dutch view of the native as a lower order of creation, with doubtful claims to the possession of a soul, or the conventional English view of him as a chattel and body-servant of the white overseer, to whom hand labor is almost a mark of shame. White South Africa has thus required us to swallow our principles, without attempting to prove that she can prosper on her own.

All that we can now hope from the passage of the Union Bill in its present form is that the controversy will be transferred to South Africa, and that the growth of a strong Liberal movement on the native question will follow the moral pressure of public opinion in the mother country. The Constitution has the great merit of fluidity, and South Africa contains her full quota of enlightened statesmen. We should be the more sanguine on this point if the Government had in the matter of the schedule yielded to the actual pressure of the South African delegates. Here we were not asked to lower the flag; we were even invited to keep it flying. The delegates would have dispensed with the schedule, and postponed the whole question of the transfer of the Protectorates. Unfortunately we have, on our own responsibility, chosen to say that when united South Africa claims, as one day she will claim, the control of these vast native regions, they shall not come directly under the Union Parliament. No doubt, in pressing the schedule, we had in view the guarantees as to the native lands and the sale of liquor which it contains. But it would have been better still to hold our powers in reserve, so as to use them freely when the occasion arose. We cannot agree with Colonel Seely that in face of Lord Selborne's "explanations" the natives desire any new arrangement. They prefer the status quo. We prefer the status quo. White South Africa for the present desires the same thing. Our advantage in retaining it is clear. Having fixed in advance the terms on which we will yield control of the Protectorates, we have greatly qualified or given away altogether the power to bargain for the removal of the color line, and for an application of the Cape policy to the whole South African dominion. No effective power of "reservation" will lie with the Imperial Power when she is faced with an Anglo-Dutch combination in a South African Parliament essentially agreed on the policy, not merely of colored inequality, but of colored subjection, to which we have set our seal. We have washed our hands of responsibility for the drawing of the color line in politics; it is for South Africa to shrink back in time from the abhorrent vision of a slave State, sinking, by the evil force of parasitism, into physical dependence on a proscribed and disinherited race.

THE DUKE'S DILEMMA.

The latest of the Dukes to enter the field of Budget controversy is His Grace of Northumberland, who requests Sir Edward Grey, as the most respectable supporter of the Budget, to be good enough to explain to him how he can avoid causing unemployment by the economies to which increased taxation will oblige him to resort. The Duke writes more in sorrow than in anger. He is quite willing to put down a number of "superfluities" in his personal expenditure. But he cannot bear to contemplate the ruined gamekeepers, gardeners, grooms, and lackeys robbed of the employment he can no longer afford to give them, and idly wandering through his broad domains. Such a catastrophe seems to him inevitable. "I have," he says, "a herd of deer, two home farms, two or three gardens, a certain number of saddle and harness horses, a certain amount of game; I subscribe pretty liberally to a pack of hounds, &c. Any or all of these I can reduce or abolish, and, for that matter, without any appreciable personal disadvantage; but I cannot help seeing that it means want of employment to all those who live by my keeping up these things." We are invited to believe that the great landlords of England will meet the exactions of the Budget by an immediate abandonment of all those pomps and sports which are the immemorial badges of their order—that hunting, game-preserving, and the other decorative pursuits which form the staple of their interests and conversation are doomed to vanish from the land by the waving of Mr. Lloyd George's magical wand. Now, there are stern Radicals to whom the prospect of so sweeping a change would be an occasion for rejoicing, not for lamentation; to whom lands rescued from foxes, pheasants, and deer, and labor redeemed from waste and flunkeyism, to be devoted to the productive work of agriculture, represent no inconsiderable step in the salvation of rural England. To such men a very brief period of undeserved distress to "producers" of the ducal "superfluities," alleviated by the humane measures for unemployment and by the schemes of rural reconstruction which spring from the development grant, might appear no heavy price for so desirable a reformation. Indeed, we gladly confess to a conviction that the Budget will so tend to diminish the quantity of land and labor squandered by the Duke and his fellow-landowners upon the "superfluities" he names. Neither the land nor the labor will remain unoccupied. Instead of being put to services of luxury and ostentation they will be employed in growing food for the people and raising materials for the nation's industries. If the Duke sells land, as Sir Edward Grey points out in his reply in the "Times," plenty of buyers will be available; if he dispenses with labor, the land is full of competitive users.

But highly desirable as would be this transformation, we are not so sanguine as the Duke about the pace of its attainment. There is a lack of proportion in all the ducal reasoning upon the Budget. If we take the case of agricultural landowners, it has already been shown conclusively that they stand rather to gain than to lose by the net result of the Budget policy. The Budget errs in point of fact by an excessive tenderness towards their interests. It is the owners of urban and other non-agricultural values that are called upon to pay virtually the whole of the increased public revenue from land. But could these payments, even were they far higher than is proposed, compel the Duke and other great owners of lands, rural and urban, to practise the retrenchments he describes? The new taxes do not fall upon any part of the existing income that is devoted to the superfluities in question. Wherever any new tax is imposed a new property at least five times as large has been called into existence. Out of this new unearned increment the Duke and his friends can easily defray the increased charge laid on them by the State: they need not put down their gardens, game preserves, and stables. Nor will they. This obvious answer the Duke thinks to dispose of by urging that all the money landowners receive, by selling agricultural land which has acquired building prices, must be set aside and accumulated to meet the increased death duties. But to this there are several rejoinders. In the first place, most of the great nobility have other and larger resources which they can summon to the support of their ancestral dignity. The words of the poet ring as true to-day as they did three generations ago:—

> "Lord Stafford mines for coal and salt,
> The Duke of Norfolk deals in malt,
> The Douglas in red herrings."

Secondly, where any considerable amount of building lands are sold, a small proportion of the proceeds will suffice to meet this requirement. Can it be seriously suggested that any single one of the great noblemen who own land in the Metropolis, or in any other considerable town, is so grievously injured by the proposed taxes that he will stop his game preserving or his hunting? The very notion is ridiculous. Notwithstanding the new taxation, his net income from land will be larger than before. Why should he economise? Once more, if it be true that there are cases where very large provisions must be made for death duties and other charges on the estate, there is always the alternative of disposing of a portion of the estate large enough to meet the charges. The Duke admits that the breaking up of large landed estates is inevitable; why then this struggle to put off what he so touchingly designates "the evil day"?

No wonder the politicians of the Opposition express open dismay at the inept pleadings of the Dukes. We suppose that it could not possibly occur to the mind of the Duke of Northumberland that what he sees as "the evil day" for his order is "the good time coming" for the people whom he and his fellow-monopolists have hitherto precluded from obtaining land under conditions of personal liberty and of stimulus in the arts of agriculture. There is a humor in this noble sorrow when we bear in mind that the insignificance of the proposed taxes is being paraded as an argument for dropping this section of the Budget. Will our hunting, motoring, shooting, yachting aristocracy, for so trivial a provocation as these land taxes, renounce all the joys of life and devote themselves to hoarding in order to hand over to their heirs estates thus shorn of all the glories of a life of conspicuous waste and ostentatious idleness? We do not believe in so much devotion to the mere form of landowning once emptied of its pleasurable contents.

Sir Edward Grey is therefore right in reassuring the Duke regarding the dreaded fate of his gamekeepers and stable hands. There can be no present necessity to dismiss them. In the future the land taxes may press heavier. But the economic effects of such pressure will still be gradual, and the Duke may begin to advise his gardeners and stablemen and other producers of "superfluities," to put their sons to some more dignified and useful kinds of work. Finally, we may remind those inclined to regard the Duke as an economic authority, that the money taken from him in taxation will be expended as surely and as profitably by the State as if it had been left intact in the ducal coffers, and that it will furnish quite as much employment as before.

THE COLONIES AS UNITS OF IMPERIAL FORCE.

Those who, as Imperialists, are anxious to draw the various States and nationalities composing our Empire into closer union, have, in recent years, essayed three methods of attaining this object. The first has been to invite the groups of self-governing Colonies to enter into some political federation with the Mother Country and her Crown dependencies, in which all should be represented in a Central Council, vested with legislative and executive powers. This dream, after floating awhile in the imagination of a few English politicians ignorant of the temper and history of the self-governing Colonies, may be said to be finally dissolved. Its dissolution has been effected by the closer contact with the actuality of Colonial sentiments afforded by the Boer War and the series of Colonial Conferences, and, perhaps, by the closer attention given to the history of these Colonies. We now know that no serious statesman in any one of these Colonies will consent to regard any sort of closer political union with Great Britain as practicable, now or in the future. It would signify to them the reversal of the dearest and most valued tendency of their history —viz., the assertion of an even fuller measure of self-government. This tendency may be said almost to have reached its limit in the recent assertions of a constitutional right to determine what appeals shall be submitted to the Privy Council and of the right of the Colonies to a predominant voice in foreign treaties which affect their interests.

The second road to closer union, that of an Imperial arrangement of preferential tariffs, though still considered open by our enthusiastic Tariff Reformers, is closed to all who understand the vital connection between fiscal and constitutional liberty. Each several Colonial Commonwealth may contrive to give some little preference to British over foreign imports, though development of Colonial manufactures must constantly reduce the value of such preference. But they will never consent to enter any sort of Imperial arrangement which, if effective, must of necessity curtail that full liberty to chop and change their tariffs which they enjoy at present. The stoppage of these two Imperial roads has thrown Imperialism back upon a third, Imperial Defence. Whenever any representative Colonials, statesmen or private citizens, journalists, educationalists, cricketers, or scientists, come over here on business or on pleasure, it seems to be held "good form" and good patriotism to try to scarify them with tales of England's peril, in order to wheedle out of them some good-natured undertaking to find us ships and fighting men. A more undignified performance than that presented by the Imperial Press Conference it is difficult to imagine. If fighting imaginary future foes is the only use of Empire that is left, Imperialism has, indeed, worn itself threadbare, and what is more, its threads are near to snapping.

But though we strongly deprecate a repetition of the contemptible manœuvres by which it has been sought to frighten and cajole Colonial Governments into "voluntary" gifts of "Dreadnoughts," we fully recognise the propriety of such a Conference among responsible Colonial statesmen as is this week concluded at the Foreign Office. The entrance of another group of Colonies upon a fuller national life may well be held a proper time for a quiet consideration of the best modes by which these free nationalities under our Imperial flag might co-operate in case of need. The results of the Conference, so far as the informal reports can be relied upon, are just what those best acquainted with the spirit of the Colonies anticipated. The endeavor to express "the Imperial idea" in a single central fleet and army, virtually controlled by British officers, has completely failed. We hear, indeed, of an Imperial General Staff, with a separate section for each Colony, and of an Imperial Navy which in time of war will be "under one control and undivided control." The Colonial nations and the mother country will consult one another regarding the character and disposition of their fleets, there will be a search after homogeneous forces and material, and our military experts will tender advice in the training of the Colonial armies. But the sketch of the Canadian scheme makes it quite evident that the oldest and strongest of the Colonial nations is embarking on a naval and a military policy, which is national, and only in a quite secondary sense Imperial. She will raise what troops she chooses, and, in accordance with her Militia Act, will not send them outside Canada except for Canada's defence. She will plan her own naval defence, dispose her ships according to her needs on the Atlantic and Pacific, ear-marked for home defence. The Australian scheme appears to be similar. Her fleet is not to be so much an integral part of the Imperial Navy as a force for national defence which may be handed over for Imperial purposes if the Government of the Colony should determine that such surrender was advantageous for the protection of Australia. We entertain no doubt but that South Africa and New Zealand have made it equally plain that the army and the navy they will raise are primarily for national defence, and that their personnel and management are to be Colonial, not Imperial. For each of these Colonial units the Empire is the second, not the first consideration. How should it be otherwise? Their military and naval policy is by each of them conceived as a natural fruit of the spirit of national independence which possesses them.

We do not undervalue the Imperial advantage which may accrue from the military preparations thus undertaken by nations who in their wider destiny will still remain our natural allies. It is a distinct gain to us that they should lift on to their own young shoulders part of the heavy financial burden we hitherto have borne, and that their armaments should be constructed and disposed so as to be most serviceable for united action, if the component nations choose to unite. But we must not deceive ourselves as to the form or the substance of this Imperial Defence. There is to be no Imperial army or navy of such a kind that if Great Britain gets into trouble with a foreign nation she can summon by right these Imperial forces. Each Colonial nation will receive a full power to decide for herself whether it is safe, profitable, or honorable, to embark her troops in such a quarrel, or whether she shall keep them for the narrower purpose of national defence which is their raison d'être. This is not the merely selfish policy which it might appear to ardent Imperialists. It is dictated not merely by nationalist aspirations, but also by justifiable discretion. It would, indeed, be folly to expect that these free nations, with their democratic institutions, would enter any undertakings with Great Britain which should bind them to take part in wars for the enlargement or even for the defence of the great un-free portion of our Empire. There is little in common, in sentiment or in material interest, between the self governing and those unfree sections, and the recognition of the rift is quite as much responsible for the purely voluntary character of the new "Imperial defence" as is the spirit of political autonomy. Great Britain, however, will not, we venture to think, be the loser by this independent policy. Could we have compelled or induced the Colonies to come into a closer Imperial defence, that force would the more easily have been abused for risky diplomacy in Europe or for further enlargements of our Imperial frontiers. The existence under the Imperial flag of a number of virtually independent nations, united by race, language, and personal free intercourse, but keeping and cultivating each a judgment of its own and a national policy somewhat different from that of its sister nations, each with a considerable force which it can offer or withhold from the mother country, must be a steadying factor alike in our national and in our Imperial policy.

LICENSE OR CENSORSHIP?

It is unfortunate that in supporting the existence of a Censorship of dramatic art in this country, the "Westminster Gazette" should at once have ignored the case for its abolition and mis-stated the position of its critics. We cannot at this stage of the controversy even guess what the conclusion of the Joint Committee will be. But we may say at once that if they declare for replacing the present Censor by what the "Westminster" calls a "solemn and competent literary authority," they will proceed not in the direction desired by the representatives of British literature, but in a precisely opposite sense. Who has asked for such a Censorship? The only suggestion of it appeared in the course of Mr. Barrie's evidence. But Mr. Barrie's entire argument was for the abolition of the right of Censorship before production; and he only referred to the creation of an "advisory board" as a pis aller. The form in which that proposal was made to the Committee by the Lord Chamberlain was plainly intolerable. Serious students of the drama are naturally repelled by the notion of submitting the unrestricted control of dramatic art to an office in which, as Mr. Shaw says, "a matter of two inches of a gentleman's sword or the absence of a feather from a lady's head-dress would be a graver matter than the Habeas Corpus Act." But the idea of handing over the living body of the drama to the tender mercies of an official, a playwright, a retired actor-manager, who is, we suppose, Sir Squire Bancroft, and an almost retired actor-manager—namely, Sir John Hare—is not a thinkable proposition. It would be not less difficult to construct a "literary" board of censorship. Who would sit on it? Who would take the personal responsibility of issuing one kind of drama to the British public and denying another? The "Westminster Gazette" puts one side of the case for the Censorship when, revealing an always latent admiration for the House of Lords, it compares Mr. Redford to that enlightened body, and suggests that, like them, he represents "a sort of groping after what the public want or will tolerate." Doubtless there is a lenient side to the Censorship. As Mr. Shaw says, it does not stand against the public when the public insists on being debauched. It merely shields it from a serious non-conventional treatment of its moral usages and prejudices. An "enlightened" Censor might conclude against many a play which Mr. Redford, good easy man, passes because it merely reflects the average lubricity of a city crowd. But he would be in a terrible dilemma when he was also asked to say, on his honor and conscience, whether the myriad questionings of current ideas on religion, morals, the social and political structure, contained in the works of Tolstoy, Ibsen, Brieux, Sudermann, Shaw, Galsworthy, ought to be presented, in this or that shape, to mixed audiences at a theatre.

And why, in fact, does this difficulty arise? Simply because the idea of literary censorship is a false one. The falsity is obvious when you place the power of coming to judgment on the varied perplexities of modern life and art in the hands of a master of deportment. But in the nature of the case no right judgment is possible when you call either on a Man or a Board to say what unperformed (and therefore unrealised) play is or is not fit for the British nation to see. Does it therefore follow that we need place no restriction on the vagaries of authorship or the audacities of management? Not at all. There is the device of licensing, subject to the specific direction of law. In other words, there is the general force of public opinion correcting authors and managers, and liable to correction in its turn. The managers dislike the idea of such a tribunal, because it gives them a real responsibility for the kind of play which they produce, and the first effect of such a change would undoubtedly be to make them timid. If the power of withdrawing licences or stopping plays after production were too stringent, it might unduly discourage and hamper their business. But if it were duly guarded, and limits set to the capricious action of local authorities on plays that had appeared in London, we see no harm, but only good, in a slight raising of the moral standard of the theatre, accompanied as it would be by a greatly enhanced curiosity about it on the part of that large portion of the British people who do not go to the play. The drama would thus tend to be much more conspicuously the mirror of the nation than it is to-day. The inquirer, the reformer, the sentimentalist, the intellectual sceptic, would have his play; the Puritan his; the light-minded could not be denied his fancy. We believe that, under such conditions, the stage would present a far greater variety of subject and treatment than it now boasts. The licensing authority would understand, and the law would make him understand, that the theatre was a great business, not to be lightly pulled to pieces, and the manager would understand that his mind and conscience must be exercised on that business, rather than passively surrendered to the keeping of the Lord Chamberlain. We see no argument against this change but that of the extreme pessimist whom the two ideas of freedom and responsibility equally plunge into agonies of apprehension. He will trust neither the people nor their representatives; and in so far as he merely concludes that we shall never get a better drama than we deserve, he is right. If the mind of England is incurably false and filthy or merely silly, no power of Censorship will prevent her drama from being false, filthy, and silly into the bargain. It can be all that to-day; it is for the friends of the Censor to deny it an effective power of recuperation.

WHAT IS BLACKMAIL?

WEEK by week the "Spectator" assails the Budget and its maker in a tone of ascending violence. Mr. Lloyd-George's Limehouse speech, however, has called forth its top-note. The accusation of "blackmail" brought by the Chancellor against the Duke of Westminster in the now famous Gorringe case is denounced as "one of the most cruel and odious that can possibly be brought against any man in the transactions of business or of private life." Many even among the supporters of the Budget appear to think that Mr. George used language of rhetorical excess, and the statement of the Gorringe case by Sir Edward Grey is held out to Mr. George as an example of accuracy and manners. Now the question of manners may be allowed to wait until the charge of blackmailing has been investigated, for we would premise that if the charge is true it cannot be bad manners to use the name.

What, then, is blackmailing? The general practice of the use of a position of advantage to sell dear or buy cheap in an "open market" cannot rightly be so designated. In every market where supply is short, prices can be raised, and sellers take an unearned or a strictly "excessive" gain. But no one would call this blackmailing. Even the owner of a "monopoly" may fix his own price in a one-sided market without being amenable to such a change. But where one man uses a special hold he has acquired upon another man, by virtue of some past business arrangement and some special knowledge of the circumstances of that other man, so as to demand the payment of the largest sum of money he calculates that other can afford to pay, with the implication that he can or will take a step which he knows will ruin or gravely embarrass him, such an act is a form of economic "blackmail." Now this is what the Duke, or his agent, appears to have done with Mr. Gorringe. Others, doubtless, have done the same, it may even be done as a matter of course by most of those who get the opportunity, it may be palliated, even consecrated, if you like, by use and wont. But though morally different from the action of the man who extorts money from another by knowledge of a guilty secret in that other's past, it is a tribute levied on the economic helplessness of another.

In order to recognise this it is necessary to distinguish the Gorringe case from the ordinary case of taking unearned increment. Sir Edward Grey mixes the two, treating the case as if a rise of value, due wholly to social or general causes, were alone taken by the Duke instead of by Mr. Gorringe. If only this "unearned increment" were the issue, it is clear that Mr. Gorringe suffered no wrong, for he was no more entitled to retain it than the Duke to extort it from him. If, in a word, the lessor on the termination of a lease exacts as his new rent all that the land and premises would fetch in the open market, he is merely a rack-renter, not an economic "blackmailer." For neither the lessor nor the lessee has earned this rise of value. It is made by the community, and in equity, as we hope henceforth in law, will be recognised as the rightful property of the community. Part of this increment, as "Leodiensis," the writer of an interesting letter in our columns, recognises, has always been claimed and taken by the municipality in rates; for any "subsidy to rates" would not ease Mr. Gorringe in arranging a new lease, but would only enable and oblige him to pay more to the Duke.

But this socially earned increase of value is not all that the Duke takes in his new bargain with Mr. Gorringe. Before any one condemns Mr. George for using either excessive or inaccurate language, let him read the actual formulation of the charge, and say in what particular it exaggerates or misstates the facts. This is his account of what the Duke, or any other landlord in like case, says to a lessee, such as Mr. Gorringe: "Here you are. You have built up a great business here; you cannot take it away; you cannot move to other premises, because your trade and goodwill are here; your lease is coming to an end, and we decline to renew it except on the most oppressive terms." In other words, it is not the taking of unearned increment which constitutes blackmail, but the taking advantage of the past energy and industry of an existing tenant and of the special inconvenience and loss which he would sustain if he were obliged to move. This trading upon the knowledge of particular necessities enables the landlord to extort the earned increment of the lessee in addition to the unearned increment; it enables him to force the terms of a bargain which will secure to him not only all past increase of value due to the growth of the community and the business energy of the tenant, but any future value due to either of these causes.

Life and Letters.

"JACK CADE."

THERE are two particularly critical moments in the career of a popular leader. The first is when the "Times" describes him as a "statesman." The second arrives when he is called "Jack Cade." The former phase suggests that he is dangerous enough to be feared, but not yet too strong to be praised. With the second title he has reached his place at the head of marching armies. The drawbridge over the Thames is down before him, and he may cut the ropes. He must be either inside the Tower or laying siege to it. The equivocal period is passed. The governing class understands that it cannot have him for its servant. It fears that it may have him for its master. Several months have passed since the "Times" described Mr. Lloyd George as a "statesman." The "Spectator" has now called him "Jack Cade." He stands, in short, where Mr. Chamberlain stood in 1885, when Lord Salisbury borrowed the inevitable term from Lord Iddesleigh's lips, and made him by this tribute to his daring and his power for twenty years to come the man of destiny in English politics. The doctrine of "ransom" remained an unauthorised programme. Imperialism took its place, and to-day, when one passes a bust of the younger Pitt, with the features that cut the air like a caricature by "F.C.G.," one understands that it was his spirit, and not Jack Cade's, which was reincarnated in the leader of the Birmingham Radicals. The same daring, the same spirit of rebellion, the same indifference to the benumbing praises of the governing class, the same faith in the loyalty of crowds inspire Mr. Lloyd George. It is the gift of sympathy, the quick and sensitive imagination, the freedom from the limitations of an Anglo-Saxon materialism which differentiate the new "Jack Cade" from his predecessor.

The name is an enduring tribute to the power of melodrama. The Jack Cade of Lord Salisbury and the "Spectator" is, of course, the Jack Cade of Shakespeare. One cannot think of this outrageous creation without feeling a momentary tolerance for all the blasphemy which Tolstoy has uttered on Shakespeare's account. If only he had criticised Jack Cade instead of King Lear, no phrase in his diatribe would have been too harsh. Shakespeare was the spokesman of two intolerable snobberies—the snobbery of the commercial stage and the snobbery of Tudor loyalism. Few popular movements in our history are so obscure and so little studied as that which Cade led to a temporary victory. Shakespeare, who evidently supposed that it was democratic and communistic, seems to have mixed it up with Wat Tyler's rebellion. We have a thesis of our own, which will, we hope, induce the "Spectator" at last to do a tardy posthumous justice to the memory of Jack Cade. His rising was, so far as we can understand it, the outbreak of a peculiarly violent Budget Protest League. England was by no means poor in 1450. It was rich enough to dislike being taxed. The old economic miseries, which had made leaders of John Ball and Wat Tyler seventy years before, were happily past. Serfs were no longer sold "with their litter," and Parliament was actually constrained to pass sumptuary laws to repress the growing magnificence of yeomen and laborers. The middle class, in short, was in the state of mind which the Duke of Northumberland finds so trying. It could not make up its mind which of its luxuries to abandon first. It was still enjoying the riotous prosperity, which followed the Black Death, when the population of England was halved by the same Act of God which doubled wages. It had, moreover, accustomed itself to what the "Spectator" would call "a new way of life." It had bent all its sinews to engage in the perpetual war with France, and more especially in Kent it found the flag a splendid "asset." The French campaigns were nothing but the pillage of fat provinces and the sack of patient cities, until the little Maid of Domrémy heard her voices. The Cinque Ports gorged on booty, and lived like Barbary corsairs on the proceeds of their piracy. The offence of Henry VI. and the wretched Duke of Suffolk was that they made an inglorious peace, lost the French provinces, stopped piracy, and imposed war-taxes instead.

For the first time since the Conquest our forefathers were "little Englanders" against their will. It was against "the treasonable loss of France" and the taxation which followed it that Jack Cade rose. His followers were not a "rabblement." They were the whole orderly militia of Kent, with most of its gentry at their head and the blessing of at least two abbots behind them. They marched to protest against a penal Budget, and as it were to the cry of "Remember Majuba." Even Shakespeare knew that, when he made one of the rabble complain of Lord Say that he "made us pay one-and-twenty fifteens and one shilling to the pound, the last subsidy." They wanted "the new way of life," and war to the bitter end with the hereditary enemy, but they objected to pay a shilling in the pound. But then, to be sure, it was not, as one might suppose from Shakespeare, a just tax with a "broad basis," which hit rich and poor alike. It was a graduated tax, a super-tax, or as Stubbs puts it, in that quiet, matter-of-fact way of his which makes the middle ages as vulgarly familiar as our own times, it was "a graduated tax on incomes arising from land and offices." Nor was that all. The tax was levied in a highly bureaucratic way, by what Jack Cade called "green wax," which we take to have been the contemporary slang for "red tape." On only one point does the parallel break down. Jack Cade complained of the interference of the great nobles in elections. When our Commons complain to-day because a Duke writes in mid-contest to "my dear Profumo" they are stirring some meaningless hereditary memory of those exciting days when a Ducal letter sufficed to elect a knight of the shire, without any affected nonsense about "supporting" him. Our Constitution is full of such memories. A dog, when he curls round and round on the hearth-rug, revives the blurred hereditary recollection of that troublesome prairie-grass which had to be beaten down before it would make a comfortable bed. Mr. Swift MacNeill is to this day tormented by the conviction that his hearth-rug is a prairie.

Despite this trifling discrepancy about the interference of peers in elections, which does, we admit, detract a little from the fair fame of Jack Cade, we have, we hope, demonstrated to the satisfaction of the "Spectator" that Shakespeare perpetrated an outrageous slander. Jack Cade, in point of fact, headed the Budget Protesters of 1450. Lord Say, who was accused of French sympathies, and inventing this graduated tax, was the real Lloyd George of the time. As to the personal character of Jack Cade, we have, we confess, an open mind. Mr. Joseph Clayton, in remonstrating with the "Spectator," quotes Holinshed, to the effect that he was "a young man of godly nature and right pregnant of wit, sober in talk, wise in reasoning, arrogant in heart and stiff in opinions." That does, we admit, lend some color to the "Spectator's" unfavorable view of him. But tradition denies the godliness. It makes him a man who fled the country because he had murdered a woman with child, fought on the French side against his own country, and turned out in the end to be—an Irishman. It is on record that he kept stern discipline and executed marauders. But poor John Payne, Sir John Falstaff's servant, has left a terrible picture of him and his rebels in the Paston Letters:—

> "And in Kent there as my wyfe dwellyd, they toke away all our godes mevabyll that we had, and there wolde have hangyd my wyfe and V of my children, and lefte her no mire gode but her kyrtyll and her smook."

The revolt, if any friend of Falstaff's could speak truth, must have been even more predatory than the graduated tax. Mr. Gairdner at one stage of his enquiries was driven to explain these discrepancies by assuming that there were two Jack Cades—or, rather, that the first was killed in the hour of victory at Blackheath, and a rascal thereupon took his name and office. For our part we are convinced that there always are two Jack Cades. It is the mark of genius, for genius is essentially fissiparous. There is Jack Cade as his men see him, and there is Jack Cade as the enemy like to paint him. And when a popular leader is called Jack Cade, the meaning of the term we take to be this. He is a man who has fired his followers with faith, and hope, and enthusiasm, a man who can lead them to victory, whose defiance of the governing class begets a responsive courage in the host which he leads. He is also a man whom the enemy must needs belittle to conceal their fears. They have realised that nothing more is to be gained by calling him a statesman. He is a force unchained.

THE BACKBONE OF ENGLAND.

South-East Lancashire and the West Riding of Yorkshire are the two greatest seats of textile manufacture in the world; the one for cotton, the other for cloth. In both districts mining, engineering, machine-making, tool-making, and chemical trades have swollen the populations, multiplied the prosperity, and intensified the squalor and blackness for which the staple industry is primarily responsible. Between the two stretches a narrow ribbon of moorland, the high, flat, steep-edged plateaux of the Pennine Range. If you see them indicated on a colored contour-map of Northern England, the effect is striking. On either side, to the east and the west, lie the low plains of Lancashire and Yorkshire, very properly colored green; as they approach the foot-hills of the Pennine they are blackened with the dense streets of closely contiguous manufacturing towns; the narrow valleys and cloughs, that stab deeply into the range from either side, carry the burden of mills and houses, of smoke and hum, as far inward as they go; but between them all is the last back-bone of inviolate mountain, colored brown on the map and blackish-purplish sepia in reality, whose pretty uniform height of about two thousand feet is nowhere crossed by railway or canal without tunnelling.

A curiously romantic region this, so near civilisation and yet so far. There are places in it, not a few, where you may be the single human being within a mile's radius of the spot on which you stand, quite alone with Nature, with the grouse, the ring-ousels, and the golden plovers, and yet within three or four miles of you may lie gigantic towns. A tragic illustration of this occurred some half-dozen years ago. One November afternoon two keepers went out on their beats and never came back. They were each found dead on the moor, in quite different places, murdered by gunshots. Almost certainly no witness ever heard the gunshots, and yet they were fired within about four miles of Oldham.

One looks in vain in this region for the brilliant coloring of the Welsh or Scottish moors or those near Whitby, let alone that of the moors in Devonshire or West Ireland. No landscape could be more sombre. The stone is millstone grit, a rich yellow when quarried, but speedily susceptible to atmospheric influences. Here the prevailing influence is that of the smoke from the great mills and furnaces which blacken the plains on either side. However far out of sight and mind those stern manufacturing towns may be, as you roam the broad, airy plateaux, or wash down your lunch with peaty water by a laughing, purling torrent, their smoke is stamped on all around you like a sort of baptism, the sign and seal of their grim spirit imprinted on this broad, fair forehead of a reluctant Nature. The grass and heather are grimy with it; the stones are stained with it; the old thorn-bushes are almost caked with it. The present writer remembers, several springs ago, climbing a low tree for a magpie's nest in a lonely clough at the Peak end of the Pennine, where the moors are cleaner. It was about half-way between Manchester and Sheffield, and a long way from either, indeed many miles from the nearest mill-chimney. Yet, when he left the tree, not only were his hands black, but the black smelt freshly of what it was—soot.

The sombre aspect of these moors, which on a cloudy day is almost intolerable, a sort of perpetual "Dead March in 'Saul,'" is increased by the fact that over large tracts of them there is very little heather. What there is instead, is a plant called crow-berry, which, although no relation of the heather, has a striking resemblance in leaf and growth to the large purple heather, only that it is darker, and its tiny white blossoms are so inconspicuous that for landscape purposes it has no blossom at all. Where the belt of moors is narrowest, roughly, between Oldham and Huddersfield and between Rochdale and Halifax, this dismal plant replaces heather almost entirely, and alternates with grimy cotton-grass as far as the eye can see. Whether the fact that it does so has anything to do with the fact that this is the smokiest part of the Pennine, no one seems to know. The grouse thrive at least as well on it as they do on heather, and that is enough.

There are, indeed, but two products of economic importance in this area—grouse and water. The water in the side valleys and outlets from the plateaux turned the wheels of the earliest factories, for which it earned the name of "mills." That is why they are found so far up these valleys even now. The substitution of steam power still leaves water some very large and important parts to play in textile manufacture; and there is all the thirst of the great cities to quench besides. Happy are South-East Lancashire and the West Riding that they do not have, like Liverpool and Birmingham, to go for their water to Wales. True, Manchester goes for some of hers to Thirlmere, but that is the exception which calls attention to the more fortunate rule. The Pennine plateaux are very rainy, and the diversion of their spare streams into reservoirs is very far from being exhaustively undertaken. The cult of the grouse is at least as elaborate. In respect of their number of birds per acre, some of these moors can hardly be beaten. But the sport which the Twelfth inaugurates here is a different affair to the sport in Scotland. There you go right away to your lodge in the wilderness, and for as many weeks as are vouchsafed to you immerse yourself in continual picnic. Here you are always on the fringe of civilisation; you come out from it for the day to a battue; you go back to it by train at night; the chief of a business takes his day off week by week in this fashion. There is not much pretence of country life about it. And, though the grouse provide excellent sport, it must be confessed that their preservation, involving as it does a pretty complete exclusion of the public from the moors, goes far to destroy the unique opportunities for recreation which would otherwise be available for the teeming multitudes of the neighboring cities.

What is the future of these solitary mountain masses which brood over the rushing, roaring, kaleidoscopically changing hives of men, so untamed though not unstained, so haughty and aloof though so near? Originally they were forested with trees. The Romans, who ran roads across them and planted forts, cut or burned the bulk of the timber; the demand for pit-poles in the early days of modern coal-mining consumed the rest. Almost certainly it would be economic wisdom to reafforest them. Their water-supply would be helped, not hindered thereby; and though the grouse might go, other game would take its place. The forested plateaux of the Ardennes, to which not a few Englishmen repair to shoot wild-boar and roe-deer, are strikingly similar in shape and elevation. Little is yet being done in this direction; but it will be remarkable if districts so fertile in industry and ingenuity as South-East Lancashire and the West Riding do not ultimately turn to account such a source of wealth and pleasure lying at their very doors. How charming a forest is on the outskirts of a city a dozen Continental cities sufficiently show.

THE GASTRONOMIC YEAR.

The procession of the months is always a pleasant thing to watch. It is the great interest in life to many quiet folk in country places. They note in their diaries the green spears of the snowdrops piercing the garden, the rooks beginning to build, the swallows gathering on still, sunny mornings for their autumn flight. The Colonel looks up these entries and reads them to his wife. In towns one can tell what time of year it is by a glance at the windows where they sell fruit, and fish, and birds. Each season in turn is heralded by its own dainties, coming round unfailingly like the yellow wild flowers in April, the blue in May, or the pink in June. The first principle of the science of gastronomy is surely to eat things that are in season. The dishes should appear on the table, like William Morris's apples, "at the right time of the year." They should be the best that, just at that moment, is yielded by earth or sea. "To eat asparagus in January," as the German proverb says, is not only to waste money sinfully, and to eat a tasteless vegetable; it is to introduce a discord into the harmonious scheme of things.

Let us begin our year in late autumn, when the lamps are lighted early, and in the pleasant country town the muffin man's bell is once more heard in the street. Our modest epicure does not despise afternoon tea; the first crumpet touches him like the first primrose. With the same feeling with which he sees the wood's late wintry head with flaming primroses now all on fire, he hears the sound which calls up the frosty sunshine of old autumn mornings, and the years that are gone like the tinkle of the muffin man's bell. With the raw season, too, come the chestnuts, symbol of everything warm, and cosy, and friendly. They come in with the turkey chicken, the bird of November. At the same moment, with thoughtful kindness, Nature provides the celery. The delicious smell of celery is the very breath of autumn. The crown of the lordliest dinner is a pile of the long uncut stalks in a great silver dish.

The dark months, too, from November to March, are the months of the oyster. This is the time of "angels on horseback" (without exception, the most poetic name in the whole nomenclature of cookery), of creamy oyster patties, of scalloped oysters, each with its little pool of salty liquor in the bottom of the shell. "Vous vous en lécherez les doigts," to quote an old French phrase, coming down from days when people ate with their fingers, which according to our own proverb, were "made before forks." The nicest things, as prawns, asparagus, green artichokes, one eats with fingers still. Sometimes, as in the case of écrevisses à la bordelaise, the feat appears to the mere Englishman, not so much difficult as impossible; but French people perform it with exclamations of joy.

The event of March is the coming of lamb. Cold lamb and lettuce and mint sauce form perhaps the most satisfactory of human food. A loin of early lamb is a delicious joint, and the kidney the daintiest morsel that ever saluted the palate of man. It is a moot point whether the "one sauce" of the Gallic sneer is bread sauce or mint sauce. A better sauce than mint sauce was never invented. It has the simplicity, the inevitableness of genius, of the very best poetry. It is the exactly right thing.

From time immemorial eggs have been associated with Easter. An omelette calls up cheery Easter holidays in Normandy, old inns at Caen and Lisieux, long lines of light green poplars on blue hills. An English omelette is nearly always dried up, like the sole of an old shoe. Still, if one is happy in one's cook, an omelette is the dish for an April breakfast table. "Pesceduovo," "a fish of eggs," the Tuscans call it, from its shape.

Asparagus comes in with May. One may lunch off it very happily for thirty-one days, and not get tired. We mean the English asparagus, slim, and green, and purple-headed, of which one eats the whole, the asparagus of Cheshire, or Worcestershire, or Surrey, not the fat, white foreigner with its bitter stalk. It is delightful to say "good-bye" to chops and steaks for a whole month, and lunch off something one can eat with one's fingers. But one should have gathered it oneself on warm May mornings, when the wet asparagus beds are alive with little leaping frogs. Gooseberry fool, too, must be mentioned as one of the innocent dainties of this fresh young time. The baby gooseberry needs not even cream, so soft and mild is it. It is the agneau de Pauillac of fruit.

A good menu for a June dinner would be green pea soup, a salmon trout, a chicken, and banquettes aux fraises. The fragile, fairy boats should be made in the slums of Soho, the only place in England where eatable fruit tarts can be obtained. Why the pastry of England should be so different from the pastry of France is a mystery. The most delicious morsels ever eaten by the writer were some red-currant tarts sent from the pâtisserie to the auberge of a little Norman town. They were the poetry, the "Ode to the Nightingale," the "Christabel" of food.

A wise gastronome would spend July and August by the sea. The fish bought on the beach, stiff and glittering, is one thing, and the fish of towns, preserved in ice and chemicals for days and weeks, is quite another. Prawns should never be eaten but on the blithe, sweet Channel shore. Few things are more delightful than to suck the very soul and savor of the sea out of quite fresh prawns, swelling and bursting with their salt juice. They should be served last, at lunch; they seem a thing to linger on. Mussels one should gather for oneself, on the rocks far out, choosing the little gilded shells and throwing the big blue ones away. The best kind of sole, by the way, is a sole dieppoise. "Dieppoise," of course, spells mussels, as "portugaise" does tomatoes, or "lyonnaise" onions. The grey mullet, not the red, the mullet of the Sussex coast, the "Arundel mullet" of the proverb, which is so seldom seen in the shops, is without exception the best fish that swims.

An August dinner should begin with bisque of lobster, there should be grouse in it or perhaps a leveret, and it should end with black, fat figs. For late August or early September the mulberry trees are loaded with their fruit. One needs to pluck them in some dewy garden; they cannot be bought in shops. They give the very savor of the earth, its autumn goodness and ripeness, as prawns do of the sea. Later in the month, when the blackberries are ripe, smothered in clotted cream, they are fit food for angels. September, too, gives us the mushroom, that peculiar joy of English meadows, more delicious than any truffle that ever came out of Provençe or Gascony.

So the year comes round to the gorgeous month of pheasants, and one comes back from wandering in the wet October days to find the red creeper on the friendly wall. The days grow chilly, and the first frosts are on the celery, and the muffin man's bell is heard once more in the street, and one finds home-made sausages, split and hissing, as one comes down to breakfast in the morning.

ON ASKING THE WAY.

Man, by nature suspicious, obstinate, and vain, rarely enquires the way. Trusting entirely to his own reason and such information as may be gleaned from maps, he has been known to walk in rain, hail, hunger, and bodily exhaustion twenty miles in the wrong direction rather than exchange two syllables with a fellow-mortal. Pressed for an explanation of this curious folly he will laugh, turn the subject, or, as likely as not, remain mute. There is in reality no human intercourse more innocent or delightful than that engendered by a casual topographical enquiry. Free alike from the hollow artificiality of the drawing-room and the sordid selfishness of the shop, it is simple, sincere, and in the truest sense democratic. For there is no man so rich but may not fearlessly be accosted by any stranger in the public highway, few so puffed up with pride of birth or place as to resist the flattery of such a solicitation. "He that questioneth much," says Bacon, "shall learne much and content much"; and perhaps there is no readier method of gratifying the intellectual and benevolent impulses than a habit of continually asking the way.

Often, indeed, there is but little taint of vulgar curiosity in the question. You do not ask the way from motives of acquisitiveness, but because the sound of your own voice is pleasant in a strange city, or because you are curious to note the varying expressions of joy, pity, or despite that spring into the faces of your interlocutors. How quickly, in these chance encounters, is a man's nature revealed! Should your stranger reply freely and felicitously, as though the compliment were nothing unfamiliar, you may mark him down at once as a man of gifted and fortunate disposition, placed by Providence in a position of high honor and responsibility—a banker, maybe, or a baronet. Should he on the contrary start, flush darkly, swallow in his throat and stammer hastily that he is a stranger, be sure that he is a cheat, a low fellow, destructive of the peace, some collector of taxes, doubtless, or interviewer. The same thing may be observed of nationalities. Thus in towns where men love each other, such as Torquay, Devon, or Boston in the United States, the citizen will converse freely, take you generously by the arm, often walking with you as much as a mile of the way. But should it be your misfortune to be strayed in the Islands of Fiji, Johannesburg, or the northern parts of England, the answers to your questions will be savage, short, or quite frequently none at all.

The manner in which the way be asked permits of infinite variations. There is the country fashion, which is open and convivial; and that for town, formal, somewhat close, and more precise than general. In Regent Street, the Strand, and other bustling parts of London it is unusual to affect too lively a degree of comradeship, for the risk of misunderstanding is great and that of inattention considerable. Sober pleasantries may, however, be essayed in such neighborhoods as Eaton Square, and should you light upon a stranger whose accent pleases you in Carlton Gardens you may without disgrace invite him home to supper. When addressing noblemen, priests, and squires, endeavor as far as possible to emulate the manners of their condition. On espying, for example, any gallant stepping from the portals of the Athenæum Club, seize him by the button-hole and cry out loudly in his ear, "Hallo, Bishop, how the d—— am I to get to Edgware Road?" Towards tradesmen, however, study to be courteous, and to young children, very kind. With omnibus conductors, underpaid and usually misanthropic, the words should be curt and clipped, the glance austere and even commanding. "Sir" (you say), "direct me kindly to the Mansion House." Should he comply, a slight bow, a smile sufficient to show breeding, and any simple formula, such as, "I thank you," "Many thanks," or "I am much obliged," may be his reward: no fee. With men of generous and noble temper, however, such as the guards on the Great Western Railway, the traveller need be at no pains to disguise his native helplessness. To take a common instance. You arrive at Paddington and enter any train that wins your admiration. Its destination is (say) Didcot, but its chief merit is a fine collection of photographs of the Cornish Riviera. After you have been seated in your carriage a little while, the guard enters and requests to see your ticket. It is labelled Bath. He looks at you simply, without any anger, and says: "Where do you want to go?" You proceed at once with your story. It is long, perhaps, and rather confused—there was your aunt, her grave illness, and your sudden summons, the wishes of your uncle, your own sense of what was right, &c. God knows (you tell him) you do not want to go to Bath, on all accounts a sad and stagnant spot, but since the matter has been so decided you will be grateful if he will teach you your surest means of arriving at that city. There are men who on being thus addressed would fly into a passion, utter foul words, and stamp their feet. But such is the patience and great goodness of this man, that without any show of contumely he will reply: "The next train for Bath leaves 4.42, Platform No. 3," and turn quietly away.

There exists a certain kind of person instinctively signalled out for question, but whose replies, whether due to lack of trained conciseness of speech or to some singularity of look or gesture distracting to the mind, the traveller is utterly unable to retain. Thus it not unfrequently happens that the way is asked of the same individual as many as three times in the same morning.

As with great occasions, so with small, it is in qualities of heart rather than of intellect that the traveller learns ultimately to put his trust. It may, perchance, occasionally have been the wayfarer's fortune to light upon some old gentleman in a lonely road, and closely press him. "Ah," he will say, "so you are bound for Putney" (or Stoke Pogis, or Cos Cob Con, as the case may be)—Ay, ay, he has heard tell of it. A fine city, so they say. A nephew of his wife's went to settle there in the year '80, or maybe '81. It might be in a westerly direction, or at any rate more north than south. You would do well to push straight on, but if anything bear a little to the left. . . . No trouble, no trouble. You are kindly welcome. He would accompany you himself were it not for his bad leg. Yes, the weather is seasonable, certainly, for the time of the year. He wishes you a fine good day. Slight though may be the geographical value of such utterances, he would be dull of soul and dead to all promptings of religion, could he not gather from them strength and confidence to continue thankfully on his journey.

Not to be asked the way argues something fearful in a man's disposition. There was a gentleman once living at Chobham, who hanged himself after twenty years of horrid misery because no stranger had ever begged of him the favor of a direction. It was said that as a lad he had once wilfully misdirected a Member of Parliament. The Member, a man of rancorous temper, shortly afterwards died, and on his death-bed (so 'twas whispered) laid a curse on the lad to the end that he might ever afterwards be unconditionally mistrusted of all wayfarers. A grim tale, and pointing a fine moral, if true.

THE TERRITORIAL FORCE UNDER MILITARY LAW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It may appear somewhat cynical at the present moment, when the success of the Territorial Forces Scheme would seem to be almost assured, to raise any question which might have the effect of militating to the detriment of the scheme, but the question which I desire to raise in these lines is one of more than superficial importance to every member of the force.

The question is: "Should the Territorial Force be subject to military law, unless, and until, they are embodied for actual service?" To the writer's mind, the answer is emphatically No! and his reasons are as follows:—

In the first place, the faults and failures of the old Volunteers were not due to the personnel of the force, but to their lack of organisation, and the failure of the authorities to realise what a tremendous national asset this voluntary army was. The spirit and work of the Volunteers, taken throughout, was beyond praise. For many years they made their bricks without straw, till at last the solidity of their workmanship was recognised, and all that was best in their organisation has become the cornerstone of the Territorial Force of to-day. The formation, organisation, and general scope of the Territorial Force is not hard to follow, the one alien and inexplicable note in their constitution being the submission of the force to military law whilst undergoing training. No general charge of unsoldierly or mutinous conduct can be sustained against the members of the old régime for a single moment. If their work was not as effective as it might have been, the fault lay with those whose object was to snub rather than to help them. Why, then, should the authorities, who have evidently recently recognised their own short-sightedness, and are endeavoring to make up for lost time, impose upon those who have been doing their duty as well as circumstances would permit, an inequitable and barbaric code of laws? Military law, take it as you will, is degrading despotism, and its application to the members of a democratic community, without just cause, cannot be defended.

The phraseological architecture of the Act, especially in sections referring to military law, has evidently been very carefully planned, with the object of making it rather more elastic than the law applicable to the Regular Army. The author of the Act, however, must not forget that these very fine distinctions will not always be interpreted by himself. The administration of the Act will be in the hands of all kinds and conditions of men—some good soldiers and some bad soldiers; some who know their work and some who do not. In a great many instances it will be administered by men who openly advocate conscription (vide list of National Service League members), and in all cases by men who are dependent on the adjutants for advice, and adjutants are men to whom the Army Act is the breath of life.

Many excuses, almost apologies, have been put forward for this subjection of the force to military law, chief amongst them being that offences against the Army Act are very rare. Why, then, is it necessary to apply a code which is so rarely required? The answer to that is as well known to those who included the code in the Act as it is to the writer. The enormous power which military law gives can be used so tyranically that it is quite easy to make a man's life unbearable without ever bringing him before a court-martial. That military law has been so used in the past is patent to everybody; that it will be so used again in the future is scarcely open to question. The possession of such immense power over men as military law gives is an incentive, to all but men of the very finest feelings, to bully and blackguard, instead of to lead and instruct. A man of the Territorial Force may find himself quite unexpectedly the target for the abuse of some foul-mouthed blackguard; he may find himself ordered, out of pure spite, to perform some pettifogging and degrading menial work; he may find himself needlessly worried and annoyed in order to gratify a senseless whim of a superior; and yet, should he utter one word of protest or resentment, he brings himself within the scope of the Army Act, and, therefore, liable to be court-martialled. Again, a genuine mistake, a foolish action, and a mere boy, it may be, brings himself within the terms of the dreaded Army Act. He may be imprisoned or he may be fined. It is not enough to say that this very rarely happens. The matter must not be allowed to rest until members of the Territorial Force are exempt from military law except when embodied.

Finally, it is worth while considering whether the imposition of military law increases the fighting value of the Territorial Force, as compared with the Volunteers. It is claimed by the authors of the Act that the code of military law is necessary, but can never be a substitute for the morale of troops. As a matter of fact, that is exactly what does happen in the Territorial Force. The knowledge that men are liable to very heavy punishment for disobeying an order is a temptation to trust to its being carried out without troubling to see that it has been properly executed. Again, the enforcement of a penal code amongst men who are civilians for fifty weeks out of fifty-two is liable to make them nervous and guarded, lest they should unwittingly offend, and men in that condition are much harder to teach than men who feel free and contented. It cannot be urged that military law will make any difference to the gunnery records of the force, or that it will cause much improvement on the Volunteers' results; but it can be taken as certain that it will cause estrangement and suspicion between officers and men, and, as a result, an incalculable loss of fighting value.—Yours, &c., VERITY.

Letters to the Editor.

THE GORRINGE CASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me space to state the financial conditions, as between the owner and the public, in the now famous Gorringe case? Mr. Asquith, Sir E. Grey, and Mr. Hobhouse have all assured us that they do not look upon the action of the Duke of Westminster as in any way savoring of a levying of blackmail; it was a natural and proper business transaction that when the lease held by an intermediary came to an end, and Mr. Gorringe had to negotiate directly with the Duke's agents, the latter should ask for rather more than Mr. Gorringe had paid the lessees. It is, however, maintained that upon the change there was a "windfall" of "unearned increment," which ought to be made to contribute to public purposes, and the inference is that the present Budget will bring under contribution this form of wealth which previously had contributed nothing to those purposes.

I do not discuss what amount of such ascertained wealth ought to go to public purposes; I want to show that at present a considerable proportion is so applied.

In a previous letter I pointed out the difficulty of valuing any site; that, at present, in arbitrations, there is a very wide difference between the valuations made by perfectly honorable gentlemen on either side; and I urged that we cannot expect a State valuer to be more accurate than either the one or the other of these opposing experts. There are occasions when an actual valuation—not merely an estimate—is made, as when land is sold or the rent of a tenancy is revised, although in these cases there may be conditions which interfere in some degree with perfect accuracy in valuation. The value of a thing, I take it, is what it will fetch in open market. The revision of the terms of Mr. Gorringe's tenure was one of those occasions where you get a real valuation, because you have a price fixed as between buyer and seller. Mr. Gorringe was willing to give the Duke of Westminster £50,000 down—which I may treat as, roughly, the equivalent of £2,000 annually. He would also pay £4,000 a year as rent. There was the further condition respecting the character of the building he was to set up, and it may be that some portion of the expenditure upon this building ought really to go into the price which Mr. Gorringe was ready to pay for the land. In the latter condition we have an indeterminate amount, which, as I previously indicated, affects the valuation, rendering this inexact. But, leaving this out of the question, we have here a fact that, in the negotiations between Mr. Gorringe and the Duke, the land was valued at £6,000 per annum. This, however, is not all. In London the rates are about ten shillings in the £, and, in order that he might occupy this piece of land, Mr. Gorringe was ready to pay, as we have seen, £6,000 a year to the Duke of Westminster, and a further £3,000 in rates to the local authorities, the total annual cost (and value) of the land to Mr. Gorringe being, therefore, £9,000. But for the demand of the public, through the local authority, it is clear that the Duke of Westminster might have insisted on a rental of £9,000; and, therefore, as it seems to me, we have here a case in which the total annual value of the land, freshly and actually ascertained at £9,000 annually, is divided between the Duke of Westminster and the public authority, the latter taking one-third.

If my statement of the case be accurate, and the logic of it straightforward—as I believe—it is evident that already the public do take a very large proportion indeed of the value—earned or unearned increment—of the land. Whether the same proportion had been taken prior to the falling in of the old leases, I do not, of course, know. We do not seem to have any data upon which to work out a problem. But I think it would be surprising if the local authority, in their general valuation of the premises for rates, had not valued the land pretty nearly up to whatever figure their advisers thought right. They would certainly value it at, roughly, £3,500 a year, which Mr. Gorringe was actually paying to the intermediaries, and the rate upon this—the contribution from the land value to public purposes—would, of course, be £1,750.—Yours, &c., LEODIENSIS.

THE NATIONAL VALUATION OF LAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Budget has done more to enlighten the popular mind on the relations of land revenues to the public expenditure, Imperial and local, than a hundred abortive resolutions such as were passed in recent and mainly Tory Parliaments. THE NATION has rendered yeoman, if belated, service in an analysis of the taxing power and its legitimate exercise by the Executive Government. The reform section of the Metropolitan Press has also contributed to the general enlightenment by exposing the more flagrant cases of oppression at the close of building leases and the anomalous valuations of contiguous town properties for rating purposes. The comprehensive valuation of all lands of whatever description, which the Government are now instituting at the expense of the State, will afford valuable information which has not hitherto been available and will go far to mitigate if not altogether eliminate injustice from the levying of both Imperial taxes and local rates. Up to this time there has been an erroneous impression that the new valuation of land is being promoted to facilitate taxing only. But although the local authorities are to draw one-half of the proceeds of the new land taxes that does not affect the benefits to be derived from the re-adjusted valuation on which rates as well as taxes will in future be based.

The new valuation is in many ways desirable and—if injustice is not to be perpetuated—imperative for the following reasons:—

1. From time immemorial the "holding" of land was viewed as the counterpart of national services and contribution to the national treasury.

2. The direct land tax now paid is somewhat farcical, being based on a seventeenth century valuation and not much over one-fortieth of what it would have been had the assessment been on the "present" value.

3. The enormously increased expenditure for national defence and social reforms can only be derived from either industrial or non-industrial sources. Parliament has decided on the latter as the main source of increased taxation, and on the land revenues mainly as being best able and without injustice to bear it.

4. It is by no means probable that the taxes on land revenues will be maintained at their low initiative level, and the new valuation furnishes a basis on which any future Chancellor can rest his case and his levy.

5. In the past the land resumed by the nation and its local authorities has been at a fabulous cost and without almost any cognisance of the "right of eminent domain."

6. The valuation on which local rates are now assessed is largely based on information derived from the agents of the large landed estates and to some extent illusory.

You have lately published enough cases of inequitable rating in urban districts; I will adduce some of a rural character which are quite worthy rivals.

The parish in which I reside is almost entirely agricultural; the only village of 600 inhabitants depending partly on a decaying deep-sea fishing and much more on the receipts derived from visitors to it as a "resort." The main "estate" embraces the village and two-thirds of the parish and as usual "a home farm." The farm consists of some 430 to 450 acres of the best arable land in the parish, and of this some eighty acres have been converted into a golf course—although still grazed with sheep—yielding some £300 or £400 per annum. About twenty-five acres have been reserved for farming, and a good many leased in perpetuity at £16 an acre per annum. The land as a whole could be let as a farm at £400 a year, irrespective of building or golf course; nevertheless, it is in the valuation roll at £300. The gardeners', gamekeepers', and other dwelling-houses run from £6 to £12 a year in the valuation roll, although they would easily let at double.

But the crowning example of want of equity is found in a residence of some twenty rooms with an acre of first-rate garden, a park of four acres, shooting over some 6,000 acres, with offices, and situated within ten minutes of a railway station and telegraph post office. This is let at several hundreds a year to an ex-member of Parliament, but—on the specious pretext that the keepers and watchers are paid by the estate—it is entered on the roll at £50 a year. Indeed, until it was exposed in a local paper of a more Radical cast than the landlord-owned organs, the value was modestly set at £25! The house and garden, &c., could be let at £70, the park at £10, the shooting at £150 a year. As far as let, the rent decides; the unlet being "returned" by the estate factors. On one occasion the Parish Council of this parish, feeling aggrieved at the above, ventured to appeal. The Appellate Court is almost entirely composed of landlords and their agents, and is thus an uncongenial sphere for the readjustments such cases demand. And the Assessor bluntly told the delegates that if they troubled him much he would take them to the House of Lords.

I think, then, the new valuation is belated rather than premature, and not only highly desirable but (if justice in taxing and rating is the objective) imperative. The Chancellor of the Exchequer should make such regulations for the new basis as would ensure equable valuations for gentle and simple and make it impossible to reduce below their separate and normal value subjects let for sporting purposes. I agree with him it is high time such practices as have lately been unearthed in connection with building leases and the relative taxes and rates of the influential and the humble "should be brought to an end." The new valuation of land will for that purpose prove a potent and almost invaluable instrument.—Yours, &c., JOHN MCCULLOCH.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a former brief note I stated as the American habit of State taxation that all real and personal property was assessed (valued) for taxation purposes at a conservative market value upon which percentages were variously calculated for State and local purposes.

I would like to add, as appropriate to the land tax discussion, that the present value of the land and the value of the improvements on the land are commonly separately ascertained, and, in suitable rentable cases, there is also considered the worth of the land at, say, fifteen or more years' purchase.

The element of differing personal judgments in this cannot, of course, be avoided, and the processes are in no respect essentially different from those used by competent appraisers or valuers everywhere.

The estimates of the prospective costs of the appraisals under the proposed Parliamentary Act seem astounding.—Yours, &c., GEO. WHITNEY MOORE.

FATHER TYRRELL'S POSITION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is not improbable that Gallio, who "cared for none of those things," held opinions concerning the missionary efforts and the spiritual enthusiasm of St. Paul, like those held by "F. R." concerning Father Tyrrell. And, truly, that earlier apostle must have presented a ridiculous appearance in the eyes of any man able to take a wide survey of cultivated thought, and careful to give due weight to the influence of far more than "a good half of the intellect and moral worth of Europe," over against which this fanatic was as dust in the balance. If any group of mankind within Gallio's consideration was "negligible in point of numbers, or negligible in point of moral and intellectual influence," it was surely the group represented by the apostle, who, although a gentleman and, to some extent, a scholar, was obviously neither moving with the main current of the times nor bringing before the world a coherent system affording "any stable position in modern religious thought." It was plain, in fact, that he did not so much as aim at stability.

The absurdity, too, of a man's taking up and suggesting to other people any attitude which involved the most serious social and even judicial penalties was peculiarly anomalous, now that men of the world were aware that the utmost freedom was generally accorded to philosophic pursuit, and to a religious practice which had reached an outlook and embrace almost universal in its humanism.

As to the childish folly of supposing that "either in the universe or outside" there existed a Being who cared two denarii about the puerile ceremonies which, it appeared, these Christians found desirable, there could be only one opinion among persons of enlightenment.

Yet there was a certain amount of intelligence, and an evident good faith, about this preacher. Therefore, it might be hoped that (since he could rise so far above the common level of superstitious observance, and must "inevitably go farther"), he might have time to follow out his beginning of emancipation. One could hardly fail to be "interested in his personal drama," however little one might be "affected by his dreams."

It is, in fact, always difficult for either our Gallios or our "F. R.'s" to see the significance of a position in which a man can speak, as Father Tyrrell does in the "Much-Abused Letter," of a "life of religion, of union with God through humanity, with humanity through God," and can declare this to be "a religion which is logically (not historically) older than all the creeds that have struggled so variously to give it expression, just as every kind of life is older than its intellectual analysis"; while at the same time he maintains that a certain communion of obscure persons is "at once the highest expression or determination and the most effectual instrument of the life of religion" throughout the world. It is difficult, but it should not be impossible. That there are sovran ideas and profound spiritual truths underlying the superstitions of Christians has been amply shown since the days of Gallio, and "F. R." at least cannot ignore the verdict of that history which Gallio was unable to foretell, although he may, and does, interpret it amiss. To Father Tyrrell the life of his Church, its persistence and its power over the hearts of men, despite its own attempts at self-destruction, confirmed that which he knew in his own depth of religious experience, and by his own penetrating religious insight. It was not for him to undervalue the visible corporate expression of an experience which he recognised as, in one degree or another, universal, were it ever so grossly overlaid by intellectual "theologising," or by an absolutism of government increasing before his eyes. Nor could he be turned away by any signs of our passing time, or by the fact that for the moment "three-fourths of" perhaps even his own "best friends" were "outside this Catholic 'Communion.'" If the whole world had been outside it and had forgotten, to its peril and its loss, the treasure there enshrined and preserved for the world, what difference could that miserable fact have made to the loyalty of such a man as he?

Not because the Catholic Communion is great or prevailing, nor because it has once been both great and prevailing, but because it is still, as when St. Paul fought its battle against and for the world, the guardian of that of which the world has need, was "the very word Catholic music" in Tyrrell's ears.

How did he know this? How do we others know it? We cannot tell "F. R.," because, when we tell him, we speak a language which, to his mind, as he says of Father Tyrrell's writing, "constantly substitutes nebulosity for clearness, and obscures the meaning in a cloud of words." We can only say to him, as was said under like conditions long ago, that the words we have to use are to be discerned as "spirit and life."—Yours, &c.,

WM. SCOTT PALMER.

SIR,—I think the right answer to your correspondent, "F. R.'s" question, and the point that he misses, is this: The particular contribution of Father Tyrrell to the religion of humanity is that he illustrates, in a very special and important manner, the effort of the religious sense to free itself from the trammels of a dead theology. It is a movement which is common to many sections of Christianity and to other religions at the present time.

To those who believe that the religious sense is as real and universal as the mechanical reason, it will seem impossible to attach too great significance to Father Tyrrell's attitude (not "position," which implies fixity) of mind.—Yours, &c.,

A MEMOIR OF FATHER TYRRELL.

SIR,—As a biographical memoir of Father Tyrrell will soon be in course of preparation, I shall be greatly obliged if any of your readers who have letters from him will kindly give me the opportunity of seeing them. The greatest possible care will be taken of all letters sent me, and they will be returned to their owners as soon as copies have been taken of them.

I take this opportunity of pointing out that as I am now responsible for all publications of letters written by Father Tyrrell, it will be necessary for any one having such letters to obtain my permission before publishing them.—Yours, &c.,

THE PREVENTION OF CANCER.

SIR,—The investigators of the Cancer Research Fund have from time to time during the last seven years published an account of their work in a series of reports. Their elaborate researches, conducted with great ability, have led to some remarkable conclusions, and shown the way to many interesting points of view for further exploration.

But on the statistical side some of the fundamental suppositions on which they proceed are not in accordance with proved facts, which, if realised and acted upon, would result much more certainly in a large reduction, not only of cancer, but of other devastating maladies. The physiological interest of transplanting tissue, of inoculating and of grafting, may conceivably, but not probably, be consummated by the attainment of a means of lasting cure. But even a cure, possible in the future, would leave the conditions productive of cancer untouched.

Mr. Bashford considered the disease to be "rare" in man, but statistics prove it to be one of the commonest—1 in 11 to 1 in 8 of persons over thirty-five in England and Wales being killed by it, as he has himself admitted.

He believes that animals, such as farm cattle, are about as much subject to cancer as man. This is contrary to the opinion of high authorities, from Sir W. Hunter, the veterinarian, to quite recent writers on this question. Possibly it may apply to beasts fattened for the market. It is rather common in the dog, and more common among carnivora than among herbivora; it is rare or unknown among wild animals such as deer.

The investigators report that statistics and comparisons of foreign countries, &c., are so unreliable and various in methods, &c., as to be practically useless; a very sweeping condemnation. But, in all their variety, the statistics of countries, of parts of countries, of communities, and of occupations point to the same conclusions. Where defective statistics, in immensely differing conditions, strongly support, without any exception, and in great number, a theory already strong from other grounds, those statistics are of high value and service.

The following statement of facts indicates very clearly the reformed habits of life which would prevent many, probably most, of the cases of disease now likely from arising at all.

(1) Wild herbivora, also uncivilised natives, especially those living frugally, are free or almost free from cancer. Natives in contact with Europeans, and with European fare, become affected.

(2) The poorer nations, and especially those using stimulants, narcotics, and irritants most sparingly, are least subject to cancer. The poorer parts of nations have been least affected, the richest parts by far the most. In the separate parts of towns a similar difference was recorded.

(3) The prevalence of the disease has rapidly grown wherever increased riches have led to a much larger consumption of meats, drinks, and tobacco. In England, tea-drinking and cancer have both been doubled in about a generation, while the use of luxurious fare, including flesh and various stimulants, has also increased rapidly. In foreign countries a rapid increase of coffee-drinking was followed by a rapid increase of cancer.

(4) Persons employed in those occupations where most flesh, beer, tea, &c., was consumed were most affected, e.g., publicans and their servants, butchers, fishmongers, commercial travellers. The death rate of these classes was abnormally high, and Dr. Farr called attention to the extraordinary mortality of butchers in early middle life. The causes of general unhealthiness seem to a great extent to be the same as the causes of cancer, though many victims are robust and many have lived temperately in every way. Toxins of previous illness, of gout, rheumatism, worry, and inherited predisposition may account for a large number of cases. But the liability of strong laborers, such as the American woodmen, seems clearly due to the great excess of nitrogenous food and inky tea in their diet. External cancer is well-known to be started by various irritants on the skin, and a variety of irritants or toxins may produce the disease internally, as betel-chewing does in the mouth. The general powers of resistance are at the same time affected.

(5) Some of the best observers and specialists, including Sir W. Banks, Sir James Paget, and Dr. Keith, were struck by the very pernicious effect of meat and stimulants in exacerbating cancer.

(6) Convents and other institutions, with peaceful ways of living and frugality, have a very low rate; some have been quite exempt. Even prisons and workhouses have a rate below the average.

Such statistical evidence, and there is a mass of it which cannot be slighted, thoroughly agrees with the testimony of some of the most eminent medical men from personal observation. It is certain that excessive food and continual stimulation, unrealised as they often are, contribute to the production of rheumatism, gout, and troubles of digestion, nerves, and brain. Reformed habits, including avoidance of the minute daily doses of strong poisons now consumed by the majority in Western nations, must be followed by a great reduction of all these diseases, and more.

If a very small proportion of the sums now given to the search for elusive cures were to be devoted to safe dietetic experiments in isolated communities or voluntary groups, valuable results would be attained, and both health and economy would certainly be promoted in the whole nation. Prevention of these disorders on a large scale has been, so far, little attempted.—Yours, &c., R. RUSSELL.

SLAVE LABOR ON THE PORTUGUESE COCOA PLANTATIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As this subject has been mentioned several times in THE NATION, I feel sure that your readers will be interested to learn that the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society has resolved to send Mr. Joseph Burtt as a deputation to the United States in September, in order to make known the facts about the slave-grown cocoa, and to arouse public opinion on the subject, especially in the important centres of the northern and eastern States.

There can be no doubt of the importance at this moment of obtaining the co-operation of the American people, and urging them to take every possible means of expressing their disapproval of the conditions under which the San Thomé cocoa is produced.

I hope shortly, with your permission, to be able to give further particulars of Mr. Burtt's tour, regarding which I am now in communication with sympathisers in the United States, and to appeal to your readers to assist by contributing to the fund which we are endeavoring to raise to meet the expenses to be incurred.—Yours, &c.,

"THE GOVERNMENT AND THE SUFFRAGE MOVEMENT."

SIR,—I think Mr. Pethick Lawrence may feel at ease on one point in his letter to you of the 10th inst.

At the next General Election there will certainly not be a wholesale desertion of all the more intelligent Liberal women from the ranks of the Liberal party. Mr. Lawrence is convinced that unless a Suffrage Bill, founded on a property qualification, is included in the Government measures in 1910, the Government will have to face the desertion, not only of the Liberal women already ex, but also "of all the other more intelligent Liberal women who will become ex if their political desires are not satisfied before the next General Election." The ex-Liberals find salvation in the ranks of those Suffragists who are violently opposed to the Government.

The revolt of these women constitutes Mr. Lawrence's proof of the approaching ruin of the Liberal Party.

Now, however extensive his knowledge of ex-Liberals, Mr. Lawrence evidently knows little of the vast number of loyal Liberal women and their feelings towards the Government. He has not gauged the deep esteem and appreciation increasingly felt by Associations of Liberal Women for the Prime Minister's incessant labors, and also for the qualities of mind and character that keep him true as steel to all the cardinal points of Liberalism.

It might have re-assured Mr. Lawrence as to the peril of "desertion" had he seen the ovation Mr. Asquith received from the National Women's Liberal Association at the Countess of Granard's reception during their annual Council meetings.

The delegates, women with political intelligence, represented Associations from all parts of England. They understood the meaning of the fight the Government is waging over the Budget, and felt deep gratitude was due for Old Age Pensions, for the Children's Bill, the settlement of South Africa, and other measures. Liberal men—whose political existence and importance Mr. Lawrence, by the way, completely ignores—and women also are deeply interested in housing reform and rent, and they see the drift and tendency in this direction of the land clauses in the Budget. Enthusiasm grows daily for the return to power, whenever the General Election comes, of a Government that has already done so much in financial and industrial reforms—reforms that touch women very nearly. Mr. Lawrence may be assured that Liberal women trust Mr. Asquith and the Cabinet fully and sincerely in their conduct of affairs because they have shown both honor and justice. Honor in redeeming all their pledges, as far as lay in their hands, and justice because they have worked for the good of the whole community, and not of any one class. They have worked with a single-minded purpose towards the high aims of an ideal democracy. It is always regrettable when any of the party of progress turn away from the upward path; some women do so to whom Life has not taught the difficult lesson of patience, or that without its power there is no achievement of purpose. But to imagine that their desertion would have any material effect on the fortunes of the Liberal Party is futile, almost ludicrous. The fear is groundless. Those who state it know little of men and women's Liberal associations, their number, and the intense enthusiasm that prevails among them for the Liberal measures, which, with infinite tact and labor and patience, the Government has already piloted through both Houses of Parliament. Liberals have little fear as to the fate of the Government at the polls. In any case failure will never arise from lack of help Liberal women can give, for the simple reason that the mass of them are loyal to the core.—Yours, &c.,

(MRS.) B. BROOKSBANK.

THE WOMEN'S WAR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your article, "The Women's War," you state that "an obstacle to success" is "the still unmoved conviction of probably the majority of the male electors of this country that the women should not be given the vote." I believe this to be a mistake. At recent by-elections the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies has had an electors' petition for signature at the various polling stations, and my experience has been that the majority of the electors are in favor of women's suffrage. At the last by-election I was at Mid-Derby. I spent eleven hours on polling day at one of the polling stations, asking electors only if they would sign the petition to give women who had the same qualification as male electors the Parliamentary vote. About 420 men voted at that particular station in the course of the day, and, with the exception of times of special rush, when it was impossible, I asked almost every elector as he came out to sign his name, address, and polling number. Sometimes we had a queue of five or six waiting to sign, sometimes men confessed shamefacedly that they could not write their name, but were willing to make their "mark." I am convinced of this: that not one signed without knowing what he was signing and what he was supporting. The number of signatures secured was 273—out of 420—just under two-thirds. I was quite alone. My small, ricketty tables constantly blew over, and in the evening the men crowded in to vote in batches, often as many as ten or fifteen coming out quickly after each other. With more help we could have spoken to all.

I heard the results of two other members' petitions before I left Belper. One had secured the signatures of a considerably larger proportion of voters, one rather smaller. I see to-day that the same helper secured 204 signatures out of 308 at the Kirkcudbright polling station in the Dumfries by-election, and that Miss Fraser, our head organiser there, received quite an ovation when she entered the Central Hall after the poll had been declared. After Mr. Gulland's speech there were shouts for Miss Fraser after every speech, until the chairman asked her to respond. At Sheffield over 5,000 voters signed the petition, more than voted for any one candidate. If often the total number of signatures do not show the same large proportions as the separate polling stations, it is because the number of helpers is insufficient. At Mid-Derby many of the polling stations had no petition at all. The difficulty of getting Liberals to sign when the militant section have been active in the constituency (they did not put in an appearance at Mid-Derby at all) is easy to understand, as there is not always time to explain to electors in the brief moments at one's disposal, that it is not the policy of the suffragists "to try and keep the Liberal out," and that the policy of any one section of suffragettes does not affect the principle or the justice and expediency of our cause.

I contend that there is evidence that the electors would declare for woman suffrage (if they could) on the merits of the case, apart from party wirepullers, and the irritation caused by the militant section's policy of "opposing the Government."

The real difficulty, I believe, is the unknown quantity of the women's vote. A Government with a large majority tends to be more or less content with its present electorate, and fears that the unknown may be hostile. Nevertheless, this attitude of acquiescence in the principle and (in my opinion quite unjustifiable) fear of the result is unworthy of the great party of progress, and "gives pause" to us, who, as elected officials of the party, would otherwise throw ourselves heart and soul into the great fight for the people.

There is no need for the Irish or any other party "to waive first claim." We only ask the Government to put a clause into the Electoral Reform Bill to remove the disqualification of sex. And we ask THE NATION, as the leading Radical paper, the paper of the thoughtful and intelligent Liberals in this country, to lead the way to a just and rapid satisfaction of our legitimate demands, to give the lead towards righteousness and freedom in this cause, as it has done in causes many leagues further from home, to help us to get women's suffrage incorporated in the Liberal programme.—Yours, &c.,

H. B. DOWSON.

SIR,—In your excellent article, "The Women's War," you truly state that "Democracy is fighting for its life." The forces of progress must, therefore, join issues and fight the enemies of democracy in whatever new guise they assume. If a few misguided women, having neither logic nor reason, choose to bob up against the Government on every possible occasion in spite of the fact that it has the sanction of the majority of the nation to usher in social reforms, they must be considered as the enemies of democracy either wilfully, or through ignorance, or through being a "little daft"; any or all of these causes. The easy toleration, good nature, and politeness with which they have been treated has certainly led them to excesses which would not have been permitted the sterner sex

As a reformer of twenty years standing (in a small way) I would advise them to "ca canny." Direct frontal attacks seldom attain the object aimed at in this age of science, and if persisted in ultimately bring the cause into ridicule and contempt, besides useless martyrdom and pain. Diplomacy, the gentleness of the dove and the cunning of the serpent, will in time remove the resisting forces and at the same time educate the great majority to see the justice of their views. This can only be done by patience, time, and hard work. There is no royal road to the franchise otherwise.—Yours, &c.,

I. MACKENZIE.

RUSSIAN OPINION AND THE TSAR'S VISIT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I point out to Mr. Scott that the fury of the Russian Reactionaries at King Edward's speech may point to a different conclusion from that suggested by Mr. Scott. It seemed to me that King Edward's remarks must have reminded all who were present of the great difference between the treatment accorded to the Tsar in England and that given to the members of the Duma. As phantom representatives of constitutional government they were treated with cordial friendship; while the Tsar was not admitted to the mainland of England at all, because it was felt that he was reducing the forms of constitutional government to a sham. King Edward's speech must, in short, have added to the effect of the protest against the Tsar's visit.

As to the approval of Professor Milyukoff, I do not see why Mr. Scott should draw so harsh a conclusion as to the opinion formed of the Professor by the opponents of the Tsar's visit. No one can doubt that the Professor and his friends are in a very difficult position; and we may fully believe that they are acting honestly and even bravely for the good of their country, and yet at the same time that their painful position incapacitates them from judging of the proper attitude to be taken by those who are unhampered by these difficulties. For my part, I believe that the exclusion of the Tsar from the mainland of England, the courtesy shown the members of the Duma, and the neatly turned phrases of King Edward's speech, must all work together to convince Russian observers of the hatred felt in England for the present official policy in Russia.—Yours, &c.,

THE POVERTY OF THE COTTAGE.

SIR,—The scarcity of cottages and the reluctance of County Councils to build, which were pointed out in a letter last week by Mr. James Mackenzie, are not peculiar to Essex

The remedy lies in the revocation or modification of bye-laws regarding new buildings. As the law stands, these must be built of brick, of stone, or of substantial concrete, and, as a cottage standing alone costs about £200 to build and a pair from £300 to £350, investors, whether private individuals or public bodies, are not anxious to sink money in cottage building when a laborer cannot pay more than 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. per week rent. The mistake is to insist upon substantial buildings in country districts. In Sweden and Norway, in the United States and other countries, this has always been recognised. Country cottages and houses of a larger sort are built of wood, with brick or stone foundations. Wood may be cheaper in those lands than it is here, but, even at the price we should have to pay in England, a wooden cottage would not cost much above half the price of a brick cottage.

The risk of fire is no greater here than in other lands, probably less, because we use safety matches, which these countries do not. Cottages usually have but one bedroom storey, and could be provided with outside escape staircases. The financial risk would be covered by insurance.

From a sanitary point of view, it is desirable that cottages should not be constructed to last many generations. A good many villages might be healthier if some of the old cottages were destroyed by fire. A fire may be a good friend.

Wooden cottages, with a wide, covered porch or verandah, are not only much prettier, but more convenient, being warmer in winter and cooler in summer than the brick and tile horrors which mar the beauty of many of our country roads. We certainly do not want to see these increased.

When the new scheme of afforestation is realised, we shall find wood the most obvious building material for country dwellings; but we need not wait for that. The need for increased accommodation for the laborer and his family is pressing, and Mr. Mackenzie would be doing a great public service if he would agitate for the alteration of the existing bye-laws.—Yours, &c.,

ELTON CLARIDGE.

MY LADY OF DREAMS.

(From the French of Paul Verlaine.)

OFT-TIMES, in dreams intense, she doth appear,
This unknown one I love, who loveth me;
Subtly she changes, yet unchanged is she
Each time she cometh to me, ah, how near!
My heart for her transparent is (but clear
For her alone, alas! its mystery).
She smoothes my forehead, all my agony
She weeps away—she only, loved and dear.

How looketh she, what color eyes and hair?
I cannot tell! Her name? 'Tis sonorous
And sweet as those that ransomed spirits bear;
No sculptured goddess hath more calm a mien;
And for her voice—not sweeter were to us
Loved voices that now are not—that have been.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

ONE of the most important issues of the autumn publishing season will be the first two volumes of "Emerson's Journals," which have been prepared for the Press by Mr. Edward W. Emerson and Mr. Waldo Emerson Forbes. These volumes, which are but the first instalment of Emerson's diaries, cover the years from 1820 to 1829, and give some fresh information about the essayist's college life, his acquaintance with Channing, his religious doubts, and the effect upon his mind of reading Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Montaigne. The journal promises to be of special interest, since Emerson not only employed it to chronicle his doings and impressions but also as a vehicle for experiments in literary style.

A "LIFE OF WILLIAM SHARP" has been written by his widow, and will, it is hoped, be in the hands of the public by next November. Mrs. Sharp has based her work upon an abundance of letters, diaries, and other literary memorials left by her husband. It is said that the book will contain a complete and authoritative account of the cause—which seems to have been a case of dual personality in the strictest sense of the words—that led William Sharp, while publishing under his own name, to adopt also the pseudonym of Fiona Macleod. The first volumes of a collected edition of all William Sharp's works are to be published simultaneously with the biography.

Two books on Gambetta are announced for publication during the year. Miss Violette M. Montagu is preparing a translation of M. P. B. Gheusi's deeply interesting "Gambetta par Gambetta," while Messrs. Sonnenschein are to issue "The Life of Gambetta," by Mr. W. Grinton Berry, the author of "France Since Waterloo." Messrs. Sonnenschein also announce a translation by Mr. J. B. Baillie of Hegel's "Phenomenology of Mind," and, in their "Special Campaign Series," "The Ulm Campaign, 1800," by Colonel F. N. Maude, and "The Shenandoah Valley Campaign, 1861-1862," by Major Redway.

IT is doubtful whether Lord Lytton's novels are now widely read, though possibly Mr. T. H. S. Escott's coming biography, "The Life of Edward Bulwer, First Baron Lytton of Knebworth," may do something to revive their vogue. Few English writers have been so versatile—he was politician, novelist, pamphleteer, essayist, playwright, and satirist—but in spite of his many-sided activity he never attained the position he sought in the world of letters. Thackeray parodied his style in "George de Barnewell," and Tennyson, provoked by a couplet in "The New Timon," in which Lytton spoke of

> "The jingling melody of purloined conceits > Out-babying Wordsworth and out-glittering Keats."

replied by some very bitter verses which, through the agency of Forster, appeared in "Punch."

> "Who killed the girls and thrilled the boys
> With dandy pathos when you wrote:
> O Lion, you that made a noise,
> And shook a mane en papillotes. . .
> "What profits now to understand
> The merits of a spotless shirt—
> A dapper boot—a little hand—
> If half the little soul is dirt?"

A BIOGRAPHY of Karl Marx, the fruit of twelve years' labor, has just been completed by Mr. John Spargo, and is to appear during the autumn in French and German, as well as in English. Mr. Spargo is an American, and has written several books upon Socialism.

THE publication of "The Scott Dictionary: An Encyclopædia of the Characters, Localities, &c., of the Novels of Sir Walter Scott" by Messrs. Routledge, will add Scott to the small band of authors who have an entire encyclopædia devoted to their creations. One of the most notable publications of this type was the "Répertoire de la Comédie Humaine de H. de Balzac," by M. Anatole Cerfberr and Jules Christophe, in which Balzac's two thousand characters are classified and their relationships to one another expounded. Last year Mr. Alexander Philip issued a "Dickens Dictionary," in the preface to which he promised a Dickens encyclopædia. Enthusiasm for an author could hardly go further, but among English novelists Dickens and Scott are best entitled to the honor.

M. VICTOR MARGUERITTE finds that pressure of political work prevents him from giving as much time as he would wish to literature, and he has accordingly determined not to contest his seat in the Chamber at the next election. He is at present engaged upon a novel, entitled "Les Ruines," and a play in two acts to be called "L'Imprévu." Among other announcements from Paris are "Les Fourberies de l'Amour," a collection of short stories by Gérard d'Houville; "Le Crépuscule des Nymphes," by M. Pierre Louys; and "L'Amphisbème," by M. Henri de Regnier. M. Jacques Boulenger has written a study of the "Muses" of the time of Louis-Philippe as a companion volume to his former book on the "Dandys" of the same period.

"SPIRITISTIC PHENOMENA AND THEIR INTERPRETATION" is the title of a book by Professor Lombroso, which will shortly make its appearance. It maintains the view that there is hardly a doubt as to the power of the dead to communicate with the living. Although Professor Lombroso has now reached the age of seventy-three, the new book is said to be written with quite as much fire and combativeness as any of its predecessors.

NEXT month will be published the first two of a set of ten volumes which will bear the general title of "A Documentary History of American Industrial Society." The general editors of the series are Professors John R. Commons, U. B. Phillips, and Eugene A. Gilmore, and Miss Helen Sumner and Mr. John B. Andrews. The opening volumes contain a great deal of fresh material illustrating the economics of the Southern plantation under slavery and under freedom, and the industrial development of frontier society up to a recent period. The remainder of the work deals with the history of the labor movement in America, industrial conditions, trade unions, employers' associations, and the political activity of wage-earners.

BOOKS which, though taking the form of a novel or "romance," are intended by their authors as serious contributions to history seem to be growing in favor, and we are promised a work of this type dealing with the relations between George IV. and Mrs. Fitzherbert. Its author, Mr. George Gilbert, has already championed Mrs. Fitzherbert's cause, and in his coming book he embodies some fresh discoveries which will, he claims, place the matter in an entirely fresh light. Its title is "To My King Ever Faithful: The Life Story of Mrs. Fitzherbert," and it will be published next month by Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

TOWN PLANNING AND TOWN PLANNERS.*

Here in opportune conjunction we are offered a manual of town planning, and the evidence of no small demand for it. Despite our natural respect for a portly volume as compared with a mere pamphlet and reprint, the latter claims first attention; for when we have seen what a fairly representative gathering of our fellow-citizens are looking for, we shall be in a better position to appraise what the professed expert is seeking to supply to them.

The National Housing Reform Council, as its name implies, though of very practical purpose, is not to be confounded with the many building schemes and directly constructive endeavors which have been springing up of late years, but acts rather as their forerunner and preacher, their prophet and pioneer. Since 1900 it has been spreading throughout the land the now prevalent, but too long delayed discontent with the housing conditions of the people in town and country, and this in the right way, by diffusing knowledge of the means of dealing with them, as these are being worked out here and there, at home and abroad. Besides much useful minor literature, it has produced, and this in handy and easily available volumes, a working encyclopædia of reference for almost all aspects of the subject, Alderman Thompson's "Housing Handbook Up-to-date," a sound compendium of information on matters of municipal and central requirements and administration, of building law and financial methods, of structure and hygiene. How far the agitation and propaganda of this body, the N.H.R.U. as it begins to be called, may have modified the attitude of the Local Government Board or stimulated its legislative activities, we need not here inquire, but it has evidently been taking a growing part in the education, both of members of Parliament and their constituencies, and this increasingly across party divisions. It expresses, in fact, within its important field, that permeation of social criticism and social effort which is so hopeful a feature of our times. By the nature of its inquiries it escapes those insular and "Imperial" limitations which at present at so many points shut in our horizon; almost from its origin it has been becoming increasingly international in its interests, like a scientific or hygienic congress anywhere. The recent Continental Town Planning Tour, of which the record lies before us, is thus not merely the natural sequel of the public interest aroused by Mr. Horsfall's "Example of Germany" and kindred literature, increased by the impulse of the Birmingham and other Town Councils' German visits and reports, and now diffused by the prolonged discussion and not altogether unfortunate delays of the Town Planning Bill; it has been in its way an independent development also. The ninety or more members of the expedition included, in fair proportions, members of town, county, and district councils, city architects and hygienists, borough engineers and surveyors, as well as active representatives of constructive associations like Garden City and its congeners; and this official report (reprinted from the "Municipal Record") resumes their journey through leading Rhenish cities and representative Bavarian ones, and appends a score or more of appreciations by individual members of what seemed to them the main lessons of their visit—occasionally its warnings also. Noteworthy evidence of the growing acceptance of this mode of civic education in the field, through actual visits to chosen places, is afforded by the peripatetic congress held by the same active body a fortnight ago at Port Sunlight, Woodlands, and Earswick model villages, and still more conclusively by the second German Tour which they are arranging for next month. Here, in fact, we have a new combination of social inquiry and travel, which unites the essential advantages, and, at least, abates the drawbacks, of types hitherto more distinct—the specialist congress, the municipal deputation, and the holiday tour. The stimulating problems and the active discussions of scientists in council are here present, without their technicality and their dispersiveness; here, too, from scores of cities, are virtual municipal deputations, with all their public purpose and local adaptiveness, but without their ponderosities and rivalries; while community of aims and variety of individual approaches to them but enhance the freedom and fellowship of an associated holiday. For such an organisation, given, of course, capable organisers, such as have happily been forthcoming, rapid growth in numbers and in influence may confidently be predicted.

Taking official report and its individual appendices together, there can be no doubt that this tour achieved its objects. Not only were the historic dignity and stately hospitality of the great German cities warmly appreciated as they deserved, and the nature and attitude of their municipal government fairly grasped, but their long foresight was understood, and their vast and comprehensive preparations for the future intelligently admired, yet not without the needful note of criticism. "Germany for Town Planning, but England for Cottages," is thus rightly set down as the verdict of the majority—a view to which German town-planners are awakening also. For the way in which civic schemes and even land-transfer facilities, have during the past generation given scope to private speculation and have thus unintentionally enhanced site-values far beyond those of this country, so condemning the working-class—who, the ruling-classes there as here constantly forget, constitute nine-tenths of the population—to tenement-dwellings, and tenement health accordingly, was very clearly realised. Indeed, if we mistake not, the proposed September tour is largely planned with the view of studying the way in which some German cities, Ulm especially, have more or less guarded themselves against this disaster. For here is a matter of obvious, almost paramount, interest in view of our own Town Planning Bill, as well as of that simplification of land-transfer which cannot much longer be delayed. Most important of all is that larger and brighter vision of city life which these various commentaries show. Many dilate upon the social amenity of German life, its family enjoyments, its domestic cleanliness and "house-pride" (an admirable word). Others are impressed by the beauty and, what is less commonly realised, the real practicability as well as beauty of the medieval town-plan, while others justly expatiate upon that all-round organising power which, as at Frankfort, not only creates a new harbor and factory quarter with unprecedented railway facilities, but beside this the needful workmen's suburbs, with not only boulevard but park, and beyond this access to forest. Another justly holds up Wiesbaden as a model to our watering-places, one at present unapproachable perhaps, yet none the less stimulating from many points of view—a city urban yet sylvan, healthy and simple, yet monumental, indeed becoming magnificent.

Above all, there has been growing up in our tourists' minds a conception more or less clear of each city as an individuality, a unique and complex personality, developing through past and present into future. The ways in which these German cities transcend our industrial towns—in elements regional and historic, institutional and cultural, artistic, spiritual—evidently made themselves increasingly felt as the observers progressed from Düsseldorf to Nuremberg, and they confess that their too narrow thought circles, brought from our too prosaic town life, of industries and communications, of rent, wages, and profits, of artisan necessaries, and middle-class comforts, and of dwellings consistent essentially with these, has been widened for the rest of their lives. The housing and town planning movement is thus visibly passing from the merely economic plane to the social; and we see builder and architect, hygienist and artist, economist and idealist, all plainly converging towards sociological thought and civic action.

So much, then, for the standpoint—or rather stage—of civic studies, which is being reached by our actual or would-be town planners and their mother organisation, as, no doubt, more widely throughout our cities; for, as we have said, this Easter German trip, the recent Congress, and the proposed autumn tour are but manifestations of an enlarging public eager for fuller knowledge, and ready for more and more expert guidance. Here then appears, in the very nick of time, Mr. Inigo Triggs's volume, and the question is—how far does it meet the situation and justify its ambitious title, its apparent, even emphatic, claim to be the encyclopædia of the subject? Its contents and treatment, however, soon show that this has not really been attempted, and the most that has been aimed at is an introductory manual. But this next disappoints us, and we find that we have to do with little more than a succession of chapters, which give the impression of so many separately written magazine articles, on the whole justifiably reprinted, no doubt, but without the unity and thoroughness so necessary in an ordered book, especially of such high pretensions. After an introductory essay, slight and discursive, comes a sketch of "the types of ancient and modern towns," which would be readable enough as a light essay, but which can satisfy neither geographer nor historian, still less the active inquirers into city origins, to whom it must appear at too many points insufficiently informed as to facts, unsound in interpretations, and careless, even to contradiction, in statement. It is, no doubt, a service at present to reproduce intelligible plans of old London or Paris, of Selinus, Alexandria, and Pompeii, of Montpazier, of Amsterdam, Karlsruhe, and New Orleans, but such a selection suggests a vagueness of treatment which the text only too plainly confirms. To compare the advantages and defects of the chessboard and radiating systems with reference to Washington is a more definite task, and more within the writer's competence, though in devoting an almost equal space to the hexagonal ideal plans of recent German writers he shakes our confidence anew; for here, what would have been an interesting enough paragraph, foot-note, or appendix, is given pages of full text, and this is in a chapter setting out an account of "types of ancient and modern towns." On the "Circulation of Traffic" we have mainly a summary of M. Hénard's recent and important paper, with its comparative diagrams of the essential traffic circulation of Paris, Berlin, and London, &c., with his designs for "superimposed thoroughfares"; and, of more practical value, Mr. Twelvetrees's admirably simple treatment of the congestion of Oxford and Piccadilly Circuses and the like by "gyratory traffic regulation," each diagram of which is worth a volume of the ponderous London Traffic Commission's Blue-Book of a few years ago. Of "Town Expansion," the sketch of the garden suburb movement will be useful enough to general readers, but it closes without even a constructive suggestion of the possible, here so peculiarly promising. The final chapters on the "Planning of Streets" and on "Squares and Open Spaces" may also be looked through for the sake of their summaries and process-blocks from this and that writer, German and American, but again fall far short of what the title and advertisement, and, indeed, the writer's previous works, entitle us to anticipate. And, with all his dependence on other writers, there is no bibliography.

We have dealt faithfully with Mr. Inigo Triggs, for what is too much a descent into hurried book-making; and we go further and say that his profession also is largely behind the times. The architects failed to control the speculative builder because their standard was too high, but now they are in danger of failing to lead the town-planning movement because their views are too limited. They do not yet know their cities, past nor present, still less their requirements. How, then, shall they create the possible? Let Mr. Triggs try again; let the R.I.B.A., let the new Liverpool School of Town Planning look to it. The problem of our cities is not to be solved off hand, on paper, by the imitation of plans and elevations admired elsewhere. Only in the measure of our knowledge, and sympathy, and interpretation of each city's past and present can we possibly be enabled to add our contribution to the development of its life. The true architect is the citizen as artist.

A HISTORY OF DRESS.*

COSTUME is a subject which lends itself to a variety of treatment. You may regard it, if you please, as a symbol of the spiritual nature of man, or discover in it a forcible illustration of the law of natural selection. You may scrutinise, with Lotze, the internal significance of feminine adornment, or fling, with Calvin, lace and ribbons to the predestined flames. You may write a tract on vanity or an ode to Julia's petticoat; or you may chronicle the latest novelties in autumn millinery for a ladies' newspaper. Finally there is the method of the antiquarian, adopted by Mr. George Clinch.

It must be confessed that Mr. Clinch's manner of considering clothing falls short of the highest entertainment. There are minds, doubtless, to take pleasure in the information that the earliest mention of the periwig dates from the reign of Henry VIII., and that trousers were not unfamiliar to the Celtic Druids, but we, for our part, would rather have the writer mould the raw material of his knowledge into the semblance of some higher truth. We would have him ponder the philosophy of farthingales, study causation in crinolines, and trace the Zeit Geist working in the patch. We should like to pursue Absolute Beauty, now in the wimple of Fair Rosamund, now in the powdered head-dress of the Duchess of Devonshire, and discuss the claims of Utility in the peak-toed shoe of the fourteenth century and the chimney-pot hat of the present day. And we should like to know why it is that masculine dress has remained stationary for more than a century, and a reason for the fact that costume under the reign of queens has ever betrayed a tendency to swell.

Mr. Clinch, however, surveys the subject of costume with an unquestioning and sober eye, averse alike from the interest of speculation and the allurements of frivolity. He gives us an extract of eighteen pages from the "Daily Expense" book of a gentleman in the seventeenth century, and nine-and-forty descriptions of costumes worn by Queen Elizabeth. But we are allowed no generalisations, hardly an epigram, but few jests, and not a single colored plate.

The costume of the pre-historic Englishman was plain, practical, and severe: it consisted of a tunic hanging to the thigh. The ladies adopted a similar fashion, reverting occasionally to greater simplicity, as shown on a carving on a tooth, where the only visible clothing seems to be a collar round the neck. In the Bronze Age, chiefs and rich persons wore cloaks, caps, leggings, and sandals; they spun and wove, carried daggers, shaved their faces, and manifested caprice in the matter of coiffure. The appearance of the ancient Briton is familiar to every schoolboy, but besides woad, he employed the skins of animals, made boots of leather, and bracelets and rings of iron, silver, and gold. Boadicea's costume has been described by Dion Cassius. She wore a tunic of many colors, all in folds, and over it, fastened by a fibula or brooch, a robe of coarse stuff. Her light hair fell loosely over her shoulders, and round her neck was a golden torque. After the Roman toga had faded from these shores came the simple tunic and shirt of the Anglo-Saxon. Manuscripts of the tenth century show a graceful and pleasing style of dress—loosely girdled robes of soft, thin materials reaching to the feet, worn by both sexes, shoes, and long wrinkled hose. With the Normans came change and artifice. The ladies carried trains, developed the hanging sleeve, plaited their hair in long plaits, and "laced in." Middle-class Normans wore long tunics open on the left side to show the whole of the leg, which was covered with a close-fitting garment above and banded stockings below the knee. Soldiers wore hauberks or tunics of chained mail, and (if we may trust Queen Matilda) shaved not only their faces, but the backs of their heads as well. The thirteenth-century costume, says Mr. Clinch, is remarkable for its simplicity and grace; but except for a portrait of a knight in armor and an effigy of King John—pleasing enough in a simple smock with belt and open collar—he gives us no illustrations to support this truth. Two charming reprints from the Loutterel Psalter show us the rural costume of the fourteenth century: a laboring man breaks clods of earth, dressed in a girdled tunic, with a head-dress covering head and neck and falling in a liripipe behind; a ploughman wears the same, with a kind of sou'-wester hat surmounting the head-dress, a girdle pierced with eye-holes, and gauntlet gloves. Several pictures of St. Etheldreda show the long, rich fur-lined and embroidered robes worn by great folk, the hanging sleeves and white wimples of the ladies. The fifteenth century marks little change, save in the further development of the fantastic, horned, mitred, lunate, and heart-shaped head-dresses of the women.

Holbein and de Here do more than any written commentary to show the richness and extravagance of Tudor dress. Two effigies from Canterbury Cathedral mark the stiffness of the early Jacobean style, but there are no illustrations of the Caroline or Puritan era, and the costume of the Restoration is left unmentioned. A picture of a "Macaroni" of the end of the eighteenth century shows us what absurdities man may suffer for fashion's sake; and there is an amusing extract from the "Gentleman's Magazine" of 1753, giving the net names of twenty different kinds of wig.

Nothing permanently great is ever immediately successful, and it has been the fate of all innovations from which mankind has largely benefitted to be heralded at birth by a storm of ridicule, abuse, and persecution. Art, letters, science, and religion guard their long chronicle of martyrdom, and we must add to the scroll of those who have suffered for an idea the name of John Hetherington, haberdasher, who, in 1795, was fined £500 for the public wearing of a tall hat.

> ". . The result of wearing such a startling novelty in head-gear was that a large crowd of spectators gathered round the haberdasher before he had proceeded far along the street. Hetherington was arraigned before the Lord Mayor on a charge of breach of the peace and inciting to riot. . . . The evidence produced went to show that Mr. Hetherington, who was well connected, appeared on the public highway wearing upon his head what he called a silk hat (which was produced), a tall structure having a shiny lustre, and calculated to frighten timid people. The officers of the Crown stated that several women fainted at the unusual sight, while children screamed, dogs yelped, and a young son of Cordiwiner Thomas, who was returning from a chandler's shop, was thrown down by the crowd which had collected, and had his right arm broken."

A London newspaper commenting on the affair remarked, with unusual penetration, that the new hat was "an advance in dress reform, and one which is bound, sooner or later, to stamp its character upon the entire community. The hat is destined to work a revolution in head gear, and we think the officers of the Crown erred in placing the defendant under arrest."

John Hetherington has been justified.

PAST WRANGLES IN THE FAR EAST.*

The book before us reviews the history of our commercial relations with China. It is written by a trained jurist who has the gift of directness and is not afraid of research. He has dredged with a patient and minute method many volumes of the Chinese Repository, all the Blue Books and Reports of Parliamentary debates which preceded the war of 1840, together with manuscripts in possession of the East India Office, to which he has had access. From the last-named documents he draws a humiliating picture of the first attempts to open up trade with China. Portuguese, English, Dutch, and French adventurers, with few scruples, were competing with each other and reproducing in the Far East upon a petty scale the feuds and domestic quarrels of Europe. The members of these rival nationalities often invoked the help of the Chinese officials against each other, and afforded every encouragement to the mandarins to exercise the same absolute rule over these adventurers from the West as it exercised over its own subjects. Extra territorial rights were not dreamed of in those days. The Lord Macartney and Amhurst expeditions to China, which were looked upon as visits of lowly tribute-bearers, were foredoomed to failure through the ignorance of those who took part in them. Little or nothing was then known of either the Chinese language or Chinese methods of negotiation. At the beginning of its history the Mantchoo dynasty was not set against foreign trade, but wished to proceed cautiously lest strangers from the West should make common cause with the Chinese people who did not resign themselves at once to the new order. It is a chequered story that is here told. The figures of drunken sailors running amuck amongst the people of the Chinese villages, of merchant captains no better than piratical marauders, of make-believe British officials with little or no power over the trading communities of which they were supposed to be both sponsors and presiding magistrates, group themselves into a picture upon which every right-minded Englishman must look with pain. The ensuing history to the close of the first Chinese war is set forth with much detail, and the causes of that event are singled out and presented with a patience that is almost wearisome and an accuracy which it is not easy to dispute. At many points Mr. Bromley Eames is compelled to recognise the justice of the Chinese cause, although he is not so strong an admirer of the native character as many recent writers. Possibly a closer familiarity with the people and their language might make him an apologist, if not an advocate. At any rate, he delineates viceroys and commissioners who were quite as consistent and veracious as Captain Elliot, the superintendent of British trade. Elliot was without the official prerogatives necessary for a strong part, and in the documents recited he shows himself a vacillating opportunist who deceived his own Government and slandered the occupant of the throne at Peking. In reference to the part played by opium in provoking the first Chinese war this writer is a safe guide, and his well-balanced verdict is not likely to restore our pride in that ugly bit of history. Mr. Bromley Eames's chapters on the subject may be read as a corrective to the sophistical attempt made by Sir J. B. Lyall, in an Appendix to the Report of the Royal Opium Commission, to whitewash that flagitious transaction. Although the writer is reserved in his expressions and never lets himself go on moral issues, no missionary indictment of our past opium policy is more damning.

This book is somewhat pessimistic in its outlook upon the future. The writer thinks that the Chinese Government of to-morrow may wish to rid itself of Christian missionaries, or greatly to restrict their spheres of action. He does not discriminate, however, as the Chinese Government is learning to do, between missionaries trained under a peculiar political and ecclesiastical tradition, who wish to withdraw their converts from the jurisdiction of the native courts, and missionaries who have been trained under a very different tradition and have sometimes felt qualms of conscience because they have done so little to mitigate the persecutions of native Christians. With the establishment of open courts of justice, a new code of law, and the criticisms of a native press, which is even now doing much of the work of official censors, political difficulties will disappear. The Chinese people are not likely to forget the past services of Christian missionaries. Indeed, there is an influential section of the Chinese people, by no means Christian, who would think twice before setting themselves to dismiss their friends. Some burning questions would have been further from settlement than they are if the missionaries for many years past, through evil and through good report, had not stood boldly out for the Chinese side.

The writer of this book looks with foreboding upon the effect of anti-Chinese laws in our own Colonies, as well as in the United States of America. Such measures may exasperate the Chinese Government and provoke reprisals. But the Chinaman is sufficiently enlightened to know that there is no parallel between the systematic attempt to flood the labor markets of the West and of the South with cheap yellow labor, and the passing sojourn of the white man in the lands of the Far East. This thorny problem ought never to have arisen. It is due to the fact that the vices of the Chinese emigrant have been catered for with the cognisance of nominally Christian rulers. When "China Towns" with their brothels, opium-dens, and betting hells are allowed to fester upon Colonial soil, no wonder the Chinaman is looked upon as an undesirable. The difficulties of the question may even yet be solved by insisting that the Chinaman shall live under moral and sanitary conditions, or else go, and be paid a minimum wage to which the leaders of the Colonial Labor Unions might be brought to agree. Unless his instincts for home have been blunted by vice and he is so impoverished that he gives up the hope of return in despair, the Chinaman is not likely to be a permanent settler who will annex a white man's country.

This carefully written and copious volume will be a standard history for some time to come. It is not without its humors. The stately British Minister at Peking was evolved from the supercargo of John Company, with Captain Elliot as the intermediate link.

A WORK OF ELUCIDATION.*

We have among us a good many writers capable of presenting adequately a picture of certain social conditions or of putting clearly and interestingly the case for special social reforms. We have not, and have never had, many writers who, looking into the general welter of facts, actual or bygone, can discern and render comprehensible the main stream of social development. Such a writer was the late Benjamin Kirkman Gray, who, at his death, two years ago, in the prime of life, left incomplete the very remarkable volume which has been edited by Mrs. Gray and Miss B. L. Hutchins, and published under the title of "Philanthropy and the State: or Social Politics."

Mr. Gray had that best education in sociology, an intimate personal acquaintance with the lives of the poor. For some years he carried on a mission in one of the roughest and most indigent districts of West London, and in the course of that Sisyphus-like toil beheld daily the helplessness and the heroisms of the slum dweller. He began to perceive the whole problem of poverty as something national, far too great to be within the scope of private philanthropy. After resigning his work among the actual victims, he began to study the rise and growth of charitable endeavor in this country and in 1905 published "A History of Philanthropy in England in the Eighteenth Century," a book of great illuminative power and a storehouse of curious, not easily accessible information. Its style, sober and scholarly, has an undercurrent of ironic humor that makes excellent reading; the massed facts are never dull and never confusing; and an intelligent reader issues, at the end, having acquired not only knowledge but enlightenment. It was ill-advertised, and, although several reviewers recognised its merits, can scarcely be said ever to have reached the general public.

"Philanthropy and the State" shows us the beginning of that supersession of private philanthropy by State action, which had been foreshadowed as inevitable in the previous work. We see, first, a period in which poverty was almost universally supposed to be the result of misconduct, and, therefore, a phenomenon strictly limited in range and well within the possible scope of private effort. The real extent of social distress was not known, and the idea of careful, detailed social research had scarcely yet dawned. By degrees a different view of poverty arose, and side by side with this a different view of the functions of the State. Mr. Gray shows us the birth of statistics, the social importance of the census, the gradually perceived, inevitable inadequacy of philanthropy, and, evolving by degrees, the conception of "the social whole." From the perception of human interdependence grows a new sense of the general human duty. "Whereas charity confined itself for the most part to efforts for alleviation, the social politics of to-day regards prevention as primary and passes on to consider how the value of life may be positively enhanced." "None of the ills of individuals are entirely individual ills. The social tissue is too tightly woven for that. It is a social concern, in other words it is a State concern, to cure the distresses incident to social and industrial life." "The distresses incident to social and industrial life"; in those words lies the great divergence between the eighteenth century attitude and the attitude of the modern Progressive.

Starting from this root, succeeding chapters take stock, as it were, of how far we have gone in the direction indicated. Progress has been continuous, but not regular. As usual, in our "practical" country, changes have come not according to any connected theory, nor in logical harmony with an acknowledged ideal, but piecemeal and under the compulsion of the moment's need. The State has taken over completely the prisons, the workhouses, some schools, and some lunatic asylums. Drainage, the paving, cleansing, and lighting of streets, the upkeep of high roads and bridges, the maintenance of fire engines and of a staff of firemen are in the hands of those minor states, the municipality or the County Council. So, in many cases, are water, gas, electricity, and trams. Most towns have baths, some have picture galleries, free libraries, and brass bands. Everywhere moves the inspector, that "outward and visible" sign of the sub-conscious conviction that no single private interest of human life is merely private. The feeding of school children long remained, as the detection of cruelties to children or to animals still remains, in the hands of voluntary agencies; and while the recreation ground has become a public institution, the hospital still remains a private one. Behind all these varied manifestations Mr. Gray's analysis reveals the great fundamental thought of the essential brotherhood of man.

Interesting and curious are the abundant details of the processes of mental and actual transition; and interesting also—though obviously briefer than it should have been—is the chapter that deals with "the counter current," exemplified chiefly in the rules and practice of the Charity Organisation Society. The doctrine of that society, namely, that poverty can be remedied by a change in the poor man's character, and cannot be remedied by any other means, Mr. Gray roundly contradicts. "Men fail from all kinds of mischances over which they have no control, and for which they often are not responsible. . . As one who has known intimately many of those who are always on the edge of the abyss, I am prepared to deny the aspersions thrown upon them. My conclusion is that they are not below, but above, the average moral worth."

Two closing sections of the book, to have been called respectively "The Private Citizen" and "The Goal," are represented only by a couple of appendices. The first—a brilliant and penetrating bit of writing—is an incomplete study of the citizen as agitator. The second consists of rough notes, suggestive enough and connected enough to show how much we miss in losing their fuller development.

The editing has been admirably performed. The book, truncated as it inevitably is, and showing though it does certain roughnesses and certain thin spots, is of high value, and the work of preparing it for publication was a social service. It is earnestly to be hoped that readers will be many, so that this legacy of a mind at once lucid, laborious, and synthetic may become part of our general inheritance.

THE WHITE PROPHET.*

Mr. Heinemann opens up an enterprising design in his new "Library of Modern Fiction." For four shillings one can purchase these two well-printed volumes of "The White Prophet." This works out at the rate of about five thousand of Mr. Hall Caine's words for a penny. At the first blush this sounds remarkably cheap, but after trying three penn'orth or so one concludes that Mr. Hall Caine's works ought to be sold through a penny-in-the-slot machine. At railway stations, club waiting-rooms, even in the public squares, the public could always turn the handle, and absorb as much matter from its favorite authors as it felt was healthy or convenient to assimilate. The labor of distributing millions of copies of Mr. Hall Caine's works throughout an Empire on which the sun never sets would thus be saved. By a rough computation one calculates that the paper used for the editions of "The Manxman," "The Christian," "The Scapegoat." "The Bondman," "The Prodigal Son," "The Eternal City," and "The White Prophet," if spread out, sheet by sheet, would obliterate all the natural beauties of the Isle of Man. And how many forests have not been felled to furnish wood pulp for the printing of the works of Mrs. Humphry Ward, Miss Marie Corelli, and other "popular favorites"?

In "The White Prophet" Mr. Hall Caine's intentions are so excellent that one hesitates to say whether the crude sensationalism of his art will do harm or good to the cause of Egyptian Nationalism that he is espousing. Probably it will do good, for, though the plot be absurd, the characters stage puppets, the conversations impossible, the atmosphere unreal and the sentimentality unpleasant, the British public will learn from it that fellaheen, Soudanese negroes, and Arabs have feelings, souls, and love of country, no less than the men who govern them. What "The White Prophet," with all its emotional gush, teaches Englishmen generally, is in its effective caricature of mere caste spirit. Lord Nuneham, the Consul-General of Egypt, with his "stern jaw and steady grey eyes, behind which the cool brain was plainly packed in ice," a "massive man of iron," who, after governing the country with honor and glory for years, gets obsessed with the idea that any opposition to his projects is part and parcel of a seditious propaganda, is a plausible caricature of many governors. Unfortunately Mr. Hall Caine cannot recognise when his sensationalism becomes ridiculous, and we fear that, for every dozen readers who swallow his scenes with avidity, one may drop them with disgust. It implies a strong stomach or a weak head not to recoil before a novel in which there is barely a speech, or a thought, or an observation, a description or a shade of feeling that is true to nature, to character, to atmosphere. Like a large and crude advertisement on a cheap hoarding, displayed with a surprising wealth of melodramatic gesture, is Mr. Hall Caine's "The White Prophet." The subject is germane, and the author's intention excellent—that is the best that can be said for it.

Lord Nuneham, the grim autocrat, with "square-hewn" jaw, has a son, Colonel Gordon Lloyd, "the youngest colonel in the British Army, a man with crisp brown hair and eyes of the flickering steel-like blue that is common among enthusiastic natures." For Mr. Hall Caine's purposes Gordon combines the best traditions of the English gentleman with a racial outlook that is practically Egyptian. "Nursed on the knee of an Egyptian woman, speaking Arabic as his mother tongue, lisping the songs of Arabia before he knew a word of English, Egypt was under his very skin, and the spirit of the Nile and of the desert was in his blood." All this does not prevent Gordon from going wild with joy and delirious with excitement at the battle of Omdurman, and when his friend, Lieutenant Ali Awad, has been stabbed "by a coffee-colored demon in chain armor," from acquitting himself like a hero. When Gordon reappears riding from the fray, "with a black banner in one hand and tears in his eyes," the Colonel, quite broken down, asks, "What became of the dervish?" Then, for the first time, the fighting devil flashed out of Gordon's eyes, and he answered, "I killed him like a dog, sir." For this, and other deeds of derring-do in the South African war, Gordon is appointed "Second in Command of the Army of Occupation in Cairo," and no one is surprised. It would take, indeed, a good deal more than this to surprise anybody who is conversant with Mr. Hall Caine's inventive powers. Colonel Gordon is deeply in love with Helena, the daughter of General Graves, his superior officer, "a fine, handsome girl, with coal-black hair, very dark eyes, a speaking face, and a smile like eternal sunshine" which are inherited from her mother, a Jewess, who, we regret to say, has shattered her husband's home by becoming too intimate with a Lord-Lieutenant, "a nobleman, a sportsman, a bachelor, a breeder of racehorses, and a member of the Government." General Graves, "in his ungovernable rage, had flung the nobleman on the ground, and trampled on him, torn the jewels out of his wife's breast, and crushed them under his heel, and then realising the bankruptcy his life had come to, had gone home and had brain fever." Helena, like a good daughter, hated her wicked "mother's lover," and "on Sunday morning, when the bells rang, she would walk with her [stricken] father to church, holding his hand in her hand as if she were the mother and he were the child . . . and only to those who saw that the brave girl, with her eyes of light and her lips of dew, was giving away her youth to her old father, was it charged with feeling too deep for them." This brain fever episode has a vital influence on the story, for when Gordon has refused to obey the Consul-General's and General Graves's orders, and to take a battalion of infantry and a regiment of cavalry and clear out of the University of El Azhar all the students and their teachers, an act which means "killing hundreds, perhaps thousands of them," and "lowering the prestige of England in Europe, India, and America," General Graves has a stroke of apoplexy, and the consequences to Helena, Gordon, and Ishmael Ameer, the White Prophet, are serious. The scene of Gordon's degradation and expulsion from the British Army is so characteristic of Mr. Hall Caine's style and outlook that we regret it is too long for quotation, but if the reader's patience survives the first twenty-two chapters of volume one, he will find the passage enshrined in the twenty-third.

What happens after this tragic episode is, briefly, this. Helena is convinced that the "White Prophet," an ingenious cross between the Mahdi and a Salvation Army captain, is responsible for her father's death, and in order to be revenged on him and betray his treasonable practices to the British authorities, she wins her way into his confidence by translating foreign newspapers to him. And the "White Prophet," who is, alas, as weak before woman's wiles as are other prophets, proposes that "she shall be his spiritual wife, that she shall be formally betrothed to him, and that he shall shield and protect her from every ill." And betrothed they are, in Khartoum, while "a camel boys' song of love recalls the soft eyes of the gazelle, and the timid looks of the beloved, and the oasis, and the song of the bird in the date tree," and other desert imagery of a pleasing and relevant nature.

The plot now thickens with a vengeance. The vindictive Helena has no sooner transmitted to the Consul-General some of the "White Prophet's" apparently treasonable, but, in reality, meritorious, plan for shutting up the British officials in the Gheziral Palace, so that his followers may enter Cairo unopposed, than Colonel Gordon, the disgraced British officer, arrives in Khartoum, disguised as a Bedouin chief. Explanations follow at great length between the old lovers, and the two prepare to leave Khartoum secretly to save Helena and the White Prophet from the consequences of her duplicity. But on the morning of their flight Gordon is stunned by receiving news of his mother's death, and he then perceives that it is his duty to save Egypt and incidentally England before he saves Helena. The passage that we append only brings us to Chapter XXIII. of Book III., and there are three hundred pages more, of much the same nature, remaining for the intrepid reader to tackle. The reviewer, however, may be pardoned for stopping, if not stopping in time:—

> "Yes! Something tells me that that subtle old scoundrel is playing a double sword game—with the Ulema and with the Government—and that his object is not only to destroy Ishmael, but, by awakening the ancient religious terror, to ruin England as well—tempt her to ruin her prestige, at all events."
> They had reached the margin of the river, and he stopped.
> "Well?" she faltered again.
> "Well, I am a British soldier still, Helena, even though I am a disgraced one, and I want to . . . I want to save the good name of my country."
> She could not speak—she felt as if she would choke.
> "I want to save the good name of the Consul-General also. He is my father, and though he no longer thinks of me as his son, I want to save him from . . from himself."
> "I can do it too," he added eagerly. "At this moment I am perhaps the only man who can. I am nobody now—only a runaway and a deserter—but I can cross the line of fire and so give warning."
> "But, Gordon, don't you see——"
> "Oh, I know what you are going to say, Helena—I must die for it. Yes! Nobody wants to do that, if he can help it, but I can't! Listen!"
> She raised her eyes to his—they seemed to be ablaze with a kind of frenzy.
> "Death was the penalty of what I did in Cairo, and if I did not stay there to be court-martialled and condemned, was it because I wanted to save my life? No; I thought there was nothing left in my life that made it worth saving. It was because I wanted to give it in some better cause. Something told me I should, and when I came to Khartoum I didn't know what fate was before me, or what I had to do, but I know now. This is what I have to do, Helena—to go back to Cairo instead of Ishmael, and so save England and Egypt and my father and these poor Moslem people, and prevent a world of bloodshed."
> Then Helena, who in her nervousness had been scraping her feet on the sand, said in a halting, trembling voice—
> "Was this what you wanted to say to me, Gordon?"
> "Yes, but now I want you to say something to me."
> "What is that?" she asked, trembling.
> "To tell me to go."
> It was like a blow. She felt as if she would fall.
> "I cannot go unless you send me, Helena—not as things stand now—leaving you here—under these conditions—in a place like this—alone. Therefore tell me to go, Helena."
> Tears sprang to her eyes. She thought of all the hopes she had so lately cherished, all the dreams of the day before of love and a new life among quite different scenes—sweet scenes full of the smell of new-cut grass, the rustling of trees, the swish of the scythe, the songs of birds, the ringing of church bells, instead of this empty and arid wilderness—and then of the ruin, the utter wreck and ruin, that everything was falling to.

"Tell me to go, Helena—tell me," he repeated.

It was crushing. She could not bear it.

"I cannot," she said. "Don't ask me to do such a thing. Just when we were going away, too . . . expecting to escape from all this miserable tangle and to be happy at last——"

"But should we be happy, Helena? Say we escaped to Europe, America, Australia, anywhere far enough away, and what I speak of were to come to pass, should we be happy—should we?"

"We should be together at all events, and we should be able to love each other——"

"But could we love each other with the memory of all that misery—the misery we might have prevented—left here behind us?"

"At least we should be alive and safe and well."

"Should we be well if our whole life became abominable to us, Helena? . . . On the other hand——"

"On the other hand, you want us to part—never to see each other again."

"It's hard—I know it's hard—but isn't that better than to become odious in each other's eyes?"

A cruel mixture of anger and sorrow and despair took possession of her, and, choking with emotion, she said—

"I have nobody but you now, yet you want me to tear my heart out—to sacrifice the love that is my only happiness, my only refuge. . . . Oh, I cannot do it! You are asking me to send you into the jaws of death itself—that's it—the very jaws of death itself—and I cannot do it. I tell you I cannot, I cannot! There is no woman in the world who could."

There was silence for a moment after this vehement cry; then in a low tone he said—

"Every soldier's wife does as much when she sends her husband into battle, Helena."

"Ah!"

She caught her breath as if a hand from heaven had smitten her.

"Am I not going into battle now? And aren't you a soldier's daughter?"

There was another moment of silence, in which he looked out on the sparkling waters of the Blue Nile, and she gazed through clouded eyes on the sluggish waves of the White.

Something had suddenly begun to rise in her throat. This was the real Gordon, the hero who had won battles, the soldier who had faced death before, and she had never known him until now!

A whirlwind of sensation and emotion seemed to race through her soul and body. She felt hot, she felt cold, she felt ashamed, and then all at once she felt as if she were being lifted out of herself by the spirit of the man beside her. At length she said, trying to speak calmly—

"You are right, quite right; you are always right, Gordon. If you feel like that about going into Cairo you must go. It is your duty. You have received your orders."

"Helena!" he cried, in a burst of joy.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

When a writer of Mr. E. V. Lucas's temperament sets out to describe Paris in a book written "wholly from the outside, and containing only so much of that city and its citizens as a foreigner who has no French friends may observe on holiday visits," one may be fairly sure that the result will not be as purely "objective" as this prefatory warning suggests. Thus, while "A Wanderer in Paris" (Methuen, 6s. net) contains a lot of information about the French capital, it also has a good deal of Mr. Lucas; and those acquainted with his individuality, as revealed by his previous descriptions of wanderings in Holland and London, will know that this makes for literary entertainment. The book, in fine, is a delightful essay on Paris and its history, disguised as a guide book, and it includes most of the characteristics of his talent—a pleasant enthusiasm, a habit of whimsical, Lamb-like diversions, humor, and the charm of the unexpected. At the same time we do not consider Paris to be a subject that shows Mr. Lucas at his very best; there are chapters in the book that, for him, are almost tedious, particularly the chapters which describe pictures and sculpture. On the boulevards, or at Montmartre, or before Notre Dame, he is most enlivening, but when he strays into the Louvre, or the Luxembourg, or the Cluny Museum, and describes with much graciousness of phrase his preferences in their treasures, he sometimes fails to grip; and the reader, knowing how attractive his author can be, wishes that he would leave Monna Lisa (and what Pater said of the picture) alone, and come outside, to chat with M. Pol, the friend of Paris sparrows, to peep at the two Zoos, to visit a favorite restaurant or a pawnbroker, to criticise boldly—as Mr. Lucas does—the superfluities of Paris life. Mr. Lucas is blessed with a sense of proportion that prevents him from viewing a Latin idiosyncrasy as a moral iniquity, or confounding the froth of a national brew with its body. Mr. Walter Dexter's water-colors of Paris streets are quite in harmony with the spirit of the text, which is essentially the blithe holiday spirit, and, as far as circumstances permit, akin to that of "The Open Road."

It is occasionally possible to write about antiquarian matters in a non-antiquarian way; but for this, the subject itself must have a more than merely antiquarian interest—must have some present-day vitality. It is hard to find this in a good deal of the English cathedral music of the last three hundred years, strong and beautiful as much of it is. Great names there are in the history, and some of the music really represents the great men at their best; but long stretches of the record are necessarily filled up with the names of second or third rate men, or even—for Mr. J. S. Bumpus, in "A History of English Cathedral Music" (Werner Laurie, 2 vols., 12s. net), is inexorable in his research—men who are only fifth or sixth rate. There can surely be few writers for the church service whom he does not mention; and, brushing up against so many mediocrities, his standard of judgment necessarily gets a little awry at times. We should speak of little things in the language of inches, not, as Mr. Bumpus does, in that of yards or miles. There are certain epithets of smallness inappropriate to large works of art, and certain epithets of largeness inappropriate to small ones; we may speak of the cameo, but not of the cathedral, as being pretty, and of the cathedral, but not the cameo, as being majestic. Mr. Bumpus's enthusiasm for chants and anthems is pardonable, but his scale of adjectives of laudation is at times much too large for them. If he were writing about symphonies and operatic tetralogies and oratorios he could hardly paint with a bigger or fuller brush. Nor can any one but the antiquarian pure and simple pretend to feel much interest in many of the alleged composers who adorn Mr. Bumpus's pages. No one, surely, cares two straws for whole bevies of these forgotten musical mediocrities, with their endless Evening Services in D, Nunc Dimittis in E flat, Choral Responses in A, Jubilate in F, and all the rest of it. For those, however, whose taste lies in this direction, Mr. Bumpus has certainly done his work with praiseworthy thoroughness. For ordinary musicians, as distinguished from church or cathedral musicians, the real usefulness of his book lies in its records of the unquestionably great writers for the church, from Tye and Tallis and Byrd, through Purcell to the Wesleys. Mr. Bumpus is not critically illuminative, and perhaps has not aimed at being so; but as a straightforward compilation of facts his volumes can be cordially recommended.

Monsignor Duchesne has so great and so deserved a reputation as an ecclesiastical historian that a translation of his work on "The Early History of the Church" (Murray, 9s. net), cannot fail of a welcome from English readers. The translation has been made from the fourth French edition, and notice has been taken of recent discoveries, such as that of fresh material regarding Julius Africanus and of the Greek text of Hippolytus. The book is dedicated to M. Gaston Boissier, a scholar whose history of the last days of paganism shows a broad and thorough scholarship, a caution in speculation, and an engaging literary quality which are also to be found in M. Duchesne's work. Not the least remarkable feature of the present volume is the freedom which Monsignor Duchesne allows himself in explaining the development of the episcopate or the progress of Christological dogma under the influence of the early heresies. He writes as a convinced Roman Catholic, but in his statements of facts he is impartial. The book in its French form is already so well known to scholars that nothing more is needed than to congratulate those responsible for its appearance in an English version.

Son Œuvre." Paris: Perrin, 3fr. 50c.), and in his prefatory note M. Doumic expresses a hope that some literary historian may be found to devote a volume to George Sand's genius and influence. As a matter of fact the définitif book upon George Sand has yet to be written. Caro's volume, though excellent in some respects, is not sympathetic enough, and had to be made to fit into a series. Other writers, like Rocheblave and the late Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, were more intent upon clearing up obscure details of biography or bibliography than upon giving a broad estimate of the writer's work, and though M. Doumic's lectures are fresh and sympathetic in treatment, biography occupies in them too large a place. It is only in his last chapter that M. Doumic attempts to deal with George Sand as a writer, and the appreciation has but one fault—its brevity. As an example of his criticism we may quote the following sentence: "George Sand a impregné le roman de la poésie qui était en son âme; elle lui a donné une souplesse, une ampleur, une portée qu'il n'avait pas auparavant; elle y a célébré l'hymne de la nature, de l'amour et de la bonté; elle nous y a révélé la campagne et les paysans de France; elle y a donné satisfaction à cette tendance au romanesque qui est, à des degrés divers, en chacun de nous." As a painter of the idyllic aspects of rural French life George Sand is incomparable, and this constitutes her claim to immortality.

A MORE accurately descriptive title for Mr. James Douglas's "Adventures in London" (Cassell, 6s. net) would be "Essays in Descriptive Journalism." The adventures which he relates are, for the most part, visits to various London resorts, ranging from music-halls and police-courts to the National Sporting Club and the British Museum Reading Room. There are besides a number of character sketches of theatrical and music-hall favorites and political leaders. Mr. Douglas's method is pure impressionism, and in his efforts to convey his impressions to the reader he relies mainly on the short sentence. Reading Mr. Douglas suggests a journey in a jolting train at break-neck speed. We get glimpses of a thousand different and unexpected objects, some of which are attractive enough to make us wish to see them at closer view, were not all our energies bent on the effort to preserve our balance. But though Mr. Douglas seems to have entered into a rivalry with Mr. Bart Kennedy as to which would make his sentences shorter, Mr. Douglas—handicapped apparently by the antiquated view that each sentence ought to contain a verb—is easily defeated. When we get accustomed to Mr. Douglas's style, and cease to be irritated by his fondness for forced alliterations, we are able to see that some of his impressionist sketches are the fruit of close observation and that they contain touches which represent criticism of life. "Clever" is, perhaps, the proper epithet to apply to them, and we are sure that Mr. Douglas needs not to be warned that cleverness does not carry a writer far.

THE crop reports are still very good from nearly all parts, including Russia, Canada, and the United States. Our English harvest is turning out splendidly, barley and wheat being generally much above the average, and oats better than seemed likely a few weeks ago. In parts of the southern counties a lot of corn has already been harvested. Trade with America was very good, but now that the tariff is signed there is a holiday lull. American bills, however, are plentiful in London, and the Indian trade is at last beginning to look up. This was bound to come as soon as the unsold stock of merchandise had been exchanged for the new crop, and India began again to overflow and to require a fresh stock of goods. The result of all this has been seen in a slight stiffening of discount rates which began to show itself on Monday and Tuesday along with a greater demand for gold. But unless Egypt and Argentine really begin to take gold the superabundance of money must continue for some time in view of the great strength of Thursday's Bank Return. The City, of course, is very empty, and even the Budget Protest League could hardly yield a sufficient number of wealthy citizens to fill a small room. I hear, by the way, that in spite of the so-called Financial Reform and the new taxes, another big loan will be required soon for the German Empire. This is causing some anxiety in Berlin.

THE STOCK MARKETS.

Partly owing to the holidays, partly to a set back in Americans, the Stock Markets have been dull, and the tendency of prices has been generally downwards, though Throgmorton Street has not been cooled like the Johannesburg Stock Exchange by a fall of snow. Mexican things have drooped owing to a certain nervousness about the social and political unrest upon which I touched last week. "Mexico for the Mexicans" is not an electoral war cry which appeals to the foreign investor. In the foreign market there has been quite a jump in Costa Rica owing to well-informed purchases on American account, which seem to indicate that another attempt at composition is on foot, and that the Government will soon begin to pay interest once more. The Costa Ricans are a rather nice people, but they have a very bad record with regard to their foreign creditors. The demand for Russian and Japanese bonds continues, and South American loans have been in request. But the Yankee market has been the most active. It has been showing signs of weakness, and some sharp breaks have occurred in the last day or two under the leadership of Unions. Some anxiety is felt by operators about the state of Mr. Harriman's health.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

Much interest is taken by English financiers in the diplomatic and commercial struggle between China and Japan. From a commercial point of view the support given by the Foreign Office (inspired, it is said, by Mr. Chirol of the "Times") to Japan is decidedly unfortunate. Of profitable openings for British capital and enterprise there are practically none in Japan. In China they are legion. The American Government is now playing the rôle of China's patron, and President Taft has sent a very clever ambassador to Pekin—a Mr. Crane, a Radical millionaire of Chicago, who is public spirited, understands journalism, and is well acquainted with the East. It is rather amusing to see the dispute over the Hankau-Czechuan Railway loan settled by increasing the amount from 5½ to 6 millions sterling, so as to give the Yankees a share, especially if (as some say) this share will have to be re-borrowed in London.

Diary of the Week.

It is announced that Lord Rosebery, coming in, as usual, a day after the fair, has promised to address a meeting of the Budget Protest League in Glasgow, and as Lord Rosebery only calls the report "premature," it is doubtless true. The act marks, we suppose, his final severance from the Liberal Party, and the "Westminster Gazette" addresses him a brief and mournful farewell. The mass of Liberals had long ago said "Good-bye" to Lord Rosebery, not because they disliked him, but because they knew that his sympathies had been withdrawn both from their ideals and from every act of their policy, with the doubtful exception of Free Trade. While he remained under Gladstone's influence, Lord Rosebery had his period of sentimental Radicalism, which coincided with the most useful, if not the most interesting, passages in his life. But he never really belonged to that small section of the Whig aristocracy which could accept political progress and help to shape it. It is consoling to remember that if he opposes Mr. Lloyd George's Budget, he entertained similar misgivings about Sir William Harcourt's. But is he to remain an officer of the Liberal League?

The slump in the Anti-Budget agitation continues, and the Liberal papers supply scores of reports of "protest" meetings telling of total or partial failure. This lack of popular support has driven the enemy to a kind of distraction, for it clearly makes ridiculous their appeals to the Lords to act with violence. The extremists, like the conductors of the "Standard" and the "Observer," still press for the rejection of the Bill, without alleging their real reason, which is that it destroys their hope of a sweeping form of Protection, but arguing that the peers will be lost if they do not assert a function which they never possessed. The more moderate journals, like the "Times" and the "Birmingham Post," steadily put these counsels aside. The Unionist peers are said to be divided, the leaders being hostile to rejection, while, on the other hand, an organisation of F.P.'s ("fighting peers") is said to rely on Lord Curzon's leadership.

Lord Londonderry has swelled the volume of outcries from the peers. Like the dukes, it is not for himself but for others that he weeps. The rentals from his property were very small (Lord Londonderry is one of the richest peers in England) and the outgoings very large. Expenses must be curtailed, and that meant the shrinkage of wages bills. In his case "the great interests" in his property were "the shooting and gardens," which enabled him to send out "large consignments of game as presents," and to mitigate unemployment. He had opened his gardens to the public three times a week—an act, we need not say, which relieves them of the development tax.

Mr. Harcourt made a very strong speech on the House of Lords on Friday week at Derby. He said, with Mr. Churchill, that the Budget would assume its final shape in the House of Commons, and would then reach the peers in a form so sound and just that even "the most vacuous hotheads" would hold their hands. But if he desired to destroy the House of Lords, he should only pray that they would reject or amend it. He would not assume that they had so parted with their sanity as to embark, solely in defence of their private lands and pockets, on the greatest Constitutional crisis which three centuries had seen. Lord Crewe took practically the same line at Glasgow, declaring that before the Lords took a "revolutionary" course, thus claiming "the first political power in the country," they would ask themselves whether they could possibly succeed.

The Development Bill has been produced. The development fund is to consist of three items—sums voted annually by Parliament, a nest-egg of 2½ millions, paid out in five annual instalments, and sums received in the way of interest on loans and the repayment of them. The grants will be made by the Treasury, assisted by an advisory Committee, and are strictly allocated to definite purposes, forestry, agriculture, rural and fishing industries, land reclamation, rural transport, and the construction of harbors and canals. The Bill also creates a Road Board whose main business will be the construction of new roads confined to motor traffic, which will be unhampered by a speed limit. We hope that the motorists using them will not be furnished with a licence to kill any strayed reveller on their privileged highways. The Board will be empowered to buy up strips of land on each side of the new roads—a valuable provision.

The Prime Minister outlined on Thursday to the House of Commons a summary of the recent findings of the Committee on Imperial Defence. They follow the main lines of public expectation as to the standardisation of the Colonial and Imperial land forces, working under an Imperial General Staff, the nationalisation of the Colonial adjuncts to the Imperial Navy, and the creation of an enlarged and powerful "Pacific Fleet," consisting of three units, a China unit, subsidised by New Zealand, an Australian unit, chiefly maintained by Australia, and an East Indian unit, which remains entirely Imperial. The leading feature of each of these squadrons is to be a battleship cruiser of the "Indomitable" type. We contribute one of these vessels, Australia and New Zealand finding the other two. Canada, whose naval equipment is, happily, to be on a smaller scale, practically stands out of the arrangement. For our part, we view the size and character of the new Pacific fleet with grave misgiving. It qualifies the new policy of concentration, and inevitably creates a demand for the replacing of the lost "Indomitable" in home waters. In this regard, the new Imperial-Colonial Navy offers no relief to the Mother Country, but an added burden.

Sir Joseph Thomson, the new President of the British Association, delivered his opening address at Winnipeg on Wednesday. It was, in the main, a fresh and, at times, a brilliant exposition of recent advances in physical science. Sir Joseph pleaded for a closer union between mathematics and physics, showing how mutually helpful had been the two methods of research, and how well they fitted in with each other. He expounded the theory of the molecular structure of electricity, with its infinitely small negative electrons or "corpuscles" and its larger positive units. Matter might be taken to be a collection of positive and negative units in electricity. Electricity furnished the key to the detection of the smallest particles of matter, such as the atoms of "neon," while it was the force that held atoms and molecules together, and differentiated one kind of matter from another. The medium of this all-important electrical force was the ether through which energy, streaming to the earth, travelled in waves. The study of radio-activity had enabled us to add millions of years to the age of the earth, and had revealed immense stores of heat to replace that which was lost from its interior. But the radio-active atoms, though they might possess a life of thousands of millions of years, were probably not immortal and unchangeable. They broke up gradually into other substances. There was no finality in science, and the discovery of one peak of knowledge only revealed the existence of another.

The Irish Land Bill has occupied the attention of the House of Commons during the week. Its important amendments and additions to the laws regulating land purchase in Ireland have been largely necessitated by decisions of the Irish Law Courts in hampering and narrowing after their kind the operations of the Land Acts. The closure resolution, under which the Bill was got through the Committee stage, was so framed as to give the Opposition a chance of discussing the main subjects which had been attacked and criticised during the previous debates on the Bill. Full opportunity was not taken of this arrangement and quite an undue time was absorbed by minor questions. An Irish member called attention to the "clap-trap" that was talked by some members of the Opposition so as to stop a discussion on important proposals, which will consequently go to the House of Lords "undiscussed." On Wednesday evening 3½ consecutive hours were occupied in divisions. They could have been given with more advantage to debate than to pedestrianism.

Monday was devoted to a discussion on the "zone" system in Mr. Wyndham's Act, under which the great mass of purchase agreements between landlords and tenants have to be passed by the Land Commission without any inquiry as to the security for the advance or the equity of the price. The Bill proposes to give power to the Estates Commissioners to investigate cases where they have reason to believe that the contracting parties were not free agents, or that the bargains were not bonâ fide. On Tuesday the main subject for discussion was a proposal of the Government to limit the amount of land, subject to a State advance, which could be acquired by one purchaser, to £3,000. This was, in principle, supported by the body of the Nationalists, who object to large tracts of land coming into the hands of one person when there is so little to go round and so many applicants. On Wednesday the House considered the proposed new constitution for the Congested Districts Board. This constitution was practically that recommended by Lord Dudley's Commission, but it is strongly opposed by the Unionists, as it brings into the Board a representative element. A discussion on compulsory powers of purchase was carried on on Thursday. All these proposed changes were bitterly opposed by the handful of Unionists who thought it worth while to attend. But little alteration was made in the Bill.

The aviation week at Rheims began on Sunday in wretched weather, but the aeroplanes came out in the evening and did some notable things. There are speed, height, and distance competitions, and the monoplane seems to have the advantage in pace, and even in distance and height. Mr. Curtiss on his biplane on Tuesday did 10 kilometres in 8 m. 35 secs., but on Wednesday M. Blériot on his monoplane reduced this record to 8 m. 4 2-5 secs. Then M. Paulhan on a Voisin biplane achieved two great feats. On Tuesday he rose to a height of 300 ft. and flew 56 kms., and the following day he beat the world's record for distance and time by flying for 2 hrs. 43 m., and covering a distance of 82 miles. He has entered for the London-Manchester prize, so that this looks much nearer being won than was expected. On Thursday, however, his record was beaten by M. Latham, the aeronaut who fell into the Channel. M. Latham covered 96 miles on his monoplane in 2 hrs. 18 m. 9 3-5 secs., and his flight was easy and beautiful to watch. It is too early to say what lessons the Rheims meeting has taught, but a correspondent makes the interesting suggestion that as apparently the aeroplanes keep up only when travelling at a great speed, the most useful form of competition would be for machines which could fly comfortably at 10 miles an hour.

The week has witnessed two notable German pronouncements in favor of moderation in naval armaments and an international agreement for their restriction. The "Vossische Zeitung" says that millions of Germans would welcome a practical plan for reduction, and that if we in England could put our ideas into a tangible shape there would be far less inclination in Germany to reject them. The "Berliner Tageblatt" speaks to the same effect, and complains that the expenditure on armaments is now "hardly bearable." The Radicals are therefore coming into line with the Prussian Conservatives, who were the first to recommend a halt in the expansion of the Navy. This movement of German opinion is of real significance, and it is important that we should take note of it. The German Navy law cuts down naval construction in 1912 from four to two ships a year, and whether that law is changed will depend in part upon British policy. An unnecessary British programme will check the tide of reasonable opinion and play into the hands of the Navy fanatics; a programme adequate to our needs but free from extravagance will help the cause of good sense in Germany and perhaps spare both British and German taxpayers a crushing burden.

At a farewell banquet in Simla Lord Kitchener declared that his voice had always been for peace, and he took credit for the fact that there had been only three expeditions during his term of office. He admitted that there had been strong division of opinion with regard to his reorganisation of the Army. Although there can be little doubt that he has left the troops and the machine in a more efficient state, it is certain that his scheme has been a heavy drain upon Indian finances, and it is more than possible that his strategy was based upon an international situation which has altered. The Anglo-Russian Convention has not been allowed to affect the disposition of the Indian Army, which has been organised by Lord Kitchener mainly to meet a Russian invasion, and perhaps does not make adequate provision for possible internal troubles. Lord Kitchener's friends suggest that the Indian Army will now on occasion be able to spare troops for Imperial needs. That, of course, means that it is larger than India requires. There can be no excuse for making the Indian peasant pay for troops intended for extra-Indian service.

The Swedish strike is now in its fourth week, but the men are holding out stubbornly. They were encouraged by the Government official census, which showed that after a fortnight there was still 284,000 men out, or practically as many as at the start. The leaders of the "Yellow" unions, which are 10,000 strong, tried to get their men to resume work on Monday, but only a few hundred obeyed. Such other secessions as have occurred are of non-union men, and, as money is coming in from abroad—the Germans alone have contributed £30,000—and the granting of strike pay has hardly commenced, the men can probably hold out for some time yet. The newspapers and influential men of moderate opinions are urging the Government to intervene. The initiative towards a compromise will have to come from without. The men are not likely to make the first move, and the employers still think that they can win a complete victory.

The strike at the Pressed Steel Car works at Pittsburg is developing the incidents of civil war. Last month there was a good deal of shooting between the strikers and the private militia of the owners, and on Monday the police, in covering some imported workers, provoked a pitched battle in which several men were shot and many wounded. The Pressed Steel Car works have a bad reputation even in Pittsburg. The accident death-rate is 4 or 5 per cent. a year; the laborers work 12 hours a day seven days a week at an exhausting pace; their pay is low, reduced by truck, and rendered uncertain by the gang system. Most of the employees are Austrian subjects who cannot speak English, and an official report by the Austrian Consul gives an unsparing picture of exploitation. As usual, American law and public opinion take quite calmly this violent anarchy of capital and labor.

The report of the International Opium Commission, which met last February, has been published at Shanghai, and the brief cabled summary suggests the disturbing thought that English influence was not thrown on the side of strong action. The Chinese found their chief support in the American delegates. The Americans moved a resolution to give every country power to prohibit importation except for medical purposes, but the English delegates helped the Japanese to get it rejected; both England and Japan, of course, do a large opium export trade to China. Another American resolution, to confine the trade in opium to medical purposes, met with British opposition, and the British delegates seem to have thrown doubt on the success of the measures for abolishing poppy culture in China. It is pretty clear that the old conflict between commercialism and humanitarianism severely hampered the Commission's discussions.

Mr. Walkley, the dramatic critic of the "Times," who gave evidence before the Joint Committee on Friday week, contributed a somewhat remarkable surrender of the critical function. He favored a "preventive Censorship," but thought the Censor's decisions were "capricious" and some of them "wholly incomprehensible." But really it mattered little whether there was a Censor or not; personally, he would probably decide the question by tossing up a coin. The Censor had refused "Monna Vanna," a moral and beautiful play, but then the public had only missed "an evening's aesthetic gratification." The importance of all art, especially of dramatic art, was "over-rated," an opinion in which Lord Newton warmly concurred. The Censor was unreal, but so were most of the alleged evils which he did not prevent. Mr. Harcourt inquired why Mr. Walkley chose to act as critic of an art which he regarded as so trivial. The Committee, we think, might also have asked why he appeared before them to discuss a matter which he would decide by tossing a halfpenny.

At Thursday's sitting of the Committee a serious matter occurred, which, we hope, will not be allowed to drop. In the course of some remarkable evidence, Mr. George Edwardes, who hinted his moral objections to "Monna Vanna," stated that his own production of "The Spring Chicken" was "perfectly harmless," and that he had only seen one unfriendly criticism, that of Mr. Stead. All we can say is, first, that Mr. Stead's remarks on this disgusting play constituted one of the most libellous articles which we have ever read, and if Mr. George Edwardes thought himself maligned by it, he had a very obvious remedy at law, and, secondly, that the notice in the "Era," the chief organ of the theatrical profession and a strong supporter of the "Censorship," described "The Spring Chicken" in terms which, properly contemptuous as they are, we could not well reproduce in this paper.

But the most important point is that when Mr. Harcourt proposed to read Mr. Stead's criticism, he was stopped by the Committee on the ground that they could not consider the details of particular plays. Does this imply that the character of a play like "The Spring Chicken" is to be taken for granted on the word of the gentleman who produced it, and that even the nature of the charges against it is to be unexamined? If so, and if this procedure is applied to other plays in which the Censor's moral judgment is gravely called in question, one half of the case against him will go absolutely unconsidered. Is this a fair, or even a rational, position? As for Mr. Stead, we think he is bound to make some statement to the Committee enforcing his point of view.

Politics and Affairs.

THE ISSUE WITH THE LORDS.

THE observer of politics will not have failed to note one special change which has come over the situation as the result of the introduction and criticism of the Budget. Up to that point the Opposition had the immense advantage of being the attacking party, while the Ministry stood constantly, and on some issues dispiritedly, on the defence. Now the parts are changed. It is the Government which attacks, the Opposition which defends. Instead of resting inactive, like Cromwell's army at Dunbar, before a beleaguering host, the Liberal Party is restored to its natural rôle of criticism and assault, with an historic question as its battleground, and an immense field of social progress to conquer. The result has been magical. The two sections of the forward army, Labor and Liberalism, which seemed to be growing farther and farther apart, have come together. Enthusiasm has revived, and with it belief in the future. The old grievance of the British people, their divorce from the land, has been presented in a simple, practical form. Just and equitable principles, involving no wrong to individuals but asserting vital public rights, have been submitted to them; deep grievances, from which all sections of the working community suffer, have been explored; and the reasonable desire for social and economic change, which is the basis of Liberalism, has been roused to full activity.

Not less profitable has been the exposure of the tactics of the Opposition. Every hour that has been spent in the development of the case against the land clauses of the Budget has turned to their advantage, and to the discomfiture of their critics. In the effort at self-justification, the great landlords have not only been guilty of acts or speech of revolting personal meanness, but they have made themselves ridiculous by asking a great industrial State to subscribe to the doctrine that the extent of their personal luxury is the measure of their public service. The answer has been obvious. The nation has plainly intimated that it can do without its dukes, and that there is not a single useful function which they claim as their prerogative, from the maintenance of charities to the employment of labor, which it is powerless to provide for itself. Will the dukes discharge their aged servants? The State will look after them. Will they starve the hospitals? The richest of nations will not neglect its sick. Will they sell land? There will be plenty of bidders. Will they cease rearing grouse and pheasants? There will be more sheep and poultry. They can keep the neighborly feeling on which they pride themselves. They are not asked to play rural Providence any longer.

But the heaviest blow which the Budget has struck has been at the House of Lords and at Tariff Reform. We doubt whether the friends of the latter cause will ever recover their attack on the land clauses. It is easy to imagine a Budget which might have made straight the path to Protection, or even produced a crooked alliance between democracy and reaction—the kind of Budget, for example, which finds favor with the "Spectator" and with those who regard the British workman much as the South African mine-owner regards his Kaffir laborers. But this was not the instrument which the Protectionists have been fighting. Their battle-cry went out against the three forms of direct taxation—the land taxes, the super-tax, and the new scale of death duties—which are aimed either at the superfluities of extreme wealth or at its future accumulations. These were the imposts which they insisted on sweeping away, so that the road might be clear for the only alternative—the taxation of food and labor. Had there have been even a tinge of true democracy in our Protectionist party, it would have followed the example of the Australian Protectionists, and welcomed a fortification of its alleged schemes for the relief of home labor. There is nothing irreconcilable between land taxes and a moderate form of Protection. The Chamberlainites might have accepted them and the super-tax as an earnest of their good-will to the workers and the middle classes. They have preferred to play trumpeter to the dukes. The inference is that they never meant Protection to assume more than the guise of democracy, and that the bloating of rents and special profits, which is its final end, made them forget that workmen and traders had to be won as well as landlords and manufacturers. It would seem as if the ring who conduct this agitation were either too slow-witted or too cynical even to dress themselves for the popular rôle they affect.

The worst embarrassment has been reserved for the Lords. The mask is now fairly off the special kind of political hypocrisy which treats the House of Lords as a disinterested organ of the national will. The Lords cannot conceal their immense prejudice in this matter, their private, personal stake in the Budget; they have proclaimed it to all the world. And it is no longer possible for them to pretend that in passing outside the British Constitution, and trampling on the privileges of the Commons, they will be acting as clear-sighted interpreters of the public mind, going behind the forces of democracy in order to get at its reality. Agitation against the Budget, sustained with the unlimited cash which the Protectionists command, and regular appeals to promising constituencies, have equally failed. The Budget is so popular with the masses that an unconstitutional check to it might arouse a sudden fury of demonstration and action such as our politics has not known since the days of Chartism or the first Reform Bill. The position, therefore, of the Government is peculiarly strong. The Lords may bow the neck and pass the Budget, as they are constitutionally bound to do. Or they may act as the French nobility acted in the first phase of the great Revolution. Each kind of procedure makes for the triumph of Liberalism. The first gives it the prestige of immediate victory. The latter course has the special advantage of placing the Ministry in the strongest position that any Liberal Government can occupy, the position of the Government of 1832. That is to say, it would have on its side both the constitutional argument and influences, and a passionate popular movement. In that movement, the Lords must go down. It is useless for the "Observer" to produce four reasons for throwing out the Budget, nor need we stop to argue with a critic who is unaware that single-chamber rule in finance has for three hundred years been the unbroken custom of the British Constitution. It might just as pertinently produce four thousand. It is the popularity of the Budget which makes it impregnable, especially against an assault where all the right as well as the social convenience would be on one side, and all the wrong, and an unexampled national confusion into the bargain, on the other.

This, then, is the situation which the Government will envisage. It is one of extraordinary and unexpected promise. We remember no Ministry that in its fourth year of office has rebounded so suddenly into popular favor. The advantage is not merely tactical. Not only have its opponents over-reached themselves, but as sometimes happens amid the unrealities of politics, a shaft has been sunk into a deep and rich vein of popular interest. All through the history of the Administration since 1906, we have been on ground unfavorable to an attack on the body which has crippled its activities; now suddenly we have them at a grave disadvantage. These golden hours do not readily recur. The wise man does not look for them more than once or twice in his life-time, and when they come he seizes them for what they are worth. Three considerations seem to us of governing importance. The first is the duty of safe-guarding free trade. The second is the largeness of the social issues which the working out of the Budget involves. The third is the necessity of coming to close grips with the Lords. Here it is a case of "Thy head or my head"—there is no third course for the Liberal Party. The question is—How are all these demands on the energies of the Government and the Liberal Party to be best satisfied? If the Budget is thrown out, we expect to see the Constitution righted; but when that is thoroughly done there is matter that cannot be long kept from the electorate. If the Budget passes, as in all probability it will pass, the question of the Lords presents itself again in a form intolerable to a great political organisation, fresh from a legitimate triumph. We do not look forward with zest to another prolonged period of enfeebled compromises, or weaker surrenders, during which the Government will again be pushing Bills up to the Lords, much as the attendant at a menagerie thrusts gobbets of meat between the bars of the lions' cages. We have come nearer the determination of the great quarrel than we have ever come before. We must note and make good our new ground.

THE HANDWRITING ON THE WALL.

Noblesse oblige. The great landowners continue to devote a considerable portion of their summer holidays to instructing the nation in the elements of political economy. There is, for example, Lord Tullibardine, heir of the Duke of Atholl, who, by means of a personally conducted tour of Scottish workmen to the top of Ben Dearg, claims finally to have exposed the small holdings fallacy, wringing from a selected "Radical" the reluctant confession that "the deer forest of Atholl is composed of heather and stones, moss, bog, and swamps, and to speak of using it for small holdings or other agricultural purposes is utter folly." The Duke of Northumberland still bewails the miserable plight to which the Budget will reduce his servants and retainers, refusing to be comforted by the specious remedies suggested by Sir Edward Grey for avoiding the necessary retrenchment. The Marquis of Londonderry has always held his property, not in the spirit of a private possession, but of a public trust. The shooting and the gardens were to him no source of personal pride or luxury. He valued them solely because "he was able to send out large consignments of game as presents, and was also able to benefit those out of employment in times of depression." How we have wronged these noblemen! Too late, alas! they have been induced to lay aside their native modesty, and to declare themselves as they really are, no cold monopolists, using the great estates with which Providence has endowed them, for their own profit, enjoyment, and aggrandisement, but warm-hearted stewards, concerned only with the welfare of the tenants and retainers for whom they find land and employment. The arduous task of fox-hunting they perform to protect their tenants from the devastation of such vermin, while they spend laborious days among their moors to shoot grouse for the sick poor. Malicious fiction-mongers have invented myths of crofters cleared out in hundreds to make way for deer, of miles of glorious scenery dedicated to grouse and pheasants and forbidden to man, of close villages where there is no liberty to live without the licence of the squire, of holdings and allotments rented to working-men at six or eight times their farm-rental, of extortion practised upon municipalities and other public bodies needing land for parks or other public purposes. Read the Conservative Press of England, and you will be staggered at the unscrupulous audacity of such inventions of Radical malice.

What are we to make of such a presentation? Reflection brings up several definite points of inquiry. Why are the great rural landowners so terribly perturbed that they bend their intellects to construct these naïve defences? The Budget does not threaten to break up the deer forests of Atholl for small holdings, or to tax Lord Londonderry's shootings, or to confiscate the 183,200 acres owned by the Duke of Portland. There is, we repeat, nothing in the Budget to justify the suggestion that great rural landowners must retrench expenditure, dismiss their servants, and enter upon "a new way of life." Only so far as these persons own city and mineral lands are they invited to contribute more largely to the public revenue. If, indeed, they were so public-spirited as individually they profess to be—they would willingly serve their country by this contribution, not out of their present, but out of their prospective unearned wealth. But even this call of the Exchequer is a very gentle one. Allowing for the increase of death duties, it can amount to a very few millions out of the vast sum, about two hundred millions, which they take each year for owning the land which certainly they did not make, and to which the work and wants of the people have given value. No! It is not the present taxation that frightens them. It is the valuation. If they could get the Lords to screw up their courage to the point of knocking out compulsory valuation, they would be quite content. Valuation is the enemy. Why?

The answer is plain. Hitherto they have piled up rents and screwed up tenants in renewals of leases with impunity; they have reaped vast increases of income from public improvements, to the cost of which they have paid a mere pittance, with impunity; they have plundered railroad companies, municipalities, the State, by swelling the value of pieces of land, with the assistance of "experts" whose opinions could be put to no authoritative test, with impunity; upon these very lands which they sell so dear they have paid almost negligible rates by the connivance of a submissive rating authority, with impunity. All these highly profitable abuses, and many more, are bred of secrecy, and will disappear with publicity. Every landowner has hitherto been free to hold up the public in selling land, in almost every industrial and public capacity which the working community can assume, to fine his tenants, to escape his fair share of rates and taxes, because there has existed no authoritative valuation of his land whereby he might be convicted of his depredations. This will be no longer possible with full and frequently revised valuations set on public record. Square dealing will be compulsory. Only those who have made research into the early history of our railroads, or whose professional duties have brought them into close contact with public arbitrations for the sale of land, adequately realise the magnitude of these gains in the past, and the damage to the landowning classes which their stoppage in the future will entail.

But the formal register of land values is felt instinctively to be the enemy, not only because it checks these public wrongs, but because it ranks as the first step in a democratic finance which will gradually undermine the remnants of rural feudalism and the economic roots of the luxurious life of our great modern plutocracy. The lords do not merely fear the Budget because it threatens to release the rural population from their hold. They are not only great landowners, but great merchants, bankers, brewers, mine-owners, industrialists, sucking large unearned income from many sources. Except during a few decades of the later Corn Law period, the modern landed nobility have always drawn largely on these other sources to support their splendor. In the growing discrimination against unearned income and the super-tax, and especially in the compulsory disclosure of full income, they detect the same fatal pressure of publicity, the discovery of wealth, and the insistence that, in the future, wealth, not poverty, shall bear the heavier burdens of the State. Moreover, they see these burdens ever advancing in magnitude; large remedies against poverty, unemployment, disease and vice, huge preparations for national defence, an illimitable apparatus of education, loom before their inflamed imagination, to all of which they will be called upon to contribute, now that their full ability to pay is for the first time manifest and measurable. What they think themselves to be fighting is not merely this Budget, but Democracy beginning to seek definite realisation in economic and social equality. Dives had not hitherto realised it possible that he might be called upon to make his reckoning with Lazarus in this world: the other he was always prepared to risk. Nor is it merely the wild envy of the disinherited he is called upon to meet. The social conscience of the community is being stirred to a new realisation of the facts of riches and poverty and the related degradation of the luxury and deprivation they involve. Never has this nation presented such a riot of sensuous extravagance as is seen everywhere to-day in our pleasure cities and our countryside, though in the dens and huts of industry millions of our workers are still short of the opportunity to toil for a reasonable subsistence. Growing numbers of sane, honest citizens are beginning to understand the nature and origin of this contrast, and to urge a determined course of political remedy. It is this fact that gives its chief significance to the Budget and to the barricades which the landlords, Lord Rothschild, and the brewers are conspiring to erect. It is not the present taxes of the Budget, but the economic education it will afford, that is the object of their dread.

THE IMPORTANCE OF ART.

If there is anything in the universe more irresponsible than a kitten and a Cockney errand-boy, it is the professional literary man. To be sure the chance of giving really shocking evidence before a Parliamentary Committee does not happen often. It is a golden moment which may arrive once in a laborious career, never to return. To the pure literary man, who is neither a humanist nor a thinker, but simply a deft craftsman in words and a confectioner of epigrams, the politician, even more than the business man, is the type of the irritatingly serious, the spirit which always affirms, the Philistine who is so unpardonably necessary in a commonplace scheme of things. Mr. Shaw, of course, could not refrain from dancing before the Committee, as David played before the Philistines. He treated them precisely as he treats the Fabian Society or a group of Wesleyan ministers. He laughed at them and teased them, because he chose to resent their pretensions to be persons of intelligence. But the less pardonable performance was Mr. Walkley's. Mr. Walkley did not pose as an anti-moral or non-moral intellectual. That sort of thing has been overdone, even in England. He played the weary Philistine. Precisely how much he meant by declaring that the importance of art is over-rated, we do not know. It is even offensive to suppose that he meant anything at all. There is, of course, a fine and a true sense in which art, and the drama, and, indeed, all our human purposes, are supremely unimportant. To the religious consciousness, and in some of its phases to the philosophical consciousness, reflection must have its moments of nihilism. Under the microscope of a divine intelligence, our efforts and relaxations may seem as ridiculously fussy as the wars of bacteria and the behavior of microbes in a biologist's test-tube. The struggle of a Dutch cheese against a green revolution may matter as much or as little to the Absolute, as the Thirty Years' War or the Revival of Learning. But it was no such remote speculation as this which Mr. Walkley intended to present for the applause of Lord Newton. His thesis was the naked assertion that, in a world where a great deal does matter, art and the drama and ideas are "apt to be over-rated." That is the assumption on which the Philistine is supposed to act. We doubt if he often makes it consciously. We fancy he would usually repudiate it, if it were set before him. He does care rather keenly about certain forms of art. He devours the novels of Miss Corelli and Mr. Hall Caine. He dotes on the "Merry Widow," and engravings after Mr. Marcus Stone. It is only the "hands-upper," "the fame Boer," the man who has deliberately transferred his loyalty from the intellectual to the Philistine camp, who gives to this supposed prejudice against art so sweeping and brutal a statement.

To Mr. Walkley, art, we gather, is nothing but a passing "gratification," and he would say, we suppose, with Bentham that pushpin is as good as poetry provided the pleasure is the same. The point of view emerged in his remarks on "Monna Vanna." It is, he thinks, "an entirely moral and beautiful play," and he stood aghast at the Censor's stupidity in suppressing it. But he went on to argue that no great harm had been done.

> "The public has been deprived of the advantage of seeing that play. Does that amount to much? They miss an evening's æsthetic gratification. Is that a very serious matter?

For our part we are grateful to Mr. Walkley for this frankly revolting statement of his case. No Philistine born would have dared to do it. The function of the "hands-upper" in art as in politics is to make the cause he espouses odious. The real Philistine would have denied with Mr. Redford that "Monna Vanna" is either moral or beautiful, and he would have claimed a positive merit for suppressing it on the ground that it was sinful and therefore ugly. But when we encounter an avowal like this that a beautiful thing may be suppressed with no greater loss to the world than that of an evening's gratification, we realise for the first time how large and serious is the issue behind this controversy over the Censorship. If it were merely a battle between two rival groups of idealists, the one contending for an exaggerated Puritanism and the other for the freedom of artistic creation, one might have said with the Greek chorus, "Let the good prevail." An ideal of sorts would in any case have emerged triumphant. But when one perceives that the battle really is between those who think that beauty does not matter, and those who think that it is supremely important, the issue becomes one of the most fundamental which life could present.

This thesis of Mr. Walkley's, if one were to do it the honor of taking it seriously, is a whole-hearted blasphemy against the power of beauty in life. An audience sees or hears a thing of beauty; it has had a pleasure, and nothing more. It misses a thing of beauty; it is none the worse for the loss. It is an assertion that a man may pass through the rare and supreme experience of appreciating "an entirely beautiful and moral thing," and be none the larger or the better for it. It is a denial of the Platonic doctrine of music, and of the Aristotelic doctrine of purgation. It is to reduce art, even the greatest art, to the function which the juggler or the performing rats fulfil at the music-hall, of giving an evening's gratification. It is to say that a man who has listened to the Choral Symphony will be next day in no higher or finer mood, when the great rhythms of the Hymn to Joy are echoing through his brain, than if he were humming a waltz from the "Chorus Lady." It is to say that Brahms' "Serious Songs" and "Stop your tickling" alike leave the mind exactly what it was before, an empty bucket with a capacious leak, through which the artist pours his fluid gratifications. The thesis is plainly nonsense, and is also self-destructive. For if there is no power in beauty, if there is no influence in art, if serenity moves the mind precisely as frivolity does, that is to say, not at all, then clearly there is no purpose or use in a censorship. The only man who has a right to call for a censorship is the man who dreads the desolating power of beauty, the man who thinks, like Tolstoy, that art is often a destroyer of souls. On Mr. Walkley's view of the function of beauty and ideas there is only one possible attitude for the practical statesman. He must take refuge in a "De minimis non curat lex."

There is clearly more at issue in this controversy than the question of winning a platform for Mr. Shaw. The real issue is whether ideas are to be allowed their influence in English life. The controversy over the means to be taken to protect the public from flagrant indecency is little more than a blind and a lure. Indecency is not a national peril. If it were, the problem would be rather how to strengthen Mr. Redford's hands so that he might deal with the commercial nastiness which now escapes his fitful vigilance. The crux of the position was quite fairly put by Mr. Walkley when he said that the Censor is "down on advanced ideas." That is only another way of saying that the Censor is there to protect us against the intrusion of new ideas, i.e., of intellectual progress, into the theatre. Nobody minds the advocacy of ideas in expensive books. The man who reads a book is not aware of his fellows on whom also it is making an impression. He is isolated. In the theatre the ideas are dynamic, not because crowds are lower in their intelligence than individuals, but because the individual in the crowd is aware that he is no longer alone. He does not merely assent. He applauds, and in the act he becomes aware that others also applaud. The idea acquires the force of a collective act of will. That, rather than any dread of indecency, is the real reason why the Censorship dreads the potential influence of the theatre, allows it to play with lubricity and forbids it to propagate ideas. Ideas are dangerous only when they reach a crowd. Nobody minded the preaching of Deism by cultivated peers in costly and difficult books in the eighteenth century. It was Tom Paine who was sent to prison, not for his opinions, but for his power to popularise them. Meredith knew the danger of the advocacy of ideas in the theatre when he dated the Lombard revolt against Austria from Vittoria's performance at La Scala. Latent in all this jealousy of the stage and this talk about the psychology of crowds is, we suspect, the conviction that a free theatre might become a great emancipating force. From that point of view the Censorship is primarily a device which permits the "Englishman's Home" and forbids the answer to it. It was really more surprising that the Censor licensed "The Silver Box" than that he forbade "Monna Vanna."

THE NEW OPTIMISM OF SCIENCE.

Many readers of Sir Joseph Thomson's presidential address before the British Association at Winnipeg must feel as if a new continent of the physical universe were being traced out for them to which they possess no kind of chart or means of measurement. What (they may well ask) is this new series of mathematical-metaphysical conceptions on which the advanced physicists have agreed? What is radio-activity? What is this theory of the molecular structure not only of matter, but of electricity? How far is it verified or verifiable? To what intelligible notion of life does all this investigation of the infinitely little tend? How far is human language capable of expressing ideas so repugnant to the common thought of mankind as the existence of a "corpuscle" of negative electricity, as small, in its relation to the chemical "atom," as a speck of dust to the volume of a public hall, and yet so powerful that in its neighborhood the all-important, all-embracing ether acquires a density two thousand million times that of lead? What is the "life" of an atom, and how far is the process of "deterioration," which "radio-active" atoms appear to undergo, applicable to the whole processes of physical existence?

Such inquirers may, we think, be partially consoled. Some of the speculative wonders of Sir Joseph Thomson's address are as old as Lucretius, and a good deal older; others will probably change their precise intellectual forms and relationships before many years have rolled over our heads. Many of the calculations on which the physicists' theories of electric proportions and functions are based can only be verified by the few score Supermen who can follow the almost unbelievably abstruse findings of the higher mathematics. But the plain man is not left quite without guidance. The wonders of radio-activity have been abundantly verified; and with them we are introduced into a sphere of ultra-microscopic energies which in a very literal sense have put down the mighty from their seat. It may or may not be true that matter is what Sir Joseph Thomson declares it to be, "just a collection of positive and negative units of electricity." But it is certain that we have to banish for ever the notion of a universe full of crude masses of dead or inert material. Instead we are introduced to a system peopled with limitless stores of whirling energy, capable of raising life to undreamed of potencies. Sir Joseph Thomson assures us that even ordinary matter contains stores of energy so enormous that if they were not kept in restraint by the watchful "corpuscles" of negative electricity, they would explode and turn the earth into a gaseous nebula. Even this is nothing to the energetic force of uranium and its products, seemingly solid bodies whose function through the ages is to fling off, with incredible velocity, immense reserves of light and heat.

The effect of these discoveries has been to overturn much of the crude pessimism of the old scientific materialists. The new science gives the earth itself both a longer past and a longer future, adding millions of years to the geological period, and suggesting that man is only at the beginning of his mastery of the stores of vital energy that quite literally lie at his feet. The earth's crust, says Sir Joseph Thomson, contains enough radium to replace all the heat that flows from the inside to the outside of the shell, while the sun—beating down in a clear sky on the earth's surface—distributes power enough per acre to keep all the world's mechanical activities going, and to encourage scientists, not of Laputa, but of Europe, to set traps to catch its beams. We need not now think that every cold winter or dreary summer implies some stealthy approach to an extinction of the sources of life. We may dismiss mid-century speculations as to the results of a failure of our coal supply. Science at least discourages that idea of some Tithonus of a world, bereft of light and heat and creeping, with the last man, into its frozen grave. We are bidden rather to think of the earth as in its impetuous youth, and of man in his first vision of its power to maintain him, not in the hard and perilous subsistence of savage life, but in a generous opulence extended to the countless, unborn descendants of Adam. To a world so full of creative and recuperative power, Byron's gloomy vision of a decaying fabric, in which > "The bright sun was extinguished, and the stars

> Did wander darkling through the eternal space,
> Rayless and pathless, and the icy earth
> Swung blind and blackening in the moonless air."

seems almost meaningless.

But, indeed, the very transformation of the search for a final physical expression of natural force has broken up materialistic notions of the universe. We are out of the sphere of "matter"; at the bidding of the physicist himself, we have entered that of "energy." It is also, it is true, a sphere of eternal and incomprehensible change, in which "everything flows" into something else, and the more instructed brain of the scientific thinker rejects the notion of an ultimate analysis. "Matter is electricity." But what is electricity—the last product of the crucible? What master-force lies behind it? And what behind that—and that? The "radio-activists" have already shaken some of the old, hard conclusions of the atomic theory. We are beginning to find that atoms may be broken up and that they are by no means all alike. In turn the findings of the brilliant searchers into radio-activity will be disturbed. But it is at least refreshing to the doubting spirit of man to feel assured of the presence of an "infinite energy" which breaks through the old divisions of organic and inorganic, and while it seems to promise a measure of security and even abundance for his physical existence on the earth, provided he can organise it on rational lines, bears witness to an eternal, fluid movement and adaptation of things, inconceivably fertile in the production and transmutation of activities. The Temple of Life is fuller of mysteries than ever. But at least it contains no cold, deserted, outer court; no corner that the central altar-fire does not warm and illumine.

"THE AUTOCRAT."

No broad, majestic river, bearing on its bosom the freight of a continent, feeding fat provinces with its overflow, now narrowing into a tumultuous torrent that carves deep, mysterious gulches as it rushes on from cataract to cataract, but a brisk-trotting brook with clear-cut banks, flowing with many quick turns through pleasant flowery meadows, chattering over the bright pebbles as its course steepens, here and there halting in some shady pool where we may look for fish, "here and there a lusty trout, and here and there a grayling"! Some such image may serve to present the genius of the latest of the great company of 1809, Oliver Wendell Holmes. There are niggard critics who would deny genius to such a man. But, though the dapper little Bostonian, who passed a long, comfortable life in the provincial magnificence of Beacon Street, lacked those dark, fierce, turbulent passions and imaginings which seem alone to count with those for whom self-abandonment is the supreme test, the saner and more balanced judgment of the ages will certainly rank his gifts as those of inspiration. Only those will boggle to whom the sanity of genius is a contradiction in terms. There is, indeed, no single quality of literary greatness in which he was not outshone even by some contemporary writer of his own country. The majestic serenity of Emerson's philosophy lay above his understanding, the poignant pathos, the occasional deep tragic note of Hawthorne struck deeper down into the mystery of human life than any of his half-scientific probings, Poe had a mastery of weird pathos to which he could not pretend, there was in Whittier a sterner moral passion, in Whitman a far more adventurous liberality of soul than his more guarded nature could attain. Even in that blend of humor and pathos which is the most characteristic note in modern American literature and life he was surpassed by the more free and forceful writing of Bret Harte.

It is easy to understand why this was so. In an age not only of moving, even revolutionary thought, but of forceful energy in a score of fields of action, in the great work of the emancipation and the Civil War, in the feverish frontier life of the new West, with its miraculously growing cities and its goldfields, amid all the bustling riot of the new industry, the age of railroads, and of the monster business men who sway the destiny of America, the "Autocrat" stood aside from action as an interested, sympathetic, intelligent observer. Thus, standing outside the main current of national activity, he never drank the full passion of the life of his time, as it was lived by a Lincoln, a Lloyd Garrison, or even a Lowell. He was not to blame for this. He did not "set out" to be a "public man," a literary force, a mirror of the age, a fountain of inspiration. His early bent and training were scientific, the most adventurous period of his life was a sober couple of years in Paris, studying medicine; his longest and most regular occupation was that of Lecturer in Anatomy. He dropped into literature because no one could live in Boston and not discover any literary gift he had. His really profitable power he was slow to find, for until nearly the age of fifty he was only known as a brilliant conversationalist, a successful writer of vers de société, and an acceptable lecturer in country lyceums. Not until the "Atlantic Monthly" started under the editorship of his friend and fellow-townsman, Lowell, did his genial fancy discover its proper mode of expression. The "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" leapt, indeed, to quick and easy fame, for its qualities of wit and wisdom, its discursiveness, its richness of illustration, were sure recommendations to his countrymen. Indeed, the very defects which ripen reflection finds, a certain overnimbleness of mind, abrupt descents into the vulgarest art of punning, an occasional crooning sentimentality, helped to win high favor for the Autocrat. Probably they have carried a too heavy cost of depreciation in the judgment of our generation, at any rate in "cultured" circles. A later literary settlement will, however, restore Holmes to a distinguished place among nineteenth century writers, and mainly upon the merits of this single volume. For, though his work makes no powerful impact on the reader, for loftiness, or profundity of thought, or for intensity of passion, it is inspired by a glorified and penetrating common-sense which illuminates every topic it alights upon. It is, we repeat, a practical vindication of the sanity of genius. An intellect acute and independent, but not profound or audacious, a quick, bright imagination which never carries him to wild extravagance, except in conscious play, generous emotions always kept in bounds, a solid orthodoxy in morals and behavior, he was admirably fitted to awaken thought among the great semi-educated "middle-class," who form, in fact, the bulk of the American people. He was not a great thinker, but he had, as Mr. L. W. Townsend says in his excellent little commemorative volume (Headley Bros.), the valuable faculty of stating "common truths in an uncommon manner." His treatment of the three Johns and the three Thomases who take part in every dialogue between John and Thomas is, perhaps, the best quoted instance of the happy method of informal psychology before this study assumed the status of a science, and began to bristle with terminology. His bright, compact, and witty judgments were particularly useful as an offset to the wild vagaries, religious, philosophical, and moral, which followed the crumbling of the harder Calvinism that hitherto had ruled the minds and conduct of New England. Among the intellectual liberators there was too little logic, too little scientific training; the collapse of the old theology either left its followers wandering in a wilderness of materialism or drove them into some misty heights of transcendentalism. Now, Holmes was "good" for this situation. He was a genuinely free man, fearless of consequences, within the limits of his intellectual vision, and his "Autocrat," innocent as it may now appear, was a powerful liberative ferment in thousands of New England villages. In these nests of ancient prejudice such sharp sayings as the following shocked and stung, "You never need think you can turn over any old falsehood without a terrible squirming and scattering of the horrid little population that dwells under it."

Though he had a pleasant knack of writing verses, with other literary graces, Dr. Holmes was not distinctively a literary man. He belonged rather to the line of general thinkers, in which Benjamin Franklin was his most eminent precursor, bringing a shrewd humor, keen interest in practical affairs, a scientific bent, and a sunny temper to bear upon his criticism of life. America has been prolific in such witty preachers, whose sermons, essays, or philosophy have been devoted to enlarging and realising for their people the great liberal sentiment of Sir Thomas Browne, "Every man truly lives, so long as he acts his nature, or some way makes good the faculties of him." To the discovery of this "nature" Dr. Holmes cannot, indeed, claim to have made any contribution of conspicuous mark. But on one matter of our attitude towards life he may, we think, be held to have exercised a special influence. His physiological training led him to think more closely than his contemporaries upon certain problems of human character, which the collapse of Puritan theology had left once more open to speculation. The new scientific treatment of character, with its clearer recognition of the causal interaction of body and mind, reset the whole question of human responsibility.

The theme fascinated Dr. Holmes, and served him as a central topic for his more ambitious works of fiction. The curious romance of "Elsie Venner" is, indeed, truly described as "a physiological conception fertilised by a theological idea," and in the far abler story, "The Guardian Angel," substantially the same problem of heredity is treated. Other great American romancers, Hawthorne and Poe, were drawn to the same borderland of science, but more as artists than as thinkers. Now, though Holmes was far from indifferent to literary form and feeling, he remained au fond a moralist, or, one might say, perhaps with more propriety, a humanist. And the particular task of humanism to which he set himself was to re-state the mystery of life which Puritan theology had expressed in the term "sin," and in the emotions they had brought to bear upon this conception. We find in a letter of Oliver Wendell Holmes a single sentence which sheds a flood of light upon his philosophy of life. Writing to an orthodox friend, he says: "To you I suppose sin is the mystery—to me suffering is. I trust Love will prove the solution of both."

The great variety of light decoration with which Holmes dressed his thought, the constant flicker of a wit, now hilarious, now satirical, now merely ludicrous, has caused him to be taken in the world of thought for lighter weight than he was. For solid wisdom in the conduct of life among all sorts and conditions of men, we know few encheiridia to compare with the "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

THE SUN.

The greatest of modern painters died proclaiming the praise of the sun. Huxley, concerned rather with science than with art, once affirmed that if there were any god he could worship, the sun would be his god. To Richard Jeffreys worship of the sun was the worship of life: flowers, butterflies, mottled eggs, gorgeous plumage of birds but the evidence of his handiwork, the hallmark which he stamped on his possessions. Sunlight, he declared, "puts out the words of the printed books as it puts out the fire." He saw it concentrated in the gold of the August harvest, woven into the petals of the rose. Among men and women who had lived in the sunshine and given themselves freely to its service he could recognise something magical. Such were the great painters, "Rubens, for instance. Perhaps he saw it on the faces of the women who gathered fruit or labored at the harvest in the Low Countries centuries ago." It is something "not actinic, alchemic, some intangible, mysterious power which cannot be supplied in any other form but the sun's rays. It reddens the cherry, it gilds the apple, it colors the rose, it ripens the wheat, it touches a woman's face with the golden brown of ripe life. There is no other hue so beautiful as this human sunshine tint." Walt Whitman, another sun-worshipper and mystic, proclaiming the "ever recurring miracle of the sunrise," rejoiced in the "sunbath"—in the silent woods by some quiet pool, where he lay all day naked to the sunshine. It is recorded in Shelley's life that he would lie like a lizard motionless for hours upon the burning rocks in the full hot sunshine of Tuscany. All painting, says modern criticism, is the attempt not to depict things, but to depict light falling upon things. Exultation and rejoicing accompany the sun's presence in all human literature. "There is nothing hid from the heat thereof" is the boast of those who scarcely know whether they are singing the glory of the sun or of his Ruler. "He cometh forth as a bridegroom out of his chamber and rejoiceth as a giant to run his course," is the pæan of praise of the bringer of corn and wine to the Land of Promise and to poor humanity of the power to affirm that the common life of men could be "very good." And the vision of the great hope of an ultimate triumph came to be concentrated upon the vision of a city where "they need no candle, neither light of the sun," because "there shall be no night" there, but experience of "light ineffable" and infinite shall remove for ever the fear of "snowdrift driving fast" and "the furious winter's rages."

It is this vast, invigorating outpouring of energy as the sun sweeps over the cold expanses of our grey Northern seas, which provides the possibility of hope and exultant life amongst the people who here labor in the twilight of an uncertain day. A summer of rain and cloud is not merely a temporary deprivation of opportunities of sport and pleasure; it represents a permanent loss to humanity of an irrecoverable asset of desirable life. Poets and persons of manly mood profess enthusiasm for the wild north-easter which has fashioned hard English men. But normal human life turns towards the sun. All our dwellings we build towards the south; two of the dearest places in London are Victoria and Charing Cross stations—outlets to "lands of summer across the sea." A friend of Gladstone asserts that he was so sensitive to the changes of the seasons that a summer such as that of this year left him at the end of it physically cramped and enfeebled, like a machine imperfectly supplied with the energy by which its life is sustained. William Morris—a child of the North to whom even Italy was an alien land—could class amongst his discouragements a similar experience. "Yet indeed I am older, and the year is evil: the summerless season, and famine, and war, and the folly of peoples are heavy matters to a small creature like me." His "Earthly Paradise" in the Western Ocean is one in which the sun is always shining, which "hath little fear for the white conqueror of the fruitful year." His Utopia is set in a hot hayfield in the Thames Valley under an unclouded sky. Jeffreys could turn from the "Pageant of Summer" to hope for a time when "ultimately the sunshine and the summer, the flowers and the azure sky, shall become, as it were, interwoven into man's existence." Morris, while the sun shone, could put away his fears of the future, and turn towards that coming day with a word of hope for the year "that it may do a good turn of work towards the abasement of the rich and the raising up of the poor, which is of all things most to be longed for."

It has been asserted that he who has only seen the sun in England has never seen the sun. Certainly his appearance here is transitory and hazardous. We are never sure of his advent. We are always fearful of his departure. He appears generally as if reluctant or displeased, flinging sombre and magnificent sunsets over the cities, as if outraged by the smoke and cloud which defile his splendor. Occasionally we can understand his effectual triumph. In the recent welcome brief interval of heat there were days when, gazing across the river from the Embankment, one could recognise here in London the very tone and essence of the South, that deep ruddy and orange glow on wall and tower which for a moment transformed the huddled roofs of Southwark and Bermondsey with the illumination of an Italian sky. He can be seen, as in the picture of Henley's golden afternoon in Piccadilly, "in a golden glory long lapsing down a golden coasted sky." He can pour down a rain of fairy gold upon the sea-coast sands of England until the huge company of playing children there become gathered into a picture of fairyland, and the commonplace crowd of awkward, shabby people who accompany them are transfigured into figures of a gold illuminated missal. Even in the furthest north, although capricious in his favors, he will sometimes exhibit his power. One of the greatest sunsets in the memory of the present writer is a vision from the wild, bleak spaces of North-West Ireland, of a huge yellow sun sinking into the sea beyond the dark heather and stones of the cliffs of Donegal on a quiet autumn evening. But in all these windy skies, lurid lights and colors replace the more tranquil and regular outpouring of sunshine, falling like golden rain through a serene air. To find this you must seek the South: watch the valley of the Loire with its hundred rivers and vine-clad slopes of historic fame; or see in Andalusia a limitless plain under a limitless blue sky with white houses facing that downhill of sunlight; or in Italy trace "the smile of God" where a radiance in the air and the scent of "old pine forests heated by the sun" tell of a region which has welcomed and absorbed the sunlight through unnumbered centuries; or go to Venice, now in August most desirable, when the tourists who cannot face this force and splendor have all fled from it, and nothing remains but brown crumbling buildings rising from still waters silent under the furious ardor of the sun.

He has left behind him, in those places where he chiefly rejoices to abide, two particular creations of his power—the rose and the vine. Whether at Naishapur or Babylon, in the Geralda gardens or here with fainter perfume and more transient flames, the rose has always been accepted as especially the child of the sun, witness of his power of transmuting dead earth and unseen air unto a thing of wonder. And the grape—that "can with logic absolute, the two and seventy jarring sects confute"—is the product of those vineyards whose terraces are always set towards the sun, which flourish most where the soil is stony and unhidden from the heat. There are other liquors which men have manufactured in uncomfortable climes, equally competent to confute the "jarring sects." But none of them possess that power of romance which "maketh glad the heart of man." The distillations of the North awaken the vision at once of sunless regions, of futile attempts to beat off the influence of rain and fog and darkened skies. The beers of England and Germany excite no suggestion of exultation and gaiety, but the blind satisfaction of an appetite. But that draft of vintage which inspired the finest ode in English literature carries with it "dance and Provençal song and sunburnt mirth."

He has given us the tenderest and dearest memories of the past: the Appenines, in a purple glow, with Assisi, a little white town set amongst them, seen from the battlements of Perugia; Mount Olympus under a cloudless sky from the tideless Salonican shore; the Euganean hills in late afternoon with all Lombardy and Venetia spread out as a golden plain beneath: Etna dazzling white from the ruined temple of Taormina, with butterflies flitting amongst the stones raised by those who once worshipped the sun. To-day he stretches out his hand, and the children of men are filled with good, he turns away his face, and they are troubled.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE MIRACLE PLAYS.

THERE was in the Middle Ages a vast popular culture which was still alive in Shakespeare's time. The references to the events and personages of sacred history and mythology with which his plays are filled were at once intelligible to the whole audience. This culture was religious in origin. There was an accepted version of the history and meaning of the world, from the Creation to Doomsday, familiar to everybody, and this vast framework was filled in the popular mind with action and life. In our own time the mental world of the great mass is quite blank and unpeopled. The good woman who points out on her cottage wall a framed sampler depicting David in royal robes with harp and crown, will say, "I don't know who it's meant for, I'm sure." Nobody in Shakespeare's England would have a moment's hesitation over a picture of King David. All the kings and prophets of the Tree of Jesse, "the nine sibyls of old Rome," the Nine Worthies, the Seven Champions of Christendom, were familiar to the people, if not in their habits as they lived, yet in the conventional presentment of them, at once recognised by all. Everybody knew that the palmer bedizened with scallop shells, carrying an immense gourd and staff, was St. James the Great. Everybody knew that the knight on horseback brandishing a lance and trampling a dragon was St. George. These representations were everywhere.

> "St. George that swinged the dragon, and e'er since > Sits upon horseback at our hostess' door," says the Bastard in King John (Act II. 1). Shakespeare's own mind had thus, from his earliest days, been filled with a whole world of imagery—"Pharaoh's soldiers, and god Bel's priests in the old church-window, and the shaven Hercules in the moth-eaten tapestry."

The miracle plays were undoubtedly the great means by which this traditional culture was diffused among the people. What a whole world of enchantment and wonder rises before one on reading the very names of these plays—the Falling of Lucifer, the Creation of the World, Noah's Ship, the Three Kings of Cologne, the Harrowing of Hell, the Coronation of Our Lady, Doomsday! Shakespeare was the heir of all this wonderful lore of the Middle Ages. The plays were passing away in his time, but they died hard, and the whole atmosphere in which he lived was saturated with their influence. He must have often seen them as a boy. One likes to think of the shining morning face of little Willie Shakespeare among the crowd, when the pageant was set up in Stratford Street, and the shows of Heaven and Hell, the Making of all the World, Paradise, Bethlehem, Calvary, were played. No detail would be missed by the boy's keen eyes, no word lost by his sharp ears. The great themes of the wonder of the Middle Ages were the Creation and the Redemption, and the final Doom of the World. These were the subjects of the plays. This wonder Shakespeare seems to have felt in the very marrow of his bones. It is the very word which he uses when he speaks of "such wonders as we feel" at hearing of "a world ransomed or destroyed." Perhaps the passage in the "Tempest" about the dissolution of the great globe itself may record the impression left on the boy's mind by the spectacle of Doomsday.

Much has been written on the question of the religion of Shakespeare. It would seem that the statements of the Apostles' Creed were so much the fundamental pre-suppositions of the world in which he lived, so much the background and setting of the life he saw, that he could not reflect that life as he did, without receiving them. The Creed covers the whole cycle of the miracle plays from the Creation to the Doom. His knowledge of the Christian doctrine was probably derived rather from these plays than from the catechisms of barefooted friars or the sermons of Puritan divines. The religion which the Shakespearean drama reflects is the popular medieval Christianity. This, like the Puritanism which succeeded it, revolves round the ideas of the fall and the Redemption. That "all the souls that were, were forfeit once, and He that might the vantage best have took found out the remedy" ("Measure for Measure," II., 2) was the foundation of miracle play theology.

Such a speech as Portia's

> "Tho' justice be thy plea, consider this
> That in the course of justice none of us > Should see salvation."

would suggest a very definite picture indeed to an Elizabethan audience. The "Reconciliation of the Virtues" was a theme often treated of in the miracle plays. They frequently begin with the pleading of Justice and Mercy for and against the culprit Man before the Throne of God. The idea is worked out in a great sermon of St. Bernard on the text "Mercy and Truth are met together, Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other." (Psalm lxxxv. 10). The four Virtues are Justice, Truth, Mercy, and Peace, with which Man was endowed at the first, but which he lost at the Fall. These four sacred sisters, before at peace together, are henceforth at discord among themselves. Justice and Truth accuse Man before his Maker, Mercy and Peace plead for him. In the fulness of time the sundered sisters meet together and embrace. This is the subject of one of the tapestries in Hampton Court Palace. The three Persons of the Trinity are seen as three crowned and sceptred figures before whom the Four Virtues are contending. On the one hand stands Justice with the drawn sword, and Truth with the book exactly worded, and on the other Peace with the olive branch, and Mercy with the lily of the far-off Annunciation. The writer remembers a wild March morning in which he had the great Palace absolutely to himself, and amid all the beautiful things in that delightful place, the pictures and tapestries, the heads of the Roman Caesars, the rooks wheeling about on the dark sky, the many-colored crocuses in the grass, the great clumps of mistletoe high up in the bare lime trees, this particular tapestry was the thing that impressed him most. A very pompous and ignorant attendant volunteered the information that it was "the story of some young prince who'd got himself into trouble." After all, the Christian doctrine on the matter could not have been more concisely put. There is a celebrated passage of Newman to the same effect.

The cycle of the miracle plays begins with the fall of Lucifer. The very A B C of the medieval lore was that before the Creation of Man the Devil fell irrecoverably, and that the cause of this fall was Pride. Shakespeare follows this teaching to the very letter when he makes Wolsey say of "the poor man that hangs on prince's favors," that > "When he falls, he falls like Lucifer, > Never to rise again," and

> "Cromwell, I charge thee fling away ambition:
> By that sin fell the angels, how shall man then,
> The image of his Maker, hope to win by 't?"
> ("Henry VII.," ii., 2.)

The growing influence of Puritanism may be traced in the references to the devil in Shakespeare. He is no longer given over bound for the sport and laughter of the children of the Church, but is becoming the mighty potentate of Milton. But the poet knew the Devil of the miracle plays well. When he makes the boy call Bardolf "this roaring devil in the old play that every one may pare his nails with a wooden dagger" (Henry V., iv.4), he is no doubt describing what he had often seen. The difference in the two conceptions explains why it was that the world of the Canterbury Pilgrims was so much more gay and blithe than the world of the Elizabethans. The sixteenth century destroyed the old simple-hearted merriment of those who believed that mankind was essentially and fundamentally rescued from the grip of evil powers. The Elizabethan drama is full of darkness and horror, and, although still Christian, leaves the impression that the world is an unsolved and insoluble riddle.

But the old traditions are still very much alive. Two very frequent characters in the mysteries and moralities were "Bonus Angelus" and "Malus Angelus," the two spirits who, according to a belief older than Christianity, contend for the soul of every man. These are often referred to in Shakespeare. "You follow the young prince up and down like his ill angel," says the Chief Justice to Falstaff. (II. "Henry IV.," I.2.) The fat knight himself says, "There's a good angel about him, but the devil outbids him too" (Act. II. 4.). We often find touches showing the poet's familiarity with the representations of the angels in plays and pageants. When Lorenzo speaks of "the young-eyed cherubins" ("Merchant of Venice," V. 1) he has, no doubt, in mind the cherubins as they were represented, "full of eyes," according to the descriptions in Isaiah and St. John. The ancient liturgies always speak of the "many-eyed cherubins." Possibly there should be no hyphen in "young-eyed"—two adjectives may be intended instead of one. Norfolk, in describing the "Field of the Cloth of Gold," says:—

> "their dwarfish pages were > As cherubims all gilt."
> ("Henry VIII.," i., 1.)

The wings of the cherubins were no doubt gilded to represent their flaming color. Falstaff speaks of a flea as "a black soul." This was the technical name for a lost soul—the saved were "white souls." Not only Heaven and Hell, but the "Limbus of the Fathers" was frequently represented. "I have some of them in Limbo Patrum," says the Porter, speaking of the mob in the last act of "Henry VIII." He had no doubt often seen the place with the name above it in large letters in the play of the "Harrowing of Hell." In the last thirty years the word "limbo" has ceased to be popular English. Talking of English, there is a phrase which occurs frequently in the historical plays, which shows the true meaning of our expression "the debt of nature." The medieval form of the phrase was evidently "we owe a debt to God." Shakespeare's ruffians and profligates indeed are still able to speak of God very simply and naturally.

In another paper we shall hope to give further examples of the influence of these old time popular shows on the great poet's work.

SALMON STREAMS AND STORAGE.

Year by year, as the holiday time comes and goes, it is found that the salmon rivers and the trout streams of Scotland yield poorer and poorer baskets. That is an incidental result of agricultural drainage. Hills and dales alike are so seamed with artificial channels that the rivers and streams have had their character changed. Before the age of drainage they were never excessively high and never excessively low, but nowadays they are practically always one or the other. In the old days the rainfall soaked into them gradually, and they remained of temperate flow until the next storm; now it is rushed in so quickly that they are over their banks for a day or so, and fall away into trickles long before another storm comes. Both these extreme states are bad for the fish. The abnormal floods tear up the spawn-beds, and the abnormal droughts, leaving uncovered many places in the channels, destroy myriads of immature insects and small shell-fish which would otherwise become food for the fish. Besides, the comparatively few fish that remain give less sport than they would if the waters were in a natural state. The trout see the angler, as a rule, long before he is within casting distance of them, and then they dart off to cover. As regards the salmon, the state of affairs is worse. On most of the rivers hardly anyone ever tries for a salmon from the end of May, by which time most of the snow water has been run off the hills, until the middle of August, when there is usually a flood. Indeed, it has come to be generally understood that between the dates mentioned the salmon in the rivers are very few, and that no fresh run from the sea is to be expected then. This belief is roughly in accord with the facts, but the facts are not in accord with the design of nature. Fresh-run salmon are absent only because the rivers in the summer months have ceased to be fit haunts for them. There is not enough water. If the rivers were approximately as they used to be before the drainage was established, sport would go on all through the summer. This has been conclusively shown on the Helmsdale, in Sutherland. That stream was taken on lease by six anglers, who had a plan for restoring the natural flow. It has two sources—Loch Baddenloch and Loch An Ruathair. The tenants raised the levels of these waters a few feet by damming the outlets; the dams were fitted with sluices, so arranged that extra water in such quantity as might be required could be let into the stream at any time; in short, the autumn, winter, and spring water, instead of being rushed off in wasteful and devastating floods, is stored, and used in time of drought. The experiment has been an unqualified success. "Before the dams were built," one of the tenants writes, "the only fishing on the Helmsdale was early in the spring. Generally it was over between the middle and the end of April, by which time the river had run so low that sport was impossible. The design towards improvement has been abundantly successful. The season of 1905 was one of the driest experienced in Sutherland for some years, the Brora and other streams dwindling away to mere trickles; but the Helmsdale, regulated, afforded good sport until the middle of August. The Torrish rod alone had nearly fifty salmon during the shooting season."

The gladdening example set on the Helmsdale has already been followed in a few places. Lady Cromartie has applied the storage system to three or four rivers, Lord Dalhousie to one river, and Sir Tollemache Sinclair to one. It is understood that in all these cases the results are highly gratifying; but a suggestion that the system should be applied wherever possible has called forth a statement of misgivings from a most unexpected quarter. Mr. Charles George Barrington, a venerable sportsman, who went fishing with Lord Palmerston, of whom he was a colleague, will have none of the storage system; at least, he will not countenance it on salmon rivers. It might, he says, be of some good use on trout streams, but on salmon rivers it would benefit the net-men only. These, the commercial fishers, who work mainly in the estuaries, would intercept practically all the salmon induced by the artificial floods to come up from the sea. To reason in this way is to pay too much deference to the net-men, who have already done untold damage to a national interest. Are they to be allowed to go on doing damage permanently? It is not even in their own interests that this should be. Whether the storage system is generally applied or not, the salmon must become practically extinct unless netting is curtailed. Happily, there is reason for believing that Mr. Barrington's difficulty is in large measure unreal. He himself will perceive this when he looks into the question. Who are the net-men? They are all the "riparian proprietors," or the persons to whom the proprietors let the right to net. In practically all cases, however, the proprietors neither net on their own accounts nor let the rights to net. They know that any exercise of the rights would be most injurious to the stock of fish. The only proprietors who do exercise the right are the Crown or the few private persons whose lands border the tidal waters. There should not be much difficulty in removing the obstacles that thus remain. It is in the interest of the whole community that the stock of salmon should be preserved and increased. The rights of the Crown, therefore, will not stand in the way of reform. The rights of the proprietors on the estuaries cannot be allowed to do so. In all the domains of human activity there is no other case in which it is so startlingly clear that individualism must be subordinate to the general interest. Unless the salmon can pass in fair numbers from the sea to the head waters of the rivers, the fish must inevitably become extinct. That is not a prospect to be tolerated.

At first sight the storage system seems open to an objection which Mr. Barrington does not mention. As the reservoirs are formed at the heads of the rivers, manifestly it is only a portion of the rainfall on the watersheds that can be stored. Is this portion enough? Does it suffice to overcome the droughts of a whole summer? Well, it suffices, as we have seen, on the Helmsdale, and there is no obvious reason for fearing that it would be insufficient elsewhere. Few of us realise how much water there is in this country. If most of it were not allowed to run waste, there would be a visible abundance at all times. An astonishing lesson in the conservation of water may be learned by anyone who strolls over the high-lying heath about three miles west of Aldershot. He would not expect to find water in any measurable quantity on that flinty upland, and, indeed, on the heath as nature made it there is, except in time of rain or just after, not a drop to be seen; but by-and-by the wanderer will come upon a narrow conduit down which water is trickling, and soon upon another, and another; in fact, there are conduits all over the northern slopes; and, lo! at the base, in Bourley Bottom, three lakes, not at all large indeed, but enough to supply the camp with water, and in the case of one of them to provide first-class trout-fishing! This, no doubt, is, in one sense, an instance of the very drainage system which has deranged the rivers, but in another sense it shows how they may be redeemed. If that arid hill at Ewshott is capable of yielding water enough to provide for the wants of a great community, the lakes on marshlands can surely be converted into reservoirs sufficient to keep the rivers and streams in ample flow. The cost of the dams is inconsiderable. Only £1,150 was spent on the wonderfully successful works at the sources of the Helmsdale. The subject is well worth the consideration of Mr. Burns, who has promised a Bill to strengthen the hands of the public authorities responsible for the purity of our streams and rivers. If these are to be restored to their natural purity, they may as well, at the same time, be restored to something like their natural flow.

Present-Day Problems.

THE WARREN ON THE HILL.

At four o'clock every morning I trudge up a hill in a large provincial town. The hill is steep and long. In the uncertain half-light of these August small hours the narrow street looks like two cataracts of dingy houses descending. Odd wayfarers, belated, dragging heavy feet behind them, disappear into the gloom of the shadows between, or vanish behind slammed doors into the Unknown: night workmen going home. Others come out from the Unknown, and walk with brisk, clanging footsteps downward to the town: workmen who must walk two or three miles to be at the gates when the five o'clock hooter breaks the morning silence.

The Unknown! Behind these straight and gloomy plaster walls, behind the dirty grey sheets and table-cloths that serve for blinds, or the tattered muslin through which glows the yellow light of oil lamps, is a territory unexplored except by the inhabitants. Silent people for the most part, preserving their own code of ethics and etiquette, the most difficult people in the world to know. Their country is honeycombed like a rabbit-warren, impermeable by any larger animal than the debt-collecting ferret or the rent-hunting terrier. They live their own lives, die their own deaths, pursue their own passions, unregarded save by the ferret and the terrier.

At four o'clock in the morning, in the squares and terraces beyond the source of the cataract, there is dead sleep and silence, save for the whistle of a bird or the rustle of a wind in the trees. Not so in the long street. The windows are all open. In these tall, plaster-faced houses are no pantries; the window-sills are all speckled with milk-jugs, placed there so that milk may not turn to curds in the lamp-laden air of the rooms. Through the open window comes a dim, confused murmur of voices, pierced by the whirring of an alarm clock, the voice of a woman rousing her husband, and, most frequent, the crying of children. This crying of children pierces deep; it goes through the murmur of the warren to the heart's core.

By day the street swarms with children. More than five hundred children live in it. By night more than five hundred children sleep in it from half-past eleven, when the shouting of revellers and the noises of traffic cease, to five or six, when the cries of trafficking and the noises of the day begin. They cry in sleep, wake from sleep to cry; they toss in illness and moan; they are brought forth from the womb in lamplit rooms to wail; the vibrations of their crying mingle in the ears of the passer-by, and echo there continually.

For, with a few exceptions, no family which inhabits the rabbit-warren on the hillside is able to occupy more than two rooms, and every house is the residence of three or four families. How they sleep is their secret; they pay their 4s. 6d. or 5s. a week to the terrier, and wrap the sequel in impenetrable mystery, to which the only clue is the crying of children in the night.

Half-way round the provincial town stretches the cool sea; on the other side the country, in its guise of olive-green woods, and hills, and streams, and fields, and great estates, and purple moors. To out-plant those families in cottages built on this widespread, beautiful land would seem to be a simple thing, and worth doing, so that the children should cease crying in the night. But not only is it not simple, it is impossible. The reason is rent. Land is very valuable in this quarter of an English county. The smallest house on a self-contained plan in an accessible place cannot be had for less than £15 to £20 a year. The families which inhabit the rabbit-warren do not average more than £30 or £40 a year for their income. They pay from £12 to £14 a year for their shares of the warren, but cannot go beyond that. If they maintain two adults and a family of four or five children on fourteen shillings a week, they say—with what reason I will leave others to judge—that they are doing all we can expect from them.

One morning a denizen of the warren came out, stretching his arms and looking up at the sky. "That's better," said he, opening his lungs. He asked me for a light to his clay pipe.

"Warm nights!" he exclaimed. "I should think so. In there! I never knew how hot it could be till I came to the town. Me and the old woman and three little kids in the bedroom, and the two big boys in the kitchen. God's truth, I'd never have left the country if I'd known."

No; he could not afford a house anywhere. He earned an average of 21s. a week, and paid 4s. 6d. of it for the rent of two rooms. He was no worse off than others, for he was strong and in regular work, and the inn at the corner did not see much of him.

It seemed a pity that he could not have a cottage for his 4s. 6d.; but the price of land would not permit builders to put up a cottage at a rent he could have paid. There was a large estate or two on the outskirts of the town, held by the landlords till about twenty years ago, then gradually sold at the market price and built upon. The unfortunate circumstance was that, while the estates had been kept in their virgin condition, the population had been increasing. As there were no houses to hold it, the population squeezed itself into the rabbit-warren and other like places. Then the market price of the estate was found to be so high that those who bought it had to charge such large rents for the houses they built that the people in the rabbit-warren could not emigrate to them.

On Saturday morning I met on the hillside a doctor whom I knew. He emerged from behind one of the barriers of the Unknown Land. He stretched his arms and said, "That's better," as he opened his lungs. I inquired of him.

"I've just assisted a small boy into the world," said he, pointing to a yellow-lit window whence the wail came.

"How do you manage in a place like that?" I asked.

"Oh, we cleared everybody into the other room when the crisis came (there were five in this instance), except a little girl of three, who was sound asleep in a corner. Rather stuffy. I'm glad to be out again; troublesome case, and I was tired. I went to Wyndham's meeting last night, and was called again at two."

"Fine meeting?" said I.

"Yes, and a great speech. Literary quality which would appeal to you if you weren't party-blind. And he gave your rotten, land-taxing, Socialistic ideas their quietus, too. There'll be no improvement till we get Tariff Reform, my friend. That'll kill your Socialism, and give our politics their true Imperial direction. That's the real reform, not this putrid, class-hating Budget. Well, I'll see if I can get some sleep."

We shook hands, and I went on up the hill between the open windows whence the lamplight shone in rooms where children cried.

The Drama.

AFTER THE CENSORSHIP?

If the Censorship were abolished, how would theatres be controlled? That is a question which is being constantly asked, and to which the London managers, in particular, seem to hold it impossible to find a satisfactory answer. Their argument may be thus summarised: "Absolute freedom is impossible. The drama, like all other methods of publication, must be subject to some control; and there are reasons in the nature of its mechanism why the form of that control should not be exactly the same as that applicable to books, pictures, &c. The existing system of the inspection before performance affords us (by custom, if not by law) immunity from any subsequent interference with productions which may represent an investment of many thousands of pounds. Abolish that system, and we should never feel secure from disturbance, either by high-handed action on the part of the police, or by the decree of elective authorities who, in the case of non-compliance, might threaten the withdrawal of our licence. Whatever the authors may think, we hold it better to bear the trivial ills we have than fly to others that we know not of."

This is a specious argument, and I shall not waste space in marshalling the considerations that diminish its apparent force. There are many good reasons (among them the experience of the Colonies and the United States) for believing that the risk of interference with any honest production by a reputable manager would in fact be infinitesimal. But so long as such a danger theoretically exists, managers may reasonably demand to be safeguarded against it; and my present purpose is to review, and somewhat amplify, the proposals to that end laid before the Joint Committee last week by Professor Gilbert Murray.

The subject falls into two distinct branches. We have to consider (1) the managers who produce new plays, (2) those who take or send plays from theatre to theatre after their first production. These two classes, of course, to some extent overlap, but their interests may be considered separately.

I.—As to New Plays.

Professor Murray's proposal was practically to render the Censorship optional or permissive, depriving it of its absolute veto, while enabling it to afford to managers a guarantee against vexatious interference. "I suggest," said Mr. Murray, "that there should be an Examiner of Plays, whose duty should be, not to express a general opinion about good manners or decorum, but to consider whether a play breaks any known law, or commits any one of a list of scheduled offences, and, therefore, becomes liable to prosecution. If the Examiner does consider that the play contains a legal offence, he should warn the manager and the author. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred they would bow to his opinion. Suppose they did not—and this is quite important—the manager should have the right to produce the play, against the Examiner's advice, and risk prosecution. He would only do that in some case where a strong principle was involved, or where he thought the Examiner was obviously mistaken. The Examiner should have the right to put the Attorney-General or the Director of Public Prosecutions in motion, or to do nothing. . . . If the Examiner passed the play, it would have the same immunity—not, I understand, an absolute immunity—which it has now." Mr. Murray further stated, in answer to the Chairman, that he proposed to leave it to the manager's option whether he should or should not submit a play for licence.

A solution on these lines seems to me by no means impossible; but there are a good many points that must be thought out before we quite know where we are.

Let us recognise, in the first place, that the most careful scheduling of offences will not relieve the Examiner of the necessity of relying on his private taste and judgment. It would be fatal to draw up a number of hard-and-fast prohibitions which could be applied automatically to every case that came within their purview. It is precisely the unintelligent application of such a set of prohibitions that has made the existing Censorship a byword. What we require is not a list of topics that shall be barred, but rather the reverse—a list of topics that shall not be barred, unless they are treated in such a way as to outrage good sense and public decency. (As a matter of fact, of course, the embargo would be tacitly, not explicitly, removed.) It is possible to test by appropriate instruments the purity of milk or the strength of whisky; but there is no instrument and no definition that can infallibly determine what is indecent and what is blasphemous "within the meaning of the Act." Lay down what rules we may, the application of them must always be a matter of discretion—the discretion of an Examiner, of a judge, or of a jury. What Mr. Murray means, I take it, is that the Act should empower certain courts to order the stoppage (with or without penalties) of any performance which, on certain stated grounds, was found to be contrary to public policy, and that the Examiner, in considering a play, should be guided by what he believes will be the view taken by such a court. Thus, in declining to license a play, he would not say, as at present, "This play runs counter to my prejudices or those of my office, wherefore it shall never be performed," but "I believe that a prosecution of this play, under such and such a section of the Act, would be successful; wherefore I advise you not to produce it."

The Act would, I presume, provide some rapid method of obtaining an injunction against a play produced either without application for a licence, or in defiance of the Examiner's refusal of a licence. But I suggest that it should be left to the Examiner's discretion whether to set this instant machinery in motion, or to be content with the more leisurely and regular process of the law. Only in very flagrant cases, such as (I believe) would seldom or never occur, would summary suppression be desirable. But a manager continuing a performance after notice of action had been given might, if the case went against him, be mulcted in the amount of his ascertained profits; so that he would be under no temptation to seek for a "success of scandal" by running an incriminated play.

Should there, or should there not, be any method of appeal against a decision of the Examiner, other than the very expensive appeal of producing the play and taking the chance of prosecution? Should the Examiner be bound, on demand, to "state a case" for the consideration of the court? Or should the author or manager have power to move the court for a mandamus compelling the Examiner to issue a licence? Or, again, should there be a system of private arbitration like that which has been suggested as a remedy against the despotic power of the Censorship? These are questions for careful consideration.

My own feeling is that, with the necessary adjustments, Professor Murray's scheme might work very well in its application to the serious drama, but that, in relation to the frivolous drama, the Examiner's position would be one of extreme difficulty. How would he deal with "Spring Chickens" and "Dear Old Charlies"? He could not, on the one hand, make himself the instrument of a stolid and killjoy Puritanism; but still less, on the other hand, could he do as the Censor now does (with the grateful approval of Mr. Charles Hawtrey), and guarantee "Dear Old Charlie" as wholesome fare for family consumption. On the whole, my personal inclination is towards the more logical course of abolishing all preliminary examination of plays,* while interposing adequate barriers between the manager and irresponsible or fanatical meddling. But if this be considered too adventurous a course, Professor Murray's compromise seems by far the best that has as yet been mooted.

II.—As to Plays taken on Tour.

The points to be secured in the case of plays taken on tour are (1) that the local stage should not be entirely removed (as it practically is at present) from all control or influence on the part of municipal bodies; (2) that they should not be able to exercise that control in an irresponsible, arbitrary, sudden, and unforeseen fashion. The first of these principles, it may be objected, would give to municipal bodies a censorship of their local stage; but this is a playing with terms. Censorship, in its objectionable sense, means the secret suppression or mutilation of a play before it has been acted at all, before it really exists, before performance has given the only true measure of its qualities and its tendencies. But we are here dealing with the right of a municipal body to consider a play which has been publicly acted and criticised, and to determine whether it be desirable that it should be presented within their boundaries. This is a totally different matter from censorship, as it at present exists. If it be held that municipalities ought to have no such power, then the problem is simplified, and we have only to declare that a play which has been licensed by the Examiner of plays, or, if unlicensed, has been performed a stated number of times without legal interference, is for ever immune against local disapproval. That would be a simple provision; but for my part I do not think it would be politic.

Assuming that municipalities should have some control, I suggest these provisions:—

Every play licensed by the Examiner or performed (say) twenty times (in London or elsewhere)* without any action being taken against it, should have a right to a maximum of seven performances in one week in any provincial town, without molestation by the municipality; but the municipality might then prohibit any further performance of the play within its limits, subject to the right of the owner of the play to move each new Town Council for the withdrawal of the prohibition. In the case of unlicensed plays which had not, in their novelty, been performed twenty times (or, in other words, which might conceivably have escaped protest simply by escaping notice) the manager should have to apply to the local authority for a permit. The local authority could take cognisance of the play in whatever way it pleased. In nineteen cases out of twenty the Press notices of its production would be sufficient; and if there was any doubt as to the granting of the permit, the manager should have the right to plead the cause of the play, personally or by deputy. Similarly, if it was proposed to give more than one week's performances of a play in any particular town, notice would have to be given to the local authority, and a permit obtained, otherwise the municipality should have the right summarily to stop the play after its one week was out. A play having had its week of performances, and no notice of prohibition having been given by the municipality, it might be brought back again to that town whenever and as often as the manager thought fit; but at the end of each engagement the municipality should have the power to prohibit any further performances of the play, subject to the limitations above stated. The fact of having produced a play which (after its week) the municipality had prohibited should not of itself militate against the renewal of the lessee's licence; but if a lessee frequently produced plays which fell under the municipal ban, and if there was reason to doubt his good faith in the matter, that would naturally be a point of character to be taken into consideration.

As here stated, these proposals may sound complex and cumbersome; and no doubt they are capable of much amendment. Nevertheless, I cannot but believe that some such arrangement would give local bodies a reasonable and healthy interest in the theatrical life of their locality, without subjecting either lessees or touring managers to arbitrary and unforeseen interferences with their interests. I have stated this scheme as an extension of Professor Murray's; but it would need very little adaptation to fit in with almost any other method of dealing with new plays.

William Archer.

* Except, possibly, in one very limited class of cases. I have suggested elsewhere, and in face of criticism I maintain the suggestion, that managers should be entitled (I do not say compelled) to present to one of the permanent officials of the Foreign Office, before production, any play dealing wholly or in part with foreign relations, and ascertain the view of the Department as to whether any inconveniences would arise from its production, and how those inconveniences might be obviated. The case of "An Englishman's Home" is the only case known to me in which the action of the Lord Chamberlain's office seems to have been positively beneficial; and there is no reason why a manager, desiring guidance in such a case, should not know where to apply for it.

* A new play produced in the provinces should be exactly on the same footing as a new play produced in London,

THE HOUSING AND TOWN-PLANNING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A large number of men and women of all shades of opinion specially interested in the better housing of the working classes are looking forward with some anxiety to what will happen to the Housing and Town Planning Bill, the Committee stages of which will be taken on Monday and Tuesday next. As only two days can be given to the Bill there will be little opportunity for farther detailed consideration of the clauses of the Bill, and it will be extremely difficult to secure amendments strengthening the measure. There are, however, one or two changes of the first importance that ought to be made if the Bill is to effect a real reform, and there is a threatened attack on the most valuable clause of the Bill which should be resisted by all friends of housing reform in Parliament. The most important clause in the Bill is Clause 30, which provides that every house and tenement should be entered in a register containing particulars as to the name of the owner of the site, the owner of the house itself, the size, nature, and sanitary condition of the rooms and yards, together with the number of persons in occupation at the time of making the return or inspection. In other words, it is merely an attempt to ascertain the facts about the houses and let them be known to the owners and to the local authorities and others interested in the health and housing of the people. It is not an inquisition into the lives of the tenants, but a survey of their dwellings and environment. The great Housing Deputation which waited on the late Sir Henry Campbell-bannerman in 1906 pointed out to him through the Bishop of Wakefield and Mr. Harold Shawcross that just as the factory inspection is the basis of administration of the factory laws, so systematic housing inspection must be regarded as the basis of good housing administration. In his reply, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman said:—

> "I was struck with the remark made by Mr. Shawcross as to the contrast between the care we take of the health of a workman when he is in a factory and our neglect of him when he goes to his home, if it is really a home. I think that consideration should be impressed upon the public mind, and I am not sure that a man would not be better who had a good healthy home, even if he had to submit to worse conditions for part of the day in the factory, than if you reversed the process and secured the best sanitary conditions in the factory, whilst leaving him to live and sleep under unhealthy conditions in his home."

The opponents of housing reform recognised that this inspection and registration of dwellings is the most potent weapon against slums, overcrowding, and high rents, and are opposing Clause 30 with the greatest energy and determination, for nothing is more dreaded by them and by reactionary local authorities than that the actual facts should be known and recorded.

They realise that if the facts are duly known, registered, and published, public opinion would be so aroused and maintained as to insist upon proper administration of the housing laws, and to overcome those corrupt, but powerful, influences which too often baulk municipal health committees and place local authorities under the control of the very persons who, with their friends, are responsible for some of the worst housing evils. Unfortunately several of the associations of local authorities have been seduously worked up into opposition to the clause, and in particular those controlled by large urban areas where frightful death rates exist and where there is most need for action. Certain powerful interests have worked on parallel lines with the slum owners and obstructive official elements, who too often dominate the committees and sub-committees to which such questions are referred, and although it has been rare to find local authorities themselves who have had a public discussion on the matter, the resolutions of these committees and sub-committees, meeting in private, have been paraded as the opinion of the local authorities themselves.

In Birmingham, where a public discussion took place, the opposition to Clause 30 was promptly disavowed, and only the most reactionary local authorities—just those whom the clause was intended to stimulate—are taking direct action against it. On the other hand, all the leading housing reformers in the country and all the Housing Reform Associations support the clause strongly, because it will reveal the facts which will supply the "driving force" necessary to educate public opinion and compel local authorities by sheer weight of evidence to devise adequate measures for coping with bad housing conditions.

The Lower House of Convocation has declared in favor of the Register; the Royal Commission of Labor, presided over by the late Duke of Devonshire, made a similar recommendation; the Select Committee on Rural Housing strongly recommended it; and on May 4th and 5th of last year a special conference representative of Local Authorities comprising 10 County Councils, 110 County Boroughs, Municipal Boroughs, and Urban District Councils, and 28 important Associations, including the Co-operative Wholesale Society, the Trades Union Parliamentary Committee, the British Institute of Social Service, the Charity Organisation Society, the Christian Social Union, and a number of Housing Associations in the country, strongly and unanimously approved of the clause.

The ostensible grounds of opposition to the clause are mutually destructive. They are, first, that it is unnecessary, because inspection is already done effectively; and, secondly, that if local authorities are called on to inspect and register, the cost will be too great a burden. It is clear that the alleged cost is grossly exaggerated in any case, because it is true—as alleged—that local authorities already do the work; it is merely a question of writing the register and summarising the results. In Paris the cost for 2,500,000 people is only £2,500 a year. The real answer, however, to objections of cost is that the cost of present ignorance, both as regards its consequences in loss of life, spiritual, mental, and physical, as well as actual money burdens, is infinitely greater than the largest sum that could be mentioned as the cost of obtaining and registering the facts.

There is no reason why the clause should not be modified so as to leave the precise method of keeping the register to the Local Government Board, and there is every reason to urge that the Government should make a special grant towards the cost of the survey, whether it be large or small.

It is, however, important for Members of Parliament and the general public to realise that this clause, which only asks for the facts to be known, is the test of all others as to whether there is to be a reform in housing administration or whether it is to continue to be the sham in the future which it has so largely been in the past. Instead of weakening the Bill, it is hoped that, if time permits, something may be done to strengthen it In the first place it is very desirable to improve Clauses 2 and 59, which deal with the acquisition of land.

In 1900 most of the members of the present Government supported a proposal to enable local authorities to hold land compulsorily acquired for housing purposes when not wanted for immediate use (see Hansard, June, 1900, page 926). Sub-section 3, as at present worded, limits this power of "holding" to land acquired by arrangement. It is desirable to amend the clause by inserting "compulsory or" after the word "land" in Clause 2, Sub-section 3, line 6.

Clause 59 should also be amended, so as to include "any land suitable for working-class dwellings" in the area that may be purchased under a Town Planning Scheme.

The insertion of these words will enable local authorities to buy cheap land on the outskirts of towns, as is done in Germany, in anticipation of future needs, to provide sites for workmen's dwellings. This is extremely important, because, although the suburbs of London and many other large towns are over-built, it is not a suitable type of dwelling for working men. In most cases landowners try to restrict the use of their land for the erection of shops and small villas, with which we are already oversupplied, and which only ruin the speculative builder and the would-be shopkeeper, for the benefit of landlords and mortgagees. Recent figures showing how many of these houses are empty while the working classes are overcrowded, demonstrate this point to the hilt. Cheap money should be secured by amending Clause 3 so as to provide for loans at the lowest market rate of interest at which the Government can themselves borrow. At present the clause only gives the same terms as for small holdings, and provides simply that housing loans should not be treated worse than other loans.

The Public Works Loans Commissioners have practically discouraged housing loans by charging high rates of interest. Ireland has had much better terms than England and Scotland, as will be seen from the following comparison:—

Ireland ... Loans for 68½ years, 3¼ % (including repayments).
England... „ „ 50 „ 3¾ % (not including repayments)

The case of the Savings Bank money should be raised in this relation. The Belgian Government Post Office Savings Bank Department pays 3 per cent. on deposits, and £10,000,000 sterling of this money is lent at 3 per cent. for housing purposes. The British Post Office Savings Bank pays 2½ per cent. on deposits, but Public Housing Loans (see above) are charged at 3¾ per cent. at present, and under the Bill would only be reduced to 3½ under existing conditions of the money market.

The definition of working-class dwellings in Clause 14 is a very bad one, and kills the value of Clauses 14, 15, and 30, because it assumes that in all places with a population less than 50,000, working-class dwellings are, as a rule, let at rents under £16 per annum. As a matter of fact, rents in Chiswick, where the limit is proposed to be under £16, are in reality just as high as in the adjoining borough of Hammersmith, where the limit is put at £40. The substitution of £26 for £16 in sub-section C would substantially meet the difficulty.

Clause 53, which deals with Town Planning, should be modified by deleting the words "land which is in course of development, or is likely to be used for building purposes," and inserting "land or roads within or in the neighborhood of their area."

Under the Bill, Site Planning, but not Town Planning is provided for. A town plan should be provided for the the construction and planning of the main arteries of communication, both of the existing and future area of the town; it should not give any fictitious value to land controlled by it, however, by ear-marking of such land as "likely to be used for building purposes." It should include all land within or in the neighborhood of the area of the town, and should find power to make a general or skeleton plan of roads on the existing area, as well as on future areas, so as to prevent the heavy expense incurred by local authorities for piecemeal widenings, following on a multiplicity of separate Local Government Board inquiries and provisional orders as is the case now.

It is estimated that £15,000,000 has been spent in this manner in London and the large towns during the last ten years, and of this £10,000,000 could have been saved under the proposed amendment, but not under the Bill as it stands.

Should the foregoing amendment be inserted in the Bill it will prove to be a most useful measure of housing reform; but if the Bill is in any way weakened, and if none of these necessary improvements are made, it will be necessary for Parliament at an early opportunity to face the whole problem again, in view of the inevitable failure of such legislation to deal with the root of the evil, especially as regards effective administration.—Yours, &c.,

W. Thompson.

RUSSIAN LIBERALS AND THE TSAR'S VISIT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As I see Mr. A. M. Scott returns to the question of the attitude of Russian Liberals to the Tsar's visit, you might like to hear a little incident bearing on it which happened to us. Talking to a Russian lady at D—— one evening on the balcony, she expressed her great satisfaction at the cordial way we had received the Duma delegates in England, though she said some were much better men than others. I had no means of knowing what her point of view was, but I said that while we had all been pleased to see the members of the Duma, there was great difference of opinion about the Tsar's visit. "Oh, yes," she said, "we saw in the papers that there was a letter to Sir Edward Grey, but we could not find the letter; only we were so glad of it. My husband telegraphed me from Paris that there had been a letter well signed." When I told her that my husband was a member of a committee who had initiated the letter, she became most effusive and declared that if Russians could sign anything safely we should have had thanks signed by hundreds of thousands. The rest of her party subsequently told me that, as Mr. Scott says, Russian Liberals are strongly in favor of the entente, or alliance they call it, with England, and hope much from influence of English Liberals, but that their hearts sank at the reception of the Tsar, and all the Reactionaries, who were against the English alliance, rejoiced at that part of it. But the letter had put matters right. A truly foreign touch was put to this conversation the next evening when my Russian friend suddenly appeared before my husband and me as we were drinking our coffee, and said, "I want to present my daughter"; and a beautiful young lady stepped up and laid before me an enormous bouquet of roses. I was so taken by surprise that I hardly understood what they said, but the letter to Sir Edward Grey appeared to be the main reason for this demonstration. Probably Russian Liberals differ like other Liberals, but this incident shows what some of them think.—Yours, &c.,

A BLOT ON THE "ACT OF UNION."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I was sorrowfully interested to read the able article in your last issue by my friend, Mr. Jabavu, against the color bar in the "Act of Union" for South Africa. Lord Selborne's many speeches in favor of native representation are fresh in one's recollection. And his recent public eulogy at Cape Town of my late husband and of his "just, generous, and statesmanlike policy" towards the native races, &c., had led many of us to expect very different conclusions to be arrived at as to the Bill now before the House of Commons.

Even at this eleventh hour I should like to point out a few facts to show why I strongly uphold the arguments brought forward by Mr. Jabavu in his plea for the cause of his people and of the colored Cape electors.

A few quotations from Lord Selborne will illustrate the subject. On December 27th, 1908, the High Commissioner gives a timely warning to us Europeans, earnestly urging us "not to deny to natives those elementary principles of justice which you have always claimed for yourselves. For then," he continued, "the mills of God will grind slowly both you and your children." In his beautiful address before the Cape University on the 27th of last February these pregnant words occurred: "Direct government by a Parliament of white men is the worst form of government for natives." And he proceeds to say that it "will be sometimes unjust, and often unwise." My study of the native Blue Books during many years on the spot, and my intimate knowledge of the people themselves, and of magistrates, doctors, and missionaries, and their experiences, all lead me to agree with this administrator in these views, as also with his further statement: "That therefore he would create the native franchise, even where it does not exist already." Surely, English legislators have not sufficient information to hand about the aboriginal tribes and of British responsibilities with regard to them, when they approve the color bar by passing the Bill in the House of Commons?

Long before we sought to civilise them, our intelligent and superior native tribes enjoyed an admirable system of responsible government of their own, their councillors, who were the direct representatives of the people, assisting to control and direct the policy of the chiefs. These, as a rule, loyally adhered to the ancient laws, and initiated no new legislation without the advice of the Council. Every village was duly represented at the "Pitso," or national assembly, so that, to quote Mr. Orpen, an old member of the Cape Legislature and an authority on native affairs: "Unless all the members of the organised sections of any tribe, or aggregation of tribes under one rule, had been duly and publicly summoned, nothing that the Chief and Council decided was considered valid and binding."

A study of native government, of their wise legal codes, and their marvellous hygienic, marriage, and social regulations, would lead Liberal men and women the more clearly to discern that this color bar is a blot on the "South African Union."

I have not alluded to the military autocracies, which deserve judicious management and settlement at our hands, the warlike Zulus, crushed and demoralised, their relatives, so to speak, the Matabele people, and we may add those of Swaziland. Is it not the natural duty of conquerors to deal fairly and righteously with the conquered? What a parody on British Christianity our treatment of these tribal people might afford to the infidel!

The virtues of the peace-loving Bantus are too widely known to require advertisement. Many Europeans might do wisely to imitate them. Olive Schreiner depicts them truly as "the makers of our wealth, the great basic rock on which our State is founded—our vast laboring class"; and they belong to a stock "which refuses to die out in contact with our civilisation."

I remember an occasion on which Sir Gordon Sprigg, then Cape Prime Minister, delighted an English nobleman* by describing a great Basuto Pitso, and adding, "I never listened to such eloquent oratory in my life, no, not in the House of Commons."

To lawyers, barristers, and judges our South African natives, including those of a humble station, have afforded a remarkable problem, as it is impossible to make them contradict themselves by any amount of clever cross-questioning.

It is my privilege to look back on many a sunny year of my life, when native Chiefs and Headmen, splendid preachers like the late Rev. Tyo Soga, medical doctors, and other notable men of color took their place as equals at our table. Members of Parliament, Cabinet Ministers, high officials, and eminent English visitors to our shores—to their honor be it spoken—invariably welcomed an invitation to meet them. To all of us who believe in something more noble and divine than the oft-repeated "Equal rights for all civilised people," namely, "Fundamental rights for all human beings," is there not a jarring note in the fine-sounding apology for this "South African Union"? "We are one people, under one King, let us have one Parliament"—the Parliament of a Constitution carefully framed to include only white males. While, within the boundaries of the vast territories to be governed, some five-sixths of the aboriginal inhabitants remain unrepresented.

Behold these dusky millions, and, near them, a pathetic group, composed of the white women of the four united countries. We are clinging to our likewise barred-out children who raise their supplicating little hands towards the unyielding door of the Constitution, while the whole picture pleads the cause of unrepresented humanity, as none save the woman-genius of the new Dominion could paint it—the women "heart-broken," indeed, at "this death-blow to all our hopes." We, these white women, ranking lower in the constitutional scale than the least important of all the excellent colored voters of the Cape of Good Hope!

What marvel if there be those among the melancholy crowd who feelingly recall the poetic fancies of their youth, and faintly murmur in the olden, Tennysonian tones, "Someone has blundered"!—Yours, &c.,

THE REAL JACK CADE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your delightful portrait of Cade as a Budget Protester is surely as beside the mark as the "Spectator's" notion that Cade was a kind of Chancellor of the Exchequer. Both suggestions are grossly unjust to Cade.

In the 14 articles of complaint of the Commons of Kent in 1450, only three related to taxation, and two of these articles were directed against the evil methods of the tax collectors. In the third case the objection was to taxation for the royal revenue going to "other men."

Both the "complaint" and the "requests" of the Commons were directed inter alia against the illegal confiscation of property practised by the King's servants, not against the legal confiscation of the tax collector. Of course, the desire of Cade and the Commons for a change of Ministry may be likened to our Budget Protesters' enthusiasm for the return of Mr. Balfour to office; but there the comparison ends.

The suggestion that the men of Kent "marched to protest against a penal Budget" is monstrous. The judicial and political corruptions of the time of Henry VI. are notorious. Stubbs—no friend to popular risings—admits that Cade "based his complaints and demands on the existence of grievances, political, constitutional, and local, which could not be gainsaid." Ramsay, in his "Lancaster and York," holds that "with Cade's followers the loss of Normandy was a secondary grievance; they wanted administrative reform and a change of Ministry." The old "Chronicle of Henry VI." puts it that "the realm of England had been ruled by untrue counsel, wherefore the common profit was sore hurt and decried."

As for your statement, "Tradition denies the godliness" of Cade, it is not tradition, but the royal warrant for Cade's arrest (issued after the dispersal of the Commons, when the Captain of Kent was a broken man), that is responsible for the stories of Cade having murdered a woman with child, fled to France, and fought against England. I am not aware that a scrap of evidence has ever been produced in justification of these libels. Is it likely the squires and gentry of Kent, Cade's neighbors, would have rallied to a captain guilty of such offences? Certainly Cade (who, after all, may have been a Mortimer, and a kinsman of the Duke of York, as Professor Oman points out) may have been born in Ireland, and it is quite probable he served under the Duke of York in France.

John Payne's letter, in the Paston Letters, was written fifteen years after the rising, when its author had become a somewhat disreputable begging-letter writer. Fastolf, at all events, seems to have lost all confidence in his servant.

It is bad enough to have Cade's memory blackened by the opponents of liberty. It is too bad that THE NATION should add to the misrepresentations and misconceptions which have obscured for centuries the heroism of one of England's greatest democratic leaders. It is more than time that justice was done to Cade's work and character.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH CLAYTON.

SCOTLAND AND THE FINANCE BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Ruskin wrote in 1877—"The organisation of a Parliament, strong enough even to modify the existing methods of land tenure, would be revolution." Such a Parliament has arrived. Will its urgent, equitable, and just land tenure proposals cause revolution? I hae ma doots. It is far more probable that there will be revolution if they are opposed by the House of Lords, and if they are not carried into effect. Quoting from the "Builder," Ruskin wrote: "Five men own one-fourth of Scotland. One duke owns 96,000 acres in Derbyshire, besides vast estates in other parts of England and in Ireland. Another, with estates all over the United Kingdom, has 40,000 acres in Sussex, and 300,000 acres in Scotland. This nobleman's park is fifteen miles in circumference! Another duke has estates which the high-road divides for twenty-three miles! A marquis there is who can ride a hundred miles in a straight line on his own land! There is a duke who owns almost an entire county stretching from sea to sea. An earl draws £200,000 a year from his estates in Lancashire. . . All the lands of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland are owned by less than 60,000 persons, and they say to the 32,000,000 of people 'All this land of Great Britain and Ireland was given to the children of men, and behold we are the Lord's children in possession, and you millions, you go to work.' We must get this land system readjusted, or revolution is bound to come within the lifetime of grave and reverend seniors like you and me. The fact is, Sir, that a majority of the inhabitants of this country are in a state of squalid poverty—living in miserable fever dens, without any of the decencies of life—scarcely ever getting a good meal, and yet they are becoming educated. Cannot others see what this means?

* Lord Ashton, the son of the great Earl of Shaftesbury.

Are the dukes and lords and baronets and squires so blinded by their wealth—the result in too many cases of sacrilege—that they cannot see what is coming? Education and starvation? What will they produce? Why, Sir, as sure as two and two make four, they will bring revolution. . . . The land monopoly is at the bottom of all the pauperism, both that which is recognised and that which is unrecognised."

In 1909, as in 1877, but worse—with an increase of poverty, destitution, unemployment, and seething social revolution. Ruskin thought the only remedy was the steady and irrevocable purchase of the land for the nation by national subscription. The Asquith Liberal Administration is nothing if not bold. They have produced another remedy. Will it be supported by the majority of the voters? Obviously it will. Why? In Fifeshire on the Tay in the north, and on the Forth in the south, land is locked up by landlords and the dead hand. Between Elie and Anstruther, as parts between Newport and Newburgh, it cannot be obtained at any price. "There are too many people on my land already" is the objection of one landlord. His demesne, with a palatial mansion-house in the centre, extends for miles inland and along the seaboard. Feus for building purposes may be obtained at from £16 to £26 per acre. It is not realising £3 per acre as an agricultural subject.

The beautiful estate of Camperdown is partly in and adjacent to Dundee. Lord Camperdown draws thousands of pounds in feu duties and from farms yearly.

The unearned increment in land adjacent to towns in Fifeshire and in Forfarshire has amounted in recent years to tens of thousands of pounds. The landlords grasp all, and the towns that have enhanced their income get not even the turn-over of household necessities. These be the object lessons of almost every county in Scotland. Hence the ever-increasing popularity of the Budget.

An ex-President of the United Irish League in this city was asked "How fares the Finance Bill?" He replied, "It has steadily increased in popularity week by week since its introduction. This is partly owing to its inherent justice, and partly to the speeches of Asquith, Churchill, and Lloyd-George. They have demonstrated that the proposed new taxation is to be raised from rich sources, hitherto untaxed, or inadequately taxed. Generous concessions have shown that the Government wish not to press inequitably upon, or to injure any trade or industry. He believed that the lurid five-chamber posters, illustrated, posted all over the city by the Unionists, and entitled 'Blunder Budget,' would not take a single vote from the Liberal Party at an election."—Yours, &c.,

SUFFRAGETTE TACTICS.

SIR,—There appear to be one or two rich men and women who think that, by hiring others of their sex to throw bricks into public meetings and stones through private windows, they can prove either that rich women should have the vote or that all women should have the vote.

May I be allowed to suggest that the contrary opinion, besides being held by seven-eighths of the nation, is easily defensible, on the ground both of justice and expediency? In considering any political measure you must look to the effects. There are two possible modes of giving women the suffrage. One is to give it to women of property. This would have a similar effect to doubling the plural vote, which most Liberals desire to extinguish. Such a measure sent to the House of Lords might go through, and would be an effectual barrier to further progress. The second mode is to enfranchise all adult women, in which case there would be a majority of women electors in almost every constituency. This would be (1) unjust, because women have no right to declare a war which men must wage, or to introduce conscription, in which only men would serve, and (2) inexpedient, because it would enormously increase the number of incompetent, inefficient, and, therefore, corruptible voters.

Trusting that you will find space for this letter.—Yours, &c.,

MEDIUM TEMPLUM.

London, August, 24th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I indicate one aspect of the controversy on the Suffragette methods which has, I think, been overlooked? It is one of importance. The issue has been narrowed down to the legitimacy of the so-called "militant" tactics of the W.S.P.U. Their keenest critics approve of the aim of the W.S.P.U., approve of their by-election policy, their meetings and journalistic propaganda; they disapprove only of their organised disturbance of public meetings and their essentially feminine, if unladylike, policy of hen-pecks.

Usually the defenders of these "militant" methods admit that they are bad in themselves. They defend them—and even claim pity for their being forced to adopt them—on two grounds; first, that "constitutional" methods have been tried and failed; and, secondly, that the "militant" methods have had conspicuously successful results.

I do not wish to dwell on the first argument. It should, however, be pointed out that "constitutional" methods have not been tried in the sense that "militant" methods have been tried. £50,000 has never been devoted to "constitutional" propaganda in one year. And, in spite of the very limited trial they have been given, "constitutional" methods have not failed. They secured for women the municipal franchise and the right to sit on municipal and county councils and other local authorities.

But what it is important to combat is the other argument—that the "militant" methods are justified by their success. It is simply the old argument: that in politics the end justifies the means; a view, surely, that is the negation of political morality. The methods of an agitation have often a greater influence on a country's history than its results; and this is inevitable, because they have usually a more immediate and direct influence on its public morality—an influence stretching far beyond the limits of the particular agitation and its aims. Violence is necessary sometimes, and then we respect it; when it is necessary it will usually be found that its influence is good, even apart from the results of the agitation which employs it. But the W.S.P.U. have, as yet, neither attempted violence, nor shown that the conditions obtain which justify it. The methods of the politicians who compelled the present Chancellor of the Exchequer to escape from a public meeting in Birmingham in disguise were "justified by success"; they won the General Election of 1900. The methods of the citizen of Manchester—we will call him Smith—who was elected to the City Council on the strength of a poster, "Vote for Smith and no swank," were "justified by success." It is possible that the W.S.P.U.'s method of using any and every means, short of violence, to obstruct and hamper the work of government, may achieve their immediate end, and obtain women the vote by making all votes futile. But everyone who cares for democracy will hope they may fail; not because failure will prove them bad, but because they are in themselves, quite apart from any consideration of failure or success, bad.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY CLAY.

"LOWERING THE FLAG."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In an article entitled "Lowering the Flag" in your current issue, your contributor laments over the evils of political inequality, viz., the restriction of the right to vote for, and to sit in, Parliament.

He describes such inequality as a "flat denial of human rights," he justly sees that those who suffer under it are "under a ban," and bear the "stigma of helotry." He even says that such a system involves not merely inequality, but "subjection" for the disfranchised, for whom, indeed, it "proclaims servitude."

"For the first time the Imperial power withholds the full opportunities of citizenship from British subjects, living under constitutional rule in their own land."

Your contributor writes this of South Africa. Is a woman in the United Kingdom, then, less a British subject than a Kaffir in South Africa?

Women who are under this "ban," who meet here with a "flat denial of human rights," and who have learnt that political "inequality" means "subjection," are likely to sympathise with all who, being excluded from the franchise because of their color, become thereby a "proscribed and disinherited race." (And women are more completely excluded than Kaffirs and colored people are, seeing that these have the Parliamentary vote in Cape Colony.)

But Liberal men who feel as the writer of your article does over a far-off wrong should realise that their own flesh and blood at home are filled with a growing resentment that Liberals do not hasten to remove from them "this stigma of helotry," and to establish for them "equality of opportunity."

"While South Africa has thus required us to swallow our principles"; yes, that is true; but who (women ask) requires you to swallow your principles at home?

We have still faith in Liberalism to believe that if men, as by a vision, could put themselves in women's place, they would sympathise with us even as they do with Kaffirs and Indians, and then there would be no more "lowering the flag" within our own borders.—Yours, &c.,

MARGARET CLARK GILLETT.

Oxford, August 25th, 1909.

THE WOMEN'S WAR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Like Mr. Dowson, I believe your opinion that "it is the still unmoved conviction of probably the majority of the male electors of this country that the women should not be given the vote" to be a mistake. Indeed, in the face of what has happened when the question of the suffrage for women has been voted upon in Parliament it is difficult to understand how such an idea should have entered into any one's head.

Mr. Dowson's figures of those in favor of the suffrage for women at one of the polling stations at the Mid-Derby by-election show, as he points out, 273 out of 420—just under two-thirds majority. There are also the figures for the present House of Commons. The Government have done excellent work in their grant of self-government to the Transvaal and Orange River Colony. They have made a good beginning in making the land more available to the people of this country; they are passing now a Budget acclaimed, not only by Liberals, but by many progressive municipal Conservatives, as an excellent step towards adjusting the burdens of taxation to the backs most capable of bearing them.

These things having been accomplished, let the Government, as Mr. Dowson says, promise to carry out themselves (for they are there for the purpose) the ideas of the British people, as ratified by the two-thirds majority in the Commons, by "putting a clause into the Electoral Reform Bill to remove the disqualification of sex."

If the Government, instead of carrying out the ideas of this large majority of the Commons, give way to the ideas of a minority of the Cabinet, many Liberals like myself who feel most strongly that the very essence of Liberalism, and, indeed, of all truly representative government, is that the majority, not the minority, should rule, will become rapidly out of sympathy with their party with unfortunate results for Liberalism in the future.—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD R. MEADE-KING.

West Derby, Liverpool,

THE RESIGNATION OF THE NEERGAARD CABINET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the last issue of THE NATION there appeared a note, expressing the opinion that the fall of Mr. Neergaard's Cabinet might very likely mean "the end of an ambitious militarist policy in Denmark."

This opinion is, however, hardly correct—for the simple reason that no such policy has really existed. There is in Denmark neither seed nor soil for Chauvinistic sentiments. The thought of making an attack on Germany is under any circumstances out of question. Slesvig may, indeed, be given back to Denmark, when, in time to come, a democratic conscience shall win its way to German politics, and make them try to rectify the deeds of crime and insolence with which the "junker" party has been sullying the old Teutonic geniality, in scorning many laws of justice and of honor; but until such internal change has taken place, the Danish policy will be to wait in hope. Any chance of forcing the events seems inconceivable, just as it is surely inconceivable that there will never come a better day for Europe, when small minorities shall cease to be oppressed—when Finland shall escape the Cossack's knout, and Slesvig be delivered from the mean brutalities of present Prussia.

The Danish population is laboriously bent on peace; its genius is placid; its temper very calm; hardly any other nation is as far removed from entertaining military dreams. That, however, does not mean that they have overlooked the absolute necessity for following, to some extent, the present European craze for armaments. That this is a necessity is no exclusive thought of the Conservatives—it has been taught with equal fervor by the Liberals; they all agree that certain circumstances have of late endangered Denmark; they all consider it imperative that Copenhagen must again be strengthened as a fortress. There are many reasons why the Danes may fear that some misfortune can befall their State; some of these THE NATION has described as "nightmares"—others lie, however, open in the day. All of them, of course, have little value to detached observers, especially to those of foreign nations, but they have some considerable weight with those who have the independence of the Danish State at heart. The fundamental arguments are two: (1) It is impossible to rest assured that there will never be another European war; (2) And it is therefore possible that future fighting may take place in Danish waters. These propositions given, the problem consequently is how to demonstrate—by force if need should be—the strict neutrality of Denmark.

Difficulties have, however, gathered round the matter. Years ago the Parliament appointed a committee to report on national defence. When this report at last appeared, the Conservatives demanded that it should be carried out immediately in its entirety, but Mr. Christensen, the Liberal Premier, insisted on some alterations, insuring, as he said, increased efficiency at less expense. The following discussion soon became, as fate would have it, interrupted by the Alberti incident, and Mr. Christensen was forced to leave the Ministry. Mr. Neergaard, his successor in the Cabinet, urged by the elections, which took place in May, at once decided to propose a compromise. This the Conservatives, although with hesitation, stated they were willing to accept, but Mr. Christensen, as leader of a section of the Liberals, refused to deviate, however slightly, from his old suggestions, and Mr. Neergaard therefore handed in his resignation.

It is here to be observed, however, that there is very little real difference as to the character of the defence: they all desire Copenhagen to be better fortified; they all are willing to increase the fleet. Party feelings have postponed the matter; but the coming ministries, whatever they may be, will have to satisfy this national demand for means of safety.

This patriotic carefulness is scarcely militarism, but, whatever it is, the resignation of the Neergaard Cabinet has altered next to nothing in the state of things.—Yours, &c.,

THE GORRINGE CASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I offer a few comments on the letter from "Leodiensis" you published in your columns last week?

His argument is, that because "Mr. Gorringe was ready to pay, as we have seen, £6,000 a year to the Duke of Westminster, and a further £3,000 in rates to the local authorities, the total annual cost (and value) of the land to Mr. Gorringe was, therefore, £9,000," and from this he concludes that, "it is evident that already the public do take a very large proportion indeed of the value—earned or unearned increment—of the land."

But is his statement of the case correct? Mr. Gorringe was certainly ready to pay £6,000 a year to the Duke of Westminster for the land, but the £3,000 he was ready to pay the local authority was for his share of certain definite services—police, street cleaning and lighting, sewerage and other sanitary services, &c.—as essential, in the main, for the carrying on of his business as the electric light and water he uses.

It seems to me there is a very sharp distinction here. It was not the total annual cost (and value) of the land that was £9,000, but of the land (£6,000) and those essential services (£3,000), and to say that, "But for the demand of the public, through the local authority, it is clear the Duke of Westminster might have insisted on a rental of £9,000" is obviously incorrect.

In that case, of course, the Duke could only have "insisted on a rental of £9,000" on condition that he performed and paid for the services in question himself.

The assumption I have indicated vitiates the whole argument, and, I think, in spite of your acceptance of it in your leading article, "What is Blackmail?" makes the conclusion arrived at worthless.

I can only regard the letter as an ingenious bit of special pleading, all the more effective because of its moderation of tone and air of complete detachment, but none the less unsound, and calculated to convey an entirely false impression.—Yours, &c., JAMES H. ROBERTSON.

ASKING THE WAY.

SIR,—We are staying at present in the country, so we only received our copy of THE NATION by this morning's post. In it we found an article "On Asking the Way," and determined when we went out for a walk that we would not be "suspicious, obstinate, or vain," that we would not "trust entirely to our own reason and such information as may be gleaned from maps"—because, for one thing, we did not intend to "walk twenty miles in the wrong direction in rain, hail, hunger, and bodily exhaustion." We had also read that there is in reality "no human intercourse more innocent or delightful than that engendered by a casual topographical inquiry." We thought we would be free alike from the "hollow artificiality of the drawing-room and the sordid selfishness of the shop," but would be "simple, sincere, and, in the truest sense, democratic."

We read that, according to Bacon, "He that questioneth much, shall learne much, and content much," and "that perhaps there is no readier method of gratifying the intellectual and benevolent impulses, than a habit of continually asking the way."

We wished to test the truth of this, and, so, when we met a typical old countryman upon the road, we "closely pressed him." But—he did not answer, as we had been led to expect: "Ah! so you are bound for Putney," &c. No; it was with silence that he received our "open and convivial question."

"Is this the way to W——?" we asked again, a little more timidly. He gazed upon us kindly—and slowly drew out an ear-trumpet!

Our hopes of the promised delightful "human intercourse" were dashed to the ground, for how can one converse even in "sober pleasantries" with a gentleman who presents an ear-trumpet?

Our conversation consisted only of: "Is this the way to W——?" in ever-increasing shouts, for we did not like to relinquish at once all chance of gratifying our "intellectual and benevolent impulses"; but the man's nature refused to "reveal itself in this chance encounter"—he remained deaf to our questionings, shook his head, but did not even "start, flush darkly, swallow in his throat, and stammer hastily that he was a stranger in these parts"—so we could not be sure that he was a "cheat, a low fellow destructive of the peace," &c.

Are people with ear-trumpets always so unresponsive? Perhaps we were not open and convivial enough—or is there a proper way to address a fellow-man who uses an ear-trumpet? We should have known how to behave to a "Bishop coming out of the Athenæum Club had we wished to go to the Edgware Road," and we had other instances given us too, but such a possibility as an ear-trumpet seems to have been overlooked. And it is certainly true that our "intellectual and benevolent impulses" received a violent shock when our old friend drew his trumpet out.

We should be glad if the author could inform us what is the proper move after such a "check" as this.—Yours, &c.,

"A WOULD-BE HABITUAL TOPOGRAPHICAL ENQUIRER."

"THE WHITE PROPHET."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having read this book with great interest and pleasure, and having been much impressed by the stand which Mr. Hall Caine takes for a more enlightened government in Egypt, I can only conclude, after reading the review published in your yesterday's issue, that THE NATION is as inconsistent as the majority of journals. If one may so express it, your leading articles are written in one spirit, and your reviews in another. I have hitherto looked upon THE NATION as the most advanced of the Liberal organs, and yet when an author advances opinions, in the form of a story, which must commend themselves to you, you are content to allow an average critic to work his sweet will and take the revenge which long experience has led us to expect whenever anything appears from the pen of Hall Caine. I am not a devoted admirer of this popular novelist, but I do like fair play, and I have as yet seen only one other review of "The White Prophet" as ungenerous as that in THE NATION.—Yours, &c.,

WHERE TO GO.

LEAVE the South! O, leave the weary golden shore
Of the Midland Sea,
Where a thousand ships have touched before;
Come away with me
To a place of wide, untravelled waters,
Silvering the leagues of sombre wood,
Where the lake-nymphs and the river-daughters
Dance all night along the shining flood.

Leave the South! for she is mournful with the weight
Of remembered years;
Lapped in ancient splendors, dim and great,
Wrought of time and tears.
For the dark earth that nourishes her flowers
Hardly veils the ever-watchful dead.
The purple vine and cypress in her bowers
Are memories of passion and of dread.

But the North lies all open to the morrow
From the fells to the strand;
Her clear morning wakens, free of sorrow,
On a timeless land.
Dreamily the pines sway in slumber,
Careless is the singing charm
Of the brook, which the grey stones cumber
With a heavy arm.

Till the lake-water ripples to the falling
Of low wings in flight,
And the woodland hears a whispering and calling
Through the brief, golden night.
Lightly, from each rock-cleft and hollow,
Little people of the stones slip forth,
Weaving spells, which the wanderer must follow
On and on, through the glamor of the North.

ROSALIND TRAVERS.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE Johnson bi-centenary celebrations will begin at Lichfield on Wednesday, September 15th, with the opening of a Johnson Memorial Exhibition by Lord Rosebery. On subsequent days there will be lectures, visits to places of interest connected with Johnson and his friends, a performance of Goldsmith's "She Stoops to Conquer," and a special service in the Cathedral. The Johnson Club intend to mark the occasion by a special meeting in London, presided over by the Prior of the Club, Mr. Thomas Seccombe, at which Mr. Augustine Birrell will give an address. In the publishing world the bi-centenary will be celebrated by Mr. A. M. Broadley's volume, "Dr. Johnson and Mrs. Thrale," which contains Mrs. Thrale's unpublished journal of the Welsh tour made by Johnson and the Thrales in 1774, letters of Goldsmith, Boswell, Fanny Burney, Dr. Charles Burney, Arthur Murphy, and others, as well as several other documents bearing on Johnson's career. Mr. Thomas Seccombe has written an introductory chapter, and the book will be issued by Mr. John Lane.

ANOTHER literary celebration fixed for September is the jubilee of the publication of Victor Hugo's epic, "La Légende des Siècles." There are to be performances at the Comédie Française, when several of Hugo's poems will be repeated from the stage, and on Thursday, the 30th, Rodin's statue of the poet will be unveiled, and speeches delivered by M. Doumergue, M. Léon Blémont, President of the Société Victor-Hugo, and M. Gustave Simon.

ARRANGEMENTS have been made for a volume of representative extracts from the writings of the late Father Tyrrell, and the book will be issued shortly by Mr. Mayle, of Hampstead. Father Tyrrell was a master of English style, and many readers who take no interest in religious controversy will welcome the selection.

MR. FRANK HARRIS'S critical work, "The Man Shakespeare and his Tragical Life Story," some particulars of which we gave in January last, is now almost ready, and will be issued by the New Age Press towards the end of next month.

MR. H. G. WELLS, who has removed from Sandgate to Hampstead, thinks of writing a novel which will deal with present-day politics. It is remarkable how few political novels of any distinction have appeared in recent years. Trollope and Disraeli are the two English writers who have excelled in the genre, and though one does not often hear nowadays of Trollope's political novels, they are probably the best in the language.

* * *

ONE of the latest Harmsworth projects is a serial publication, to be called "The World's Great Books," which aims at giving a series of "little pictures" of "all the great works in all departments of literature." Publishers have been asked to permit the inclusion of summarised versions of works still in copyright, the recompense offered to author and publisher being permission to advertise in "The World's Great Books" at a reduced rate. The plan for reducing literature to tabloid form is not, however, meeting with the approval of publishers. We cannot imagine an author who respects himself or his profession having anything to do with this compilation.

MANY new facts in regard to the career of Madame de Maintenon and her relations with Louis XIV., both before and after their marriage, have been brought to light by recent research, so that a biography, "Madame de Maintenon: Her Life and Times," by Mr. C. C. Dyson, which is announced by Mr. John Lane, will probably place her character in a new light, at least for English readers. Mr. Dyson has chosen a good subject, for the career of a woman who, though born in a prison, became the wife of Louis XIV., and who, though the grand-daughter of Agrippa d'Aubigné, approved of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and did more to enforce a rigid Catholicism than any woman of her time, is full of piquant contrasts. Saint-Simon's one-sided portrait has done her memory some injustice. She was a prude and a bigot, but she did good service to education by founding the schools for girls at Reuil, at Noisy, and at Saint-Cyr, and she will always be remembered as one of the most copious and interesting of letter-writers.

EARLY in October Messrs. Methuen will publish a book by Sir Oliver Lodge, bearing the title, "The Survival of Man: A Study in Unrecognised Human Faculty." It gives an account of Sir Oliver Lodge's investigations into matters connected with psychical research during the last quarter of a century, and treats of automatic writing, trance speech, and similar phenomena. The author's conclusion is that there is a basis of ascertained fact for the belief that human beings survive their bodily death.

A BOOK on "French Cathedrals, Monasteries, and Abbeys, and Sacred Sites of France," by Mrs. Elizabeth Pennell, with a large number of illustrations from drawings by Mr. Joseph Pennell, is announced by Mr. Fisher Unwin. The volume is the fruit of twenty years' study of the French cathedral cities on the part of both author and artist, who hold that among the Christian churches of the world the French cathedrals are supreme "in the dignity and grandeur that befits the house of God, in the harmony without which the work of art is not complete, in the human sympathy expressed in its inexhaustible ornament, which appeals to the people, and tempers their awe with love."

MR. WERNER LAURIE has in the press a book called "Spirit and Matter Before the Bar of Modern Science," by Dr. Isaac Heysinger, which brings together the recent conclusions of physical science, psychology, and comparative religions upon the conflict between Materialism and Transcendentalism. Dr. Heysinger holds that every materialistic clue "has been run out, and ended in a cul de sac, from which there is no extrication except through spirit—what Romanes named 'the Spirit of the Universe.'" The same publisher announces "The Quintessence of Nietzsche," a volume of selections and a commentary by Mr. J. M. Kennedy.

"MEN AND MANNERS OF OLD FLORENCE," is the title of a book by Dr. Guido Biagi, the Librarian of the Laurentian and Riccardi Libraries at Florence, which appears on Mr. Unwin's list. It attempts to do for Florence what M. Jusserand and Dr. Jessopp have done for medieval England—to explore the byways of history and show the everyday life of the people.

AMONG novels to be published during September are Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "Open Country," Miss Rosa N. Carey's last novel, "The Key of the Unknown," "Stradella," a story of Venice in the seventeenth century, by the late Mr. Marion Crawford, "Northern Lights," by Sir Gilbert Parker, "The Doom of the Severins," by Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick, "Happiness," by Miss Maud Stepney Rawson, "The First Round" by Mr. A. St. John Lucas, and "The Holy Mountain" by Mr. Stephen Reynolds.

CHESTERTON ON SHAW.*

[By Shaw.]

This book is what everybody expected it to be: the best work of literary art I have yet provoked. It is a fascinating portrait study; and I am proud to have been the painter's model. It is in the great tradition of literary portraiture: it gives not only the figure, but the epoch. It makes the figure interesting and memorable by giving it the greatness and spaciousness of an epoch, and it makes it attractive by giving it the handsomest and friendliest personal qualities of the painter himself

I have been asked whether the portrait resembles me. The question interests me no more than whether Velasquez's Philip was like Philip or Titian's Charles like Charles. No doubt some mean person will presently write a disparaging volume called "The Real Shaw," which will be as true in its way as Mr. Chesterton's book. Perhaps some total stranger to the Irish-British environment may produce a study as unexpected, and as unflattering, as the very interesting picture of Nelson by a Turkish miniaturist which hangs in the National Portrait Gallery. Like all men, I play many parts; and none of them is more or less real than another. To one audience I am the occupier of a house in Adelphi Terrace; to another I am "one of those damned Socialists." A discussion in a club of very young ladies as to whether I could be more appropriately described as an old josser or an old geezer ended in the carrying of an amendment in favor of an old bromide. I am also a soul of infinite worth. I am, in short, not only what I can make of myself, which varies greatly from hour to hour and emergency to no-emergency, but what you can see in me. And the whole difference between an observer of genius and a common man is not a difference in the number of objects they perceive, but in their estimate of the importance of the objects. Put one man into Fleet Street and ask him what he sees there; and he may give you an accurate description of the color of the 'buses, the sex of the horses, the numbers of the motor-cars, the signs of the public-houses, and the complexions and probable ages of the people. Another man, who could not answer a single question on these points, may tell you that what he sees is a Jacob's ladder with angels moving up and down between heaven and earth. Both descriptions are true. The first man, demurring to the other's description, would say that a cabman is not an angel. But the second man, the Jacob's ladder man, would never dream of saying that an angel is not a cabman. Call the taxi a chariot of fire (which it literally is) and the verbal difficulty is half smoothed. But the real difficulty is that the Jacob's ladder man is a man of genius and the other is not; and that difficulty is not to be got over. Mr. Chesterton is the Jacob's ladder man. He perceives that I am an angel; and he is quite right. But he will never convince those who cannot see my wings; and for them his portrait will never be a good likeness. Fortunately lots of other people will take his word for it, and some will rub their eyes and look a little more carefully; so his book will be of signal service to me.

All the same, it is in some respects quite a misleading book, not so much because it is here and there incautious, as because its only distinctively English quality is its fundamental madness. First, as to the incaution. Everything about me which Mr. Chesterton had to divine, he has divined miraculously. But everything that he could have ascertained easily by reading my own plain directions on the bottle, as it were, remains for him a muddled and painful problem solved by a comically wrong guess. Let me give a screaming example. Here is Mr. Chesterton on Major Barbara.

> "Sometimes, especially in his later plays, he [Shaw] allows his clear conviction to spoil even his admirable dialogue, making one side entirely weak, as in an Evangelical tract. I do not know whether in 'Major Barbara' the young Greek professor was supposed to be a fool. As popular tradition (which I trust more than anything else) declared that he is drawn from a real professor of my acquaintance, who is anything but a fool, I should imagine not. But in that case I am all the more mystified by the incredibly weak fight which he makes in the play in answer to the elephantine sophistries of Undershaft. It is really a disgraceful case, and almost the only case in Shaw, of there being no fair fight between the two sides. For instance, the Professor mentions pity. Mr. Undershaft says with melodramatic scorn, 'Pity! the scavenger of the Universe!' Now if any gentleman had said this to me, I should have replied, 'If I permit you to escape from the point by means of metaphors, will you tell me whether you disapprove of scavengers?' Instead of this obvious retort, the miserable Greek professor only says, 'Well then, love,' to which Undershaft replies with unnecessary violence that he won't have the Greek professor's love, to which the obvious answer of course would be, 'How the deuce can you prevent my loving you if I choose to do so?' Instead of this, as far as I remember, that abject Hellenist says nothing at all. I only mention this unfair dialogue, because it marks, I thinks, the recent hardening, for good or evil, of Shaw out of a dramatist into a mere philosopher, and whoever hardens into a philosopher may be hardening into a fanatic."

If the reader will now take down the play and refer to the passages in question, he will discover, with a chuckle, first, that the professor of Greek actually does make the precise retort that Mr. Chesterton says he ought to make, and, second, that "Pity! the scavenger of the Universe!" is a howling misquotation. I do not disapprove of scavengers any more than I disapprove of dentists. But scavenging is only a remedy for dirt, just as dentistry is only a remedy for decaying teeth. He who aims at a clean world and sound jaws aims at the extinction of the scavenger and the dentist. What Undershaft says is, of course, "Pity! the scavenger of misery!" And my retort to Mr. Chesterton is, "If I refuse to permit you to escape from the point by means of misquotation, will you tell me whether you approve of misery?" As to the professor making no fight, he stands up to Undershaft all through so subtly and effectually that Undershaft takes him into partnership at the end of the play. That professor, though I say it that should not, is one of the most delightful characters in modern fiction; and that Mr. Chesterton, who knows the original (evidently not so well as I do), has failed to appreciate him, is nothing less than a public calamity.

Generally speaking, Mr. Chesterton's portrait of me has the limitations of a portrait, which is, perhaps, fortunate in some respects for the original. As a picture, in the least personal and most phenomenal sense, it is very fine indeed. As an account of my doctrine, it is either frankly deficient and uproariously careless or else recalcitrantly and (I repeat) madly wrong. Madly, because it misses the one fact that a sane man should postulate about me—namely, that I am a man, like any other man. And the really amazing thing about this oversight is that Mr. Chesterton is aware of it, and, in a magnificent Bacchic rhapsody, finally excogitates, as proof of my superhumanity or sub-humanity, exactly the reason that would have been given by one of Wellington's private soldiers. This reason is, that I, having enough money in my pocket to purchase unlimited beer, do actually pass by public-house after public-house without going in and drinking my fill. I know no extravagance in literature comparable to this. Teetotallism is, to Mr. Chesterton, a strange and unnatural asceticism forced on men by an inhuman perversion of religion. Beer drinking is to him, when his imagination runs away with him on paper, nothing short of the communion. He sees in every public-house a temple of the true catholic faith; and he tells us that when he comes to one, he enters ostentatiously, throws down all the shields and partitions that make the private bar furtive, and makes libations to the true god and to my confusion. And he will see nothing but "cold extravagance" in my sure prevision of the strict regimen of Contrexeville water and saccharine in which his Bacchic priesthood will presently end. I don't drink beer for two reasons: number one, I don't like it, and therefore have no interest to blind me to the plain facts about it; and, number two, my profession is one that obliges me to keep in critical training, and beer is fatal both to training and criticism. It makes men cheaply happy by destroying their consciences. If I did not know how unsafe it is to conclude that men practise what they preach (Mr. Chesterton doth protest too much, and may be little better than a hypocritical abstainer), I should challenge him to forswear sack and dispute my laurels as a playwright, instead of lazily writing books about me. Is a man to live on my work, and then tell me I was not drunk enough to do it properly? Have I survived the cry of Art for Art's Sake, and War for War's Sake, for which Mr. Chesterton rebukes Whistler and Mr. Rudyard Kipling, to fall a victim to this maddest of all cries: the cry of Beer for Beer's Sake?

* "George Bernard Shaw." By Gilbert K. Chesterton. Lane. 5s. net.

Another insanity of Mr. Chesterton's is his craze for fairy tales. I read every fairy tale I could get hold of when I was a child, and in the normal course took to stodgier literature later on. Mr. Chesterton, I suspect, began with Huxley or George Eliot, and was caught in later life by that phase of the Oscar Wilde movement which Du Maurier satirised in his picture of the aesthetes raving about the beauty of Little Bo-Peep. He must have read Jack the Giant Killer for the first time in the budding vigor of his manhood, and read it as a work of art; for no child ever loses its head over a fairy tale as he lost his over this one. He does not seem to have ever read another, or to remember whether that one was really Jack the Giant Killer or Jack and the Beanstalk. Jack was enough for him; and, ever since, he has preached an insane cult of that particular fairy tale. The result is that he falls foul of me for pointing out that the true hero is not an average Englishman miserably mortifying his natural badness, but a superior human being strenuously gratifying his natural virtue. I illustrated this by our myths, which show the hero triumphing irresistibly because he has a magic sword, an enchanted helmet, a purse of Fortunatus, and a horse beyond all motor-cars. This infuriates Mr. Chesterton. He declares that I shall never be nearer to hell than when I wrote this; and I hope he is right, as I was not in the least scorched. Thinking of Jack and forgetting Siegfried, he declares that all the fairy tales show a little man vanquishing a big one. Now, seriously, nothing can be more horrible than the defeat of the greater by the lesser. Even to see the greater driven to vanquish the lesser by cunning and treachery is not pleasant: it is more endurable to pity Telramund in his helplessness against Lohengrin than to exult in David killing Goliath by what was, by all the rules of the ring, a foul blow. All the stories which represent Jack as killing the giant are mean flatteries of our Jacks and gross and obvious calumnies of our giants. In the great world-significant stories the giants are slain with pitiable certainty by the gods, and not by tailors and hop-o-my-thumbs. There are no consolation prizes for the devil in the book of life. Mr. Chesterton has read only one fairy tale, and that a mean one. I have read them all, and I like the ones in which the hero conquers, not because he is a well-plucked little 'un, but "in this sign."

Mr. Chesterton is, at present, a man of vehement reactions; and, like all reactionists, he usually empties the baby out with the bath. And when he sees me nursing the collection of babies I have saved from all the baths, he cannot believe that I have really emptied out their baths thoroughly. He concludes that I am a Calvinist because I perceive the value and truth of Calvin's conviction that once the man is born it is too late to save him or damn him: you may "educate" him and "form his character" until you are black in the face; he is predestinate, and his soul cannot be changed any more than a silk purse can be changed into a sow's ear. Next moment Mr. Chesterton is himself Calvinistically scorning me for advocating Herbert Spencer's notion of teaching by experience, and asks, with one of his great Thor-hammer strokes, whether a precipice can be taught by experience, to which I reply, in view of the new railway up the Jungfrau, that I should rather think it can. On another page he is protesting that I exaggerate the force of environment, because I proclaimed the staring fact that Christmas is a gluttonous, spendthrift orgie, foisted on us by unfortunate tradesmen who can just make both ends meet by the profits of the Christmas trade. He concludes that, in my joyless Puritan home (oh, my father! oh, my mother!), I never melted lead on "Holi-eve," never hid rings in pancakes, never did all those dreary, silly Christmas things, until human nature rebelled against them and they were swept out of our domestic existence, like the exchanging of birthday presents and the rest of the inculcated tribal superstitions of the kitchen; and he would have me believe that every Christmas he turns his happy home into an imitation of the toy department at Gamage's, and burns a Yule log ordered, regardless of expense, from the Vauxhall ship-knackers. Chesterton, Chesterton, these are not the spontaneous delights of childhood: they are the laborious acquirements of bookish maturity. Christmas means: "Thank God Christ was born only once a year; so let us get drunk and have done with it for another twelve months." I would not give twopence for a Christian who does not commemorate Christ's birth every day and keep sober over it. But I must stop arbitrarily or my review will be longer than the book! For there is endless matter in G. K. C. My last word must be that, gifted as he is, he needs a sane Irishman to look after him. For this portrait essay beginning with the insanity of beer for beer's sake does not stop short of the final far madder lunacy of absurdity for absurdity's sake. I have tried to teach Mr. Chesterton that the will that moves us is dogmatic; that our brain is only the very imperfect instrument by which we devise practical means for fulfilling that will; that logic is our attempt to understand it and to reconcile its apparent contradictions with some intelligible theory of its purpose; and that the man who gives to reason and logic the attributes and authority of the will—the Rationalist—is the most hopeless of fools; and all that I have got into his otherwise very wonderful brain, is that whatever is reasonable and logical is false, and whatever is nonsensical is true. I therefore ask the Editor of THE NATION to open a subscription to send him to Ireland for two years. As I write, with the Kerry coast under my eyes, I can see, breathe, and feel that climate, that weather (changing every twenty minutes more than the stiff, fierce, brain-besotting weather of England can change in a month), which he calls "material and mechanical," mere "mud and mist." His English will, his English hope, he says, are stronger than these mere physical things. Are they? What about the Scotch will, the Yorkshire hope of the Shaws—have they prevailed against that most mystical of all mystical things—the atmosphere of the Island of the Saints? Let Mr. Chesterton try that atmosphere for a while. In ten minutes—no more—he will feel a curious letting down, ending with an Englishman's first taste of common sense. In ten months there will not be an atom of English will or hope anywhere in his ventripotent person. He will eat salmon and Irish stew and drink whisky prosaically, because he will hunger and thirst for food and drink instead of drinking beer poetically because he thirsts for righteousness. And the facts will be firm under his feet, whilst the heavens are open over his head; and his soul will become a torment to him, like the soul of the Wandering Jew, until he has achieved his appointed work, which is not that of speculating as to what I am here for, but of discovering and doing what he himself is here for.

THE DECAY OF THE CHURCH OF ROME.*

THE plain man, Mr. Matthew Arnold's Philistine, though liable to occasional fits of panic as to the supposed designs of the Church of Rome upon his domestic life, regards her in his settled moods as a negligible quantity. For him, Giant Pope is as dead as Giant Pagan; their day is gone. The man of culture views her in another light. He is impressed by her past, by her wide diffusion, by her appeal to the imagination. He does not admit her claims, but he looks at her as a constant product of human nature, at least a relatively permanent part of the order of things. Which of the two estimates is nearer the truth is the question to which Mr. McCabe addresses himself. And he decides in favor of the former: the Philistine is right, the man of culture is wrong.

> "There is no country in Europe in which Roman Catholicism is making progress: in every country it has to admit, by the mouth of its own representatives, very serious losses; and in almost every part of Europe the loss is proportionate to the literary and mental activity of the population."

The apparent progress is accounted for by the migration or movement of nations—the Irish are a conspicuous example. On the whole, Catholicism is in a state of rapid dissolution. During the last half-century the Church has lost 80,000,000—a third part of its adherents; and the educational test gives even more decisive results than the numerical; as education advances, Catholicism decays.

The belief in the permanence of Rome rests on a priori grounds which break down under examination.

* "The Decay of the Church of Rome." By Joseph McCabe. Methuen. 7s. 6d.

> "The Positivist pays Rome the tribute of borrowing what he thinks to be her imperishable forms. The Rationalist is almost always convinced that, in his familiar phrase, the last stage of his war will be the struggle of Rome and Reason. To the former it should be evident that, in sharing Roman forms, he has incurred a share in Rome's decay: and the flaw in the theory of the latter is that its starting-point is false. The Roman Church has more than once warmly rejected the notion that she asks her followers to rebuke reason and stand by faith alone. Her theologians, in fact, denounce as 'Protestantism' the theory that faith is an emotion, and not a deliberate adhesion of the informed judgment."

While the view that the Protestant Churches are temporary shelters only, or occasional protests against abuses that have crept into Catholicism,

> "accords neither with the broad features of religious evolution nor with the facts of religious psychology. Buddhism, Confucianism, Mohammedanism—nay, Christianity itself—had the initial character of a protest or revolt, yet the life-giving motives and the structures endure. In nearly all the great schisms of religious history the virility has passed into the dissenting body."

Few institutions have ever lived to so great an extent on an undeserved reputation as the Church of Rome. A Christian Church, she possesses, if overlaid with much that is not Christian, the substance of Christianity, and numbers among her children many of the most perfect Christians that the world has ever seen. She knows how to use such persons. They are parade figures: behind them stand the men who manipulate the ecclesiastical machine. A St. Francis covers a Brother Elias, a Loyola a Lainez. It is the latter, not the former, who represent the spirit of Rome and do her work. Her political instinct, in the past a strength, has become a weakness; the world has outgrown it. What was genius has degenerated into trickery and intrigue.

> "A day will come when historians will wonder how the Vatican ever acquired a reputation for statesmanship. In the small, momentary ruses of diplomacy it has usually been able to command the services of skilful men, but its whole management of the Latin races has been devoid of any large statesmanship. In spite of its imposing profession of a view that ranges over eternal things, it has lived from decade to decade like an Oriental. . . The Pope of the twentieth century rebukes intellectual advance with peevish references to Antichrist, and meets the social revolt of the workers with the maxims of resignation to the poor and philanthropy to the rich."

Pressed hard by the defection of the Latin races, the original stronghold of Latin Christianity, the Catholic apologist falls back on the progress made in the English-speaking communities, and on the Spanish-American continent, where the Church has called into existence a new world to redress the balance of the old. To what does the argument amount? With regard to the British Empire and the United States, the central fact of the situation is the dispersal of the Irish.

> "This fully accounts for the apparent increase of Catholicism in England, America, and Australia. The millions that have appeared in these lands owning an allegiance to the Vatican owe their existence to no subtle magic, but to a process that is very familiar to the social student—migration. If 1,000,000 Irish Catholics have immigrated into England in the course of the nineteenth century, it can hardly be deemed preternatural that the Catholics of England to-day number 1,250,000; the remarkable thing is that, with the normal growth of population, they do not number 2,000,000 or more. So, in regard to the United States and Australia, the other chief destinations of the Irish emigrants. In 1801 the population of Ireland numbered nearly 5,500,000. As the population of England has quadrupled since that date, we assume the same, at least, for the people of the sister isle. But the actual population of Ireland is 4,458,775; where are the missing 18,000,000? They are the body of the Roman Catholics of the United States and England to-day. Add to them a constant inpouring of French, Italian, and German Catholics: the descendants of the Catholics of 1800; and the converts that have been won from other Churches; the question for the social observer then becomes, not 'Where have the Catholics come from?' but 'Wherever have they gone to?'"

And to the Irish in the West correspond the Poles in the East of Europe. There the numerical strength of the Church, such as it is, is maintained by "the prolific growth of the backward and illiterate races that have been so largely absorbed into the German, Austro-Hungarian, and Russian Empires." With regard to Spanish America, it contains more than a fourth part of the Catholic population of the world.

> "But what a population it is! One third of the 60,000,000 are aborigines or negroes, who very largely elude every test of civilisation. They rise gradually from a state of complete wildness, in which even the most ardent apologist would shrink from recognising Catholicism, to a state of incomplete civilisation in which Catholic doctrines mingle light-heartedly with pagan beliefs and practices. A third more are half castes, with, to a very great extent, a half caste civilisation. Less than one-third are whites, and these whites, apart from certain classes of foreigners, are at a lower cultural level than Spain or Portugal. About 53,000,000 are densely ignorant and illiterate. And of the remainder, the majority of the men are either indifferent or intensely hostile to the Catholic Church."

The chief point in which Mr. McCabe is open to criticism is the extension which he is willing to give to the term Catholic. When he tells us that since the middle of the last century the Church has lost a third part of her members, the question rises, what does membership involve? He does not, of course, mean to say that the 80,000,000 persons in question, or any appreciable part of them, have joined another Church, or even formally seceded from Rome. What he means is that their membership has ceased to be effective.

> "I decline to regard anyone as a Catholic who never goes to mass or Easter communion: or who habitually supports parties that are sternly condemned by or openly hostile to the Church. Where there is obviously neither belief nor obedience to commands, that, on the most familiar Catholic principles, bind under pain of eternal damnation, I do not see how a census declaration that one is a Roman Catholic can be taken seriously. Our experience has been that, in so many instances, such a declaration merely means that one is neither Protestant nor Jew."

The Catholic apologist will argue that indifference, political or religious, is not alienation; and the parallel from the moral province is in his favor. Recent events in France, however, where the "Camelots du Roi" are noisy enough, do not lead us to expect any great results from Catholicism of this negative type, even where its interests and sympathies are enlisted on the side of the Church; while, on the part of the great majority of Frenchmen, what has taken place has been no mere expression of superficial Voltaireianism or of a passing political resentment, but "a cold, judicious, slow, and temperate dismissal of the Church from the life of the nation." Such decisions are not reversed lightly: what is done is done.

What is called in German Schadenfreude—the pleasure taken by base natures in the misfortunes of others—would be on the part of Protestants at once misplaced and unworthy. The Roman Church is undergoing a process of dissolution—"without are fightings, within fears." Her theology is no longer possible, unless a large latitude of interpretation in a symbolic sense be granted; and under Pius X. this has been definitely refused. Yet no other Church or system is ready to replace her: the future of religion in the Latin races, and in general in the Catholic world, is gloomy in the extreme. No wise and good man can do otherwise than deplore this. The interests of religion, under its many and various forms, are one. A Leo XIII. retards, a Pius X. accelerates the inevitable. If it be, as we believe, in the interests of mankind that it should come later rather than sooner, it is desirable that the successor of the reigning Pontiff should be a Leo XIV.

HERESY, AND SOME POETRY.*

From time to time one hears of artistic malcontents who would have poetry do what music is doing nowadays, which is, altering its mode of expression. Of course, music is changing its expression because the content of music is, in some sort, changing; but what these malcontents do not see is that the boundaries of poetic content were long ago extended to such spacious width that it is not humanly possible to extend the imperium of poesy, and consequently, that the mode of proper poetic expression is also, within broad limits, practically fixed. We may liken the two arts to states, and the expression of the arts to government. Poetry is a very ancient state, its antique frontiers thrown out as far as ages of experience show may be congruous to good government; and the mode of government (that is, the art's expression) has long ago adapted itself to the administration and control of all the various peoples and climates within the state. It is unlikely that anything will occur within the borders of the poetic state with which the established poetic government will not be able to cope. But music is a new and upstart state. It is continually throwing out new and more ambitious frontiers; and therefore the state government (the expression of music) has to be continually altered to meet the requirements of the new provinces that are from time to time absorbed. Strauss and Debussy, for instance, are not insurgents against the constitution; rather they are viceroys ruling, with provisional powers, recent additions to the empire of music. But we may justly accuse a poet of mere rebellion and treason if, while abiding within the old boundaries, he defies the constituted, but extremely elastic, government of his state. Not such were Browning and Whitman; they were rather eccentric, but quite law-abiding citizens. Such, however, is Mr. Ezra Pound. He has mistaken insurgence for strength, treason for originality. Not having anything particularly new to say (it is none the worse for that), he yet seeks to be unusual through a strange method of expression. By this we do not only mean queer tricks of metre and diction; poetry easily allows such eccentricities. Mr. Ezra Pound gives us plenty of them; some are successful and pleasant, others irritating and foolish. One may tolerate such Chaucerian words in modern verse as "swevyn" for "dream," and "everychone" for "everyone." But "ellum" for "elm," in a poem written not in dialect, and "mine fashion" for "my fashion," are merely silly; and to address Phoebus Apollo as "'Pollo Phoibee, old tin pan, you," is not humorous, but ludicrous. Such matters some modern critical opinion holds to be insignificant, though they are greatly important really; but they are not Mr. Pound's gravest offences. And we could forgive his habit of beginning a poem in the middle, and his uses of German, French, and Italian words. The grave error that Mr. Pound commits lies in the initial shaping and conduct of his thought. From the beginning he will not, or cannot, manage his thought according to the high and nameless, but rigorous, logic of poetry. Poetry does not consist in a fine clothing of words; the words must clothe, not only a spirit, but a spiritual shape. A mere gusty wind of spirit will not do for poetry; it must be a spirit with formed lineaments and stature, a spirit with at least the shape of divinity. Except in a few cases where he is following Romance models, one finds no such spirit wearing Mr. Pound's words; they are but carried on unruly tempests of thought or emotion. We dare say Mr. Pound finds these poems of his full of subtleties and allurement, for he knows, no doubt, what meaning runs through them. But for most others many of them will seem, we fear, only abrupt, discontinuous and meaningless exclamations, rather trying to patience. One sometimes detects vigorous poetic phrasing in his work, and the ring of heroic thought, as in the "Ballad for Gloom":—

> "I have loved my God as a child at heart
> That seeketh deep bosoms for rest,
> I have loved my God as maid to man
> But, lo, this thing is best:
> To love your God as a gallant foe that plays behind the veil,
> To meet your God as the night winds meet beyond Arcturus' pale."

Mr. Pound very properly objects to the "crepuscular spirit in modern poetry," and would be the cock that "scatters the rear of darkness thin," as he says, rather finely:—

> "Great God, if we be damn'd to be not men, but only dreams, > Then let us be such dreams the world will tremble at."

Certainly, Mr. Pound makes a lively din; and it is because it is lively, and not mechanical, that we have criticised it at some length. There are admirable qualities in his work, but not the supreme quality; like the cock's, Mr. Pound's din lacks measure. Were that present, he would be one of the most notable poets of our time.

There are no doubt those who would commend Mr. Pound for breaking away from the "holy habit" of poetic thought; in these free days, they will think, it is a hardship that the manner of poetic expression should be fixed and determinate, even though the bounds of that manner be so large that for those who understand its necessary limitings its service is perfect freedom. Such persons might do a good deal worse than read Mr. Darrell Figgis's "Vision of Life." Mr. Figgis's poetry is not at all conventional, or even orthodox; it is new and original. Yet it is quite good poetry, implicitly obeying the code of poetic law. Beneath all its complexity and elaborate decoration, the rigorous poetic conduct of thought is there, hard and firm. The chief poem in the book is that which gives it its title, "A Vision of Life," which is a sort of ode of enormous dimensions. It deals with the old conflict between pleasure and duty, and deals with it by means of elaborate music and spacious imagery. But the poem, on the whole, is top heavy; its complex superstructure is built upon only a small foundation of thought. It is, in fact, much ado about little; but the ado, if sometimes it becomes rather like a pother, is a fine and exhilarating one. Mr. Figgis sometimes uses far-fetched diction, and his sentences are full of involution, put there, apparently, for the sake of involution. The rhymes also are often so far apart that they do not, as a physiologist would say, function. Nevertheless the poem is so vigorous, so "full of pomp and gold," that it is very far from being negligible. Here, as a sample, is the first sinister appearance of Duty:—

> "So, as I glowered upon its portals, wan,
> Gaunt, lofty, lifting up a parlous height
> Of shadowy phantasy, before its brink
> Palely the air shivered, and its atoms shone
> Pregnant with waking light.
> Unknowing what its purport, what to think
> Scarce dared I hazard—gazing, smote to trance,
> Riveted there with every thought and glance.
> The pallid atoms, hither-thither mazed,
> Smitten with iridescent rigors, shaped
> As to an outline—gaunt and leanly draped
> With flowing vesture, bony arms upraised
> Talon-befingered. Its Visage all was wan,
> Harrowed and sexless, like some skeleton
> Draped o'er with lifeless skin."

The shorter poems in Mr. Figgis's volume are more ordinary, the mood in them much less intense, than in "A Vision of Life."

Mr. John Marjoram, aiming at less portentous themes, achieves a more obvious success. He seems content to enclose beauty and emotion in his art; and that is enough for poetry. The "Fantasy of the Sick-Bed," in his new poems, is a quite exquisite piece of writing, full of delicate metrical and verbal effects and charming portraits of Nature. These are qualities that appear in the shorter poems also. Mr. Marjoram is an indubitable artist in words, and though the title of the poems we have mentioned might lead one to suspect it, there is not the slightest decadence in his poetry.

Here is one of the dream-pictures that visit the sick man in the "Fantasy"—a very pleasant piece of delirium:

> "Beyond the wood is the seaward hill
> Covered with gorse . . . My heart stands still
> At the scent, and I walk—as if afraid.
> For the lane leads past the hill to the shore
> Whence she comes, whom I long to meet . . .
> And come she must; I am certain now
> It shall be, though I know not why or how.
> Here at the edge of the young green wheat
> I will wait to watch how the squirrel spies;
> How Zephyr wanders up and down.
> Shaking new odors from her looped gown—
> Till every living being feels the sweet
> Spring juices in it rise,
> And thistledown flies—
> And a young lamb cries
> And pushes to pass the hurdle;
> And the sound of a footstep haunting by me."

Another poem, "Afternoon Tea," is a bold attempt to portray the senseless drivel of polite society, concealing a burning elemental passion underneath it; and the contrast is managed with great skill. But there is admirable poetry throughout the whole book.

There is a very evident difference in the motives underlying Mr. Marjoram's "Fantasy of the Sick-Bed" and Mr. Young's "Wind and Hill." It would be easy to say, of course, that Mr. Marjoram takes us into a darkened room and Mr. Young into mountain air; but that would not be a just contrast, since, as we have remarked, Mr. Marjoram is in no way sickly or feverish in his poetry. We can, however, fairly put it something in this way: Mr. Marjoram, one may safely assume, writes poetry because that is the main desire of his life, whereas Mr. Young has been moved to express himself in verse because he feels that nothing else will fit the delight and invigoration of "corporal toil," and his communion with > "the chief things of the ancient mountains,

> And the precious things of the lasting hills."

Mr. Young is a mountaineer; and surely no pastime or business should be more provocative of poetry than mountaineering. It has, however, mostly been left for poets who never tackled a chimney or a traverse in their lives to sing the emotional meaning of mountains, poets like Coleridge, Wordsworth, or Shelley. Obviously, if a mountaineer could be vocal, he would have enormous advantages over such theorists. He would not only be uplifted by the mountainous grandeur of appearance, by the feeling that Mont Blanc has a voice which can "repeal large codes of fraud and woe"; but also by the recollection of experienced difficulties, physical danger, and triumphant effort. And in Mr. Young we have a vocal mountaineer; and certainly by far the best poems in "Wind and Hill" are those which contain his personal adventures, physical and spiritual, among mountains. He takes us up into lonely peaks, and shows us that hills are something more than "earth set a little higher above the face of earth," but are, as it were, persons, distinctive members of the world of being. In Mr. Young's poems we feel the silent frosts of the heights, the mountain winds and rivers, the majesty of sheer bulk, and glaciers "glorious as the Gates of Heaven beneath the keen, full moon." And we feel also the triumph of will over the fear of precipitous height, the ascending struggle of sinew and nerve against the body's weight; we

> "Tighten the muscle, feel the strong blood glow,
> And set the foot upon the utmost crest."

And for the mild, home-keeping reader of poetry, to mountaineer thus by proxy is a very exhilarating experience; for Mr. Young can not only command mountains, but also those more risky, more treacherous things, words.

MR. WISE ON AUSTRALIA.*

The publishers of this book are to be congratulated upon their choice of a writer. Educated in England, distinguished in Australia, both in the legal profession and in public life, Mr. Wise brings to bear upon his task exactly the training and experience that are wanted. He knows most of what there is to know of Australia: and he knows how that knowledge should be arranged so as to appeal to English readers. One meets in every chapter a practical acquaintance with life in more than one division of the Empire. There is an almost entire absence of colonial provincialism. A long and even brilliant career in New South Wales has not blinded the author to the features and claims of other Australian States. He writes as broadly as might have been expected from one of the leaders in the fight for Australian federation. Indeed, the volume might be entitled "The Australian Commonwealth, by one of its Founders." He is free, too, from the partisan bias which so often detracts from the value of a politician's review of affairs and institutions with which he has been in close personal contact. Beyond a modest expression of hope that his name may be remembered as one of those who labored in the building of the Commonwealth, Mr. Wise scarcely refers to his distinguished public career. His eulogy of the abler Australian politicians, Griffiths, Deakin, Gillies, Parkes, Inglis Clarke, Kingston, Graham Berry, and others, and his spirited defence of the efficiency and honesty of colonial Parliaments, are quite untainted with egotism.

The descriptive sketching of the earlier chapters is brightly, yet carefully, done. Though admitting that tropical Australia—one-third of the continent—will, for the present, have to lie almost fallow, Mr. Wise takes a patriotically roseate view of the future of his country. He reproduces a map which appears to show that, after making a fair allowance for the impossible central desert, Australia's fertile and, more or less, well-watered fringe equals the area of Europe outside Russia. To the present writer that estimate seems economically much too high. But even a cautious prophet might put the area of habitable Australia—habitable, that is, by white women and children—as equal to the superficial extent of France, Spain, Italy, and what used to be called the Barbary States. The day may come when Australia, with the aid of intensive culture near the coast, artesian wells, and irrigation in the interior, and medical science in the tropics, may support in comfort eighty millions of highly-civilised whites. Such a destiny is great enough to justify patriotic dreams and to excuse a good deal of that Australian assertiveness which is hinted at, though palliated, by our author.

The industrial and social chapters of the volume are, as a matter of course, well done. The former are packed with information, the latter are readable and correct. The main vice of the people, which is not drink, indolence, corruption, or proneness to predatory legislation—as certain critics have been silly enough to suggest—but gambling, especially over horse races, is candidly admitted and condemned. Twenty-five years' experience at the Sydney bar (during six of which he was Attorney-General) give weight to Mr. Wise's words when he says that nine-tenths of the embezzlements, forgeries, and breaches of trust which come before Australian courts are due to horse racing and its concomitants. One of the strangest parts of the racing mania is that the colonial public is far too intelligent not to be fully aware that dishonesty is rife among jockeys, trainers, and even horse-owners. But gambling in more or less modified form seems to have a peculiar temptation for the sanguine dweller in Australian sunshine. Industrious, honest, in many ways self-denying the Antipodean usually is, but speculate he must; at any rate, a very common type of him must. Has this anything to do with the prominence of gold and silver mining and the unsettling fluctuations of seasons and the prices of such staple products as wool and meat?

It is, however, the political portion of the book which lends it its chief interest. We turn to a survey of the constitution and Parliamentary life and find it admirably done. The writer has hit the happy medium between ignoring the personal roughness and occasional coarseness and brutality which deface the life referred to and attaching too much weight to these important, but not quite essential, defects. The politicians may be blatant, vulgar, and sometimes bitterly personal. But, after all, they are, as a class, neither inept nor corrupt. They are professionals, paid servants of the State, who, on the whole, earn their wages honestly and do their work creditably. Oddly enough, the most economically dangerous class amongst them are often the quietest and most decent-spoken. These are the "roads and bridges men," country members, often rather conservative in theory, often fiercely anti-Labor, but whose value to their constituents is apt to be expressed in terms of the public expenditure in their districts. To the Labor Party Mr. Wise is just; and his defence of the White Australia policy is pithy and accurate. Nothing seems able to convince the English Press that the entire working-class of Australia is not doggedly and blindly opposed to all immigration—white as well as colored. On few colonial subjects has more nonsense been written in London, not seldom by Australians themselves. The truth is that the exclusion of Asiatics from the Commonwealth is a political as well as an economic question in which an overwhelming majority of the colonial middle-class sympathises with the manual workers. The success of the sugar fields after the expulsion of Kanaka labor may be bracketed with the boom on the Rand which has succeeded the repatriation of the Chinese coolies. Both together have spelt a signal rebuff to the Jingo Imperialism which proposed to develop the British Empire by semi-servile labor recruited without compunction in the cheapest markets.

Space does not permit more than the briefest reference to a compact summary of the all-important land question, and a temperate vindication of the much-discussed labor laws. In particular may be noted Mr. Wise's exposition of industrial arbitration, which has done, and is still doing, good work in Australia, though it has scarcely met there with the remarkable success and almost complete acceptance which it has achieved, and at this moment commands, in New Zealand. In New South Wales, however, as Mr. Wise justly claims, public opinion prevented a hostile Government from abolishing the principle in 1908; and in Western Australia it appears firmly established.

One defect the book has, more serious than the repellant all-red hue of its exterior. It has not been at all carefully read before being sent to the printer. We do not refer merely to such slips as "leave" for "lease," and "Sir Thomas McKurack" for "Sir Thomas McIlwraith." The otherwise capital exposure of the myth of the Six Hatters is turned topsy-turvy by the omission of a negative. Elsewhere nonsense is made of an estimate of Australia's indebtedness to foreign creditors by printing £5,000,000 as £500,000. Worse still, this misprint is accepted and taken in a calculation lower in the page. Errors of this kind are the more to be regretted in what is, on the whole, a sound, workmanlike, and serviceable book.

FRENCH POETRY.*

Mr. Eccles has produced a book which will delight those who care for French poetry and will also lead many who at present remain upon its threshold to enter one of the pleasantest chambers in the palace of literature. To compile an anthology is, with all its appearance of ease, one of the most exacting tasks which the critic can set himself. Taste, feeling, knowledge, and a ripened judgment are a few of the qualities it demands. But of equal importance with these, for its absence will make them all nugatory, is a severity, even a ruthlessness, in excluding all that is not really excellent "To keep the mean between the two extremes of too much stiffness in refusing and too much easiness in admitting" is a principle that worked admirably in compiling the Book of Common Prayer. It would be disastrous in an anthology; for there, more than anywhere else, "le bon est l'ennemi du mieux."

In his preface Mr. Eccles explains that though his volume contains what is in his judgment "a fair proportion of the very finest French verse written in this century," it also includes "much else of interest coming far short of that superlative." His plan has been "to cull among the works of some forty poets—not necessarily all the best, but each representing a phase in the later poetical development of France—such examples as should convey a just notion of their peculiar qualities and of their range." We find, accordingly, that, although there is little in the book that does not deserve a place, there are absences which we regret. Thus of Musset's immortal "Nuits" only "La Nuit de Décembre" is given, and though there are twenty-two poems by Victor Hugo, these do not include the "Tristesse d'Olympio," nor that exquisite lyric beginning "Puisque j'ai mis ma lèvre," which is to be found in "Les Chants du Crépuscule." Again, among the selections from living poets we miss M. Verhaeren's grim pictures of London, and we hardly think that M. Henri de Régnier is represented at his best in the four poems which Mr. Eccles has chosen. We would suggest that the lines beginning "J'ai cru voir Ma tristesse debout sous les saules" are at once on a higher level and more characteristic of the poet than any of the four in Mr. Eccles's volume. But no two people will agree regarding any volume of selections. We have each our favorite poets and our favorite verses which please us for reasons personal to ourselves. If the compiler of an anthology keeps his own bias subordinate to the principles that should guide his choice we have little ground for complaint, and there is so much of the pure gold of literature in what Mr. Eccles has given us that to reproach him for this or that omission would both be churlish and betray a misunderstanding of his purpose.

For his book is something more than an anthology. It is a helpful and attractive introduction to the study of modern French poetry. Each poet is introduced by a biographical and critical notice, and it is this portion of his work which must have cost Mr. Eccles the most pains and in which he is most successful. These notices are models of what such introductions ought to be. They are short, but they are also satisfying. They are written with enough independence of outlook to give freshness to what their author has to say, though at the same time he keeps clear of the cardinal vice of the latter-day critic and never uses his subject as a vehicle for the display of his own cleverness. Except for some looseness in the texture of the style and a tendency to overload the sentences, we should have equal praise for the "Essay on the Development of French Poetry" with which the volume opens. Its main thesis is to prove the existence of "a continuous and venerable French tradition in poetry," and in his estimates of the various schools and of the forces that called them into being Mr. Eccles gives evidence of a fine critical perception. As examples of his skill in setting forth the literary ideals of very divergent epochs, and the moulds into which their activity ran, we quote the following passages:—

> "The admirable poetry made in the Great King's reign supposed the rigorous distinction of mind from matter, and dealt exclusively with mind; its paramount concern being the conflict of passions, reason or discernment, and free will in the social man. It sought to represent human truth purged of its accidents; and, instead of the ideal figure summing and lighting up the movement of the Sixteenth Century, that creature of diverse aptitudes, mobile temperament, and unprejudiced curiosity called the complete or universal man, it substituted, as the arbiter of its tone and language and interests, l'honnête homme—the cultivated man of the world, who made the study of his fellow-men (or more narrowly of his equals) the occupation of a stately leisure, whose talk was mainly a ventilation of ideas, a gleaning of maxims, a definition of types, and whose abhorrence of obtruded personality, intolerant of strangeness, mystery and emphasis in speech, proscribed the learned and the trivial jargons, terms of art, and all that smacked of a function or a hobby or a trade.
> "L'honnête homme sublimated—such was the poet of those spacious days, one who eliminated both autobiography and the exaltation of unconscious nature from his matter, whose characteristic tone was neither introspective nor ecstatic, but observant, conversible, even declamatory, and whose predilection for the general, the human, and the durable, shaped a speech already rich in rational elements and, if anything, deficient in the sensuous; for he held the understanding supreme, the common measure of sensations, and was persuaded that we become articulate only by becoming a little less ourselves. And so he renounced the elegiac solace of intimate avowals, the direct appeal from sense to sense and from mood to mood, the notation of fluid dreams, the hoarse eloquence of a dishevelled frenzy."

And, after a deserved tribute to what the Romantic poets have achieved for French poetry, this is his summary of their demerits:—

> "The great militant generation of poets had brandished the notion of beauty self-justified in the faces of their elders, and had given some examples of an indestructible and flawless excellence; but, in general, they had seemed to prefer adventure, character, vitality, to that perfection in which form and matter are one. They measured success by the intensity rather than the quality of the emotions they excited. They had nursed the idea of inspiration as a state of passive receptivity; but they had too often mistaken the craving to project an ideal personality for an imperious visitation of the muse. They had trusted in their own exuberance, and, disdaining to know, had asked of time and space nothing more than an incitement, a background, an embroidery."

Mr. Eccles's book ends with a short discussion of the principles of French prosody. He is of opinion "that nothing accounts so well for the poor reputation of French poetry in England as the assumption that (unlike the Greek and Latin) it can be approached and appreciated without the most distant notions of its prosody." We are afraid that there is a deeper cause than this. Englishmen who care for poetry value it above all for its power of suggestion, its capacity for carrying the reader to the brink of some mystic world and giving him at least the feeling of having peered into the au-delà. Though these are to be found in several modern French poets—Verlaine above all—they do not constitute the strength of French poetry. Its qualities are very different, and the great merit of Mr. Eccles's book is that it sets the English reader on the road to their enjoyment.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON, W.

dicts the oft-heard statement that no book about theatrical people succeeds, although it does not, indeed, confute a companion statement that no book about theatrical people permanently attracts the public. In any case, we have now in one volume the contents of the earlier two, with much added matter, issued under the title of "The Bancrofts: Recollections of Sixty Years." Here, certainly, is no lasting contribution to literature. The most that can be said is that with it the confirmed playgoer may wile away an hour or two. Sir Squire and Lady Bancroft are popular people in the life of to-day, and the interest in them continues. That it should extend to a capacity for reading about every play in which they have acted together is surprising. It is still more astonishing that any one can enjoy the old time newspaper praise of their work. One half of this book belongs to a bygone period, the pre-Ibsen age, when what our authors call the "picturesque pen" of Mr. Clement Scott was taken seriously, and Robertson's comedies were believed to thrill with life.

The value of this book lies in such light as it throws upon the development of stagecraft, and upon the possibilities of the stage as a career for man or woman. Lady Bancroft took the Prince of Wales' Theatre upon a loan of a thousand pounds, which was repaid within two years. Here, and later at the Haymarket, she and her husband would seem to have acquired a fortune, although they raised the salaries of actors, and gave to the stage the suggestion of costly realism in dress and scenery which it wears to-day. As an example of the profits, take those of "School" in 1880, which from May to August exceeded £10,000; as an instance of salaries take George Honey, who as "Eccles" received £60 per week. As an example of the reform of dress on the stage, we have Mrs. Bancroft's shocking confession that before her régime she had seen a leading lady at the Haymarket theatre end one act in a dinner dress, and pay a morning call in the next act wearing the same garments. The Bancrofts changed all this, and changed still more completely the method of mounting plays. They carried their realism so far as to have copies of some of the portraits at the Garrick Club reproduced for "Peg Woffington," while they carefully copied the garret presented in Hogarth's "Distressed Poet." The stories are good, even those that one has heard before. There is the tale of H. J. Byron, who, when lodging in a country town, complained to the landlady in the morning that he had been attacked by fleas. "Fleas, sir; no, sir! I am sure there is not a single flea in my house." "I am sure of it too," Byron replied, "they are all married and have large families." We like the story of Terriss rehearsing the duel in the "Corsican Brothers" with Irving, and saying, "Don't you think, governor, a few rays from the moon might fall on me? Nature, at least, is impartial." There is an anecdote in the same genre of Macready, acting as Hamlet, and telling one of his subordinates, who took the part of the King, in a whisper, to "die further up the stage." Whereupon the stricken monarch sat bolt upright on the stage, and retorted, "I guess, Mr. Macready, you had your way at rehearsal; but I am King now, and I shall die where I please."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. E. Dillon's handsome volume on "Rubens" (Methuen, 25s. net) has several conspicuous merits, not the least of which is that the account it gives of the great Fleming's diplomatic career is unusually complete. Very few modern writers have troubled themselves with this phase of Rubens's activity, the result being that the most hazy notions prevail in regard to the character of the negotiations that he undertook with a view to making peace between the Crowns of Spain and England; Mr. Dillon lifts the veil to a great extent by his careful study of the international politics of the time, and shows that the artist-ambassador was (1) the servant of Isabella, Archduchess of the Spanish Netherlands, rather than of King Philip, and that (2) he was never entrusted with plenary powers—a fact that doubtless accounts for the inconclusive, not to say inglorious, ending to his efforts in the cause of peace. His position, in fact, was exactly the same as that of Balthazar Gerbier on the English side. Both men were agents, not ambassadors; both were liable to be repudiated in event of misfortune. The chief difference between them was one of character, not of political position, for Rubens's probity was beyond question, while that of Gerbier was not. In view, indeed, of the latter's want of principle, the friendship that existed ostensibly between the two men is one of the inexplicable things in history. When Mr. Dillon comes to Rubens's art career—which he keeps severely distinct from the rest—he is obviously oppressed by the thought of the multitude of books on Rubens that have gone before, and his writing is distinguished by careful summarising of facts rather than great critical insight. Yet if he adds little to the existing bulk of constructive criticism, he at least deserves our gratitude for eliminating most of the untrustworthy data and theories with which popular guides and handbooks are filled to suffocation. We have a memory of being informed, for instance, by an Antwerp guide that the two women in the left hand corner of the "Descent from the Cross" represented Isabella Brant and Helena Fourment, notwithstanding the fact that the latter was unborn when the picture was painted, and this statement and the legend that the "Assumption" in Antwerp Cathedral was finished in sixteen days are typical of a kind that Mr. Dillon wisely leaves alone. We cannot quite follow him when, in dealing with Rubens's pleasure in scenes of torture and physical distress, he traces this to "some obscure psychological working of the artist's brain" in regard to religious conceptions, and compares this "orgiastic spirit" to that which at the same period prevailed "in the treatment of subjects taken from profane history and domestic life." The piling-up of horrors was a notable characteristic of Flemish painting, religious as well as secular, before and during this period, and even Rubens could not have been wholly unaffected by his milieu. The absence of any reference to Gasper De Crayer, whose artistic sympathy with Rubens is very emphatic, is somewhat curious in a book treating as comprehensively as this does of the master and his contemporaries. Nevertheless the work is an essentially just survey of Rubens's life and art, and the author has succeeded admirably in his self-imposed task of avoiding mere repetition; while the 484 full-page reproductions of pictures alone suffice to render it a colossal achievement in illustrated biography.

"The City of Jerusalem" (Murray, 12s. net) is the third large book which has appeared within two years upon the history and topography of Jerusalem. Colonel C. R. Conder ranks Professor Smith's great history and Mr. Merrill's monograph among the "controversial works" in his bibliography, alongside of Buhl's "Geographie des Alten Palästina." This is odd enough. His own work covers a wider scope than theirs, since he traces the story of the city down to modern times, but it is equally controversial, in the sense that any book must be which deals with scores of disputed archæological and geographical topics. If Colonel Conder's pages appear less controversial, it is because he generally takes his own line, leaving the reader to infer that there is, or can be, little room for any difference of opinion. Such self-restraint is inevitable in the case of a volume which essays to deal succinctly with an extremely intricate subject. But anyone who is even moderately acquainted with the problems will hesitate to believe that matters are quite so settled as these pages would occasionally suggest. Monumental evidence has its own value, but the literary criticism of ancient documents is not to be set aside in the easy-going fashion advocated by our author, and Josephus will not be accepted by experts as a final court of appeal, in spite of the sarcastic plea that "his knowledge of Jerusalem topography was personal and contemporary, and he is more likely to have known the facts than any scholar writing in the west of Europe or in America to-day." Colonel Conder's book, however, may be read with considerable profit and interest. He has done honorable service in the exploration of Jerusalem. He is under no illusions about the character of most of the traditions. As he puts it, we cannot feel sure we are standing on the very ground trodden by Jesus, unless we have the bare rock of Jerusalem as the surface. The traditions of the pilgrims have to be received with great caution, while, even with regard to the Holy Sepulchre, we must say of our Lord, as it was said of Moses, "No man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day." Colonel Conder has honestly endeavored to furnish his readers with a comprehensive outline of the archæological discoveries in Jerusalem, as well as of the successive transformations which the city has undergone since the days when David made it his capital. Seventeen maps and illustrations help to elucidate the text; among them is a convenient photograph of Miss Luthoit's model of the Herodian temple. The book is clearly printed, and, although the literature on Jerusalem is assuming formidable proportions even in English, there is certainly a niche for a volume of this kind, which collects the fruit of wide research in a form both accessible and interesting to the general reader. For the most part his pages are the matter-of-fact chronicle of a city's romance. But once or twice he pauses to let us see the color and genius of the city through the eyes of a trained observer who has lived and worked within its walls.

Miss Alice D. Greenwood's "Lives of the Hanoverian Queens of England" (Bell, 10s. 6d. net), is intended to supplement Miss Strickland's "Lives of the Queens of England." Miss Strickland did not include the Hanoverian queens in her work on the ground that materials for an impartial history were not available when she wrote. Her successor's first volume contains two biographies—those of Sophia Dorothea of Celle and Caroline of Ansbach. Although Sophia Dorothea was divorced by George I. before he became king and has thus no claim to rank as a Queen of England, Miss Greenwood was, we think, justified in including her in the volume "partly for the sake of completeness, partly as the ancestress of the royal house, and partly because of her very real importance in the history of the royal family." In her account of Sophia Dorothea's tragic history, Miss Greenwood inclines to the view that Sophia's attitude was not that of "a consciously guilty woman." The gruesome circumstances which have often been related concerning Königsmarck's murder are, she says, taken from romances, "and rest upon little or no other evidence." The biography of Caroline of Ansbach fills the greater part of the volume, and here Miss Greenwood is unsparing in her chastisement of George I. and his grandson Frederick, Prince of Wales. Of the latter, Caroline said to Lord Hervey that he was "the greatest ass and the greatest liar and the greatest canaille and the greatest beast in the whole world, and I most heartily wish he was out of it." A chapter is given to Caroline's political work, and though nothing fresh is told us in regard to her steady support of Walpole, the facts are well marshalled, and the portrait of Caroline's character helps us to understand the causes of her influence upon politics. It would be faint praise to say that Miss Greenwood's work attains the level of her predecessor's. In judicious use of her material, caution in reaching her verdicts, indeed in every quality except the art of giving an air of picturesqueness to her pages, the later writer is by far the superior.

The "Letters of Diana, Lady Chesterfield, to her Daughter and Sister," by Mrs. Crackanthorpe (Heinemann, 2s. net), were well worth reprinting from the pages of the "Westminster Gazette," where they originally appeared. The Lady Chesterfield, who is, of course, of Mrs. Crackanthorpe's creation, is an aristocrat of the Victorian era, whose accomplishment in the now decayed art of letter-writing recalls the famous masculine prototype of the eighteenth century and the same name. While, moreover, the letters to her daughter, Philippa, who has gone to London for the season, are dominated by the writer's distinctly "class" and narrow notion of the right course for a young girl to pursue, they are shrewd, witty, and, in regard to the affection they express, essentially human and mother-like. Without these qualities the analytical discussions of Philippa's eligible suitors might become a trifle nauseating; as it is, and when the maternal manœuvres end, as her ladyship intended they should, in Philippa's falling in love with an old flame of her mother's, one feels that Lady Chesterfield is an attractive, as well as a clever, specimen of a fast-vanishing type. Mrs. Crackanthorpe maintains her letter-writer's point of view from start to finish, the whole series of letters constituting a character-study so adroit and convincing that one hardly requires the "obituary notice"—Lady Chesterfield is killed off before the completion of her last letter—to round off the picture.

Thanks to the excitement about Mr. Harriman's health and the consequent perturbations and uneasy heavings of the American market, there has been more animation than usual at this season in Throgmorton Street. The Bank return is stronger than ever, and consequently the continuance of cheap money is confidently predicted. It is satisfactory to see from the last pauperism returns that London conditions are now much better than last year and are, in fact, no worse than in 1907. Employment is improving, and if a spurt occurred in the shipbuilding trade there would not be much to grumble about. A much more confident feeling prevails in the iron and steel districts. The staple industry of the West Riding has been stimulated by a big order for Khaki from the Turkish Government. Lancashire is beginning to export more cotton goods to India.

U.S.A. Cereal Crops.

The only trades which seem to be benefiting by the passing of the U.S. tariff are steel and leather, from both of which a substantial amount of protection has been withdrawn. Trade generally is still rather dull, over 20 per cent. of the workmen in New York State being still unemployed. However, the food crops are so splendid, and the prices obtained will be so high that another industrial boom might easily take place. The Commercial National Bank of Chicago, in its "crop and business report," hesitates as to whether wheat, maize, oats, and barley will or will not beat the record of 1906. Winter wheat is put at 444 and spring wheat at 290 million bushels, some 80 or 90 million bushels better than last year. The worst crops are those of Texas, Ohio, and Indiana. The maize crop is expected to yield over 2,900,000,000 bushels, more than 300,000,000 bushels in excess of last year, the excess being mainly due to an expansion of sowing in Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, and other Southern States. In spite of a bad drought Texas will be the third maize State this year after Illinois and Iowa. Of the Indian corn 80 per cent. is consumed at home chiefly in fattening pigs and cattle. The yield of oats is calculated at 940 million bushels, a hundred million more than last year. Barley promises 183 million, and rye 35 million bushels, both substantially better than last year. Rye bread is still eaten by the Germans, Scandinavians, and some of the foreign Jews in the United States, but the consumption is rapidly declining, though rye flour is relatively much cheaper than wheaten flour.

The Foreign Market.

In the foreign market nothing of great moment has occurred. The demand for good bonds yielding 4½ to 5 per cent. is still very strong South Americans have been favored. The Argentine drought is over; but the situation in Brazil, owing to over-expenditure, over-borrowing, a monstrous tariff, and bad coffee finance is rather gloomy. But it is satisfactory to learn that a candidate has at last been found to oppose the Chauvinistic Marshall Hermes de Fonsecas for the Presidency. From Mexico a brief telegram announces that General Reyes is in hiding, fearing the political vengeance of President Diaz. Upon this intelligence Mexican railway stocks rallied a little, as if a military despotism were a synonym for security! Those who know Turkey best are anxious about the Yemen, where the successes of the rebels might cut off Mecca and strike a fatal blow at the prestige of the Sublime Porte. Nothing further is known of the new German loan, but there are many signs of financial uneasiness in the German Press. Russian bonds are still in high favor, as the political situation is thought to be improving, and the harvest promises well.

PARIS AND HELEN

NOW REPRINTED FROM THE "BON GAULTIER" BALLADS BY PERMISSION OF THE AUTHOR. ORIGINALLY PUBLISHED IN 1842

AS the youthful Paris presses
Helen to his ivory breast,
Sporting with her golden tresses,
Close and ever closer pressed,

HE said: "so let me quaff the nectar
Which thy lips of ruby yield;
Glory I can give to Hector,
Gathered in the tented field.

"LET me ever gaze upon thee,
Look into thine eyes so deep;
With a daring hand I won thee,
With a faithful heart I'll keep.

"O my Helen, thou bright wonder,
Who was ever like to thee?
Jove would lay aside his thunder,
So he might be blessed like me.

"HOW mine eyes so fondly linger
On thy soft and pearly skin;
Scan each round and rosy finger,
Drinking draughts of beauty in!

"TELL me whence thy beauty, fairest,
Whence thy cheeks' enchanting bloom?
Whence the rosy hue thou wearest,
Breathing round thee rich perfume?"

THUS he spoke with heart that panted,
Clasped her fondly to his side,
Gazed on her with look enchanted,
While his Helen thus replied:

"BE no discord, love, between us,
If I not the secret tell!
'Twas a gift I had from Venus,— Venus who hath loved me well.

"AND she told me when she gave it,
'Let not e'er the charm be known
O'er thy person freely lave it,
Only when thou art alone.'

"TIS enclosed in yonder casket—
Here behold it's golden key;
But its name—love do not ask it,
Tell't I may not, ev'n to thee!"

LONG with vow and kiss he plied her,
Still the secret did she keep,
Till at length he sank beside her,
Seemed as he had dropped asleep.

SOON was Helen laid in slumber,
When her Paris rising slow,
Did his fair neck disencumber
From her rounded arms of snow;

THEN her heedless fingers oping
Takes the key and steals away
To the ebon table groping,
Where the wondrous casket lay;

EAGERLY the lid uncloses,
Sees within it, laid aslope,
Fragrant of the Sweetest Roses
Cakes of PEARS' Transparent Soap!

Diary of the Week.

There seems no reason to doubt the accuracy of the splendid news that Dr. Cook, an American explorer, reached the North Pole by a swift dash on April 21st, 1908. The last news had placed him N. of Ellesmere Land on March 17th of last year, about 420 miles from his goal. No further tidings having come, he had been given up for dead until this week the Colonial Office at Copenhagen received a telegram from Greenland giving the startling intelligence of Dr. Cook's achievement and of his safe arrival. When the rush of speculation as to route and method has passed, the world will look with an immense interest to the explorer's history of the greatest victory over nature in our age. Dr. Cook is a man of scientific training, as, indeed, every successful explorer needs be, and may be expected to enrich several sciences with a hard-earned store of new facts gathered in his heroic adventure.

With unconcealed feelings of relief the Opposition last Wednesday quitted their damaging defence of landlordism for the more congenial and, as they hope, more popular task of defending the Trade. Their tactics, however, were embarrassed at the outset by the sweet reasonableness of the Prime Minister, who with the chief assistance of Mr. Samuel and the Solicitor-General, has undertaken the guidance through Committee of this section of the Finance Bill. The prompt correction of a crude error in drafting which unintentionally lowered the minimum for grocers' sales in England to one-fourth of a quart, removed from the Opposition a weapon which their Press was already brandishing with holy zeal for virtue. Next followed a reasonable concession, allowing the holders of July licences to enjoy them at the old rate until September. Then came the allowance of a reduced minimum for Ireland, based upon the preponderance of smaller houses and the prevalence of mixed trade in Irish liquor-selling shops. It was characteristic of Mr. Balfour's worst manners that, returning to the House without listening to Mr. Asquith's reasoned defence of this preference, he should unhesitatingly impute this concession to the crudest form of political "deal."

The larger debate on the liquor licences was chiefly squandered on an attempt to re-assert and defend lost positions. Why select for special fiscal treatment one "legitimate" trade among other trades? Special taxation of liquor is an act of vengeance for the loss of the Licensing Bill. Neither manufacturers nor retailers can bear the new taxation, ruin stares them in the face. We are champions not of the rich brewer, but of the little men who cannot defend themselves. Thus ran the wearisome array of stock "arguments" bearing the familiar liquor mark upon them. Mr. Asquith never shows to more advantage than in submitting fuddled reasoning to the test of logic and of facts. The whole case for the taxation stands on the special legal and economic conditions of a trade which is removed from free competition and which, as the Premier showed, has concentrated its manufactures and achieved economies to an unusual degree, assisted by recent remission of the sugar duties. The just effect of the rejection of the Licensing Bill in enabling the Government to re-adjust and raise the licence duties was argued by Mr. Samuel in a powerful and closely informed speech. The real source of the virulence of the brewers and their political backers is a fear, well grounded, in our opinion, that the trade will not be able to shift the bulk of the new burden on to the consumer. There is a limit to the economy of watering, and experiments in tampering with "fourpenny ale" have not proved encouraging.

The powers of the Road Board to be set up in order to work the second part of the Development Bill deserve close study. Five men are to be appointed to construct new roads or to improve existing roads "for facilitating motor traffic." They are to have the full powers at present exercised by a County Council to construct and maintain main roads, except the power of levying a rate. They can do the work themselves or by subsidising the existing highway authorities. "A new road constructed by the Road Board will be primarily a road confined to motor traffic, and the speed limit will not apply on such a road." But other sorts of traffic may be allowed to use the roads on payment of a toll. No other road can communicate with these new viae sacrae except by permission of the Road Board, who will charge what they please for this privilege. The Road Board can compulsorily purchase strips of land a quarter of a mile broad for their roads, securing for their sole use any unearned increment due to their improvement. If any existing highway gets in the way of the new motor road, the Road Board may shift the highway by carrying it, by means of bridges, over their new road. The County Council or other local authority may raise objections to these motor roads, but has no power to enforce these objections. The Road Board need only give notice to the County Council or Borough Council of their intention to make the road. Even the Local Government Board has no power to veto a proposed motor road. The Treasury is to be the new road authority, and can authorise the making of these motor roads after "consulting" with the Local Government Board. The moneys used by the Road Board come, apparently, from three sources: (1) Tolls and charges levied on private roads and non-motor vehicles and rents from lands along their roads; (2) the net proceeds of the duties on motor spirits and motor licences; (3) loans from the Treasury up to an amount the interest on which does not exceed two hundred thousand pounds a year.

For a "non-controversial" measure the Housing and Town-Planning Bill was subjected to a pretty harassing ordeal in Committee. The principal points of attack were the arbitrary powers claimed for the Local Government Board to institute local schemes and to over-ride the local authority, the application of the compulsory purchase clauses to the case of railways, docks, and other public companies which have acquired land, under statutory powers, the right of the public authority to acquire and hold for future use all sorts of land, vacant or built upon, and the departmental power to determine the objects and the amount of compensation without an appeal to any court. On all these questions of centralised authority Mr. Burns stood stiffly for his office and for the large powers claimed under the Bill. Though there is reason to hold that the recent treatment of many of our most progressive and enlightened municipalities by the Local Government Board has been exceedingly vexatious, it is impossible to deny that the effective operation of this Act involves adjustments between different local authorities which can only be accomplished by the central department. So, again, the power accorded to local inhabitants to surmount the bar of County Council prohibition and to appeal through the District Councils to the Local Government Board for improved housing should greatly improve the condition of our villages.

But the perverse rejection of the quinquennial survey and register, secured by Mr. Burns, has grievously injured the efficiency of the measure. A thorough and repeated survey is essential to the success of the housing reforms, especially in rural parts, where the existing powers of inspection and improvement are rendered nugatory by the influence of property owners upon local bodies. There was no reason to hold that the cost of such a survey would be great, or that an "army" of officials would be needed. As Sir John Dickson-Poynder points out in his letter to the "Daily News," no real weight attaches to any of the three objections, viz., that the survey is (1) new and expensive; (2) superfluous; (3) inquisitorial. The rejection of Clause 30 invalidates the operation of the whole measure, for it destroys the machinery for gathering the detailed facts required to enable the Local Government Board to exercise with discretion its judgment in the particular cases of proposed reform. It is notoriously untrue to say that any genuine sufficient survey and inspection exists or can exist, especially in our villages, under the present Public Health Acts.

On Friday last 2,500 officers and men of the Greek army seized a hill outside Athens and demanded that the Premier should receive a deputation on their political views. This was too much for M. Ralli, who resigned, but a new Ministry, under M. Mavromichaelis, found itself in a convenient agreement with the mutineers. The European Press has taken a very serious view of the movement, and believed that it is anti-dynastic. M. Mavromichaelis, however, says not, and there is nothing in the actual programme of the Military Leaguers to contradict him. They asked for reforms in the army and the resignation of the Royal princes from their posts. It was the Crown Prince who arranged the very remarkable strategic movements of the Greeks in Thessaly during the war with Turkey. His commandership-in-chief must, we would think, have been a source of weakness of which the Crown should be glad to get rid. This it seems disposed to do; and, if so, any immediate danger to the throne is probably past. But the appearance of the pronunciamento in Greek politics is profoundly disquieting. What Greece wants most is not a fine army, but political education, and the new Military League, standing as it does for a revolt against what are rather unreasonably regarded as the humiliations put on the country, does not seem likely to supply it.

A detachment of the Spanish Army in the Riff country has formed a new base at Suk-el-Arba, which is at the opposite end of the Mar Chica lagoon from Melilla. It is an attempt to find a "way round" the almost impregnable Moorish position at Gurugu, which blocks the main advance from Melilla. At Suk-el-Arba there is open country extending to Zelouan, which is the first objective of the Spanish Army, and is fifteen miles distant; and the Spaniards hope, by an advance along this route, to force the Moors out of Gurugu, and so open up a clear way to the Spanish army in the north. The spirit of the troops is said to be very good; but the difficulties of the advance are enormous, and the political consequences of another defeat would be disastrous. The war is exceedingly unpopular in Spain, and with very good reason, as is proved by Mr. Cunninghame Graham's revelations in this month's "English Review" of the politico-financial transactions that led up to it. Spain has rejected the Sultan of Morocco's overtures, on the ground that he has no real authority in the Riff country. But Spain, by her contraband trade in arms with the Riffians, has done her best to undermine that authority, and has herself supplied the powder and shot that have already sent many hundreds of poor Spanish conscripts to their graves.

The net result of the recent Imperial Defence Conference, it would seem from Mr. Asquith's brief summary last week, is to be the formation of a new Pacific Fleet in three squadrons—an East Indian, a China, and an Australian squadron. Each squadron is to consist of one armored cruiser of the "Indomitable" type," three "Bristol" cruisers, six destroyers, and six submarines. Australia is to furnish the "Indomitable" for her own station, New Zealand's offer of a "Dreadnought" is to be commuted into an "Indomitable" for the China station, and the third "Indomitable" is to be supplied by this country. The Australian squadron is to be under Australian control, and to be stationed in her own waters; temporary assistance will be given by the Imperial Government, but in time the whole will be supported by Australia. New Zealand, on the other hand, prefers the plan of direct contributions to the Imperial Navy. Canada will form a small squadron of her own for service on the Pacific seaboard. These new arrangements are to be explained in detail by papers that are to be circulated later, and they are subject to the consent of the Colonial Parliaments, which has yet to be obtained.

The only serious Colonial criticism that has yet been reported is from New Zealand, where the "Dominion" wonders whether the creation of three separate squadrons has not involved some sacrifice of naval strength. But little hostile criticism is to be expected from the Colonies, whose wishes have been studiously met. The scheme is open to more serious questioning from the English point of view. It will be observed that the net result of the Colonial offers of "Dreadnoughts" will be actually to decrease our strength in home waters by one large cruiser instead of increasing it by two battleships. The stationing of an "Indomitable" in the Pacific is a reversal, to some extent, of our policy of naval concentration in home waters. The reversal is not to be justified for the sake of a symmetrical arrangement with Australia and New Zealand, and it may well be asked on what grounds of policy it is made.

According to the Canadian correspondent of the "Times," there is reason to believe that the Dominion Government has decided to refuse its support to the proposal of an Imperial cable service. Considering the enthusiastic approval given to this proposal by Sir William Mulock, and by Mr. Lemieux, his successor, this announcement has not unnaturally caused consternation among Imperialists. The "Times" correspondent openly suggests that private business interests have tampered with the Government, and that Sir W. Laurier, genuinely distrusting all forms of public ownership, has allowed their arguments to prevail with him. The private cable, telegraph, railroad, and telephone corporations exercise even greater influence in Canada than in the United States. The Canadian Pacific Railway has its own telegraphic system, handling a great commercial and press business, the Great North-Western Telegraph, linked up with the Western Union Company of the United States, is also strongly entrenched in most Canadian centres; while the Bell Telephone Company is alleged to have among its stockholders "some powerful friends of the Government." Recent revelations of the power of commercial and financial companies to influence and to direct the expenditure of public resources in Canada indisputably lend countenance to such an explanation of the decision attributed to the Government to ignore the projected Cable Conference in London.

The protracted negotiations between China and Japan over Manchuria have at last ended in the almost complete triumph of Japan. In Eastern Manchuria, it is true, China retains her sovereignty over the Corean settlement at Chien-Tao, an important point gained, because if Japanese subjects carried their country's rule with them wherever they settled, China might as well abandon Manchuria altogether. But, economically, the future of the country is already lost to her. She may not extend her railways in Western Manchuria without the consent of Japan, on the ground that such extension might compete with the railway to Port Arthur. Moreover, over the whole course of this railway, Japan has made good her claim to sovereign rights; and she has carried her point, too, with regard to the policing of the branch line from Mukden to Antung. Japan has, in fact, asserted as much as Russia claimed from China before the war; and her diplomacy has been even rougher than Russia's. Since the war Russia, in the north of Manchuria, has had the same difficulty with China over the rights of sovereignty along the railway as Japan in the south; but Russia had to withdraw the claim that Japan has enforced. Whatever may be said for the Anglo-Japanese alliance, it can hardly be maintained any longer that it is an instrument that makes for the preservation of China's rights.

The meeting of the British Association at Winnepeg, though well attended and productive of many excellent papers, seems to have been unusually devoid of intellectual controversy. The chief interest seems to have lain in the field of physics, opened up so luminously by Sir Joseph Thomson's presidential address. Though geology and biology are full of new and vigorously contested positions, the holiday atmosphere of such a gathering does not appear provocative of keen discussion. Still more significant was this pacific note in the department of economics, where a stiff Free Trade challenge was received almost in silence by an audience which must have held many Protectionists who believe that a Tariff policy is "scientific." This decline of controversy is, we think, to be regretted, especially at a time when new and, pace Sir Oliver Lodge, highly "speculative" doctrines are in the air. Why is it that the tough instructive contests waged in the early years of the Darwinian "hypothesis" are not renewed to-day over the new and hardly less revolutionary conceptions of the Universe and man's place in it which recent science has evolved?

The meeting of the International Trade Union Congress this week at Paris must be considered to have had an educative rather than a directly practical importance. Apart from the usual condemnatory attitude on the matter of international "blacklegging," the issue which seems to have aroused most interest was that of the arbitrary measures taken by the Prussian police in requiring foreign workers to produce permits on pain of expulsion from the country. A valuable suggestion to the effect that the Trade Union Organisation should seek the assistance of the International Parliamentary Bureau on this and kindred matters, deserves consideration. Trade Unionists might also bear in mind that on labor questions a beginning of what may rightly be termed international labor legislation has already been made. It ought to be possible for labor parties in the several countries to utilise more fully this line of practical co-operation, urging their Governments to make legislative pacts on the lines of those which have been made for the restriction of night labor and for the abolition of poisonous processes in the match trade.

The "aviation week" at Rheims has founded a new and romantic sport of which it is still impossible to foresee all the developments. The first honors of the meeting go to Farman for a flight of 118 miles in rather more than three hours. But Farman's flights are low and his motions less delightful to the eye. Latham carries off the palm for brilliancy and altitude of flight. The prize for speed was won by Curtiss, who did the course of twenty kilometres in 15 min. 50 secs.; but Blériot, who was again so unfortunate as to get rather badly burned, was almost as fast. More important, however, than these records of distance and duration of flight was Farman's flight with two passengers. If passengers could not be carried, flying would remain for long enough a sport for the adventrous and the gifted. But Farman promises the pleasures of flying to every man and his wife who are rich enough to afford a machine and an "aviator," to borrow a word from the correspondent of the "Manchester Guardian." It was a brilliant week, and they were lucky who saw the flights that mark unmistakably the beginning of man's conquest over the air.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF ENGLAND.

The introduction of the Development Bill marks a new stage in the realisation of Liberalism. The narrow conception of the work of Government, as confined to national defence and the preservation of internal order, has long since yielded to a fuller interpretation of the State as an instrument for securing to the citizen such positive conditions of individual liberty as are contained under the terms sanitation, education, protection against destitution, and against various forms of industrial oppression. For such purposes a great variety of public health, education, and industrial enactments have been placed upon our Statute Book, and large administrative powers have been vested in our national and local Government. But almost the whole of this enlargement of the State has hitherto been directed to the redress of grievances or the prevention of injuries. Even where the State, as in the case of the Post Office, has invaded the realm of private enterprise, it has been actuated more by a desire to curb vexatious monopolies than by any theory of constructive activity. It has always hitherto been impelled by pressure from behind, and has scarcely claimed to play a positive part in the application of national resources to the arts of industry and of social progress. Other European countries and some of our own Colonies have been pioneers in new experimental paths of public policy. We have kept more closely to the older ways. This tardiness enables us with fuller confidence to undertake a task designed to "promote the economic development of the United Kingdom," as is set forth in the title of the Bill. The main objects and the chief methods of the measure, though they will be rightly subjected to close scrutiny, are not likely to be exposed to keen party controversy in the House of Commons. There are, indeed, belated politicians who would rule out a priori all such public enterprise, upon the ground that "The State cannot make the country richer or more prosperous through Government expenditure," settling all claims to the contrary by arguing that money taken in taxation for such public enterprise implies the diversion of capital from better use in private hands, to worse use by the State. Such reasoning, were it sound, must, of course, be equally condemnatory of public education, and, indeed, of all other State activities. It is the economics of sheer anarchism. Sane reflection must lead any man to recognise that private profit, which is the test of success in individual enterprise, is no true measure of the public utility of such an enterprise, and that there are some undertakings which, from their magnitude or their slow fructification, or from the very nature of their product, are not accommodated to private industry. Every civilised nation has come to this conclusion, and there is a tolerably close agreement as to what these profitable public undertakings are.

The Development Bill embodies no new Socialistic attack upon competitive industry, as the mere recital of its objects serves to indicate. Forestry, the reclamation of waste lands, the improvement of rural transport, the construction of harbors and canals, the improvement of fisheries, the promotion of scientific and economic research and education in agriculture and rural industries —is there any one of these objects which is not greatly desirable in the interests of our national welfare, and is there any one which can safely be left to private industry or casual philanthropy? So far from encroaching upon or injuring private enterprise, every one of these improvements, if they can be compassed, will be an increased food and stimulus to profitable trade, enlarging the actual area of utilisable land, improving its accessibility, imparting new skill, affording an enlarged variety of remunerative employment to our working population, and adding to the real wealth of the nation. No cavilling at the slackness of official management, occasional corruption, or "the Government stroke" of public employees, disposes of the arguments in favor of this enlargement of the State. This is sound, necessary public work, and a civilised State must bring its best powers of energy and character to its performance. It will cost money! Of course it will, but the outlay will be richly remunerative. A small fraction of the expenditure upon armaments will suffice to open up this process of development, though we are glad to see that the financial provisions of the Bill set no close limits upon further expansion. We believe that when once the truly profitable nature of this economic development is recognised, a larger and larger proportion of the public revenue will be applied to it, its seen advantages serving as a wholesome curb upon the wild extravagance of the destructive services of so-called defence.

There is, however, one part of the scheme which we approach with grave misgivings. In dealing with road transport as one of the modes of development, the construction and improvement of roads is formally excluded. This exclusion appears to be made good by Part II. of the Bill, which is specially devoted to Road Improvement, and which sets up a Road Board entrusted with large powers to make new roads and with large financial resources for carrying out the work. But this road-making is not for the general use of the rural population, but for a single class of vehicle and a single small class of users. The whole of this expenditure is "for facilitating motor traffic." Now, it may be true that in the future motor vehicles will largely or wholly displace horse and pedestrian users of the road. But this is not the case at present. It cannot be seriously maintained now that these new roads will be public benefits, except to the extent to which, by providing alternative roads for them to take, they may abate the dangers and the nuisance which motors are allowed to cause to the general public. The text of the Bill and the memorandum leave the picture of these new roads very vague. But it is difficult to understand how roads, which are designed expressly for motors running without speed limit, upon which ordinary roads must converge and cross, undertaken by a Road Board whose powers appear to override all the ordinary powers of the local authorities, can be defended as a legitimate object for the expenditure of the taxpayers' money. It is not even the case that the public money to be expended on such roads is confined to the product of the motor taxes. Far from it. Apparently the Road Board is to draw an income partly out of the unearned increment of strips of land along its roads, partly by rack-renting private roads which communicate with it, and is further empowered to borrow a sum of money amounting to several million pounds, the interest to be guaranteed out of the public funds. The composition of the proposed Road Board, the powers it claims, the sources of revenue it is to enjoy, and the uses to which this revenue is to be put, all demand the closest scrutiny. The people will want to know why a little class of wealthy pleasure-seekers is to be endowed with public money for the purpose of providing new facilities for a sport pursued hitherto with callous disregard to the public safety and convenience, and in flagrant, systematic, and avowed defiance of the law of the land.

THE INTERVENTIONS OF LORD ROSEBERY.

It is evidence of the waste of force in Lord Rosebery's career that both parties agree in regarding his practical secession from Liberalism to Conservatism as an event of no special importance. It is interesting; it is even sensational. We hear of it much in the spirit in which we note M. Blériot's capture of a momentary "record" in "aviation" from M. Latham, or M. Latham's recapture of his lost laurels at M. Blériot's expense. But we do not feel it to be a true historical landmark, like Gladstone's election for modern Liberalism, or the opening of the second momentous phase in Pitt's career. So much that has happened to Lord Rosebery has seemed to flow less from a genuine effect of opinion and sentiment than from an effort to keep himself in the public eye, and secure not so much a following as an audience. Again and again this device of the ever-popular artist has succeeded. The people have been entertained, have enjoyed a certain hypnotic satisfaction, and have only woke up a little later to find that they have been sent empty away. It was so with Lord Rosebery's Premiership. It was so with his Chesterfield speech. Nothing happens as the result of his innumerable excursions, alarums, appeals, perorations, and protests. The agriculturist ploughs no "furrow," lonely or other. The laborer's task with the "spade" is o'er before it has well begun. With Lord Rosebery all is pose, and the course of each one of his interventions in politics is exactly foreseen before it has begun. An epigram or two, an emotional triumph, a plausible representation of a national mood, or a sectional prejudice, a storm of applause, and the accomplished artist disappears, as the diva retreats to the wings, bowing and pressing to her bosom the tributes of an enraptured "house."

This is not to say that Lord Rosebery is an inept critic, or a careless student of affairs. When he comes forward, as an opponent of a Budget, or of Home Rule, or of the Scottish Land Bill, we may know that a certain stream of public opinion has been set going, and that Lord Rosebery has been an attentive observer of it. It is more doubtful whether he has been well advised in his attack on the present Budget. This time his trumpet sounds an almost solitary challenge. He might have led a faction against Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman: he can only lead a family against Mr. Asquith. He attacks a solid Ministry and party, led by an old friend whom he acclaimed as his own successor in the headship of Liberalism. His only followers in secession will be of his own clan. Moreover, he comes out as the adversary of the one line of thought in Liberal politics with which he can be said to have shown any marked individual sympathy. His best and least affected rôle was that which he assumed when he undertook, with no slight success, the management and direction of the first Progressive majority on the London County Council. The Budget of 1909 is the matured fruit of the agitation which won its first victory on the first London Council, and gave Lord Rosebery his chance of the Premiership. It is characteristic of Lord Rosebery that he should fail to recognise the pit out of which he was digged. The new Radicalism put the crown on his head in 1894. His first act of consequence was to disown it in foreign affairs. His last act as a Liberal is to denounce as a "revolution" the advance which he helped to prepare when his own career was in the making.

A career so futile ends with peculiar want of grace when it signifies the timidity of great wealth in the presence of moderate demands on its public spirit. This is not a happy issue for the admired, the caressed, Lord Rosebery. He has chosen no such direct mark in life as Mr. Chamberlain has from time to time set up; he has no philosophy of politics, like Mr. Balfour, nor can he boast a steady Conservative instinct, tempered by cautious trust in democracy, such as guided the late Duke of Devonshire. He has simply failed, like the young man of great possessions, to live up to the light that was in him. He might have devoted his great talents of persuasion, his unusual charm of personality, to the service to which they were originally vowed. But even if he had failed to keep pace with modern Liberalism, and had felt some distrust of its later developments —and there would be no moral fault in such an attitude—he might have spoken more like a statesman and less like a great landowner. He might have aimed at keeping his old party "straight," instead of directing sensational attacks on them. But the author of the speeches on the Scottish Land Bill and of the letter on the Budget has seemed to possess just the kind of unimaginative hauteur which is the stamp of aristocracies on their defence, and to be at heart no more of a Liberal than Lord Wemyss or the late Lord Salisbury. Mr. Chamberlain, in spite of his later associations, never quite ceased to be a Radical. Lord Rosebery's present demeanor makes one doubt whether he was even a moderate Progressive. Neither the increment tax nor the development tax, nor the super-tax could be styled "revolutionary" developments by anyone moderately familiar with the line of thought which the Liberal Party has pursued since the days of the Newcastle programme.

But, indeed, it is Lord Rosebery's much-praised function of "orator to the British Empire" which reveals his weakness as a political figure, and makes it impossible for him to offer his country much serious or considered advice. What is oratory divested of practice and responsibility? It has no more value, or little more value, than the sonorities of the City Toastmaster. Each party knows that the moment it begins to act Lord Rosebery stands apart from it. The healthy human plane of associated labor has been closed to him by his own shyness and incalculable temper, until it may almost be said of him, as of Charles II., that if he never says a foolish thing, he is never in a position to do a wise one. Therefore all the polish and sparkling malice of his own speech are in the nature of a mere intellectual entertainment. Lord Rosebery could never, like his hero, Pitt, throw a tremendous force of character and skill in affairs into the balance, and in the act outweigh the most accomplished assembly of mere talent. Whatever he counsels on the present situation, whether he be an advocate of moderation or of violence on the part of the peers, he is dealing with a situation which his own tardily offered advice cannot decisively affect. Yet, in one respect, his latest bound into the arena has a significance of its own. It is a sign that the more truly Conservative side of our political aristocracy is, at last, thoroughly over-shadowed. In ceasing to be a Whig, Lord Rosebery almost brings the main tradition of Whiggery to an end. His letter on the Budget is the letter of an alarmed, if not a very sincere, politician, and breathes nothing of the sagacious temper which the Duke of Devonshire who, all through his career, heartily disliked a good deal of Radical politics, applied to the actual conduct of the affairs of the British nation. Here is a loss; for adaptation and concession are of the essence of our State system, and for the moment the country is singularly barren of these useful arts. But Lord Rosebery was not born for systems, and when he shines fitfully over the scene, we know that the light leads no whither.

THE GREEK PRONUNCIAMENTO.

Peoples are in nothing more imitative than in their revolutions. The Russian general strike of 1905 was copied within a year in Vienna and in Teheran. The Young Turkish conspiracy has just been reproduced, as far as the radically different conditions admit, by the officers of Athens. When once the thing has been accomplished, one asks oneself rather why it never happened before than why it has happened now. The Young Turks had enormous difficulties to overcome, both moral and material. They had to cope with the most ubiquitous system of espionage in all the history of tyranny. They risked not merely death, but torture. They had to deal with a people which possessed no tradition of liberty, no precedent of revolution, a people, moreover, which was not quite decided whether it chose to be considered European and progressive or Asiatic and stationary. The Greek officers, on the contrary, are more at home in politics than in the field. They are accustomed to the slackest and most genial discipline. Their soldiers address them by their Christian names, and orders are regarded chiefly as subjects for debate. The Constitution is the most democratic that exists outside Latin America, and every Greek of a little more than middle age remembers the revolution that overthrew King Otho and brought in the present Danish dynasty. The organisation which has carried out this coup d'état made no affectation of secrecy. The Greek for a secret is rumor. It had its ramifications in the ranks; it included several hundred officers; it was allied with some working-class leagues. There is good reason to suppose that it was before it that the late Ministry of M. Theotokis retired, while it still possessed a majority in the Chamber. His successor, M. Ralli, held his own for a few weeks. He did good service in tiding over the Cretan crisis. He was allowed to return a smooth answer to Hilmi Pasha's menacing despatches. That task accomplished, he also had to reckon with the Young Greek officers. They marched out and encamped on a historic hill, framed their demands, and brought about the prompt resignation of the Ministry. There has been neither conflict nor resistance. A docile, or perhaps one should rather say a friendly, Ministry under M. Mavromichaelis has bound itself to execute the programme of the rebels. The coup d'état has succeeded; the Crown Prince has resigned his command of the army, and a general amnesty has smoothed over a momentous mutiny.

There was nothing subversive or dangerous in the programme of the mutineers. They have, apparently, no quarrel with the King, if he will do their behests. They do not wish to overthrow Parliament, provided that it will efface itself. They have only this in common with the Young Turks, that they have risen in protest against a national humiliation. Greece was unable to second the bold gesture of the Cretans, for the simple reason that Greece has neither an army nor a navy. There is, happily, no thought of repeating the experiences of 1897. But the officers are resolved at last to aim at efficiency. Their programme seems moderate and not unreasonable. They demand the economies in the civil services which will render possible an adequate expenditure on defence. Some shipbuilding, some improvement in the farcical system of military training, the engagement of a foreign general —these are their more essential claims. The most contentious item in their programme was the demand for the resignation of the Royal Princes, who, seven in number, threatened to occupy all the more important places in the services, from the chief command downwards. There is no lack of talent in this Russo-Danish family. But it has never known how to win the affections of the Greeks, and it gave in 1897 no proof of military capacity. One indisputable claim King George has to the gratitude of Greece. His capacity as a diplomatist, and his intimate family ties with all the Courts of Europe, have enabled him to render to the country which he rules services which the most efficient of armies could hardly have bettered. He brought the Ionian Isles as a gift. He helped to add the rich plains of Thessaly. He won the reversion of Crete, despite the disasters of the Græco-Turkish War. By such concrete boons he has managed to keep his hold over a race among whom the passion of criticism and the genius of suspicion are abnormally developed. They have never professed to like him. They laugh at his pedestrian common-sense and his taste for business. But they did him the justice to admit that he is useful. It is, no doubt, the failure of his diplomacy to use the Balkan crisis for a solution of the Cretan problem favorable to Greek claims in Crete, which primarily explains this movement of discontent and this sudden cry for military efficiency.

The psychology of the Greeks makes a somewhat complicated study. There is hardly a sacrifice too great for their patriotism in an emotional crisis. They give to public purposes with a prodigal generosity which no other race can equal. The least martial Levantine from Alexandria or Smyrna was ready to take up arms as a volunteer and face defeat during the war of 1897. Private citizens not only talk but act as though the rivalry with Bulgaria in Macedonia, and the old feud with Turkey in Crete, are the absorbing preoccupations of their lives. Yet it has been possible for this race, so intelligent on its critical side, so democratic in its politics, so jealous, not to say Chauvinistic in its patriotism, to leave its army and its navy in the same state of hopeless disorganisation in which the campaign of 1897 surprised them. The fleet is actually worse than it was then, and the army, save for some recent purchases of material, is no better. The explanation is, we think, two-fold. In the first place, the tradition of the Greek race, from the days of Odysseus downwards, has been to trust to its subtlety and its gift for intrigue. The Bulgarians, slower-witted and much less passionate in their patriotism, rely on work and organisation. At the back of his brain no Greek really believed that the army could win Crete and Macedonia. He hoped everything from diplomacy. In the second place, this buoyant and intolerant patriotism defeats itself. Its first employment is always to repress and silence the pessimist and the critic. It is too busy with the glories of the past to face the facts of the present. These racial characteristics may be for the moment in abeyance. The Young Greeks are profoundly impressed with what the Young Turks have done. But while there doubtless will be some fitful attempt to reorganise the army, we need not expect to witness anything at all comparable to the patient effort which has made of Bulgaria a formidable military Power. It is well for Greece that she cannot hope to compete on the plane of physical force. For if she could learn the patience of the Bulgarians and the discipline of the Turks, her numerical inferiority would still doom her in a conflict to certain disaster. One is inclined to think that in such conditions any fresh expenditure on armaments must be unmitigated waste. Her wiser course would be to embrace the advantages of neutrality, instead of courting the risks and accepting the sacrifices which are the lot of the weak belligerent.

For the moment this Greek pronunciamento is a merely local happening. It will begin to affect the balance of forces in the Near East only if these officers attempt to maintain a steady influence in politics. If that is their aim, we may predict with certainty that, so soon as they have effected a measure of military reform which to the sanguine national mind seems adequate, they will begin to pursue a policy of adventure in Crete or in Macedonia, or in both. In the Balkans armies are emphatically intended for use, and use means aggression. The process of army reform, according as these officers are intelligent or the reverse, may occupy months or years. But European diplomacy may reckon with confidence on the revival of one or both of these questions, so soon as this renovated army conceives itself to be fit for war. The present shelving of the Cretan question is not a settlement. No settlement will ever be lasting, short of a union with Greece. British diplomacy, though its methods have been neither adroit nor far-seeing, has done well to spare the Turks an immediate crisis and a fresh humiliation. But in their interests, no less than for the sake of the Cretans, it is essential to begin betimes to prepare the union. Crete can have no tolerable life in its present amputated state, and Turkey will only be weakened, without and within, while she insists on retaining this thorn in her own side. There is, we believe, one means by which the transfer might be made palatable to the Young Turks. If the same settlement which gave Crete to Greece were also to restore Cyprus to Turkey, the prestige of the new régime could not suffer. The island is only an annual drain to us. We have made of it no military use. Our rule is neither popular nor markedly successful. Disraeli took Cyprus with the idea of gaining a fulcrum from which to help a decaying and weakened Turkey. By restoring it we might earn for ourselves an influence which would be worth more to us in the East than the possession of all the islands of the Levant.

MR. BIRRELL'S IRISH LAND BILL.

Many persons are puzzled how it is that a system which is acclaimed to be so great a success as is Irish land purchase, should require Parliament to consider a Bill of over sixty clauses within a few years of the parent measure. But the success of the Act of 1903 was its undoing. Mr. Wyndham estimated that a sum of one hundred millions sterling and twelve millions for a bonus would tempt the landowners to sell their estates to the occupying tenants in a period of from fifteen to twenty years. But the advantages and temptations offered proved so seductive that, after the Act had been but five years in operation, land to the value of eighty millions was sold or agreed to be sold. This phenomenal success had its disadvantages. The sales were agreed to far more rapidly than they could be carried out by the Estates Commissioners, or than the money could be got by the Treasury to finance them. Mr. Wyndham's one hundred millions was soon found to be far under the sum needed. Already the actual demands have reached the sum of £83,000,000, and it is probable that as much more may eventually be required. The causes of the success of the Act were the great prices that the owners of Irish estates were able to get for their property and the bonus of twelve per cent. which was thrown in. Prices under the Act jumped up from seventeen years' purchase to twenty-three years' purchase of the existing rents. This was due to the reduction in the annuity payable by the tenant-purchasers from a four per cent. to a 3¼ per cent. rate. The purchasing tenant seldom considered the sum he was giving for the land—he thought only of the reduction in his annual payment. Mr. Wyndham estimated that from five to seven millions a year would be required, but sales were agreed to at a rate that would require £16,000,000 a year. Mr. Wyndham estimated that the money could be raised by the issue of stock bearing interest at 2¾ per cent. This stock, however, on the average has not produced more than £88 per cent. The £12 per cent. loss had to be found by somebody, and Mr. Wyndham's method was to throw the loss on the Irish ratepayers. Doubtless he never contemplated that the burden would be so enormous. For some years a fund, known as the Irish Development Grant, stood the loss, but that soon was exhausted, and the Irish ratepayers became vocal in their objections to undertaking the obligation. Hence the necessity for a new method of financing the Act.

It was evident that the finance of the Wyndham Act was bad, that the provisions for raising the necessary funds were inadequate and not self-supporting. The landlords, quick to recognise what this meant, were in favor of a Bill to improve the financial arrangements by transferring the loss upon the ratepayers to the Treasury. They, however, strongly objected to such an alteration in the annuity rate as would enable the money to be raised without loss. Such an alteration meant lower prices. Consequently, they contended that the Government should bear the loss on the plea that the financial scheme of the Wyndham Act was the British Government's confirmation of and participation in the terms of a treaty. This, of course, is not so. The Act of 1903 clearly shows that the intention was that no loss should fall on the Treasury. The Liberal Government recognises, however, that, having regard to official continuity, it, to a certain extent, is responsible for the bad finance of the Wyndham Act, so they propose to undertake to meet the loss on existing contracts, but at the same time to make the future arrangements for raising the necessary funds self-supporting.

The Irish Party, however, refused to be parties to a measure which merely supplied funds for land purchase. It demanded that some important reforms and additional power should be in the Bill. The measure introduced by Mr. Birrell contains a large number of more or less technical provisions which five years' experience showed to be necessary, but its main features are: Improved finance, powers of compulsory purchase, limitation on the zones, and a new scheme for the congested districts.

The new financial arrangements will allow the Treasury to create a 3 per cent. stock for land purchase purposes. In the case of agreements already entered into, the vendors, if they so desire, must be paid in cash to be raised at the cost of the Treasury, should there be, as there must be, any loss. In the case of future agreements, the vendor may, at the option of the Treasury, be paid in 3 per cent. stock, and, as in such cases the annuity to be paid by the tenant purchasers is to be 3½ per cent., of which 3 per cent. is for interest, there will be no loss to the taxpayer. Neither landlords or tenants naturally like this arrangement, but it is unquestionably fair to the Exchequer.

The House of Lords cannot alter the finance of the Bill, but it can deal as it pleases with its other provisions. As money is so important to vendors it is evident that, although the landlords do not like the new finance, they will take it rather than leave things as they are, especially as it includes a raising of the bonus from three per cent. to seven or eight per cent.

There are three things in the Bill that the landlords will not have on any terms, if their representatives are to be believed. They will not agree to compulsion, to interference with the zones, or to the constitution of the new Congested Districts Board. Most of the other provisions in the Bill they will swallow. As the landowners are omnipotent in the House of Lords, it may be assumed that that body will only pass a measure that, on the balance of advantages, will satisfy the Irish landlords. The compulsion in the Bill is very wide. Powers are given, not alone to acquire lands compulsorily which are necessary for the relief of congestion, but also where the landlord will not agree to terms of sale with his tenants. There is room for compromise in this matter. Compulsion is necessary for the relief of congestion, but hardly yet for bringing about ordinary sales.

As regards the constitution of the Congested Districts Board, there is, perhaps, also room for negotiation and compromise. If the representative members of the Board are to have any real voice in the administration they will seriously hamper the paid members, who must be regarded as the working heads. If, on the other hand, the elected members are to be only figure-heads, and have no real power, they will be the cause of constant complaints and irritation.

The only other matter of importance that is likely to lead to trouble with the House of Lords is the provision that enables the Estates Commissioners, at their discretion, to inquire into cases that come within the "zones." The landlords seem to fear that this provision will lead to the destruction of the zone system, which they regard as the best feature of Mr. Wyndham's Act. But the zones have now done their work, whether for good or evil, and their abolition would make very little difference in the prices of Irish land. What is required is that, in cases at present protected by the zones where it is a matter of doubt whether the parties were free agents, the Commissioners should have the right to inquire. The Irish courts have practically taken away this right, the necessity for which an unprejudiced person would have considered an elementary proposition. This power of inquiry should be secured to the Commissioners perhaps best by specifying in the Act the circumstances under which the right of inquiry should be exercised. Were the alterations here suggested made, Mr. Birrell's Bill could hardly be violently opposed in the House of Lords, and at the same time it would lose little, if anything, as a valuable addition to the Land Purchase code.

Life and Letters.

THE JOHNSON BI-CENTENARY.

In this year of centenary celebrations it would not have been possible to pass over a man so characteristically English alike in his merits and in his shortcomings as Samuel Johnson. The centenary of his death hardly received the notice which it deserved. The year was, however, marked by the foundation of the Johnson Club. Born of a dinner given by Mr. Fisher Unwin, the club soon attracted many notable votaries. Among its yearly Priors have been the late Dr. Birkbeck Hill, Mr. Birrell, Sir Frank Carruthers Gould, Dr. Sidney Lee, Mr. George Radford, and other men of letters. For a quarter of a century it has met in Fleet Street and discussed more than a hundred papers without sign of flagging, and, to borrow Johnson's own phrase, without having travelled over his mind. With or without reason, it claims to be more enthusiastically Johnsonian than "The Club," the august society which is able to trace its lineage to the sage himself. At any rate, in this bi-centenary year it has shown itself more ready to come forward in Johnson's honor and to give its labor to the cause. Very properly, it is Lichfield—"Magna Parens," as she is saluted in the Dictionary—that takes the lead. The Corporation of that ancient city and county are in possession of the house in which Johnson was born, and have converted it into a museum which may illustrate his life. They have bestirred themselves to much purpose, taken counsel with the Johnson Club, and secured the services of Lord Rosebery to inaugurate the celebration, and of other lecturers to carry it on. They will conduct their visitors to the scenes of Johnson's early life, will sup them jointly with the Johnson Club upon the sacred birthday, and will dismiss them with a sermon from Dr. Beeching in the stately Cathedral which Johnson loved. The five days assigned to the festival make perhaps too long a period, but Johnson is so ample a personality, and presents himself to different persons in such different lights, that the various speakers and preachers are hardly likely to find themselves travelling over the same ground.

We have said that Johnson was characteristically English. Within the limits of the eighteenth century there was perhaps one man who was even more so. But Swift's work was finished before Johnson's name was known, and when "London" attracted the attention of Pope the unhappy exile of Dublin was almost "a driveller and a show." In later days Swift has the one advantage over Johnson that a certain profession must look back to him as its founder, since even Defoe cannot dispute his claim to be the father of journalism and perhaps the greatest of journalists. Yet between us and Swift there flow the nine streams of Styx. No knowledge can penetrate the mystery of his life, no affection can overcome the saeva indignatio which he allowed to lacerate his heart. We acknowledge his genius, we try in vain to explain it to the foreigner, we recognise vaguely his kinship to ourselves, but we remain cold to the man. A brother he may be, but certainly a frère de loin. With Johnson Charon has plied his oars in vain. We know him as we know no other man of the past. His face lives no more clearly on the canvas of Reynolds and in the marble of Nollekens than his heart and his mind, his speech and his manners, in the pages of Boswell and Mrs. Piozzi. He may vex us at times, but we love him none the less. We are little troubled if we cannot make a Frenchman understand Swift, but it becomes a personal grievance when the same man asks us "What is there in your Johnson?" In fact, our knowledge of Johnson grows rather than lessens. Our fathers left "The Rambler" on their shelves, and even Sir Leslie Stephen thought that we could no more read its numbers for our pleasure than we could get through the sermons of Stillingfleet, or Secker, or Porteous. With us the dust no longer lies on the volumes, and we read them, not as sermons, but as illustrations of their author's mind, as a view of life which may be unduly sombre, but cannot be safely neglected by man that is born of a woman, a creature whose happiness is in peril from hour to hour. In fact, the end of the series coincided with the greatest blow that can befall a man. The death of the wife, whom Johnson, despite her years and some of her qualities, had loved with a deep and sometimes boisterous affection, left him, since man's help were vain, to beg only for remembrance in the prayers of his oldest friend. Yet it is clear that he was the better able to bear the blow because he had not only thought much on human life, but had also put his thoughts into written form in the pages of "The Rambler."

Such a celebration as we now keep is hardly the fittest time to lay emphasis on Johnson's faults, except in as far as we may be prone to share them ourselves. That he was sometimes wayward cannot be denied. It was not always easy to say beforehand what side he would take, and that not only when he argued for victory. Then he did not bring to all his problems, literary and practical, the scientific spirit. His depreciation of Gray, mistaken though it was, is hardly an instance in point, for a man of Johnson's training could hardly give another judgment. His judgment on Milton was warped, though he did not, as Keble did, go so far as to construct a theory of poetry which should exclude the Puritan poet from the first rank. Characteristic of our nation as Johnson's faults must be called, we should grant him no celebration were it not that his virtues are no less characteristic, and, in some ways, present us at our best. He was the type of British resolution. It is true that we grumble and he did not. "Whether the subject," says Boswell, "was his own situation, or the state of the publick, or the state of human nature in general, though he saw the evils, his mind was turned to resolution, and never to whining or complaint." The difference between Johnson and his countrymen seems great, but, in truth, is merely on the surface. Our grumblings seldom have any reality, and do not, in fact, affect our resolution. We may be sure that the man who complained to Johnson that by the increase of taxes labor would be dear, other nations would undersell us, and our commerce would be ruined, though he may have desired to lessen his own burden, did not really believe his own predictions, and would not let them alter his own conduct. He did not need Johnson's reassuring words, "Never fear, sir. Our commerce is in a very good state." This manly resolution is the quality which Lichfield desires above all to celebrate, and this resolution was based, not upon ignorance, but upon knowledge. Had it been the constitutional cheerfulness which, in the case of one of his friends, was always breaking in and forbidding him to be a philosopher, again there would have been no celebration. Johnson was not cheerful. He was the victim of a life-long disease, which brought invincible fits of depression. His gaiety, when it came, was not gentle, but boisterous, and gave some color to Mrs. Piozzi's statement that he was always in extremes. Nor should we keep his festival if his optimism had come from inability to see, if he had thought that rose-water could cure the plague, or, like Mrs. Nickleby, that a difficult situation could be overcome by a pudding once a week or fish twice. He "saw the evils," but he had no sympathy with anyone who cried that they could not be overcome, or exaggerated their force in order to commend his own nostrum. And this, we take it, is the reason of his preferring Walpole, "the fixed star," to Pitt, "the meteor." Much as he differed from Walpole, hotly as in his younger days he had denounced Walpole's administration, he could not but see that in the great Whig statesman there was a continuity of thought and action, a resolution as firm and as wise in small things as in great, a magnanimity independent of the greatness of an occasion. Pitt could be for a moment perhaps greater, certainly more brilliant, than Walpole, but only when the occasion would throw a fierce glare upon his achievements, only when the lightning flashed and the heavens were ready to fall. What Walpole was in the State, that was Johnson in the lesser world of letters and private life. We go to Lichfield to celebrate a fixed star. We shall see the house in which the poor bookseller struggled for a living, the school in which his son outshone the more favored children of clergyman and squire, and the house at Edial in which that son struggled to make a living on his own account. We shall remember how his failure drove him not to despair, but to fresh resolution, how he went forth to capture London, how he never fainted even under actual hunger, how at last he could proudly tell Lord Chesterfield that a great nobleman's patronage was nothing to a man who was known. We cannot say that, of those men who seek a living from the pen, Johnson was the first to establish his own independence. That good fortune had fallen to Pope; but Pope stood alone, Johnson gave independence to his class. And Pope and Johnson were tradesmen's sons. Dryden was of gentle birth, but henceforth there were to be no such fulsome dedications as defile his pages. This also will be remembered at Lichfield. Thus there is no man who more deserves a celebration, and, thanks no less to his biographer than to himself, there is no man who provides more material for it.

BOND OR FREE?

Are we witnessing the birth of a new free nation in South Africa or of a white oligarchy standing on a permanent foundation of black servile labor? This momentous question, we may agree, cannot be satisfactorily answered by mere reference to the insertion of a color bar in the Constitution and the present denial of a franchise to Kaffirs and colored people in three provinces of the Union. But, after making all due allowances for present political expediencies, we cannot look forward to the future without grave apprehensions. The issue at stake is neither sentimental nor merely humanitarian: it is primarily practical, and that in the hardest and narrowest sense. Taking any modern standard of "success," we may premise that, if a nation is to "succeed," it can only do so by the fullest discovery and the best utilisation of the personal capacities of all its population. Civilisation can only advance by applying effective stimulus to personality. The ultimate sin of slavery is the denial and depression of human personality. But every political or economic arrangement which denies and depresses personality is of the nature of slavery. The denial of an opportunity to acquire a political franchise on the ground of race, color, or sex is clearly of this order. The various modes of sophistry by which a "superior" race seeks to evade this plain lesson of history have never been better illustrated than in the Southern States of the American Republic, and we commend the study to the "Liberal" statesmen of South Africa who so confidently assert and believe that just and safe government is possible on color lines. The most specious of the arguments for denying justice takes the form of urging that industrial education must precede a bestowal of political and civil rights. Indeed, the new setting of the Negro Problem in America may be said to turn precisely upon this issue. A singularly interesting presentation of the question is given in a volume, "The Negro in the South" (Fisher Unwin), to which the two most influential members of the negro race, Mr. Booker Washington and Professor Du Bois, contribute. Mr. Washington opens his case with an acknowledgment of the services which slavery rendered to the negro race. "At the end of the period of slavery, about two hundred and fifty years, the negro race as a whole had learned to wear clothes, to live in a house, to work with a reasonable degree of regularity and system, and a few had learned to work with a high degree of skill." Cast suddenly upon the country with a liberty they had not learned to use, and a political power they could not but abuse, they were collapsing into industrial and moral inefficiency in the era following emancipation, until the new gospel of "work" got hold of them, and induced them to subordinate political and even spiritual aspirations to the primary need of economic progress. Large numbers of Northern "negrophils" are heard openly regretting that the Fifteenth Amendment, bestowing a negro franchise, was ever put into the Constitution, and they condone the various legal or illegal devices by which Southern States have evaded the enforcement of this constitutional provision. Let negroes show themselves successful farmers and individualists, acquiring property and achieving solid positions of material respectability, white American sentiment will then begin to recognise them as serviceable elements in the national life, and will accord them all the rights and opportunities of American citizenship! So Mr. Washington and his Northern philanthropists preach acquiescence in present political and civil subjection, content to dwell upon the fruits which such institutions as Hampton and Tuskeegee are bearing in the growth of negro farms and trading businesses.

Mr. Du Bois rips up this cowardly complacency by a sharp analysis of the new economic situation in the South. Cairns, in his brilliant work, "The Slave Power," showed the fundamental inconsistency between slave labor and the demands of successful agriculture. So long as the South was virtually confined to agriculture, a mere modification of the old servile conditions has sufficed. Peonage, contract labor, convict chain-gangs, apprenticeship, have maintained sufficiently the old economic system, while the great majority of the independent negro farmers are free only in name, lying at the mercy of the factor who takes their crops, or the machine-maker or the town mortgagor. The development of the new industrial South, with its iron and steel industry in Alabama and Tennessee, its coal mines in Tennessee and West Virginia, its cotton mills in Carolina and Georgia, brings out anew the desperate fatuity of the processes of race oppression which have replaced slavery. If the South is to march abreast of the rest of the country in the path of civilisation, the same encouragements of hope, intelligent interest and opportunity, must stir her laboring classes. Modern industry demands and admits neither slaves nor serfs, but free men: education, liberty to choose one's work, to acquire and practise any sort of manual or mental skill of which one is capable, to rise to positions of responsibility and power, to combine freely with one's fellows, to reap in sentiment and public esteem the full fruits of individual character and capacity—these are the undeniable essentials of success in the higher walks of industry. Though large sections of the Southern negro races may not be able to respond to this industrial appeal, no one can doubt that out of the seven millions of colored people, who compose the great labor force upon this spot, large numbers are capable and eager to help in the industrial advancement of their country. But full political rights, equal education, and equal access to all occupations are indispensable conditions. These conditions the Southern whites refuse: by constitutional juggling they annul the franchise, on pretexts of economy they starve the negro schools, while white Trade Unionism has been allowed to exclude colored men from almost all the best-skilled and best-paid trades. Such progress as the negro race has made has been in the teeth of a persistent and a brutal opposition, in which the authority of the law has commonly prostituted itself to the cause of injustice, and even of crime. The denial of the franchise, with all that it entails, is defended by the allegation that the negroes as a race are definitely and permanently inferior to the whites in intellect and moral responsibility. This is a good ground, no doubt, for insisting upon education and character qualifications. But it is a notorious fact that the race-passion of the Southern whites is especially directed against the minority of civilised city negroes, who, as tradesmen or professional men, have shown themselves "as good as white men" in intellect and character. Here we touch the kernel of the race problem. It is not the ignorant, stupid, unprogressive, or even the vicious members of the lower race who rouse the animosity of the superior race, it is the able, intelligent, and progressive members, who challenge comparison with white men upon white standards, who can do white men's work and claim white men's pay and white men's rights. The white South does not want "educated niggers." At present it is bestirring itself to entice sufficient European immigration into its industrial centres to enable it to continue to keep its niggers down. Should this policy succeed, it can only accentuate the race cleavage and exasperate race feeling. For the more energetic and aspiring blacks must come more and more into economic collision with the incompetent and shiftless members of the European races, the growing company of "poor white trash" whose unruly conduct has always fanned the flames of the race feud. But white immigration can no more solve the labor problem for the Southern States than for South Africa. Amid many diversities the root issue in the two countries is the same. In each country the hard manual labor upon which industrial civilisation stands is done by a large settled population of blacks, increasing in numbers at least as fast as the whites. In neither case is deportation or close confinement to special areas practicable. In neither case can the two races continue to work and live side by side without the elevation of the lower and the degradation of the higher. The policy of intellectual and moral segregation, only partially successful in one instance, that of Java, is impossible for America or for South Africa. In both countries the blacks are flowing more and more into the white man's cities, and acquiring by imitation the fruits of civilisation: the Christianity of the Churches, however carefully medicated, is certain to sow seeds of moral and of social aspirations. Although the present tendency is towards firm racial supremacy, the rigorous enforcement of the color line in politics, industry, and social life, such an experiment is foredoomed to failure. The "dignity of labor" must always remain an idle phrase until it is associated with free and equal access to the whole range of rights and duties which make the dignity of manhood.

SHAKESPEARE AND THE MIRACLE PLAYS.

II.

SHAKESPEARE'S men and women have always the old-time devotional feeling. The writer remembers reading somewhere of a street accident in medieval London. A man had broken his leg, and the bystanders crowded round, "bidding him be of good cheer, and think of the Passion of Our Lord." The event to which it was so facile and natural to them to refer was one of which they themselves had been, as it were, the life-long spectators. In Shakespeare these references occur at every turn. His characters speak of

> "the sepulchre in stubborn Jewry
> Of the world's Ransom, blessed Mary's Son."
> ("Richard II.," ii., 1.)

of

> "the Blessed Feet
> That fourteen hundred years were nailed
> For our advantage to the bitter Cross."
> ("Henry IV.," i., 1.)

of

> "the precious image of our dear Redeemer."
> ("Richard III.," ii., 2.)

We see, in particular, the profound popular impression produced by the two Passion scenes, of Judas kissing his Master, and Pilate washing his hands. One of the murderers of Clarence says:—

> "How fain would I like Pilate wash my hands
> Of this most grievous guilty murder done."
> ("Richard III.," i., 4.)

Again, Richard II. says:—

> "Tho' some of you like Pilate wash your hands,
> Showing an outward pity: yet you Pilates
> Have here delivered me to my sour cross,
> And water cannot wash away your sin."
> (Act iv., 1.)

To quote only one reference to Judas from the same play:—

> "Did they not sometimes cry 'all hail' to me,
> As Judas did to Christ? But He in twelve found faith
> In all but one; I in twelve thousand none."
> (Act iv., 1.)

The Old Testament stories are referred to constantly by Shakespeare with all the traditional details with which their scenic representation had familiarised his audience. He alludes, for instance, to the story of Cain and Abel again and again. Abel, the first Martyr, who is three times called "Righteous" in the New Testament, by Our Lord, by St. Paul, and by St. John (St. Matt. xxiii. 35; Heb. xi. 4; 1 St. John iii. 12), and who is spoken of as "Thy Righteous Servant Abel" in the Canon of the Mass, has always been one of the great figures of the Divine Drama, and Cain one of the chief objects of Christian abhorrence. The tradition is that it was in a field at Damascus that the murder took place. Adam and Eve were placed at Damascus after they were expelled from Paradise. According to the Septuagint, Cain said to his brother, "Let us go into the field," and there murdered him. In the first part of "Henry VI." Shakespeare makes Winchester say:—

> "Nay, stand thee back, I will not budge a foot,
> Be this Damascus, be thou cursèd Cain,
> To slay thy brother Abel, if thou wilt."
> (Act i., 3.)

The crying of Abel's blood for vengeance would doubtless be made much of in the miracle plays. We find this in "Richard II.":—

> "Which blood, like sacrificing Abel's, cries, > Even from the tongueless caverns of the earth."
> (Act i., 1.)

A jawbone was always used on the stage for the committing of the crime. Hamlet speaks, in the grave-digging scene, of "Cain's jawbone, which did the first murder." Cain, like Judas, was always represented as a red-headed man. In the "Merry Wives of Windsor" Simple speaks of "a Cain-colored beard" (Act I. 4). Red is the "dissembling color," and Cain not only murdered his brother, but "wrought guilefully" in enticing him into the field with that intent.

The constant proverbial references to Noah, to Job, to his wife, to Samson, to Goliath, are evidently such as were in common use in Shakespeare's time, and are such as could only be employed by people who had not only read or heard of these characters, but had seen them, and had their living images in their minds. Such proverbs as "As poor as Job," were probably coined by the spectators of the miracle plays. They had seen him sitting on his dung-hill with their own eyes. The people of our own day might, no doubt, speak proverbially of the strength of Samson or the size of Goliath—as a matter of fact they seldom do—but they would never speak, like Moth, of "Samson carrying the town's gates on his back," or like Falstaff, of "Goliath with the weaver's beam." We read again and again of being "as slanderous as Satan," "as poor as Job," "as wicked as his wife." These things had become part of the people's minds. Shakespeare is full of jests about "Noah before he was a sailor," and the like. They call up the vivid farcical scenes in which the audience so much delighted—the well-known characters, Job's wife cursing and railing, Noah's wife refusing to go on board the Ark. The spectacle of Dives and Lazarus seems to have had a special attraction for Sir John Falstaff. He talks of "Dives in his purple," of being "damned with the glutton." He calls his Coventry soldiers "slaves as ragged as Lazarus in the painted cloth, when the dogs licked his sores." There is always the vividness of the description of an eye-witness.

The stories of the Saints were still familiar to everyone in Shakespeare's England. A bitter opponent has described that medieval world of pageantry in lines which curiously betray the fascination which it had even for those who destroyed it.

> "Christ's Passion here derided is with sundry masks and plays,
> Fair Ursula with her maidens all doth walk amid the ways,
> And valiant George with spear then killest the dreadful dragon here,
> The Devil's house is drawn about wherein there doth appear
> A wondrous sort of damnèd sprites with foul and fearful look,
> Great Christopher doth wade with Christ amid the brook,
> There walketh Catherine with her sword in hand and cruel wheel, > Sebastian, full of feathered shafts, the dint of dart doth feel."

To give only one example of Shakespeare's familiarity with these stories, and the way in which he refers to the most obscure and little known of them, with an easy assurance that the point will not be missed by his audience, the Dauphin Charles says of La Pucelle:—

> "Helen, the mother of great Constantine, > Nor yet St. Philip's daughters were like thee."
> (I. "Henry VI.," i., 2.)

These were the two daughters of St. Philip the Apostle, who accompanied him to Hieropolis, where he slew the great dragon. After his martyrdom they lived many years in the city, teaching the Faith to the people, and at last were buried, one on the right hand, the other on the left, of their father. The most minute details in the plays are significant of the poet's acquaintance with all this saintly lore. When Horatio says, "There's no offence, my lord," and Hamlet replies, "Yes, by St. Patrick, but there is, Horatio," in the scene after the appearance of the Ghost, the oath is no mere random exclamation. It refers, no doubt, to the "Purgatory of St. Patrick," the many descriptions of which were one of the great sources of the medieval doctrine as to the state of departed souls.

We can hardly read ten lines of Shakespeare without coming across some reference to Christian folk-lore and customs, if it is only a jest about the Apostle spoons at a christening. The lines in "Hamlet," which enshrine the old beliefs about Christmas, are too hackneyed to need quoting. A "chrisom child" is an old English phrase which occurs in the scene where Mrs. Quickly describes the death of Falstaff. "He went away like any chrisom child" (Henry V. 2. 1). The writer admits that here we get a glimpse of Mrs. Malaprop as she existed in the fifteenth century. "He's in Arthur's bosom, if ever any man went to Arthur's bosom." It would be interesting to know when the phrase "a chrisom child" went out of spoken English. The chrisom of the early Church was a white robe, which afterwards became a white cloth. On the Continent one frequently sees the priest put the child's white cap on its head at the words, "Receive this white garment." The chrisom vanishes from English literature in the seventeenth century, until the "maid who keeps her chrisom white" appears again in Keble. To give another example. When the Clerk of Chatham is brought before Jack Cade and his followers, they ask his name. When he replies "Emmanuel," he is told:—

> "They use to write it at the top of letters,
> It will go hard with you."
> (I. "Henry VI.," iv., 2.)

This refers to the custom of beginning a letter by writing the name "Jesus," or "Emmanuel," at the head. The inference is that any one suspected on whatever ground of knowing how to read or write will probably be hanged. The alphabet, again, is spoken of by its old name of the "cross row." Clarence, for instance, says of his brother Gloster, that "he from the cross-row plucks the letter G" (Rich. III. 1. 1). It was so called because the sign of the Cross was placed first in the row of letters. In the "Comedy of Errors," when Adriana says:—

> "Back, slave, or I will beat thy pate across,"

Dromio replies:—

> "And he will bless that cross with other beating; > Between you I shall have a holy head."
> (Act. ii., 1.)

Such allusions, not irreverent even when ironical, could not but rise naturally and spontaneously to the lips of those who saw the Cross everywhere. It was the sign of the whole community, the recognised token of human solidarity. When the plays were written Charing Cross had not yet been broken down, and the old market crosses were still standing everywhere, as they do still at Chichester and Malmesbury. Our forefathers began to learn to read with the Cross. It was on the coins that passed from hand to hand in that old England, the "angels" and "nobles" of the Plantagenet and Tudor kings. It could not but be found traced on the pages where the life of old England is reflected so faithfully by the great poet, who is yet the child and heir of the old tradition, William Shakespeare.

THE FOOTBALL INDUSTRY.

Eleven men on one side; eleven on the other; the contest, who shall kick the ball most times through the goal that the other side defends. It is a capital pastime for winter weather, and it were no bad thing for us if the whole able-bodied youth of the country could be divided into hostile elevens every Saturday. Football would then have a better right than it has yet to the title of "national game" bestowed upon it by the leader of the Labor Party in a diplomatic message to the Football Association this week. But football has strayed far from this simple ideal. For every twenty-two men that play there are as many thousands who find looking on the better part. The best players have so far out-distanced the average as to become subjects of hero-worship, chosen champions of a craft as remote as that of Galahad from the capacity of Gurth. The workers in our factories and others contribute their tens of thousands of sixpences to witness a single match. The more notable the players, the greater the crowd, the greater the mountain of silver, and the greater the difficulty of allocating it between the players, the clubs—and the Football Association. We cannot enter into the reasons why Association football has become professional while cricket remains mainly amateur. The professionalism of League football is simply a fact that must be taken account of. The question of a footballer's wage and what right he shall have to bargain with his employer must be determined by the same principles that apply to the boiler-maker, the music-hall artiste, or the journalist.

Left to themselves, the clubs and the players would be able to work out between them this question of hiring. The managers of the Manchester United, for instance, were anxious to pay this week the wages due to their players, but were prevented by a higher authority. The Football Association has undoubtedly its useful and legitimate functions—to organise the League and Cup-ties, to create and maintain universal rules of play, to keep the game clear of violent and doubtful tactics by making it impossible for incorrigible offenders to play for any team. The Association draws its support from three main sources. It takes from each affiliated club a fee of a guinea or so per annum, five per cent. of the gate money of all the Cup-tie rounds, and every other year the entire gate money at the three international matches. It is a question whether a too ample sustenance has not made the Football Association powerful beyond the limits of usefulness. The public is beginning to trace some connection between its invested thousands and its late stiff-necked attitude towards the players. Its ruthlessness towards a man who has offended against its standard of honesty or good conduct is perhaps salutary. The discipline of the football field is perfect, and the game is as free from taint of crookedness as most amateur games. But it is doubtful whether it is any part of a Football Association's business to interfere in the economic relationship of players and their clubs, or to say whether collective or individual bargaining and settlement of financial differences shall be the rule. Least of all should it impose collectivism on the clubs and forbid it to the men. The only reply to the interference of the Association with the economics of employment was the establishment of the Players' Union. The suspension of all players who join that Union is very like the last word of a despot. The end of the dispute will probably be that the Association will amend or further define its constitution, and confine its activities to the regulation of the game.

When we think of the attitude of this huge organisation towards the players, it is hard to realise that the latter have no standing whatever within the Football Association. It is simply an affiliation of clubs, in which the Leagues vote solidly, as a kind of Parliamentary party, but are liable to be outvoted by the amateur clubs, which can scarcely have a particle of sympathy with the players. It was the vote of the amateur clubs, and of the poorer clubs which cannot afford to pay high wages, that instituted the rule that no club shall pay any player more than £4 a week. If Mr. Clegg, instead of Lord Kinnaird, had been in the chair, the motion would probably have been ruled out of order and a swift end made of it. At present the whole Council advocates its repeal, but cannot prevail on the annual meeting to give quite the necessary two-thirds majority. It does not seem to occur to the Council that the dignified and proper thing to do would be to resign. This oddly out-of-date Statute of Laborers is doomed to evasion, and, perhaps, to ignominious rescindment by a court of law. Together with the transfer method it makes the football player very like a chattel slave. Any prince of the game who signs a £4 contract is, by rule, bound as long as he proves useful to the club—or its assignees. The club can sell him, and does sell him, to a rival for as much as £1,000, and the man must go to his new master and may claim no more than one sum of £10 for removal expenses. Thus the rule of the £4 maximum does not restore equality between the rich and the poor club. It does not alter the market value of the superior player: it merely puts that value into the pocket of someone to whom it does not rightly belong.

Needless to say, the maximum pay rule is notoriously evaded. A man can scarcely be expected to play his best at £4 a week when he knows that he is worth three times as much, and that his employer actually pockets the difference. So the good-will of the purchased gladiator is secured by the payment of two or three pounds beyond the maximum. More often an unsaleable man is released by his club and is bid for by other clubs more or less as a free man. It may even be that a man procures his freedom by calculated or instinctive listlessness begot of a mere £4 wage, and that shrewd agents know that he will play a good deal better for £6. Some clubs have loyally agreed with their men (falsely, as regards the Association) for a higher wage than the maximum. In other cases men have been betrayed and ruined by those with whom they were so incautious as to negotiate. The case of Parsonage will suffice. This Fulham player, on the point of terminating his contract, was approached by representatives of the Chesterfield club, who allowed him to suggest that a removal grant of £50 would scarcely make it worth his while to engage with them, then reported him to the Association, who took away his only means of livelihood by suspending him for life.

Perhaps it is shrewd instinct that makes the football authorities fear the exposure in the courts of such methods as these. At any rate, that is the rock on which the whole organisation was likely to have been wrecked this week. A little more than a year ago, the Football Association of its own motion sanctioned the formation of the Players' Union "with welcome." The Union was then already seven months old, and its rules had been under the consideration of the Association for at least four months. The welcome of the Association lasted six months, and was withdrawn solely because the Union, in pursuance of its most elementary duty, supported a member who had sued his employer in the County Court. It is true that this clashed with an "opinion" of the F.A. Council, to the effect that neither clubs nor players should resort to law, but it is an opinion of highly doubtful validity and not of the clearest expediency. It was inevitable that the quarrel should soon work into the bitter channels and somewhat ludicrous situations lately presented to the public. They have included the spectacle of clubs willing and eager but forbidden by the Association to pay their men their agreed salary, of men deserting, rejoining, and again leaving the Union, as they were swayed by their ultimate interests and the present prospect of starvation, of the attempt to form a union of non-unionists, whose merit in the eyes of its promoters was that it would do nothing for its constituents. Thanks to the generous support of the Union by the Trades Union Federation and the friendly mediation of the Labor Party in the House of Commons, open war has been succeeded by an honorable truce. The Union has undoubtedly won the elementary right to combine, and it seems certain that the football industry will be purged of the more glaring anomalies that are the product of its peculiar history.

A CHAMPION OF THE CENSOR.

Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, author, along with Mrs. Hamilton, of "A Sense of Humor," boasts himself "the only playwright in England who is a thick-and-thin supporter of the Censor." He further holds that "The 'precious' people who think that the British public have no taste for anything but garbage and the horrible things of life ought to be censored." Who these precious people are he does not say; but manifestly, if they exist at all, it can only be in Colney Hatch, under the censorship of their keepers. Incidentally, Mr. Hamilton informed the "Pall Mall" interviewer that his play had been censored; whence one might be apt to deduce that, in its unchastened form, it was "garbage." That, however, would not be a fair inference. I saw the play, at a private performance, in (presumably) its pristine shape; and I should never have dreamt of applying such a nauseous epithet to it. I did, and do, dislike it heartily, because I happen to disagree with the Lord Chamberlain and Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, who think that adultery ought to be treated with "a sense of humor." But I do not hold it either good manners or good sense to go to Billingsgate for my critical vocabulary.

I shall be told that no actual "misconduct," in the divorce-court sense, occurs in the play. That is quite true; but from the rise to the fall of the curtain everything skirts around it. Two married couples, Sir William and Lady Hutton and Major and Mrs. Hay, are sharing a fishing-cottage in the island of Mull. Sir William Hutton and Mrs. Hay have, or think they have, fallen in love with each other. Sir William's valet gloats over their endearments; for, as he says, "Next to playing in a billiard-tournament, there is nothing he likes better than watching the aristocracy at play." He has already taken part in one aristocratic elopement to Monte Carlo, and confidently looks forward to another southern trip, to be followed, if all goes well, by a happy half-hour in the witness-box. Lady Hutton's maid, however, is a person with no sense of humor, and holds it her duty to inform her mistress of Sir William's "carryings on." Major Hay, meanwhile, has noticed his wife in Sir William's arms, and confides his sorrows to Lady Hutton. She, fortunately, possesses a sense of humor, by the application of which she believes that "every tragedy can be turned into a comedy." Her philosophy of life further assures her that, at certain regular intervals (I think she says once a year), wives are apt to behave as Mrs. Hay has just been behaving, and that, on discovering it (if he has a sense of humor), "the wise husband sets back the calendar to the honeymoon, and 'God's in His heaven, All's right with the world.'" Accordingly she suggests that Major Hay shall now summon up all the humor he can muster, and join her in the merry jest of pretending that he (Major Hay) and she (Lady Hutton) are madly in love with each other, and desire nothing so much as an exchange of partners, without any formality or fuss. Sir William and Mrs. Hay now enter, and the bright little scheme is propounded to them, much to their amazement. The act-drop falls upon Lady Hutton clasping Major Hay's hand and saying, "Thy people shall be my people." In the original version, if I remember rightly, she repeated the whole passage from the Book of Ruth. If its curtailment is due to Mr. Redford, he has not lived quite in vain. It was much out of place in this "humorous" setting, not because it is biblical, but because it is beautiful.

It seems, at first, that Lady Hutton's scheme is to succeed; for Sir William's jealousy is violently aroused. But Mrs. Hay is not so credulous; she sees that Lady Hutton and the Major are only playing a game, and she induces Sir William to enter into the joke and keep it up. The amiable quartette have a long discussion on the limited accommodation of the cottage, and the probability that, now that they are "two honeymoon couples," they will constantly be getting in each other's way. At last comes the time for Lady Hutton to play her master-card. She has instructed the Major that "when she says good-night he is to follow her, as a matter of course, to her boudoir, and lock the door"; and this programme is carried out to the letter. She announces her intention of retiring, and when her husband asks where she is going, she replies, "To my boudoir! Good-night!"—whereupon the Major solemnly takes up her lighted candle and follows her, as the act-drop falls. I seem to recollect that in the earlier performance two brass bedroom candlesticks of the most unmistakable pattern stood on the table. For these a pair of blue porcelain, non-committal candlesticks have been substituted, doubtless from motives of delicacy. I wonder whether this, too, was an inspiration of Mr. Redford's?

What Lady Hutton calls her "boudoir" is, of course, a dressing-room, with the bedroom and bed very plainly visible beyond. Once locked in with the Major, her sense of humor fails her, and she has an attack of nerves; and it is in no humorous frame of mind that the two strain their ears to make out whether Sir William and Mrs. Hay have taken the other candlestick and retired to the other "boudoir." As above indicated, things do not go quite so far. Sir William bursts into the bedroom, mutual explanations ensue, and Major and Mrs. Hay go off together in the odor of propriety, as Lady Hutton lets down her hair and remarks that: "God's in His heaven, All's right with the world." Mr. Redford, if a Mr. Redford there must be, might, I think, protect Browning, no less than the Bible, from Mr. Hamilton's sense of humor.

Of course, I am far from suggesting that the Censor did wrong in licensing this play. It does not happen to appeal to my sense of humor. I take no pleasure in skating on thin ice; nor do I greatly value the propriety which calls bedrooms "boudoirs," and applies the term "garbage" to the work of writers who do not deal in such euphemisms. But I am not one of the people who think everything they don't like ought to be summarily suppressed. If the public sense of humor responds to Mr. Hamilton's, there is no great harm done—no harm in the least comparable to the injury done to the body politic by an exercise of despotic and irresponsible power. But Mr. Hamilton is wise in supporting the Censor through thick and thin. But for the sedative influence of that official upon the susceptibilities of the public, it is not at all impossible that people might come to feel that such plays as "A Sense of Humor" are at once a little too thin and a little too thick.

There ought to be a great fortune awaiting the man who shall write a really good detective play. Or is it, perhaps, a condition of success in detective plays that they shall be as silly as possible? "Sherlock Holmes," a great success, was thinner than the very thinnest of Sir Arthur Doyle's stories, and immeasurably inferior to his best. "Raffles" was poor stuff up to the end, when an ingeniously comic or comically ingenious effect took the audience by storm. And here is "Arsène Lupin," apparently a copy of "Raffles" (unless I am misinformed as to dates), put together with rather more technical skill, but not, fundamentally, a bit better invented. Indeed, it has what I, personally, find an unpardonable fault in this class of work: it cleverly works up your anticipation of some really ingenious climax or catastrophe, and then it fobs you off with mere audacious nonsense. I confess myself foolishly addicted to detective stories. Having a conveniently short memory for plots, I can read and re-read Sherlock Holmes; and I have a pleasant recollection of his not unworthy disciple, Martin Hewitt. But just because I love a good detective story, I resent a bad one; and I have never yet seen a good one on the stage.

So long as we do not know the plot of "Arsène Lupin," we think there may be something in it: the moment we understand it (if that moment can be said ever to come) it tumbles to pieces. Lupin is a burglar of genius who successfully impersonates a deceased Duc de Chamerace, and is the accepted suitor of the only child of a colossally wealthy and idiotic art-collector. As his title and position seem to be fully established and unassailed, one would think this a good opportunity for him to retire from his profession and settle down as nobleman and millionaire. But such sordid ambitions do not, it would seem, appeal to him. He practices burglary as a fine art, with no thought of filthy lucre; wherefore he devotes himself to robbing his prospective father-in-law of all sorts of art treasures, which he cannot possibly sell, and has to put in a safe deposit. No wonder he baffles the detectives; for detectives are apt to reckon on a spice of self-interest among the probable motives of robbery; and when a man disinterestedly despoils art collections, which will one day be his own, of objects which do not and cannot bring him any profit, Sherlock Holmes himself might well be out of his bearings. Detective psychology assumes sanity—the peculiar sanity of the criminal—in its subjects, and may not unnaturally be nonplussed by a lunatic burglar. Meanwhile, the art-collector (who is evidently no connoisseur of character) engages as companion to his daughter a young Russian lady, who is, like his ducal son-in-law, a thief. Lupin recognises in her a kindred spirit, falls in love with her, and shields her in a peculiarly inept robbery which she commits. Finally, he outwits the Sherlock Holmes of the play, by means of a trick elevator (a monstrous development of the "Raffles" clock) and a preposterous and wholly undeceptive disguise. Really, I rebel (and I should not be altogether surprised if the public rebelled) against the humiliation of an innocent detective by such inept methods as these. It is not playing the game.

The piece is full of loose ends and clumsy devices. Why, for instance, does Germaine, in the first act, take no notice of the somewhat startling circumstance that a gentleman who has called to inspect one of her father's automobiles is detected in the act of purloining a rope of pearls? She lets him go off with his associates to bargain for the motor-car, without giving her father a word of warning. No doubt Germaine is a goose, but her conduct in this case is imbecile. Though every one is perfectly conscious of living in an atmosphere of larceny, every one continually leaves valuable objects trailing around for the purpose of being stolen. In the last act, when Lupin, apparently cornered, has handed to the detective all sorts of priceless and quite portable objects, that officer, instead of buttoning them up in his pockets, is careful to place them on a table for the express purpose of letting the burglar re-possess himself of them. An action which cannot be carried on without the aid of such flagrant stupidities is surely an insult to the meanest intelligence. Why does the detective employ ridiculous handcuffs connected by a chain which can be snapped at a single wrench? Why does Lupin keep carefully secreted a sham bomb, and treat it and speak of it, when there is no one present whom he wants to deceive, as though it were a real infernal machine? The answer is plain: there is someone present whom he wants to deceive—namely, the audience. If audiences relish being thus clumsily taken in, the play will succeed; if not, we may hope soon to see the clever company, including Mr. Gerald Du Maurier, Mr. Dennis Eadie, Miss Alexandra Carlyle, and Miss Rosina Filippi, in something better worthy of their powers.

THE MISUNDERSTANDING OF DARWIN.

SIR,—In the "Fortnightly Review" for August there is a really remarkable article, by Mr. E. B. Iwan-Müller, on "The Cult of the Unfit."

The author, after heading his work with a title which is absolute nonsense ("The Cult of the Unfit"), declares himself to be a Darwinian—not a passive, contemplative Darwinian, but one anxious to teach "the practical lessons involved in acceptance of the theory of evolution." And this he proceeds to do by applying what he understands of the doctrines of evolution to the "grave problems" of poverty and unemployment. Needless to say that he goes ahead on the easy and somewhat worn-out lines of classing the poor and the unemployed among the unfit, and of then attempting to prove by means of biological data that to assist the poor and the unemployed is to cultivate the unfit.

But we do not quarrel with Mr. Müller for turning Darwinism into a class weapon. What does concern us, however, as students of Darwin, is this gross misinterpretation and distortion of his teaching. This is unpardonable.

Mr. Müller uses "fit" and "unfit" in two senses, without each time specifying the particular sense intended. "Fit," biologically, merely means "adapted to environment." In this sense a tape-worm is "fit"—in fact, a tape-worm actually is an egregious example of the survival of the fittest. "Unfit," therefore, does not necessarily mean low, or base, or poor, or unemployed, in the biological sense, it means merely unadapted—just as some great artists have been unadapted—Beethoven, Mozart, Bizet, Whistler, Rodin, Nietzsche, for instance, and hosts of others. In the strict biological sense a fine quadruped (like the lion) may be less fit than the cockroach in our kitchens. When Mr. Müller speaks of the unfit, therefore, as the unadapted, he is right; but when he speaks of the unfit in the human sense—that is to say, as creatures which it is a political and natural crime to cultivate, he is obviously wrong; because then he invokes our taste, our human aspirations, and our racial ambition, and, according to these, Mr. Müller's unfit may be precisely those we should like to cultivate. Is this clear?

Suppose we take Mr. Müller quite seriously. We then find that his article is no more than naïf, for he has to subscribe to the following propositions:—

1. Marie Corelli belongs to a class of novelists who ought to be cultivated. She is surviving triumphantly.

2. Thomas Otway belongs to a class of dramatists who ought to be suppressed. He died of starvation.

3. The pavement-artist belongs to a class of painters who ought to be cultivated. Some of them make a good living.

4. Jean François Millet belongs to a class of painters who ought to be suppressed. He was on the verge of starvation all his life.

This is obvious nonsense. But Darwin gives one absolutely no warrant for this puerility. He attaches no human valuation to the words "fit" and "unfit." If he did, he would be unable to show that parasites are also examples of the survival of the fittest. How, then, is Mr. Müller justified in implying that there is a "duty" to be done in regard to his "unfit," which a "benign Radical Government" does not do? Mr. Müller, we presume, does not divorce all human valuations from the words "fit" and "unfit"? He does not really subscribe to the propositions given above? (See Herbert Spencer's Essays, Vol. I., p. 379.)

There is one assumption underlying the whole of his article, and that is, that the conditions reigning in the civilised world at present are a desirable and satisfactory test of superiority or inferiority (we do not use the words fitness or unfitness here, for they connote no superiority or inferiority).

In conditions which are undesirable, the fittest which survive are, of course, "fit," but not necessarily "superior" in a human sense. In fact, given really base conditions, the unfit, biologically, might be the superior individuals in a human sense. Now, where does Mr. Müller make any attempt in his article at showing that the unfit nowadays are inferior, because the conditions now reigning are the best possible conditions for testing superiority? He attempts nowhere to do this. Had he upheld modern society as the best possible form of social organisation for the testing of superiority and inferiority —however much we might have disagreed with his point of view—at least his article would have been consistent in itself. According to him, however, the test of success is alone final—no matter how undesirable, unsatisfactory, unfair, foolish, and chaotic the conditions may be, the fittest which survive, in the biological sense, are the superior in the human sense.

This is the conclusion of his article. My objection to it is that it is an abuse of science. It is an abuse of Darwin. And it is an abuse of the reader.

In saying this, in all sincerity, I should like it to be understood that I in no way wish to support the policy that Mr. Müller attacks, for I know too little about politics. My sole desire is to call attention to the misunderstanding of Darwin which a reading of Mr. Müller's article is bound to reveal.

It is precisely this misunderstanding which no doubt helped to make that scientist so surprisingly popular all over Europe towards the end of last century; for, when his doctrine is interpreted as Mr. Müller interprets it, it certainly gives a scientific sanction to all those who may happen to have reached the top of the tree, whether by fair means or foul.—Yours, &c., ANTHONY M. LUDOVICI.

Letters to the Editor.

THE GORRINGE CASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I offer a small defence of the position held by me, and by yourself, against the criticism of Mr. James H. Robertson.

It is said by Mr. Robertson that my letter on the Gorringe case is "special pleading." I take it that Mr. Robertson does not wish to be discourteous, and that in this little controversy he aims at accuracy; therefore, that he uses the phrase in its strictly legitimate sense. I find it stated that "the function of the special pleader was important to the English practitioner whether in preparing documents or in detecting defects in those of the adversary"; and further, of special pleading, that "its strictness and subtlety were frequently a subject of complaint." In this sense, I am content to accept Mr. Robertson's statement.

When, however, I turn to his argument, I find him urging that the £3,000 a year was not taken by the public from the gross annual value, because Mr. Gorringe was obtaining in return certain public benefits such as "police, street cleaning and lighting, sewerage, and other sanitary services." Mr. Robertson forgot to mention the support of the poor and of workhouses, which ought surely to have been included in the reasons for the contribution. He also forgot that this £3,000 taken by the public represents only a portion of what Mr. Gorringe had to pay, since the annual value of the building also comes under the survey of the rating authorities; the total rate being, one may suppose, at least £6,000 a year. When one is desirous for accuracy, I think these things should not be ignored.

But my argument had reference solely to the amount taken from that which, but, for the public claim, would naturally have gone to the owner of the land. As you, sir, so rightly put the case, any subvention given in aid of the rates would reduce the share taken from the owner of the land—would, in fact, go into his pocket. This, surely, is elementary doctrine. Mr. Robertson objects that, in return for what the public take, the public give something in the way of services. I have always understood a fundamental principle of all rating and taxation to be that the public authority shall give something. We do not suppose that we are paying rates simply for amusement, or out of good nature. We look to get something back again. I do not think Mr. Robertson would agree that he himself ought to pay "for his share of certain definite services" and something over, which, ex hypothesi, he does not owe; and I think Mr. Robertson would object if his rate demand note were presented to him, claiming so much for this service and so much for that, and a considerable addition for which no valid reason in the way of benefit could be set forth.

May I suggest, however, that in regard to police, street lighting, cleansing, sewerage, and paving, it is probable that the rate per yard of frontage charged on Muswell Hill is enormously lighter than that charged per yard frontage of Mr. Gorringe's land—lighter, that is, in comparison with the actual cost of the services rendered. Even in the matter of workhouse accommodation, I imagine that Mr. Gorringe and the Duke of Westminster would pay in proportion to the services rendered them a very much higher rate than Mr. Robertson. In other words, the proportion paid out of this value of the land is enormously heavier in the case of the Duke of Westminster's land than it is in that of the neighborhood where Mr. Robertson resides. Therefore, as it seems to me, when the enumerated services are paid for, there is still in the Gorringe case a very large balance which is taken by the public for services not actually rendered towards the efficiency of the land on which Mr. Gorringe's premises are built, and the owner of the latter therefore is paying much more than the costs of the services "as essential in the main for the carrying on of his (Mr. Gorringe's) business as the electric light and water he uses."

To my mind, Mr. Robertson shows the essential weakness of his position when he intimates that the public should take from the value of this land something very much greater than the value of the services rendered, and upon this principle he founds himself. The principle can only be justified upon the general theory that we rate people on the basis of ability to pay, and not upon that of payment for services rendered. My contention is that we do rate on the basis of ability to pay, and that, therefore, a very much larger amount is paid by the Duke than would be required if he had himself to make provision for his share of the general lighting, street cleansing, and police in front of the land on which Mr. Gorringe's shop is built, and for the workhouse accommodation which he may or may not require.

May I put the case in a way which may perhaps make it even more clear? Prior to the new lease, the amount of rating falling on the land was distinctly less than afterwards. I do not know the amount of annual assessment, but in my letter of August 19th I suggested that there might be a valuation of £3,500 a year, this being what Mr. Gorringe was actually paying to the intermediaries; and the contribution to rates on this account at 10s. in the £ would, of course, be £1,750. The value of the building was also much lower than after it had been re-built in accordance with the terms laid down in behalf of the Duke of Westminster. If I may judge from experience of renting a site and building an office in another part of London, I estimate the ratable value of the erection itself at certainly not less than that of the land. In the Gorringe case, I think the valuation of the new building would be greatly in excess of this. If, however, we take the two as equal, it appears that, prior to the granting of the new lease, rates were paid to the extent of £1,750 upon the value of the land, and an equal amount on the value of the building—a total of £3,500 a year. This, I think Mr. Robertson will agree, represented the amount taken in rates—from his point of view, to cover the cost of various public services. Under the new lease, however, the contribution would be very greatly increased. It would certainly be £3,000 on account of the land value; and, if we add another £3,000 in behalf of the building itself, we have a total of £6,000 contributed towards the rates, an increase of £2,500. Whereas I think it cannot be disputed that the public services rendered during the last few years of the old lease did not materially differ from those when the new lease and extra payment came into force.

Of course, my point is that, even on Mr. Robertson's own showing, and if I accepted his conditions, there is a margin of several thousands a year, which has no fresh equivalent in public services.

I submit, therefore, that the "obviously incorrect" has become the obviously correct, and that a very large sum has gone to the public revenue, which otherwise must have been taken by the Duke—that is, a considerable slice of the "unearned increment" has been diverted from private to public purposes.—Yours, &c., LEODIENSIS.

Sept. 1st., 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is considerable pleasure in replying to a piece of clear straight-thinking such as "Leodiensis" can put together, and I trust you will permit me that pleasure. I ignore the last paragraph, in which he throws away part of his statements in order to keep within figures which are excessively safe. Let us assume with him that, all things considered in the negotiation between Mr. Gorringe and the Duke of Westminster, the land was valued at £6,000 a year and that the rates taken by the public authority amount to £3,000 a year. The rates would actually be more, because property is rated not only on the value of the land, but also on that of the buildings. It conduces to simplicity, however, to confine our attention to the land, of which, following "Leodiensis," we are assuming that the Duke takes two-thirds, and the public authority one-third, of the annual value.

Now the public authority for its one-third supplies certain services to the community, in which, as the user of a certain value of land, Mr. Gorringe receives the benefit. Streets, lighting, public sanitation and police services are matters in which the occupier as such is directly interested, and these the public authority supplies for its one-third. But what does the Duke give for his two-thirds? What has he given or done at any time?

It is being realised by an increasing number of people that the mere taking and holding of natural resources does not in itself constitute a right against mankind. All values owe their existence to the demand which depends on the presence and needs of the community. But the ownership of that which the individual brings and offers to the community as the result of his own effort (whether it be improvements in land or movable goods) is quite a different thing from the ownership of the site or the original and unproduced contents of the land.

The single taxer maintains that the value of these natural resources should be the basis of all taxation, to the exclusion of all other values, whether of personal services or of objects brought into useful form or situation by human effort. And the science of economics knows only these three classes of real value; that is (1) natural resources, (2) human effort and services, and (3) the objects adapted by human effort to supply human needs.

The Liberal Party has not adopted the single tax, but "Leodiensis" clearly shows that Mr. Gorringe would have been quite willing to pay £9,000 a year in rates and taxes on his premises, were it not for the tribute which the Duke of Westminster levies on the use of the land he did not produce. Who can say, in view of this, that the single tax on land values would not suffice for the public needs?

A more immediately practical question is whether the community is to be content with one-fifth of the future increment beyond the £6,000 a year tribute already levied? The force of public opinion will very soon insist that so far from the Budget making too great a claim on landowners, the claim it makes is altogether too small. Those who feel this most strongly are glad to see a beginning made in the right direction. But when the first step has actually been taken the next must be taken without delay.—Yours, &c.,

F. U. LAYCOCK.

SIR,—There seems to be great confusion in the minds of your correspondents about the Gorringe Case. They apparently make no distinction between ground rent and rack rent, and are evidently bewildered by the different utterances of the Cabinet Ministers.

Mr. Asquith, who is a born statesman, spoke as the logical lawyer, when he said at Bletchley "Every man is entitled to exercise the rights that the law gives him." Yes, but when his Grace the Duke of Westminster, in assessing the terms for a new lease to Mr. Gorringe, who had worked hard for forty-five years to attract trade to a street possessing previously little or no commercial value, and who had had to pay heavily for every interest he had disturbed in the enlargement of his area (by way of goodwill, costly alteration of premises on short leases at rack rents, and so on)—when, I say, his Grace the Duke took the value of the ground, mainly created by the labor of Mr. Gorringe, plus the premiums and rack rents paid by him for getting possession of adjoining premises, as the basis of the new ground rent for a site on which was to be erected a palatial pile of buildings, and, moreover also demanded from Mr. Gorringe, as a preliminary, £50,000 premium, virtually purchase money for the goodwill of his own business, it became an infamous abuse of an iniquitous law, and may equitably be called blackmail.

One correspondent says, "Mr. Gorringe was willing to pay £50,000, &c." What arrant nonsense! Mr. Gorringe himself told me that he regarded the terms as so outrageous that he very nearly abandoned the scheme.

Let the readers of The Nation bear in mind that the case referred to is no exception. I enclose for your perusal the Armbrecht case, typical of scores of others, where deserving tradesmen have been turned out and deprived of the hardly-earned results of years of toil and anxiety without hope of redress.

The Budget, sir, bears the impress of far-seeing statesmanship in every line, but I do appeal to the Prime Minister, I appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to remember that tenure is even more important than taxation.—Yours, &c.,

John Lewis.

"THE TERRITORIAL FORCE UNDER MILITARY LAW."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The tone and substance of your correspondent "Verity's" letter, in your issue of the 21st inst., are regrettable.

His remarks are based on two misconceptions in regard to military law, namely that it is degrading, and that its imposition on the Territorials is by way of a penalty.

As a matter of fact, it is a promotion for the Territorial to be placed on the same footing with the professional soldier. And there is every reason why he should be so placed. While in camp he is a soldier; it was his own choice to become one; then let him be subject (as he himself wishes to be) to a soldier's conditions. To make such a distinction as your correspondent suggests between one kind of soldier and the other would be taken as uncomplimentary, both by the Territorial and by the "regular."

Military law is a despotism, certainly; but I deny that it is a degrading one. Obedience is the first law of the military man, and is essential alike to discipline and to the acquirement of knowledge without which his service would be worthless.

What if the law is administered by the Adjutants (who, by the way, are the most competent to administer it); what if a man does now and then suffer abuse, or if his sergeant or officer is foul-mouthed (although not, on that account, necessarily a blackguard); what if one does have to perform menial work? These things do no harm to a man who is robust enough to take them in the right spirit; if he is not that, he is not fit to bear arms.

Moreover, I protest against the idea that menial work need be degrading. Those who find it so are usually the ones who are put on to it for shirking or "miking"; these are no acquisition to any corps. The roughest and dirtiest menial work, such as that of the sergeant cook and his staff, is mostly done by men who volunteer for it; they do not find it injurious to their self-respect.

To argue that the present system is liable to make the men "nervous . . . . lest they should unwittingly offend" is mere nonsense. Your correspondent can hardly have seen a Territorial camp from the inside, or he would have known that nervousness and estrangement are found only amongst the inefficient, the non-efficient, and the knock-kneed; and these are few in number.—Yours, &c.,

W. E. Sykes.

THE BUDGET INCREMENT CONCESSION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—In your notes of August 21st you refer to two Budget points on which a misunderstanding appears to have arisen; viz., the exempting of undeveloped land up to five acres, if occupied with a dwelling-house, and the ten per cent. exemption of the increment duty.

In regard to the latter, you infer that the ten per cent. reduction is on the first sale or transfer, and not on the successive transfers. I hope your inference is true, but have you any special grounds for such an interpretation? With the concession of the valuation at the cost of the State, Mr. Lloyd George should have withdrawn the ten per cent exemption, as no longer necessary, and as undermining the Budget pledge to retain twenty per cent. of future increment for the public who create it. When I saw your explanation of August 21st I felt somewhat reassured to think that at least a part of the twenty per cent. would eventually reach the public. On reading the excellent reprint from the "Daily News" "50 Budget Points," I found in point 49 an illustration of a piece of property in King-street, Manchester, which was withdrawn in 1881 on a bid of £20,250 and sold in 1900 for £40,000—showing an increment of nearly 100 per cent. in nineteen years.

Between 1881 and 1900 the property was sold and resold eight times. On six of these occasions the increment was under ten per cent., and on the other two occasions only just over ten per cent., with the result that, instead of the £3,600 which would have been due to the public under the original Budget proposals, only £140 would come to the Treasury if the first ten per cent. exemption is allowed on each successive sale or transfer.

Seeing an instance of this kind newly advanced in an influential and reliable Liberal publication, backing up the Budget on the grounds of its great moderation, it makes one wonder which interpretation of this clause is the right one, the "Nation's" or the "Daily News.'" If the latter, then the increment duty is practically a dead letter, because the great bulk of the land will not reach or exceed the ten per cent. exemption. Add to this, the five-acre garden concession as an "amenity" to placate the big Tory dukes, the exemption of agricultural land, the right of owners to re-apportion or manipulate their estates from time to time, in order to avoid having to pay too much of the publicly created increment duty, the fact that all present values are now given for ever to the present private owners, that profitable London and big town slums practically escape altogether; and what becomes of the general all-round ground-value taxation we were led to expect from the present Government? As Mr. Lough has pointed out, this is now barred from future imposition. Surely under such disappointing circumstances Mr. Lloyd George will never allow the ten per cent., or half of the bare twenty per cent. remnant promised, to be filched from the creating public on every successive transfer! If he does, then the land clauses had better be dropped altogether, and a small ground value tax or rate on all land substituted, as in parts of Australia and New Zealand. This would be a start in real ground-value taxing.—Yours, &c.,

H. Horner.

LANDLORDS AND LABORERS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I suggest that the cry, "Back to the Land," applies quite as much to the landlords as to the laborers? Absenteeism is one of the great curses of the present land-holding system, and if the landlords have to curtail their charities and the amount spent on labor when the Budget is passed, let them give up their London establishments and live on their estates, whence their wealth is derived. We want more landlords of the type of the late Earl of Leicester, who could hardly be tempted to London, unless under the most urgent plea of duty. He was lord lieutenant of his county, as well as a great territorial magnate; and he used to say that his duty was towards his tenants, and the people of the country generally look upon it that the day must come when farming will become a partnership between landlord and tenant, and when the former must share the losses as well as the profits of the latter. This can only be done by both being on "the spot."—Yours, &c.,

THE PROPOSED MOTOR ROADS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—It is surely strange that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should call his proposals with reference to roads uncontroversial, seeing that they violate every canon of Liberalism and democracy, and constitute a subordination of the public good to a class interest more violent than anything that has proceeded from a Conservative Administration. For, shorn of legal verbiage, the proposals amount to this:—

(1) That new roads are to be made for the special benefit of a particular class which only constitutes 1-500th of the population.

(2) That the whole of the taxes derived from the special luxury of this wealthy class is to be devoted to their amusement and advantage.

(3) In addition to these extraordinary advantages this small class of wealthy people is to receive assistance by being empowered to levy a toll on all their poorer fellow-citizens, who may desire to use these roads.

(4) Meanwhile the great bulk of the community are to receive no corresponding advantage by being freed from the daily terror and inconvenience inflicted upon them by motorists, who are to be permitted, not merely to have special roads for themselves, but also to continue to use the present roads as at present.

(5) The one feeble barricade that the law of 1903 raised for the protection of the public against motor-cars is to be non-operative on the new roads; so that non-motorists who use the new roads will not only have to contribute to the advantage of motorists, but also run a very good chance of getting killed.

On this question the non-motorists are like the Lapps and Tartars, mentioned by Lord Rosebery; and Parliament does not represent the feelings of the electorate.—Yours, &c.,

THE POVERTY OF THE COTTAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you permit me to say how much I appreciate the letters of two of your correspondents on the "Poverty of the Cottage"? In my early days I knew it from the inside, and a few months of rural wandering has supplied my note-book with abundant material strongly to endorse all that they have written on the tragedies of village housing and village economies.

Of the inadequate supply of houses or the ghastly horror of many so-called dwelling-places in most villages, every reader of THE NATION is undoubtedly aware. I often ask myself, depressed at the seeming hopelessness of the problem, What on earth is the good of teaching children something of morality and the value of personal hygiene, when we compel them to live in places where it is impossible to practise the elements of common decency?

But the remedy? Will the Town Planning Bill help? Will it give power not only to local authorities to build—composed, alas! of many people with little imagination—but is there to be a power behind them? That is the heart of the matter. But whatever may be attempted in this direction, I plead on behalf of my friends, the agricultural laborers, that nothing shall be done in the direction of solving this root problem, this imperial problem, to build down to the present economic condition of the laborer.

A member, who represents a rural constituency, one of the most lovable and sympathetic of men, has just erected six excellent cottages. These are to be let, I am informed, with an acre of ground to each house, at £10 per annum. That member has imagination, and those houses will set a standard to which all future building in that village will undoubtedly approximate.

Given money at a cheap rate for a long period and the necessary compulsory powers to parish or district councils to procure land and build, and in time the village hovels may give place to something more worthy of the name of home. Those powers, however, must contain a minimum standard of building, below which no locality should be allowed to fall.

Of the poverty of rural life—poverty in its widest sense—who can write with restraint? In many villages in Cambridgeshire wages are 12s. a week. At the beginning of summer, owing to prolonged wet, little work was possible in the fields. No work, no money! At the end of a wet month in one village between twenty and thirty men, driven to desperation, tramped eight miles in the pitiless rain to the nearest Board of Guardians for some assistance. Just think of that for a decent, sensitive man—and these poor are sensitive. Sixteen miles' tramp for able-bodied men to beg, cap in hand, for a little relief. Twenty names are in consequence missing from this year's list of voters. I said to a big farmer a few weeks ago: "There will at least be an opportunity for all of them to make an extra sovereign at harvest, won't there?" "No," he replied; "we discharge some men at harvest time."

I have no heroic remedy to suggest. A strong branch of the Agricultural Laborers' Union in every village would do much to give the laborers a better wage, as it would certainly help to kill that ox-like patience which is an almost inseparable hindrance to economic improvement. But I hope to live to see the day when the proposed machinery to deal with sweated trades may become law, and include within its beneficent scope one of the worst sweated of them all, the agricultural laborer.

I could write much on the eagerness with which men in every village are grasping at the new opportunities which the Small Holdings Act is slowly, but none the less certainly, bringing to most of them. In that magnificent piece of Liberalism we have the key which is opening the door to almost infinite possibilities. But I have trespassed too long upon your far too valuable space for my inadequate plea, and I will only add in conclusion one word to your correspondent in whose letter I find an echo of what one frequently hears from a certain type of farmer, viz: that the present-day system of education prevents them getting cheap boy labor. I do not want wilfully to misunderstand your correspondent, but what does he mean by his tirade against education? Does he mean that the children of the laborer should be ear-marked for the plough? Or, if not, what, in his opinion, is the right kind of education to be provided in village schools? His reply should prove interesting.

With the deepest gratitude to you, Sir, for your powerful advocacy of all those causes which aim at a national minimum standard of life for the poor and needy.—Yours, &c.,

A WANDERER.

Cambridge, August 26th, 1909.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As the writer of the above-mentioned article, I have read with great interest the two letters on the subject which appeared in a recent issue. I should like to endorse every word Mr. Mackenzie says on the housing of the poor in country villages. It is all true, more than true, true ten times over. I could tell of horrors, tragedies, caused by overcrowding in country villages—doubtless every country clergyman could do so. As to the condition of the cottages—well, I have myself lived in one for twelve years, with the rain on the bed and the rats on the floor. When these wretched shanties are pulled down no new ones are built. I think if the temperance agitation could be bodily diverted into a crusade in favor of decent houses for the people the gain would be enormous, not least to the cause of temperance itself. When writing the article I did not speak of this, because one can only say one thing at a time, and having mentioned a "circus" I naturally thought of "food." The "circus" is really the third, not second need of the poor. I think they run (1) food; (2) houses; (3) circus. If the first two needs were supplied they would appreciate the third. At present they don't. Country children will look with dull, unamused eyes at baby elephants playing cricket, hitting away the ball and shambling across the stage, and the attendant fixing up the score of their runs. This is because they are underfed and overcrowded.

"Senex Quidam Presbyter" takes the typical view of the "better classes." He says "thirteen shillings a week is quite enough to keep four people in reasonable comfort; a frugal and capable housewife would save money out of it." I would point out that sometimes the housewife has to keep not four people, but ten (herself and her husband and eight children), on the thirteen shillings a week. "Presbyter," too, seems to think that only food has to be provided with this money. But it has to do for everything. What about boots, for instance? A woman with a big family and this money once said to me, "Why, there isn't bread after Tuesday." How can there be? The "salmon tins" are probably the last evidence of hopeless wretchedness. The most poverty-depressed of cottage women frequently run up bills for sardines, apricot jam, and the like. It saves firing, saves the trouble of cooking. The cottage woman, generally speaking, thoroughly dislikes cooking, in spite of the kind instructors who from time to time descend and teach her, say, how to make a bombe. Her great need, I must repeat, is something to cook. Give her that, and the cookery will come. The upper classes appear to me to be simply children in their view of the poor. I remember a little girl whom I told that some friends had gone on a walking tour, "taking their cooking things with them." "Oh," she said, "I suppose they've taken an omelette pan and a soufflé pan." This shows quite as much knowledge of the facts as the ordinary well-to-do talk about the poor. "The man of Uz, and U without the Z, Have need of patience."—Yours, &c.,

"SUFFRAGETTE TACTICS."

SIR,—Under the above title there appears in your issue of August 28th a short letter signed "Medium Templum," mainly devoted to an attempted demonstration that the denial of the vote to women is "defensible on the ground both of justice and expediency." The writer, citing one possible mode of giving women the suffrage (viz., "to enfranchise all adult women, in which case there would be a majority of women electors in almost every constituency") observes: "This would be unjust, because women have no right to declare a war which men must wage, or to introduce conscription, in which only men would serve."

On this basis, what becomes of the "right" by which men carry through, as at present, by an exclusively (not merely preponderantly) male vote, legislation affecting women far more intimately than men, legislation indeed more truly to be described as affecting "only" women than the waging of war or the establishment of conscription can be said to affect "only" men? What are we to think of the reasonableness of an opponent of the suffrage who can take into his hand such a weapon as that argument and not realise that its heft is as sharp-edged as its blade?—Yours, &c.,

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE STAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am not concerned to defend Mr. Walkley against your strictures or to belittle the pretensions of Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Granville Barker, and the other dramatists who are aggrieved because a Censorship will not let them produce what they regard as their best dramatic work. We have, however, had one dramatist in this country whose height I still regard as greater than that of the whole lot put one upon another's shoulders, and in the "Midsummer Night's Dream" he has at least suggested his own censure upon the art he wielded so well. You may remember that when the play of "Pyramus and Thisbe" was being performed, Hippolyta became femininely contemptuous. Thesus reproves her:—

"The best in this kind are but shadows, and the worst are no worse if imagination amend them."

It was not to teach or to evolve problems in morals that this worker in "shadows" tried; he was content to hold the mirror up to nature, and to be regarded not as a teacher, but as a workman and artist.—Yours, &c.,

A WARNING FROM THE UNITED STATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think the following extracts from a letter just received from an American kinsman, who has taken his share in political life, may be of interest:—

"I have been watching English politics with much interest. The outcry against taxing the 'unearned increment' strikes me as the height of absurdity. Even in this country, which is loaded down with a protective tariff, we are not quite so silly. 'Unearned increment' gets taxed here, and I suppose in all civilised nations except Great Britain. . . . . In this country we are said to have revised our tariff. This only means that there has been a shaking up, and that the 'interests' have had another struggle among themselves for a fairer division of the spoils. The unfortunate consumer is just where he was before. The people of England had better be careful, I think, about 'protecting' English industries. Once adopt the system (and it can only be adopted by humbugging the consumer) and our experience in the United States shows how hard it will be to get rid of it. In the debates in Congress you never hear a word bearing on Free Trade or Protection as principles, but only of the claims of this or that section whose manufactures want to continue 'protected.' I sometimes wonder if anything except a regrettable political convulsion will overthrow the system."

You are welcome, sir, if you think well, to publish these remarks.—Yours, &c.,

WOLF'S EYES.

[From the French of Jean Richepin.]

THE hang-dog fellow looked at me askance,
And shut his lips, mumchance.

He said no word to quicken charity;
But thrust his hand at me.

No glibly muttered thanks fell from his tongue
For the poor dole I flung;

But in his gray wolf's eyes was plainly set
His reading of the debt.

They said: "Dost think, proud fool, for ha'pence thrown
To have me all thine own?"

They said: "'Tis I that make thee charity;
Thou givest nought to me."

They said: "In giving thou alone canst find Comfort, in being kind."

They said: "These ha'pence given, and thou art free
To lord it virtuously."

They said: "What kingly right is this, to thrust Thy fellow in the dust!"

They said: "My right it were to spit at thee,
And spurn thy charity."

They said: "I take it; but thou canst not lift
The curse that dogs a gift."

This message in the gray wolf's eyes was set;
For so he read the debt.

And I, too, looking on his hang-dog face,
Said nothing for my case;

But fingered yet more ha'pence; went my way,
With nought at all to say.

For there was truth in what the wolf's eyes said;
And, shamed at heart, I fled.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

PROFESSOR GILBERT MURRAY has completed a translation of the "Iphigenia" of Euripides into English verse, and it is probable that the play will be performed at one of the London theatres during the autumn.

MR. B. SEEBOHM ROWNTREE, whose book on the social and industrial conditions of York is one of the most valuable of recent contributions to practical Sociology, has completed a book called "Land and Labor: Lessons from Belgium," which will be published by Messrs. Macmillan during the autumn. The work deals with the social and economic condition of Belgium, especially with reference to the land system, and attempts to show the relation between the system of land tenure and the general well-being of the people. Other matters such as taxation, education, temperance, the railway system, and household budgets are also discussed, and the whole study has been undertaken with a view to showing how this country may benefit by Belgian experience.

FOR many readers there would be something wanting in an autumn publishing season that did not bring them an anthology by Mr. E. V. Lucas. His title this year is "Some Friends of Mine," and the volume will contain a series of character sketches by favorite authors. Mr. Lucas also promises a collection of essays, to be called "One Day and Another." There are few living essayists who write in so engaging a style as Mr. Lucas, especially when he treats of bookish topics.

"SHELLEY: THE MAN AND THE POET," by Mr. A. Clutton-Brock, announced by Messrs. Methuen for publication early in the season, is not a complete biography but a narrative of those facts which seem to throw light upon the poet's character and art, accompanied by a running commentary upon both. Mr. Clutton-Brock writes at some length upon all Shelley's chief works, and makes use of original documents as far as possible.

NEXT week Mr. John Lane will publish "Carlyle's First Love: Margaret Gordon—Lady Bannerman," by Mr. R. C. Archibald. Froude stated that "Margaret Gordon was the original, so far as there was an original, of Blumine in 'Sartor Resartus,'" but the assertion has been disputed and the distinction has been claimed for Miss Catherine Aurora Kirkpatrick and for Mrs. Carlyle. It can hardly be doubted that Blumine in "Sartor" and Jane Montagu in Carlyle's unfinished novel "Wotton Reinfred" were drawn from the same model. Carlyle worked at the latter book immediately after his marriage, and Mrs. Carlyle was hardly the woman to remain silent had she suspected that the heroine of what was intended to be Carlyle's first "real book" was someone other than herself. It seems probable that Carlyle made Blumine an idealised portrait of his wife, though he may have painted into it traits from the two other women who had most attracted him.

ENGLISH translations of no fewer than three works by Professor Rudolf Eucken are to be issued this autumn. Mr. Fisher Unwin has in preparation "The Problem of Human Life as Viewed by the Great Thinkers from Plato to the Present Time." Under the three headings of Hellenism, Christianity, and the Modern World it presents and criticises the different philosophies of life that have been put forward by famous thinkers. "The Meaning and Value of Life," announced by Messrs. Black, is a shorter work containing in simple form the fundamental convictions of Eucken's philosophy, while "Christianity and the New Idealism," to be published in Messrs. Harper's "Library of Living Thought," is a brief examination of present-day religious thought. Professor Boyce Gibson, who was the first to make Eucken known to English readers, has supervised the translation of the first two volumes.

A REVISED and expanded edition of Mr. J. M. Robertson's "Montaigne and Shakespeare," containing some additional essays, is to be issued by Messrs. Black. In the new edition Mr. Robertson brings further evidence to support his contention that Montaigne's essays had a great influence upon Shakespeare's thought, and he also argues against the counter theory that the poet was deeply read in the classics. Mr. Robertson is almost the only thorough English adherent of the scientific school of literary criticism founded by M. Hennequin, and there could not be a better exposition of both the method and practice of that school than his two volumes of "Essays Towards a Critical Method."

"THE SOUTH COUNTRY" is the title of a book by Mr. Edward Thomas, narrating what the author has seen and thought in his rambles through the English southern counties, with the exceptions of Dorset and Somerset. It will be published by Messrs. Dent. Mr. Thomas is the biographer of Richard Jefferies, and his work is marked by something of Jefferies' power of observation and delight in an open-air life.

AN abundance of family papers as well as documents in the public libraries, dealing with the Hicks and Hicks Beach families, have been employed by Mrs. W. Hicks Beach for a volume of memoirs which Mr. Heinemann will shortly publish under the title "A Cotswold Family—Hicks and Hicks Beach." It contains some hitherto unpublished letters of Sydney Smith, who was at one time tutor to the sons of the family, as well as other letters dating from the reign of Elizabeth to the present time, which are said to contain many curious illustrations of life and customs in an English county.

THE manuscript of a completed work has been found among the papers of the late Jonas Lie. It contains a collection of fables closely resembling the same author's "Goblins," and will be published at once by Gyldendal, of Copenhagen.

THE results of a journey of exploration in China by Dr. W. E. Geil are to be given in a book called "The Great Wall of China," which will be issued by Mr. Murray. Dr. Geil is the first European who has traversed the whole length of the Chinese fortifications—1,700 miles. It appears that quite a number of great walls have been constructed by the Chinese, and Dr. Geil treats of the history, legend, sociology, botany, and zoology connected with them. Another work to be published by Mr. Murray is Lord Balcarres' "The Evolution of Italian Sculpture." It relates the history of the plastic arts in Italy, and analyses the methods and ideals of the different schools.

AMONG Messrs. T. & T. Clark's theological announcements are a translation of Professor Theodor Zahn's "Introduction to the New Testament"; "The Gospel of Reconciliation," by the Rev. W. L. Walker, the author of "The Cross and the Kingdom"; "An Introduction to the Architectures of European Religions," by Mr. Ian B. Holborn; and the second volume of Dr. Hastings' "Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics."

ARCHITECTS AND ARCHITECTURE.*

ARCHITECTURE differs from the other arts in this, that the merely mechanical and journeyman portion in it is much more important and bulks much larger to the eye than is the case with other arts. It is no small thing to be able to prepare and manipulate pigments, and work up a fine impasto on the canvas, and it takes time and patience, as the old Italian masters knew well enough, and as we in these days are rather apt to forget, to acquire such knowledge perfectly; and it is no small thing, too, to attain a sculptor's mastery over marble and stone, and to be able to cut and polish it to the required dimensions, and this, too, requires time and training. Nevertheless, this command over his materials, in the case of the painter or the sculptor, we readily take for granted. We assume that the painter or sculptor can make paint and marble do what he, according to the measure of his knowledge and inspiration, requires of them, and we go on at once to ask of the picture or the statue what it contains in the way of inspiration, what thought it embodies, what emotion it is charged with. But with architecture it is otherwise. Here the merely material part of the art is so important, so preponderating, that it is difficult to get beyond it. All sorts of intricate professional problems confront the architect at every turn. He has to handle matter in such vast masses, and in such an infinite variety of ways, that the mere knowledge of how so to dispose and handle it becomes in itself almost a profession. The complex questions which arise in connection with the construction of a great building—the proportion of weights to supports, the nature and extent of foundation, the kinds of material best adapted for every part, the planning of the vaults, the right estimation of their side-thrusts, and the meeting of such thrusts with pier or buttress in due proportion—all these and a thousand other difficulties, some tremendous and structural, others elaborate and delicate, are of so engrossing and so technical a nature that they constitute an end in themselves. A man is already an architect, and no mean one, who has thoroughly mastered the capacity of his material, quite apart from the quality of his ideas. He may have nothing whatever to say, but he passes simply because he knows the language.

In the building of architecture, in the criticism of architecture, in all the ideas that are circulated and presented to the public in connection with architecture, this predominance of its technical aspect plays its part. In the first place it has had the effect of throwing the appraising, criticising, and general explanation of the art almost entirely into the hands of its professional exponents, for none but people with "expert knowledge" are supposed to be capable of grappling with the difficulties of the subject. So that, while almost all critics of painting and sculpture are non-professionals, and deal with the effects of those arts, almost all critics, lecturers, and writers of books on architecture are themselves architects, and deal with its causes. And in the second place, the preponderance of technical interest in architecture has its inevitable effect on architects themselves. For in the same degree in which the difficulties of the subject warn off the outside public, so they tend to imprison and enmesh the profession. Constantly revolving in their minds the complex problems of their art, occupied day by day with the laws which govern the disposal of their material, the natural inclination of professional architects is to repose on the belief that their art consists in these problems, and is bounded by these technical laws. They fall into the habit of regarding the material view, and the structural laws by which it is organised, as the sole factors in the evolution of style. Mr. Jackson, who is one of the most distinguished lecturers and writers on the art at the present time, goes what is called the whole hog in this direction. He declared in a series of lectures recently that the explanation of the origin of Gothic was to be found in the fact that the medieval builders were obliged from motives of economy to use small stones, instead of big ones. The classic age, having command of slave labor, could use large blocks of masonry, and indulge in trabeated forms of construction. The Gothic architects, reduced to free labor and small, easily handled masonry, piled up, inevitably and of necessity, the Gothic vault as we see it. The difference is purely in the material. It was the stones that did it, not the men.

Mr. Russell Sturgis, and his theory is the most generally accepted among architects, makes a step forward, and passes from material to structural law. It was the problem of vaulting, according to him, which necessitated and gradually introduced the new style. The Romanesque architects had got a certain way in the solution of the problem, but a certain way only. The steps they had taken, however, necessitated the steps that were to follow. The pointed arch, and all that followed from the pointed arch, were parts of an inevitable and mechanical sequence. The new style "grew," as a plant or a tree grows which contains within itself the impulse and law of its own development. In Mr. Russell Sturgis's own phrase, its evolution was "wholly constructional."

Following the same line of thought, we now have a series of lectures published by Mr. Blomfield, another recognised and professional authority on architectural matters. "The point of interest for the student," Mr. Blomfield asserts, "is how the space is spanned by the vaults, how the thrusts are met, the actual dimensions of the masonry, the proportions of wall to window, in short the actual details of the building." Theories which connect human emotions and ideas with architecture are brushed aside by Mr. Blomfield with some little contempt. Let us leave such notions "to the industry of German speculation," and confine our own attention strictly to "the anatomical structure of the building, the disposition of its planes and masses, the pro portion of its parts, the materials and their treatment."

Considering that architects are the public's almost sole instructors in the architectural art, considering that the public looks to them for an explanation of the meaning and origin of all the phases of the art, it is perhaps in some ways a pity that they should lay such exclusive stress on "the materials and their treatment." Certainly the materials and their treatment are matters of great importance and complexity in architecture, and so long as it is a question of materials and treatment let us by all means kneel at the feet of architects and accept what they have to tell us about vaults and thrusts with due submission. But when they tell us, as they do tell us, that the materials and treatment exhaust the subject, that the secret of the evolution of a great style is contained within itself, is a law of its growth, and that he who follows step by step the development of a style and observes the degrees of change which ensued one upon another, has mastered the reasons of the evolution of the style and fathomed its purpose and meaning, it is time surely to call a halt. It is time to protest that means are not ends, that how is not why, that the steps and degrees by which a change is brought about do not explain the new thought, or purpose, or aspiration in the mind of the age which made the change seem desirable. On many points, on the elimination of unessentials, and the subordination of detail to the whole effect—principles which architecture shares with all the arts, and even with literature—Mr. Blomfield has much to say which, as is apparent even to the amateur, is valuable and suggestive; but there is one point of view he seems never willing to adopt. He never considers a great architectural style as the expression of the mind and spirit of its age, or rather as the impress cast in stone of the mind of its age. Yet this is precisely the point of view from which architecture, to all who are not architects, appears most significant. Greek architecture is pre-eminent for its quality of purely aesthetic beauty; yet even Greek architecture, with its exquisite consciousness of the sense of form, its hankering after perfect definition and delicate and precise statement, is doubled in interest for us when we take it as, what it truly is, the image of the classic mind, of the classic view of life, and classic ideals of conduct. It interprets for us, looked at thus, and lights up, as nothing else can, a phase of intellectual development, the very perfection of which depended on its limitations. And when we come to styles less perfect aesthetically, but into which more of human life and human feeling have been crammed, this human interest naturally increases, and becomes, in some cases, quite the dominant interest. It is the dominant interest in Gothic. All the strong, keen impulses of medieval life; its intense democratic vitality, its religious fervor and exaltation, combined with the circumscribed narrowness of its outlook on life, are fused and blended in a Gothic cathedral, just as they were fused and blended in the lives of Englishmen of that day. It is these influences which still, by the inward affinity we have for such moods, draw and attract us, and certainly a mind open to the architectural language will find itself more filled and penetrated by the consciousness of the medieval spirit through a study of its architecture than by any other kind of study whatsoever.

Moreover, it is to be remarked that this human significance is always present in architecture. Its aesthetic value may vary to any extent. It may be immense, or it may be non-existent. But the human interest is ineradicable. Even present-day architecture, with its random impulses and individual eccentricities, is a perfectly fair record of the mental conditions we live in. No doubt it would be unreasonable to expect architects to be always dwelling on this aspect of the question. They have their own intricate technical problems to attend to, which require study and due explanation. Nevertheless, to an unbiassed onlooker, capable of looking at the matter both from its technical and human points of view, it must seem a matter to be regretted that the recognised exponents of the art should either ignore, or even deny, the very existence of the human interest in it altogether. Even from the professional standpoint it seems a pity; for it is by this that the art appeals to the public. Architects may lecture about materials and their treatment, but it is by that which they ignore or deny, by the human passions and emotions it bodies forth and portrays, that architecture claims most forcibly the interest of living people. Who knows? Perhaps, if the professors of the art were to dwell a little more on this aspect of architecture, Mr. Blomfield would no longer have cause to designate an architect as the "least popular of men."

A FRENCH COURT IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.*

Mrs. Patmore (a daughter-in-law, we believe, of Coventry Patmore) is to be congratulated on a felicitous début in letters. There is nothing hasty in "The Court of Louis XIII.," a work which must have involved much research and extensive and judicious reading, and which, in the choice and arrangement of material, exhibits no small power of historical appreciation. To the common sort of compilation it bears no resemblance whatever. It is of serious as well as of lively interest, and not even among French works on the earlier half of the seventeenth century could we name one in which so wide a tract of ground is so completely covered.

We have to remember, moreover, that whereas the importance of this reign lies very largely in its politics, foreign and domestic, this part of the subject has had to be very sparingly treated. The dominant figure in the France of the first half of the seventeenth century is Richelieu, and though he certainly makes a splendid appearance in the social world, history knows him chiefly as the diminisher of turbulent nobles, the compeller of Parliaments, the builder of despotism. A volume on court life has, obviously, no great concern with Richelieu the minister, but Mrs. Patmore gives us an excellent account of his rise to power and his consummate management of the puppet King.

Louis XIII., the son of Henri IV. and Marie de Medicis, was between eight and nine years old when his father was slain by Ravaillac. We may readily believe that, degenerate as he was, no training would ever have made of him a really king-like man; but his mother—a narrow-minded, meddling, ineffectual woman—gave him uncommonly little chance. The royal child was reared on a mixed diet of birch-rod and powders. For things of the intellect he had neither aptitude nor inclination, and to his tutor, M. de Fleuranges, he said, on one occasion, "If you will let me off my lessons I will make you a bishop." The tutor kept him to his tasks, but neither whippings nor blandishments availed to make a scholar of him. He cooked little dishes (as, indeed, he continued to do through life), played at soldiers, and made cowls for toy monks.

> "As years went on the young king displayed more and more those aptitudes for handicrafts which nearly two centuries later were seen again in his descendant, Louis XVI. If he went to lay a foundation he must also amuse himself with the work of a mason. He shod horses and helped in the removal of furniture. A house-moving had been among his childish games. 'He had,' remarks one historian, 'all the points admirable in a valet, but none belonging to a master.'"

His mother, encouraged, perhaps, by her extraordinary favorites, the Concini pair, kept him from all participation in affairs of state, and allowed him to be severely disciplined under the very eyes of the courtiers. Mrs. Patmore finds some excuse for her.

> "Henri IV., in the hour of his son's birth, had laid the sword of government upon the infant form, and recognised him as the property of the State: Cet enfant est à tous; but Marie, her perception blocked, we may allow, by the spectacle of her husband's discursive amours and the laxity of the court in general, resolved, perhaps, that her son should be driven with a tight rein lest he also follow in the same groove. Marie de Medicis has been the victim of much obloquy, but the difficulties of her position are often overlooked. They might have staggered a wiser regent. Unhappily she had no strong man among her advisers, and it is doubtful whether she would have welcomed one had he appeared."

No wonder that Louis banished his mother; no wonder that when the strong man came forward, in the person of the "Iron Cardinal," he found his royal master pliable. For the tremendous purposes that Richelieu entertained he could not have picked a more perfect instrument.

Louis attained his majority on the completion of his thirteenth year, and at fourteen he was married to Anne of Austria. That poor little princess (who was one day to become a rather powerful woman, with a very definite will of her own) had made a much worse bargain than she fancied. Her sovereign lord was still taking black draughts, and going to bed in terror of ghosts, and his kennels received a larger share of his attention than his bride. Mrs. Patmore says:—

> "Those early months of marriage must have been a time of dreary disillusionment for Anne of Austria. No happy domesticity followed on the promise of the first day at Bordeaux. It was not until April 18 [they had been married in the previous November] that the young pair took even a meal together. Formal visits were paid by Louis to the Queen, and sometimes she would return them in his rooms, where he even rose on one occasion to the preparation of a little feast of sweetmeats for her, but was obliged to stretch himself, exhausted, on a couch before she arrived to accept the hospitality. A monarch and a husband lolling on his couch and playing with his silver soldiers during his queen's visit within a few months of marriage, must have damped enthusiasm.

Although the marriage of Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria took place in 1615, the prince who was to ascend the throne as Louis XIV. was not born until 1638. Louis was not, like his father, a rake with whom no woman was safe, but he seems to have been almost destitute of natural and wholesome affections. He was, as the author says, a wry-minded and flabby creature, at once callous and effeminate. His personal reputation is by no means as hideous as that of Henri III., with whom the line of the Valois went out in black disgrace, but all sound-minded persons at his court must have viewed with contempt his unmanly friendships and pitiful bickerings with favorites of his own sex. Here was a king who could cook an omelet and mend a smock, and there is little else to be said about him. The favorites whom he alternately slobbered over and snapped at, died or were beheaded, and he ordered out his hounds and gave them no farther thought. As the hour for the execution of Cinq-Mars was approaching, the King, who at one season would not let him from his sight, pulled out his watch and exclaimed: "Ah! before long M. le Grand will be having a bad time." Such was the monarch in whose service Richelieu wore himself out at the age of fifty-seven.

Mrs. Patmore gives us finished sketches of every member of the royal family, and of the statesmen, soldiers, gallants, viveurs and amoureuses who at one time or another occupy the scene. Among the ladies is the charming and pure-minded Louise de Lafayette, who, beloved by the King in his anæmic way, "fled to the cloister lest she should be false to her own ideals and to her royal mistress." Among the men is the gay Bassompierre, courtier, memoirist, and stout soldier, whom, in one crisis of his career, we behold burning his collection of 6,000 love-letters. At least, he tells us there were 6,000 of them, and no one can any longer gainsay him. The story of Cinq-Mars is told in detail, and with a few artistic and gravely dramatic strokes Mrs. Patmore brings before us the scaffold on which he and de Thou yielded up their heads with brave courtesy.

There is an excellent, racy, and faithful chapter on meals, modes, and manners. Certain modes and manners of seventeenth-century France are none too easily described, whether in English, in French, or in Latin; and if everything were told, and the account were printed, writer and publisher would probably be introduced to the magistrate at Bow Street. Mrs. Patmore, with a sure instinct, has known how to avoid the shocking, while giving a very fair notion of the actual.

The chapter that follows, "The Court as Patron of the Arts and Literature," is charming too, but students of the French literature of the period will scarcely be satisfied with Mrs. Patmore's rather cursory treatment of Malherbe. Malherbe, although the school that he founded was only just coming into its own forty or fifty years after his death, is a distinguished name in a very distinguished century, and we are not permitted to question his genius. But let us once again take leave to insist that this is a book of quality.

A PILGRIM IN PORTUGAL.*

Who is the happy traveller? It is he who can lose his train and snap his fingers, his purse, and only feel the richer, who cares not whether he walks or drives, nor when he reaches his journey's end; who can dine off a crust, sleep under the stars, and find a friend in every man he meets. He reads no guide-book, but carries a classical library in his head, is ignorant of geography, but knows the beautiful in every land, cannot tell a cotyledon from a phagocyte, but is deeply learned in the human soul. In short, your happy traveller is the imaginative man. Unfortunately, he is seldom met with on his journeys. You may search the best hotels in every capital in Europe and find him nowhere; you may go to Switzerland for the winter sports and he will have escaped you, sail round the Grecian Isles in company with Dr. Lunn and miss him from your party, take a circular trip to India or the Nile and yet continue to avoid him. And you may travel throughout the length and breadth of the United States, and no one will so much as have heard his name. But go to your bookshelves and see if you may not learn something of his whereabouts. For has he not journeyed with a donkey through the Cevennes and walked the path to Rome, painted travel pictures in Italy or the Hartz mountains, and sentimentalised in France? Seated in an arm-chair by the fireside, you may wander in his company all over the world and share with him unfatigued the glories of adventure and the sweets of freedom.

There is, however, another sort of traveller, less happy, but not so rare. He journeys soberly and in comfort, taking with him a Baedeker, a kodak, and a fund of useful information. He is learned in history and agriculture, and only selects hotels where the cuisine is guaranteed. He is careful to visit every place of interest, taking accurate notes of all the local customs. On his return he writes a book of travels for the benefit of those who stayed at home.

Mr. Koebel has made the tour of Portugal, and his impressions are faithfully recorded in the volume before us. He tells us that Lisbon is famous for its lights, its lean cats, the Praca Don Pedro IV., some exceptionally fine water works, an aqueduct, and the Avenida da Liberdale. It boasts at least two excellent hotels and a magnificently situated Archæological Museum. Much of Old Lisbon is exceedingly picturesque, and the monastery of Belem and ruined Carno Church are well worth visiting. Particularly noteworthy is the Lisbon tramway service, the speed, efficiency, and enterprise of which put those of many another capital to the blush.

Beyond Lisbon is Cintra, whose beauties the attentive reader of Byron and Southey will readily recall. At Callores a gathering of peasants invites the attention of the student of human nature; there is an exchange of courtesies, strawberries, and cigarettes, and an examination of the local cheese. The Portuguese peasant is commended for the amiability of his disposition, his good manners, and the purity of his body linen. At Alemtejo the swine herds and shepherds offer further opportunities for analysis. They are simple and friendly, illiterate and conservative, living contentedly on bread, oil, and lentils, and clinging to their own arithmetical system and the old Moorish wooden plough. Between master and servant the relations are natural and unrestrained; the peasant brings his troubles to the master for solution, trusts to him in sickness, and jokes with him on equal terms. He is a hard worker, and there are few countries where men labor more consistently, with less supervision. Meeting him on the road, the stranger may be struck by his dilatory pace, but the cause is not indolence but justifiable fatigue.

> "It is seldom that both passing man and beast are not burdened to the exclusion of the possibility of any ambitious flights of speed. . . . The men are weary from their labors, if not from their loads; while the women in gorgeous petticoats, brilliant head gear, and with the few gold ornaments that represent their fortune in their ears and upon their breasts, go staggering beneath bundles of corn or hay that they have gleaned."

Cork forests and olive-groves are the background of the south, wild flowers are everywhere, over them hovering butterflies, clouded yellows, red admirals, swallow tails, and fritillaries. Lizards dart across the road, hawks sweep overhead, and by the side flits the hoopoo, with tufted head and brilliant wing. But the cork forest, as we are reminded, is not merely a beautiful, but a necessary, factor in the life of the Portuguese. The substance of cork pervades all things: chairs and doors are made of it, troughs for ducks and hens, drinking cups and ladles for mankind. "Doves fly homewards to cork cotes; bees buzz in and out of cork hives, and if dogs fail to sleep in cork kennels, it is because the peasant seldom owns a dog, and as for the dog, he owns a kennel more seldom still."

No book of Spanish travel would be complete without a mention of the bull fight. Mr. Koebel's account is vivid and spirited, but the reader will (or should) be relieved to hear that the Portuguese, unlike the Spanish, bull fight, is a comparatively humane affair; no horses are killed, and the bull returns to his stall only a little the worse for wear. The attractions of the performance are, indeed, more acrobatic than sanguinary, and skill in avoidance of danger is rated as highly as efficiency in attack. Here is an account of a neat tour played by the forcados:—

> "The devoted half dozen have gathered together again. With tense muscles they face their redoubtable opponent for the third time. Exhilarated by his late triumph, the animal charges again. This time the knot of men sways and yields; but its members do not scatter. As the bull dashes through, one man leaps upward directly in his path. He has clutched—and found a firm grip of the horns. With his legs astride of the very nose of the maddened animal, he is being swept with a rush through the air towards the barrier. But the others are racing by the side of the bull. One has seized his tail, and hangs like grim death to the appendage, while the remainder spring upon the flanks and clutch. In a few seconds the bull is motionless—held fast. No mere strength could effect this. The knack of the proceeding that holds this great body in leash is amazing. At the sight one wonders whether the forcado is not worthy of a less humble status in the ring."

The illustrations to the book are charming.

A BOTANIST IN SOUTH AMERICA.*

In ways undreamt-of by those whom illusive reports of vast treasures beguiled thither in olden days, South America has proved a veritable El Dorado. For there explorer after explorer has found in her fauna and flora a wealth of material for knowledge of Nature's "works and ways," untouched by the artifice of man. Among those who returned laden with the riches of primeval forests, the late Richard Spruce has prominent place, and to no more capable and sympathetic hands than those of his friend, Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, could the labor of reducing his copious journals and other records to order have been entrusted. Spruce died in 1893, and not until four years ago was Dr. Wallace able to command the time for that work. Outside the small circle of botanical specialists, Spruce's name is little known; hence the more welcome is the biographical sketch outlining the main incidents of a life which "the children of this world" would hardly pronounce successful, and which was one prolonged struggle with impaired health and narrow means.

Son of a schoolmaster, as were both Spencer and Huxley, and, like Dr. Wallace, for a while, a schoolmaster himself, Spruce's passion, from boyhood till death, was the study of plants, notably of the humbler orders, mosses and liverworts, which possess for the botanist the attraction of that vast antiquity held by the lower organisms in fee simple, and which, in the economy of nature, perform a more enduring service than the flowers, whose colour and fragrance delight the senses. An early convert to the doctrine of natural selection, he wrote in 1871:—

> "I am more Darwinian than ever. I feel certain that if we had all the forms now in existence, and that have ever existed, of such genera as Rubus, Asplenium, Bryum, and Plagiochila, we should be unable to define a single species—the attempt to do so would only be trying to separate what Nature never put asunder—but we should see distinctly how certain peculiarities had originated and become (temporarily) fixed by inheritance; and we could trace the unbroken pedigree of every form."

Wanderings on the moors and among the woodlands of his native Yorkshire, and such expeditions to the Pyrenees and other happy-hunting grounds as time and money permitted, produced in Spruce a well-equipped cryptogamist, and secured him encouragement and aid from Bentham and other leading botanists to explore the region stretching from the mouth of the Amazon to the mighty Andes. It suffices to quote the verdict of the veteran Sir Joseph Hooker upon the achievement of Spruce. "No doubt his monumental work on the Hepaticæ is his crowning one, and will ever live." Skilfully as Dr. Wallace has woven together the scattered record, the volumes do not furnish matter easy for quotation, and the reader in quest of references to such subjects as, e.g., the manners and customs of people among whom Spruce spent fifteen years, will find these too sketchy to be of much service. Spruce admits that Bates's "much longer residence in Brazil enabled him to give a far more complete account of manners and morals," and in this matter the "Naturalist on the Amazon" will not be superseded. But we light upon a passage which occurs in a letter written from Barra do Rio Negro as far back as 1851, and which clerics of to-day may, perhaps, ponder with advantage:—

> "I wish you Englishmen would agree about some general comprehensive system of education. It is painful to read the accounts of the squabbles, and to see what narrow-mindedness exists, about a subject of such vital importance; and all this time your prisons are filling with young delinquents for whom the State has never provided any intellectual or moral training. Cannot this last be given apart from any doctrinal teaching? For really, at this distance from the scene of controversy, how insignificant to me do most doctrinal differences seem—more than half of them mere matters of opinion!"

A full index guides the reader through the miscellaneous contents of a work indispensable for fuller knowledge of the botany of South America.

AVENGING CHILDREN.*

In "Avenging Children," Mrs. Mann gives us a sequel to one of her best novels, "The Memories of Ronald Love," and though her hand is as practised as ever, she would probably admit that the work is of her second best. Sequels are things difficult of achievement. Either the characters take their revenge on the author by growing out of all likeness, or else they stiffen and repeat the original impression they made on us. Mrs. Mann has reintroduced only two old characters, Ronald and his father, but both of these act in a wooden and lifeless fashion, as though they were tied down beforehand to a course of action over which they have no choice. "Avenging Children" is a variant of the proverb about the parents having eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth being set on edge, and though the moral is a sound one, we rebel at being led with a firm, but kindly, hand along the predestined path.

Ronald Love is the illegitimate son of the distinguished Norwich physician, Sir Erasmus Clough, who has contrived to shut the mouths of scandal-mongers by marrying off his mistress, the sweet, heedless Nancie, to Tilly, the market gardener. Poor Nancie has pined and died, and little Ronald has thereupon been adopted by the doctor's charming young bride, Eleanor. When the sequel opens, twenty-five years have passed, and we find Ronald, a man of thirty-one, is about to be taken into partnership by the Norwich cloth manufacturer, Mr. Blore, who is anxious that he shall also enter into a family alliance and marry Grace, his gentle, docile, and much-bullied daughter. It is the mid-Victorian era, the days of chignons and crinolines, and of domineering Paterfamilias with outbursts of tempestuous irritability, men who were "managed" by their womenkind. Grace, who pleads "I do not want to be married yet, papa," does not care for Ronald, but is in love with the handsome and dashing Alfred Clough, who visits her secretly every evening with the connivance of Matilda, her old nurse, and on this point, as in most other respects, Mr. Blore, who lectures and guides and guards his daughter, hedging her round with the most absurd restrictions, is left entirely in the dark. Very painful, and all too true to life, is this picture of the sensitive, nervous girl of nineteen, who is driven into accepting the man she has no feeling for, simply because she dare not face the paternal thunderings. Mrs. Mann is always at her best in her cruel portraiture of erring masculinity, and the fatuous Mr. Blore, "a man of the highest principle and the soul of honor," is relentlessly drawn. The scene of the dinner party, where the worthy manufacturer informs the whole table as to the exact system on which Grace has been reared, the details of "boiled bread" and woollen underclothes being conspicuous in the programme, is almost as good as some scenes in Miss Austen's "Emma." It must be conceded that Mrs. Mann, even when her psychological analysis seems faulty or overstrained, possesses the secret of making her characters live. But only an uncritical reader could be satisfied with the conversations between the rivals, the steady, deep-natured, manly Ronald, and the brilliant and high-spirited Alfred Clough, who, at bottom, is vacillating and shallow. Alfred, in his off-hand relations with his father and mother, in his haughty demeanor to Ronald, and in his sustained pose as Prince Charming to Grace, is exaggerated in drawing, and at times unreal, but Mrs. Mann has seized so well the essential build of his nature that he lives in our imagination. Ronald, on the other hand, is rather too self-denying and faithful, too consistently deep and true in pattern to convince us that the author has seen him from all sides. The man is there, it is true, but, like his father, the stately Sir Erasmus, he serves as a foil to the women folk, and we get tired of his negativeness. On the other hand, the women, Lady Clough with her mother's infatuation for her handsome son so strong upon her that she cannot be fair to Ronald in spite of her desire, and Grace, alluring in her adorable childishness and appealing timidity, have all the fine shades of feeling by which a character stamps itself on the reader's memory. Mrs. Mann follows her instinct unfalteringly when she writes of women, and if she has not created any feminine types so original as Thomas Hardy's Sue in "Jude the Obscure," she has drawn quite a gallery of everyday women, wives, mothers, and maids, all essentially feminine in their ruling impulses, and all true to their domestic environment. The parts of Mrs. Mann's novels are nearly always superior to their effect as a whole, and why this is so it is a little hard to say. In the case of "Avenging Children" Mrs. Mann seems to be telling us a true story known to her at second-hand, one that needed filling up and amplifying, if not reconstruction, by the artist. The crisis of the tale, for example, when Grace and Alfred Clough elope to London, and Grace is found after a search of five days by her father and brought back to Norwich, alone, needs elucidation We understand, of course, that she is his wife in all but name, but the drama lies there, in Alfred's hot and and cold fits during this episode, and this the author, for some mysterious reason, shirks. Mr. Blore's headstrong imbecility is very true to life, and the passage we quote below is characteristic of Mrs. Mann's insight into the irrational basis of human obstinacy. Excellent also are many of the scenes that follow. Grace, practically forsaken by Alfred, who has fallen in love with an actress starring in Norwich, Miss Bella Ringer, is forced to confide her anguish to Ronald, from whom she had run away, and the ambiguities of Ronald's relations with her and Mr. and Mrs. Blore are all most natural in their irony Alfred Clough naturally makes a sad hash of his affair with Miss Ringer, but we are inclined to think that the story would have gained much in artistic poignancy if he had not conveniently been got off the scene by suicide. The moral, "men's pleasant vices are instruments wherewith they scourge themselves," is obtrusive, and destroys the last act of the drama; for Grace and Ronald ought to be brought together against all the forces by which society, time, and occasion keep them apart, but once Alfred is off the stage, the end is a foregone conclusion. On the whole, if Mrs. Mann fails in "Avenging Children," it is because she crowds her canvas with too many side developments, and does not restrict herself enough to the leading issues. The story, like all her work, is clever, and the following passage is a very fair example of her artistic energy:—

On the morning after Grace's return, her father had sought an interview with Sir Erasmus Clough.

"I have come here," the merchant began, "to tell you what I think of the conduct of your son."

The big, turbulent man was red and heated, he panted and spluttered in his talk; a painful contrast to the other, pale with anger, but restrained and dignified as ever in his bearing.

"I decline to hear it," he said. "My son is almost a boy still. In what they did the responsibility rests equally with your daughter."

"I have not spared my daughter."

"I can believe that you have not."

"And I do not intend to spare your rascally son. I have told him publicly, once, what I think of him. I have had, indeed, the gratification of knocking his hat over his eyes with my umbrella; a crowd looking on. In public or private, in future—wherever we meet, in fact—he will hear my opinion of him again. I am not afraid, as perhaps you are aware, Clough, of having opinions, or of expressing them. In whatever society I find him I shall express myself to him again; and shall probably knock his hat over his eyes as on the former occasion."

"You will find yourself in the position of being bound over to keep the peace, Blore," Sir Erasmus said with grim lips. "Now, be good enough to restrain yourself for a moment, and let me get in a word. An instant's consideration should show you that it is not to your advantage, or your daughter's, that our families should quarrel. After what has taken place, my son must marry your daughter. He will not shirk the responsibility he has incurred, and his mother and I sanction the marriage. If you like I will give you my word of honor to further it in every way."

"Never!" Blore cried. "Never!" he brought down his closed fist into the open palm of his other hand, and glared in the doctor's pale face. "I give you my word of honor, there, Clough. Man! if I meant them to marry, what do you suppose I separated them for?"

"It was the act of a madman. Don't ask me to explain it," Sir Erasmus said with cold contempt.

"Marry, did you say? Marry my daughter? No, nor touch her, nor speak to her, nor, while I can prevent it—and I swear to do it, or die in the attempt—come within a mile of her again."

There had been an intimacy of twenty years between the men; the doctor had been used to the violence with which the merchant's intentions had been expressed; unfortunately he had had, many a time, occasion to witness that his actions were as little dictated by expediency as his words.

"In your saner moments you will become aware of the folly of the position you have taken up. When you do we will talk this matter over again," Sir Erasmus said. His face was set and white, he looked at the crimson, boisterous man before him with a cold distaste in his steel-blue eyes. "In the meantime," he went on with still impressiveness, "I should like to say this. I am doing my utmost, wherever I go, to make the best of this foolish business, and to stop the tongue of scandal. I advise you, Blore, to do the same"

"The tongue of scandal?" Blore repeated. His expression changed; he looked at the other with a surprised questioning in his eyes. "Who dares, do you suppose, to speak of my child in connection with scandal?"

"You," continued the doctor levelly, "know the particulars of their flight, and are doubtless assured of the innocence of the relations maintained between the pair. But, remember, the world is not acquainted with these details, is not eager to believe them, when it is told. For the inevitable tittle-tattle you are responsible, Blore. You should have stayed with them until they were married. You have made a heavy, irreparable mistake."

But while he said it he knew that Blore, poor bullying blunderer, was of that terrible order of man who, having made a mistake, abides by it, fights for it, dies to maintain its wisdom

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. C. H. Sherrill's "Stained Glass Tours in England" (Lane, 7s. 6d. net) has most of the good qualities which we noticed in this American writer's previous volume, "Stained Glass Tours in France." The arrangement is equally systematic, so that the utility of the work as a guide-book is not less; and we derive from the record of the Tours the same pleasurable impression of first-hand observation and genuine enthusiasm. The Tours are four in number and are planned according to periods, not places; that is to say, Mr. Sherrill has adopted the same period designation as exists in architecture, classifying them as Early English, Decorated, Perpendicular, and Renaissance. Under this scheme, famous cathedrals which possess stained glass of more than one period are visited more than once. York, for instance, comes into three out of the four Tours. Mr. Sherrill does not confine himself to describing the glass of our world-renowned shrines. Secular buildings such as the Guildhall at Coventry and Bishop Abbott's Hospital at Guildford have come under his notice, and in several comparatively little-known country churches he has discovered good examples of stained glass. Generally speaking, this country is richest in glass of the Decorated and Perpendicular epochs. Examples of Early English are few; those of Renaissance work still fewer; and what there is of the latter is mainly of foreign manufacture. During the middle periods, on the other hand, France was too much occupied with the Hundred Years' War to produce much glass, and it was then that the English craftsmen brought their art to its highest achievement. Later, the influence of the Renaissance was only dimly felt in this department, and few of the home-manufactured results of the movement survived the attention of Puritan iconoclasts in the seventeenth century. Hence it is mainly to the Decorated and Perpendicular epochs that one must look for noble specimens of native stained glass. A notable feature of early and later English glass is the use of grisaille. As Mr. Sherrill points out, the English glassmakers recognised from the first that our grey climate prohibited the wide use of those rich, light-excluding colors so much in vogue in sunny lands, and, keeping in mind the fact that the first duty of a window is to admit light, employed grisaille with a free hand. By instances of this kind he shows how English stained glass, while largely owing its beginnings to Continental example, quickly acquired individual characteristics and developed along national lines.

To compress the main events of the French Revolution into less than three hundred pages, and, at the same time, to avoid making the record a mere catalogue, is no easy task. Mr. R. M. Johnston, Assistant Professor of History in Harvard University, very nearly succeeds in this double aim in his "The French Revolution: A Short History" (Macmillan, 5s. net). He begins by a brief discussion of the most important histories of the period in which he recognises Mignet's work "in its negative manner" to be to this day "one of the best general histories of the matter." He also points out that in Jaurès' "Histoire Socialiste" we have "a new phenomenon, history written for the laboring class and from the point of view of the laboring class," and that it "presents the Revolution under the aspect that gives most food for thought and places it most directly in touch with the problems of the present." A chapter entitled "Versailles," in which Mr. Johnston describes the results of Bourbonism, and another giving a statement of the economic crisis that led to the summoning of the States General clear the ground for the narrative portion of the book which ends with the year 1799 when Napoleon seized power. We think that Mr. Johnston does a little less than justice to both Mirabeau and Danton though his treatment

In "My Life as Farmer's Boy, Factory Lad, Teacher, and Preacher," Mr. Adam Rushton (Clarke, Manchester 3s. 9d. net), who is a veteran Unitarian minister, provides us with an autobiography that alarms us by its proportions. It extends to about 350 solidly printed pages. Nor is this all, for we are informed when the end is reached that there is a second volume to follow, containing a trifle of some fifty-seven chapters. Prolixity notwithstanding, this autobiography includes sufficient about other people to save it from the reproach of an undue egotism. The description of the conditions of child labor in factories in the good old days has the piquancy of the first-hand; and the account of the Wesleyan revival, if one can disentangle it from the stream of self-interpolation and spiritual reminiscences that runs through it, is of some historical value. The great defect of the book is the absence of the selective faculty. We are treated to a great number of little autobiographies of men whose sole claim to the public memory is the fact that the writer knew them. Neither will posterity be greatly interested in reading here what Miss Marie Corelli wrote elsewhere on the subject, "If Christ were to come again." Again, much of the argument—of which there is enough and to spare—is given in dialogue form, a literary device that, so far from creating lightness of effect, adds ponderousness to themes already ponderous. Mr. Rushton's experiences were perhaps worth recording, but his book needed the careful and drastic editing of its over-long and occasionally incoherent pages.

Money remains superabundant and very cheap in spite of the fact that all the available gold in the open market last Monday was taken by Austria. The Bank's position is still very strong, and so far there seems to have been no difficulty in financing America's big crops. The wheat and oats of the United States are now mostly harvested, and a third of the Canadian crop is also safe. Great progress has been made with harvesting in the South of England. In many counties, notably Wiltshire, Somerset, and Gloucester, the farmers are having a year of record prosperity. Everything now points to some cheapening of the loaf; for the outlook of the sown crops in India and Australia is very good, and the Argentine drought has at last broken up. The trade recovery is slow, but I think sure. Iron and shipbuilding especially are beginning to revive. On the stock markets the break in the American railway market and some pretty violent oscillations have been a principal feature. The difficulty has been to decide precisely how ill Mr. Harriman is, and, secondly, how injurious to the stocks he controls and manipulates his illness is likely to prove. I have heard a very clever American, who knows Harriman well, predict that within ten years Union Pacific will be once more in the hands of the Receiver. The Underground Electric Railway report shows a further improvement, but there is still a deficit of £16,000 on the six month's working. And yet staff economies have been carried to what some think dangerous lengths. Armament shares have been a little uneasy owing to German newspaper articles in favor of a naval agreement. But the announcement of Baron Von Stengels anti-peace book gave them quite a fillip on Thursday.

English Railways and First Class Carriages.

Even after all the reforms and economies of the last few years there are still some curious examples of sheer waste on our railway lines. Thus there is scarcely an English railway on which the first class carriages pay. On most they are a dead loss. Now why is this? Certainly not because there is no demand from people of moderate means for the certainty of quiet, cleanliness, and comfort. No; the prime reason is that the first class fares are purposely made exorbitantly high because the directors of a railway (having free passes over all the other railways) want always to have first class carriages comfortably empty so that their own travelling may be as luxurious as possible. For the same reason the supply of first class carriages is absurdly in excess of requirements. Hence one constantly sees a train with all the third class carriages crowded and all the first class carriages empty. If the ratio of a first to a third were as three to two instead of four to two, first class carriages would fill up and would pay very well indeed. In my opinion it would be a good thing to abolish free passes altogether. A short Act providing that no railway director may travel without a ticket on any line but his own would vastly improve the outlook in the Home Railway market.

Mexico's Troubles.

Monterey, the capital of one of the Northern States of Mexico, is an important town with some considerable works and factories run by American and British capital. This city and the neighborhood have suffered heavily by fire and flood during the last month. Two thousand lives and much valuable property have been lost. Monterey is the official seat of Governor Reyes, the leader of the Mexican Opposition Party. He is now under the ban of President Diaz, who is said to be endeavoring to arrest him Anyhow, General Reyes has prudently retired from Monterey into the country, where he will probably remain until the political situation clears.

Free Dandelion and Tonka.

"Aside from sausage and shrimps," writes the "Louisville Courier Journal" on the subject of the new Payne-Aldrich Tariff, "both of which are more or less widely used, the free list, under the Payne Bill, includes the following commodities:—

"Balm of Gilead, catgut, dandelion roots, dragon's blood, gambier, ivory tusks, junk, spunk, kieserite, myrobalans, moss, seaweed, plumbago, pulu, rags, turtles, tonka beans, manna and terra alba, not made from gypsum rock."

Here is good cheer for the American consumer. He can feed on dandelion roots and tonka beans sauced with balm of Gilead on days when the manna does not fall, and he can wash his meal down with a tumblerful of dragon's blood—though the tumbler, of course, will have had to pay a thumping duty. Dragon's blood, I am told, is a kind of furniture polish not yet produced by any American trust. Seriously, any Free Trader who wishes to strengthen the weak and convert the fallen should use a copy of the new American tariff as a missionary tract. No wonder the Tariff Reform League is so quiet upon the subject.

Wool Prices and Dividends.

Fifty years ago, when people of all classes had less to spare, it used to be a maxim that when wheat was dear wool was cheap, and vice versâ; the reason being that the more money men required for the purchase of the prime necessity of life (bread) the less could be afforded for secondary necessaries, such as clothing. This summer, however, both wheat and wool have been abnormally high, and Australia has been remarkably prosperous, these being in good years her two staple products. How flourishing the pastoral industry has been is illustrated by the statement of Goldsbrough, Mort & Co., the big Melbourne company, whose profits for the year ending March 31st were £120,000, equal to about 12½ per cent. on the share capital. The management recommend a bonus of 10 per cent. to the staff on their salaries. Wool prices are perhaps dangerously high, but our woollen and worsted mills are well employed and the consumption must be heavy.

Diary of the Week.

It now seems probable that the majority of the Peers, led by the extreme Protectionists and egged on by Lord Rosebery, will take a course equivalent to the rejection of the Budget. The form will apparently be the passing of a dilatory Resolution, such as that by which the Peers attempted to re-establish purchase in the Army. Gladstone was then able to call in the Crown and pass his Bill by Royal Warrant, but, as Finance Bills cannot be carried without the formal assent of the Peers, this course is barred. Ministers could resign; or they could pass the Budget Bill afresh under a form of closure, while the country welters in confusion; or (conceivably) they might ask the King to create peers or promise to create them. But, as no compromise is possible on the question of finance, such a course could only delay the issue, while the Liberal Party will probably feel that if the Lords wish to commit suicide, it is not its business to hold them back.

If these counsels prevail, the rejection of the Bill on second reading or the carrying of a hanging-up resolution will be followed by an immediate dissolution, with a call upon the electorate for power to force the Bill through and to settle for ever the question of the Lords' veto. If, on the other hand, the Bill be passed afresh, a situation essentially revolutionary will be prolonged for a few weeks, and, if the Lords refuse the measure a second time, a dissolution will take place in January or February instead of November. For the latter date the register would, of course, be put forward.

Meanwhile, the party reports show a most determined, united, and enthusiastic feeling on the double question of the Lords and the Land, coupled with splendid reports as to the prospects of an election. On the other hand, the prospect of rejection has already divided the Conservative ranks, the "Spectator" deprecating this course as too violent, and urging that in any case a Unionist victory at the polls should not be interpreted as a mandate for Tariff Reform. On the other side the Tariff Reformers, sensible that between the Budget and the Dukes, Protection is, for the moment, snowed under, are said to be willing to drop their opposition to some, though not all, of the Tory Free Traders. This, in its turn, means the practical, probably the final, disappearance of the Tariff Reform issue. The cry on the one hand would be "The Lords and the Land," on the other "No Socialism" and "Spare our old Nobility." Mr. Stutters, a well-known Unionist workman, urges in the "Times" that an issue thus joined might bring Tory democracy to an end. The Limehouse speech, says Mr. Stutters, "quoted through the length and breadth of the land sways the opinions of those who, even in politics, love novelty." And he adds that on the question of the limitation of the veto "the side which secures the greatest measure of popular support must win."

We observe that the Protectionists and Tory extremists, after raising ineffectual hands to Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour, have set up an appeal to Lord Rosebery, who, appearing (as usual) at the psychological moment, is to lead the distracted host to battle. This new Veiled Prophet of Toryism is counted on, not, indeed, to propose the rejection of the Budget, but to declare afresh that it amounts to a "revolution," and that the House of Lords is within its constitutional rights in "referring" it to the electorate. Such a mode of reference might not be the best possible; but, failing a referendum by law, the Lords were the best available instrument. Lord Rosebery may disappoint these expectations, but this is the kind of language which he is expected to use. If this advice is tendered, it will certainly be taken.

[Since writing these lines we note that Lord Rosebery, verifying our predictions, has declared war on the Budget, and has stated that it must not pass into law.—Ed., Nation.]

On Saturday Mr. Churchill delivered a speech of great brilliancy in support of the Budget. He made excellent fun of the Dukes, who, he said, were like goldfish which blundered on to every hook they saw, and which it was no sport to catch. "Let us put them back gently, tenderly, in their fountains, and if a few bright gold scales have been rubbed off in what the Prime Minister calls the variegated handling they have received, they will soon get over it—they have got plenty more." In its fourth year of office the Government stood in a position of unexampled strength, strong in its past, and stronger still in its resolve to enter "the long avenue of social reconstruction and reorganisation." Could it be doubted that the Budget was a tremendous reinforcement of all the good forces in the national life? The new scheme of insurance against unemployment alone would secure the industrial lives of 2¼ million workers. He quoted Bismarck to the effect that the Commonwealth should be an agency for establishing "practical Christianity," and insisted that the new attitude of the State towards wealth was not merely "How much have you got?" but "How did you get it?"—following up this epigrammatic statement by a striking analysis of the chief sources of modern wealth. The destruction of the Budget by the Lords would be a Revolution by the Rich, and the battle it provoked must be a fight to the finish.

Lord Crewe, speaking at Leamington on Saturday, dwelt with great weight on the Constitutional issue. He declared that all amendments to the Budget in the Lords would be carried at what the railway companies call "owner's risk." If the Unionist leaders meant to enter on a contest with the House of Commons, they ought to be sure they would succeed, as the Commonwealth succeeded against Charles I. Mr. Birrell also declared at Manchester that the Government would do their duty, and steer the Budget to its haven, though they would not allow the Lords to dictate the time of dissolution. Mr. Shackleton, the President of the Trade Union Congress, declared on Monday that the Budget was the "greatest financial reform of modern times," and that its only alternative was Protection, which was merely a scheme for increasing the cost of necessaries. On Wednesday Mr. Keir Hardie, the most powerful of the Labor leaders, declared that the new industrial reforms came from a Government more friendly to the working classes than any Ministry he had hitherto known.

The Licence Duties have been taken through the House at a leisurely rate. The Prime Minister has been in charge of this part of the Budget, while Mr. Balfour commands the little band of brewers that relieves the landlords who fought the land clauses. The chief tactical manœuvre of the Opposition has been to allege a number of hard cases, and to attack the proposal setting up a register of the compensation value on which the licence duties will be based. Mr. Balfour, setting up the signalling process again, declared this to be a fresh case of "tacking," having nothing to do with the finance of the year. To this the Prime Minister replied that it was necessary to make provision for future financial needs, and that to refuse this power to the Commons was to deny them effective control over finance. On Clause 32, which aims at an equitable division of the licence duties between the brewer landlord and the "tied" publican, the Opposition refrained from dividing, while insisting that the brewer would be able to shift the burden.

On Thursday night the Government were able to bring to a successful close the debates on the whole scale of duties—a result largely due to the skilful management of the Solicitor-General, who, like the Attorney, has brilliantly served the Administration. On the other side, Mr. Healy, breaking all his party bonds, has been the most vivacious, and at times the most ferocious, combatant. The final discussion arose on the proposed tax on clubs. This has been wisely advanced from threepence in the pound on sales to sixpence in the pound on purchases, and the Prime Minister calculated that this would yield £100,000 a year. The general line of the Opposition was to urge an equalisation of duties on clubs and "pubs." The Prime Minister replied that the former had no monopoly value, and "distributed" liquor among their members instead of selling it for a profit. Mr. Balfour ingeniously retorted that clubs ate into the monopoly value of public-houses, and that therefore the State should recover on this abstraction.

The Development Bill was read a second time in the House of Commons on Monday and referred to a Standing Committee. The Opposition were plainly disconcerted, and did not put their Whips on to the division, in which only seventeen Conservatives gave a hostile vote. Mr. Chaplin expressly approved Part I., and only one member for an agricultural constituency showed hostility. The strain of criticism came from Tory individualists of the type of Lord Robert Cecil, who described the Bill as an engine of corruption—ten times more noxious, added Lord Morpeth (a Protectionist) than Tariff Reform could be. The Chancellor somewhat minimised the scheme of motor roads, declaring that it would be mainly utilised to secure short routes round villages, and that some such plan was made necessary by the pitiful tale of child death from motor cars. But surely the lives of children on the public roads should be secured by enforcing reasonable speed rates.

Meanwhile, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has concluded an amicable arrangement with the Stock Exchange, under which he substitutes a new scale of stamp duties for the present scale, ranging from sixpence to 2s. The new scale goes up to 20s., but reduces the burden on average transactions. Still more important is the appearance of an amendment to the death duty clauses, which will be discussed next week. This enables the Commissioners to accept portions of the land of an estate in satisfaction of the whole or part of the duties. The land thus acquired may be disposed of "as Parliament may hereafter determine," and will obviously be available for small holdings. An admirable and fruitful provision.

The North Pole has been reached, though not, we fear, by Dr. Cook. On Monday a wireless message was received viâ Labrador from Commander Peary, who has sought the Pole for twenty-three years, and started last March from Cape Columbia, that he had "nailed the Stars and Stripes" to it, while a later message made over this much-disputed expanse of floating ice to President Taft. Peary was back from the Pole—where he stayed one day—by April 27th, when he rejoined his ship, the "Roosevelt." His later messages specifically declared that Dr. Cook's tale was a fable, and that the two young Eskimos who accompanied him had admitted that he went "no distance north," and kept within sight of land. Cook is also charged with having deliberately stolen a march on the regular Peary expedition, and to have taken Peary's Eskimos. The meaning of this charge is undoubtedly that Cook heard of Peary's success in August, when it began to be bruited in Greenland, and deliberately forestalled it by the legend of a triumph a year earlier—i.e., April 21st, 1908, in place of April 6th, 1909.

Dr. Cook's reply to this direct challenge has not been satisfactory. He has declared his willingness to lay his observations before "a council of scientists from all nations," and that in due course he would publish a statement dispelling doubts. But he has evaded all specific questionings. The sceptical attitude to his story rests in the main on (1) the vague and rhetorical character of his narrative, and the doubtful nature of his natural history and scientific suggestions; (2) the haste and inadequacy of his equipment; (3) the occurrence of grave specific errors, such as the repeated statement that he had registered a maximum temperature of 83 Centigrade, or 149 degrees of frost; (4) his failure to produce his diaries, observations, and instruments, which have been sent to America. Hitherto none of the scientists who have expressed qualified faith in him have been furnished with any documentary proofs. Mr. Stead has, indeed, endorsed him; but Mr. Stead has a weakness for all unorthodox discoverers, whether of this world or the next.

The "Times" has secured the publication of Commander Peary's first narrative, and, as far as it has been disclosed, it contrasts sharply with Dr. Cook's limelight phrasing. The speed of Peary's progress from Cape Columbia, which he left on March 1st, was astonishing, far greater than Dr. Cook's alleged pace of fifteen miles a day, which astonished the exploring world. His average on the outer and the return journey was actually twenty-six miles. But his equipment was incomparably greater. He started with seventeen Eskimos, 133 dogs, and nineteen sledges, with seven white men in charge, and seems to have made his final dash (which was begun near the 88th parallel) with five sledges, against Cook's one. He says nothing of the land which Cook claims to have discovered.

On Monday the Spanish troops in the Riff country drove the Moors out of the hills near Suk-el-Arba, and held the ground gained as an advanced position on the road to Zelouan. The troops seem to have been handled well, and the looting after the battle was highly efficient. The Moors, a body four thousand strong, fought desperately, and lost heavily before they made good their retreat on the main army. But the other news of the week more than counterbalances this success. That another division has been ordered out shows how serious a view the Spanish Government takes of its military task. Before the war began, the idea of the Spanish Government was to limit its liability to the peninsula of Melilla, in which the concessions lay. There was this much ground for these hopes. The Riff country was virtually independent of the Sultan, and was, indeed, in open insurrection against him. But since the defeat and capture of El Roghi, the leader of the Riff rebels, the Sultan has made himself master of their country, and this week his authority has been formally acknowledged. The Sultan has from the beginning held that concessions from Riff rebels had no validity, and now that he is actually as well as legally their Sovereign, a war on the Riffs for the protection of the concessions is a war on Morocco and the occupation of their territory an infraction of the Algeciras Agreement. The politics of the enterprise are as crazy as the campaign in itself is dangerous. Meanwhile, the work of repression continues in Catalonia, and Señor Ferrer, in whose release English people interested themselves two years ago, has been re-arrested on a charge of directing the recent riots in Barcelona.

The ex-Shah has left Teheran, and the sale of his public property may relieve the Persian Government of its more immediate financial embarrassments. The Government, putting a bold face on affairs, denies that anarchy exists in any part of Persia, and has organised and despatched a force to police Azerbaijan, the northern province. Its dearest wish, evidently, is to get rid of the Russian troops whose continued presence in the heart of the country weakens the Government and threatens its liberties. We do not know whether Sir Edward Grey has adopted on this question the strong attitude due alike to our rights under the Convention, our policy, and our sympathy with the constitutional Government in Persia. The "Temps" urges us not to be impatient for the withdrawal of the Russian troops; it hints obscurely at a forcible counter-revolution and asks us to wait until things have become more stable. But a country's independence is already lost if foreign troops are to remain on its territory on the chance of some trouble turning up. Russia is waiting evidently in the expectation that the financial difficulties of the new Government will drive it into her arms. That is just what we want to avoid. Persia may need European assistance in men and advice, and probably in money, too. But between advice and loans offered at the end of the bayonet and assistance voluntarily sought by Persia with full liberty of choice there is all the difference. The evacuation of Persia by Russian troops is, therefore, the first condition of a stable settlement.

The published text of the Manchurian Agreement, which was signed last Saturday, confirms the forecasts on which we commented last week. It is a very one-sided bargain, and in Western Manchuria it asserts, at any rate by implication, Japan's right to veto any railway construction by China. So far as railways are concerned, the open door is now closed. The United States, which, under the late Mr. Hay, always took a very straight and honest line when all the European Powers were scrambling for concessions in expectation of early partition, is indignant at the new Agreement; and it would be interesting to know how far the objections of America would carry her if China, for example, were to give an American syndicate a railway concession in the region affected by the new Agreement. The position of Japan in Manchuria is, of course, very exceptional, in view of her sacrifices in the war with Russia; but her action in the recent negotiations is none the less calculated to revive the old mischief of "spheres of influence." The "Times," we observe, still affects to regard the Yangtse Valley as a British sphere, and resents the intrusion of German railway enterprise. But the doctrine of spheres of influence, whether political or economic, is, of course, absolutely irreconcilable with the policy of the "open door," and for that reason it is to be regretted that our support should have been given to Japan in the recent negotiations.

Mr. E. H. Harriman, perhaps the most powerful of the many American personalities who, in the realm of commercial control, have grasped a monarch's power, died on Friday in his sixtieth year, worn out with the effort to run nearly 30,000 miles of railway, to dominate 30,000 more, and to "rig" their finance. Beginning with the Union Pacific, which his genius—he was a great railway manager—plucked out of decay, he grasped line after line until he attained a power unknown even in the land of railroad kings. In the act of buying and floating the stock of newly acquired companies, he made vast sums for himself and his confederates, until his wealth is said to have reached one hundred millions, a store greatly depleted in the panic. Unscrupulous as a financier, he did much to enhance the efficiency and carrying capacity of American railroads, and his last design was to enlarge the standard gauge. He had Napoleonic powers of work. "I have been a pack-horse all my life," he said, and he almost lived in the private railway carriage in which he flew up and down the American continent.

"THE LORDS AND THE LAND!"

THERE can be no doubt that a situation of the utmost gravity, which may easily develop into a state of Revolution, has arisen in the land. The House of Lords is being urged by its friends to seize the supreme power in the Constitution, and is likely to follow their advice. It is called on to set itself up above the Crown, which for two hundred years has ceased to exercise a veto on the acts of the responsible Government, and to aim at the destruction of the House of Commons in the historic function which the representative assembly has established after three hundred years of conflict with the Crown and with the aristocracy. This is Revolution. It dissolves the established theory and the continual, unvaried practice of British Government. It sets up a state of war between taxpayers and the taxing authority, between traders and their customers. It may compel the Crown to choose between the claims of the Peers and the cause of the People. It displaces law by anarchy, obliterating the group of understandings under which the three governing authorities in the realm act harmoniously, or at least peaceably, together. If such a course of action succeed, it must destroy Liberalism, and put an end to the party system, leaving Conservatism mainly faced by avowedly revolutionary forces. If it fails, the House of Lords must cease to exist.

Let us examine the grounds of the extraordinary and unparalleled contention of the Peers, premising that the Conservative Party, in endorsing it, will have surrendered its avowed purpose in politics. Calling itself the constitutional party, it will have broken up the constitutional traditions and implications. It will be no longer a Monarchical party, for it will have dragged the King out of his constitutional reserve, forced him into the party arena, and exposed him and his successors to every wind of unrest that may blow. It will not be a democratic party, for it will have set every element of democracy at defiance. It will not be even a party of property, for it will avowedly act in the interests of one kind of property, that of the great landowners. It will have abandoned the true ground of modern political controversy—the representative assembly—and discredited its own force in the battlefield where all its real victories have been won.

The Party of Landlords will also have chosen an ideal ground of conflict for us. For years every progressive combatant has prayed that the issue might be joined on the joint question of the Lords and the Land. The two questions have always been inseparable They are now to be united with a challenge to the old laws and customs of England, the right of the people to be taxed only by their elected representatives. In the act of "manœuvring for position," therefore, we shall gain everything that a general and an army desire. First a formal union of all our forces in the four kingdoms—Liberalism, Progressivism, Laborism, Free Churchism, Nationalism. Secondly, a fight on a measure which stimulates and maintains to the highest point the element of enthusiasm without which the Liberal Party fights in vain. Thirdly, a blow at an old and hated enemy, of whom it may be said, as of Richard III. on his bed, that in its trouble it can only summon up the forms of those whom it has wronged and embittered. Fourthly, a cause which closely touches the welfare of the people, and raises a clear ground of principle on the one hand, and on the other the fears of a small, favored class, which could disappear to-morrow and leave the country stronger and better for its loss.

Let us examine the point of tactics a little more closely. The Lords are being urged to reject the Budget. Why? Partly because they dare not in policy reject the land taxes, for then they would unmask their own selfishness, and alienate the liquor interest, the main strength of their popular support. But chiefly because they find that they cannot amend. The privileges of the House of Commons stand in the way. All amendments to the Budget Bill, all excisions, would be ruled out by the Speaker as a breach of the privileges of the representative House. Therefore, they cannot touch the land taxes alone, and must strike at them by destroying the entire structure of the Bill. The Lords must cancel the provision for relieving small middle-class men with families, for graduating the income-tax, and for taxing extreme wealth. It is clear that the forms which they adopt to achieve this end will, comparatively speaking, be of small importance. The Lords may throw out the Bill on the second reading by a simple motion of rejection. They may "hang it up" by a dilatory amendment, declaring that they reserve it for further consideration by the electorate. This is their more probable course, and we have little doubt that if it is commended to them by Lord Rosebery in his Glasgow speech, they will eagerly adopt it, hailing their new chief with enthusiasm, and trampling on the fears and cautionary tactics of their leaders, in order to be rid of the menace to their order. For such a plan possesses one obvious advantage. It enables the Lords to control finance, without seeming directly to destroy the taxing power of the Commons. They will ask, in fact, for a Revolution: in form they will only ask for a Referendum.

The result in either event will be the same. The working of the British Constitution is such that if the Lords refuse to the annual Money Bill the formal assent which alone is required of them, they throw the finances of the country into instant and complete confusion. So great faith have British citizens in the sole taxing powers of the House of Commons that they and their law courts accept as valid the mere resolutions which set up the new scales of taxes from the dates at which the Commons declare them to be operative. Whisky duties, tobacco duties, petrol duties, duties paid in life or discharged on death, all come into play. Millions have already been paid on them. If final sanction is withheld, the Treasury, indeed, would refund the merchants. But no one could reimburse the public. They have already been drawn upon for millions of indirect taxes. The Dukes will have paid little or nothing. They will have cut down their hospital subscriptions, and they will have destroyed the instrument which threatens their land. But the Drudges, if the Budget does not pass, will be doubly defrauded.

In hundreds of thousands of cases they will have paid the State its duties and the merchant his profit on them. In both cases they will possess an absolute moral right of recovery, and, failing a kind of national rush to the Courts, no means of making it good.

Far more serious will be the case of the annual taxes —the income tax and the tea duties. When the Budget falls to the ground, they fall too.* Not a penny of income tax can be collected. Not a farthing's worth of tea duty can be charged. Tea can be taken out of bond by the thousands of pounds; ships can flock to our ports packed with free tea. The tea duty for the coming year will be ruined, and speculators will reap immense fortunes at the expense of the Treasury and the consumer. Lesser but still vast gains will be reaped by the conductors of the whisky and tobacco trades. Every conceivable device for ending the confusion must produce financial trouble. Even the "Times" admits that eleven millions of taxes must be refunded. But, as Mr. Frederic Harrison points out, this estimate takes no account of taxes collected at the source, such as the income tax on invested property, which for the last half-year has been paid both on the old and on the new rates. On the other hand, the income tax on professional earnings has not fallen due, and a further cause of inextricable confusion and serious social injustice arises. In a word, if the Budget failed the Government would have to consider the negotiation of a loan, not of eleven, but of fifty millions, an operation which must cause a financial crisis of the most serious magnitude. In any case, great masses of expenditure must be left unprovided for. Only an oppressive tariff, or a thriftless loan, or a tax on the bread and backs of the poor, or all these devices put together, can fill the gulf. Well may the Tory statesmen pause and shrink, while the hotheads push them over the precipice.

Such are some of the industrial consequences of a rejection of the Budget. Their mere consideration is already spreading distraction in the ranks of those who contemplate or further such a course. The Parliamentary correspondent of the "Times" actually suggests that the Government should come to the rescue of the Lords and, entering with them into a conspiracy against the taxing power of the House of Commons, propose a Bill of Indemnity to sanction the unauthorised taxes—i.e., to pass provisionally a portion of the Budget—up to the date of the rejection of the whole scheme. Such a fantasy may at once be dismissed. The Government would not propose it if it could, and could not if it would. A measure which would annul the control by the House of Commons of the annual provision of supplies would fall stillborn. Not ten Liberal members would support it.

But the Constitutional and political consequences would be even graver than the economic results of the rejection or the suspension of the Budget. They, indeed, would reveal at once the violent and reckless character of the action of the Peers. But the political situation would be far more important. Hands would have been laid on the Ark of our political Covenant. A handful of great landlords, anxious to escape their moderate personal share of a scheme of taxation, would have pulled down the essential fabric, the supporting stones and timbers, of the British Constitution. Since the Stuarts no English King has challenged the powers of the Commons in finance. The Peers have respected it, and the last great Tory statesman expressly warned them against the course on which they are now set. No precedents, no authorities, have been produced all through this controversy in support of such an action as interference with the powers of the Commons to tax or to remit taxes implies.

Nor can any half-constitutional, half-national, ground be advanced to cover such an action. The Budget is the most popular Liberal measure of our generation. The hostile agitation is dead; the answering movement in its favor is as brilliant a success as the Limehouse speech, of which a million and a-half copies have been sold. If, therefore, the Lords choose to plunge into a plébiscite, they must do so, not on any signal they have had from the country, praying them to relieve it of an oppressive or unjust or revolutionary measure, but because they are determined that either they or democracy must go under. They will have made the primitive appeal, "Thy Head or my Head." If they win, they destroy us—for a time. If we win, we destroy them.

How can the Ministry—thwarted in nearly all its political activities, and now threatened in the last stronghold of popular Government—receive such a challenge? Can there be a reasonable doubt that the answer must be instant, unequivocal acceptance; an immediate appeal to the people; a General Election within as many days or weeks of the rejection of the Budget as the processes of the law allow?

Other courses nominally, but not really, exist. The Government can resign, or they can set up the Budget again, probably in a curtailed form, and under the rule of closure. Theoretically there is something to be said for each course. But neither is commensurate with the action on which we may suppose the majority of the Lords, driven by their wild men, their Dukes, and their Protectionists, are determined. No Parliament, unless it were prepared to take up arms and renew the physical fight for power which ceased when the King became a more or less constitutional monarch, could postpone the appeal to the ballot-box for an unnecessary hour. The financial situation would demand it. The party, eager to be led against the foe, would call for it. The King could not refuse it. The nation would despise the statesmen who shrank, or even appeared to shrink, from such an issue.

One supreme consideration remains. It will at once be said that a Dissolution would mean that the Lords had claimed and had been conceded the totally new power of cutting short the life of a hostile Government, and also establishing the control over finance which Lord Salisbury denied to them. If the matter of the coming election were the re-discussion of the Budget, we should feel that such an objection was fatal. But no such limitation could be imposed. The real, the fundamental, issue would be the Veto. No Liberal Government could ever take office again till that question was settled and progressive administration lifted for ever out of the maimed, timorous, dependent life which it has lived during the last four years. The moment the Lords reject the Budget, we are in the sphere of Revolution. Liberal statesmanship, stopped from legislating on land, liquor, education, the franchise, and now at last forbidden even to tax a nobleman, has come to the end of its resources; and the people must be called in to say who shall govern England and how.

THE SAN GRAAL OF ADVENTURE.

The world has lost one Arctic hero in the brief space of a week, only to gain another. The mood in which the news of Dr. Cook's exploit was received has passed rapidly from hope to scepticism. But the success of Commander Peary, even before his narrative has reached civilisation, admits of no honest doubt. His character and his record stand plain for all men to read. For twenty years he has labored towards the goal which he has reached at last. He has lived meanwhile in alternations of total silence and world-wide glory. No explorer is better known or more generally respected among his comrades in adventure and his fellow scientists. His writings proclaim the simplicity and modesty of the man, as his records prove his courage and determination. Voyage after voyage has carried him at each attempt a little nearer to the Pole. In his final success there is nothing surprising. It is the crown of a great career, the career of a "generous spirit," which worked to the fortunate end, through youth and middle age "upon the plan that pleased his boyish thought." From such a man the world asks only one authentic sentence, that it may accept his claim. It knows, as his daughter put it, that "if he failed by fifty yards to reach the Pole, he would say so." The authentic sentence has come, and we are assured that behind it will be the full testimony, not only of Commander Peary himself, but of the scientists who accompanied him to assure for his observations the maximum of accuracy and for his records of the phenomena around the Pole the fullest value. The exploit has been no "vacation ramble." It is the last of eight long journeys, and the fruit of a life of endurance, suffering, and study. What will be its scientific value we do not know as yet. It is conceivable that some of Peary's earlier journeys, which broke no record in the struggle to reach the Pole, may be, like Nansen's crossing of Greenland, richer in scientific results than either of their dashes to the North. But as an adventure the thing has fallen out as every generous man and every romantic boy would have wished it to happen. The palm of glory has gone to the ideal "Happy Warrior." It has been wrested from nature by a sheer triumph of the human will, and by the old methods of ship and sledge, to which generations of explorers had trusted their lives. Three hundred years after Captain Henry Hudson's first essay, a sailor of the same race has solved the problem which he set. Had the achievement been delayed another year or two, it might have been some aeronaut with wings for sails, and petrol for dogs, who would have closed the record by entering a verdict of defeat against all who had attempted the task in the brave old pedestrian way.

There is little need to-day to write of Dr. Cook. His brief bid for fame raises a psychological as well as a scientific puzzle. It is at present impossible to accept his claim. If it is rejected, what folly or madness was it which could induce a man, who had already a certain position among Arctic explorers, modest if not unchallenged, to face the obloquy that awaits one who consciously makes a claim which must be mean if it is false? There is little need now to analyse his singularly unconvincing narrative. Its literary style alone conveyed a warning. A man who expresses himself in bombast is a man who values first of all the applause of the ignorant. The Crusoe-like adventures, the picturesque details about shooting Polar bears and musk-oxen with improvised bows and arrows, make a severe claim upon our faith. Much harder to accept is the assertion that Dr. Cook had accomplished in two months the journey from Etah to the Pole, though it is fair to say that on the final dash Peary went faster than Cook. The unfortunate mistake over the recording of unparalleled temperatures, explained away by the simple substitution of Fahrenheit for Centigrade, makes another element of doubt. Astronomers and physicists do not admit that his alleged methods of taking his bearings at the Pole could possibly result in accuracy. It was difficult to understand why an American explorer should have preferred to return home viâ Copenhagen, and elect to leave behind him the diary and the calculations on which his claim must be based. It is still more disconcerting to find that Mr. Whitney, whom Dr. Cook named as the bearer of these invaluable documents, is in no hurry to return to the United States, and has apparently been quite recently the fellow-traveller of Commander Peary, who none the less denies Dr. Cook's entire story. The fabric of evidence seemed from the first to be slight. There were no witnesses. There were no documents. But Peary's telegram to the effect that the two Eskimos who are said to have accompanied Dr. Cook to "the Great Nail" declare that he was never out of sight of land, leaves nothing to stand against all these disavowals, contradictions, and improbabilities, save the solitary voice of Dr. Cook himself. It would be harsh and rash at this stage of the controversy to pass a final judgment; yet this can hardly be a case of an explorer insufficiently equipped, sincerely believing himself, through faulty observations, to have reached a point which in fact he did not reach. Dr. Cook, unless he can prove his claim and confound his Eskimos, will stand confessed a deliberate thief of glory. Nor does he seem at present to be even a skilful or plausible artist. He shares with Madame Blavatsky the distinction of having interested Mr. Stead. There lies behind this claim of one explorer to have anticipated his more famous rival by a year some war of cliques and clubs and newspapers which we in this country can with difficulty follow. Against all the probabilities we have, however, to set the fact that the Danish officials in Greenland, who are not novices in Arctic affairs, promptly accepted Dr. Cook's claim. To a fair trial before an impartial jury of experts he is still entitled, whenever he chooses to produce his evidence. In the meantime, the only fact which interests us is that Peary reached the Pole in April of this year.

There is in all our minds some momentary spasm of regret at the thought that there is now one world the less for Alexander to conquer. The threshold of Thibet has been crossed; the Pole has been trodden; men sail below the surface of the sea, and flight becomes a commonplace. The limits of the unattainable are shrinking, and with each year some breach is made in the flaming ramparts of the world. Yet one may well ask whether this quest of the San Graal of adventure has really filled so large a part in the knightly life of mankind as poets are apt to suppose. Most explorers have had a severely practical end in view. Columbus did not sail to seek the baths of all the Western stars. He went to find a way to the Indies. Hudson, when he opened in 1607 the secular search for the North Pole, was simply a captain in the service of the Muscovy Company, determined to sail across the world's roof to "the islands of spicery." It is only in the last stages of adventure, when the alchemist has despaired of transmuting his gold, and the mariner of reaching Cathay, that the attenuated and disinterested passion, which alone seems to us romantic, begins to lure the explorer and the scientist. The rougher, simpler impulses are still at work, the passion for knowledge is quite unabated, and there are fallow fields enough for all to plough. One suspects that the record of a thorough exploration of Greenland would make better reading than the story of a dash for the Pole, and there are valleys in Albania still untrodden by any Western European since the Latins trampled through them in the effort to subdue the Eastern Empire. Time has its romance as well as space, and Dr. Evans has found in Crete adventures of the spirit more startling than any journey to the Pole. Mary Kingsley, exploring the West African mind, found kingdoms stranger than Timbuctoo, and more secret than Lhassa. The man who will tell us how the mosses and lichens flourish in the Arctic Zone will reveal for us more marvels than Peary can have found amid the desolate ice of the Pole. What has happened in this superb adventure is rather the laying of a ghost. It had walked for a good three centuries. It had haunted the dreams of boys, and lured aged captains to their deaths. It had filled these barren solitudes with the graves of better men than ever went to El Dorado. We can see it to-day the phantom it ever was. The brave, the necessary, the idle achievement is over, and still the seas beckon and the deserts call.

THE ORIGINS OF WEALTH.

Mr. Winston Churchill, in his great speech at Leicester, did well to quit the close and somewhat sordid atmosphere of controversy in which the Budget is debated at Westminster, in order to bring home to his audience the ampler political realities involved in the great struggle in which the Government is engaged. No larger and more inspiring presentment of the task of modern Liberalism has been given in our time. It is the pride, not the rebuke of Liberalism, that it is distinctively a land of promise, that its adherents appeal more to the future than to the past, regarding "that which they have done but earnest of the things that they shall do." But there was no vagueness in Mr. Churchill's vision. The urgent task of Liberalism he laid out in lines of sharpest realism, as he recounted in short, unsparing sentences those issues of poverty, degeneration, and waste which are gathered into the pregnant phrase "the condition of England." That phrase and all that it imports has too long been dallied with and shirked by Governments. It is, indeed, a legitimate reproach of Liberalism that it has waited so long and approached so timorously the inward diseases which Mr. Churchill designated "the enemies of Britain": "the awful gap between rich and poor, the divorce of the people from the land; the want of proper discipline and training in our young people; the exploitation of boy labor, of physical degeneration, the awful jumble of an obsolete Poor Law, the horrid havoc of the liquor traffic; the constant insecurity in the means of subsistence and employment which breaks the heart of many a sober, hard-working man, the absence of any established minimum standard of life and comfort among the workers, and, at the other end, the swift increase of vulgar, joyless luxury." Not one of these terrible diseases is new, not one of them but has been flaunted before our eyes for generations. Yet our theory of government has been so narrowly negative that in our boldest moments we have done no more than touch the fringe of these sores, glad to persuade ourselves to trust to the healing processes of a "Nature" which needed no conscious organised effort on our part. This era of craven toleration has now passed away. Its place is taken not, as its enemies pretend, by a Socialism which aims at displacing all individual initiative, all private enterprise, by an unlimited expansion of the State, but by a constructive Liberalism aiming to strengthen the foundations of society, by developing the latent resources of the nation, and securing for all its members such access to the common stock of material and moral opportunities as will enable each to make the most of his natural capacities.

This is the Liberalism to which the Government is now committed. Two phrases express alike its magnitude and its moderation, one describing the policy embodied in Mr. George's constructive measure, "the economic development of the United Kingdom," the other adopted here by Mr. Churchill, the "minimum standard of life and comfort." These are the two related duties towards its land and labor which the Government of every civilised State, aristocratic or democratic, old-world or new, is coming more and more to recognise. For the successful performance of this work of conservation and of progress a more conscious organisation of the national resources is needed, and the part taken by the State involves not only a rally of spiritual and scientific forces of reform, but a large provision of financial power.

It is this consideration that gives its larger significance to the new conception of Liberal finance contained in the Budget. If this enlarged positive career of the State is to be safely and profitably pursued, an adequate and secure provision must be made for the growing revenue required for these public services. If the State is to insure a standard of health, knowledge, justice, employment for all its citizens, to maintain weak and deficient members, and to develop the natural resources of the country which lie outside the range of private enterprise, it must look to increased taxation for its livelihood and its outlay. This involves, as Mr. Churchill sees, a new and a more scientific method of taxation. The developmental policy of the modern State, supporting and assisting in so many ways the individual citizen, is represented in a great increase of wealth. This increase, thus largely due to public, not private, exertion, passes, in the ordinary course of industrial and professional life, into the incomes of individuals, and becomes their property. Their individual skill and energy have doubtless, in most instances, co-operated with the social forces represented by the State, and a portion of the growing wealth is rightly theirs. But not the whole. The State is entitled, and, indeed, required, to discover and to take those elements of income which, though held by individuals, really represent, not private, but public productive energy. This is the true justification of what is denounced as the "predatory policy" and the "inquisitorial method" of the Budget. When Mr. Churchill says, "We do not only ask to-day 'How much have you got?' we also ask 'How did you get it?'" the "Times," supported by a certain antiquated order of economist, scents a new and monstrous heresy. But in truth this question of origin is the most relevant of all questions for a public financier. For it is of primary and vital importance for him to take by taxation only those portions of private income and property which do not represent the necessary reward of individual labor, skill, or enterprise, and the removal of which, therefore, does not disturb the performance of these individual services. In other words, he must look as far as possible to what are "unearned" elements of income, however they may be designated—economic rents, unearned increment, monopoly profits, windfalls. These incomes, "unearned" by their owners, are earned by society; the results of social work and social wants, they are a rightful income of the State.

So far as the question of origin can be safely put and answered, it has long been recognised that such incomes have a large ability to bear taxation. Our future Liberal Budgets will aim, by careful experiments, to attach to the public revenue an increasing share of those values which come from national or contrived monopoly or scarcity, from legal privilege, from superiority of opportunity, or other economic force enabling a person or a company to get more than he requires to induce him to give out his productive energy. Those land values which grow "while men sleep," or are extorted by legal violence, those licence values which measure legal restraints on competition, are two of the largest and clearest instances of incomes whose ability to bear a tax is proved by enquiry into origin. Clearer, closer analysis of the intricate processes of modern industrial life show many other cases, not directly connected with land-owning or licences, where incomes contain similar elements of surplus. Where fuller revenue is needed, these surplus elements are proper objects of taxation, so far as they can be ascertained. We do not say that this origin is the sole test of taxability. Nor did Mr. Churchill. The State cannot be indifferent to the question of mere size of income. A large income, apart from proofs of origin, may be considered as carrying normally a proportionate ability to bear taxation.

So the progressive character of our income tax, enforced by the super tax, is a sound practical policy. For it unites the lighter deprivation of removing the top layer of a large income (whose expenditure can afford the minimum of satisfaction) with the legitimate presumption that the "unearned" element of any large income varies directly with its size. Though neither of these assumptions is precisely true, or exactly ascertainable, they amply justify the claim of the State to participate to a moderate extent in the incomes of the rich. Thus, while the question of search into origins is not a novel principle of national finance, its adoption as a primary principle in the determination of the taxing policy may fairly be described as "a new idea, pregnant, formidable, full of life." It is an essential to the new Liberal conception of the State.

THE CHANCES OF A MEXICAN REVOLUTION.

Any competent journalist who is fond of excitement, and does not mind risking his life in the pursuit of useful knowledge, might do well, after acquiring a little conversational Spanish, to invade the modern Republic of Mexico. So long as his inquisitiveness and the evil purposes of his journeyings are unknown to the officials, he will be at least as safe as if he were travelling in Texas or Montana. But if an infamous plot to disclose the truth were suspected, he might receive as short a shrift as a Spanish savant who fell among Riffs.

The Mexican Union (Estados Unidos Mexicanos) comes third among the American Republics in population, and fourth in size. From 1522, when Cortes was appointed Governor, to 1821—close upon three hundred years—it was under the rule of Spain. First an Empire was proclaimed; then in 1824 a Republic was established, which lasted till 1862, when Napoleon the Third commenced his ill-starred enterprise. Under French auspices Maximilian was crowned Emperor in 1864, but was defeated and executed with his Generals at Queretaro, in 1867, so that, from the time when the Spanish yoke was definitely thrown off, Republican government has clearly commended itself to the national sentiment of Mexico. Whether this Republicanism can be called a reality is just one of the questions which an independent inquirer might report upon at the end of his travels. After the downfall of Maximilian the Presidency of Juarez lasted until 1872; Tejada followed till 1877, and was succeeded by General Porfirio Diaz, whose seventh term, after an uninterrupted rule of thirty-three years, will come to an end on November 30th, 1910.

Even those who know Diaz best, and have studied his government at first hand, would hesitate to pronounce a simple sentence on him. That he should have received many professional eulogies, grossly fulsome and absurdly exaggerated, need not blind us to his merits. He has given Mexico many of the external conditions which modern civilisation demands and requires. He has secured and encouraged a remarkably good system of railways, which are now being nationalised—an operation, it must be said, that is attended with considerable risk to travellers. By this means, and by the establishment of order through the greater part of a vast territory, he has induced a great flow of foreign capital, which has developed much mining and agricultural enterprise. Probably fifty millions of British savings are at this moment invested in Mexico. The French, the Germans, and the Americans are also busy in many parts of the Republic; and there is no doubt at all that wherever European wealth has been intelligently employed under European supervision, the natives have advanced in wealth and culture. In some parts Indian blood has mixed freely with that of the Spanish conquerors. The President himself is almost a pure Indian, and it is rather significant that his stern and often cold-blooded dictatorship has never given the slightest encouragement to that anti-foreign feeling which flourishes in Mexico, as it flourishes in China and Japan.

It is the habit of the politician throughout America to feather his own nest by direct or indirect means, and it would be too much to say that Diaz remains a poor man, or that he has prevented his colleagues from becoming rich. But he is honest, as honesty goes on that continent, and his influence in regard to public contracts has been on the right side. Enterprising Americans who cross the border find it surprisingly difficult to rob the Mexican public by bribing the public official. M. Limantour, the President's French Chancellor of the Exchequer, has amassed a great fortune; but his legislation and finance have been on the whole well contrived, and he has done much to establish the credit of Mexico in the eyes of the world. Like every new country it has its ups and downs, occasionally assisted by earthquakes, floods, droughts, and other natural disasters, as well as by the violent upheavals that attend speculative booms and reactions. Three years ago the country was in fashion. Mexico City swarmed with adventurers. Every other man had a mining prospectus in his pocket. Most of these worthies were from the North; and when, in the autumn of 1907, a financial panic swept the United States bare of money and credit the fictitious part of Mexican prosperity came toppling down as flimsy houses collapse before a whirlwind. The depression which has reigned in all the commercial and industrial centres of Mexico since that calamity is largely responsible for the political unrest of which we must now speak.

General Porfirio Diaz is in his seventy-ninth year, and the dispute for the succession has already begun. That there should be any dispute at all is not relished by the old dictator, whose plan is understood to be as follows. He will stand again, with his henchman, Corral as Vice-President. Then, after they have been duly elected, the President will visit Europe, leaving the government in Mr. Corral's hands, and if all goes well, General Diaz will soon afterwards resign the Presidency. Most unfortunately for the scheme of President Diaz, Mr. Corral is an Americanised Mexican from the border state of Sonora. The Americans of the United States are very unpopular in Mexico. It is not forgotten that they stole Texas, and their trading methods have often been so unscrupulous that the historical feud is kept alive by constant swindles. Accordingly, an anti-Corral faction has arisen, and political clubs have been founded in the large towns for the express purpose of defeating Corral, though all intention of opposition to the President has been carefully, and, no doubt, honestly, disclaimed. Nevertheless, in the circumstances of the case it was inevitable that this movement should be denounced by the Government Press as a seditious conspiracy.

When, therefore, the new faction found a popular champion in General Reyes, the Governor of Nuevo Leon, that gentleman began to feel the weight of Presidential displeasure. Divided between fear and ambition, he wrote a letter last July, in which, while disclaiming any wish to oppose the choice of President Diaz, he had also the temerity to assert that it was not for him to dictate to the consciences of the electors. In the hubbub which followed, a friend of Reyes was deposed from the Governorship of a neighboring province, and, after a public meeting of Corralists had been violently dispersed by an overwhelming crowd of Reyists in one of the principal cities, President Diaz sent a faithful general with a strong force of Federal troops to Monterey, the capital of the State of Nuevo Leon. General Reyes immediately retired to a distant health resort, followed, however, by troops with instructions (it is supposed) to arrest the recalcitrant Governor. But the proceedings against Reyes were interfered with by terrible floods at Monterey, which not only caused enormous loss of life and property, but damaged the railway lines. The latest information is that Reyes will return to Monterey, and that the utmost uneasiness is beginning to prevail in Mexico City. The execution of Reyes, who is popular with the army as well as with the people, might cause the outbreak of a formidable revolution, in which foreign property and the interests of European investors would be overlooked. The natives of Mexico are fairly tractable and industrious; but they have not passed the stage (what Spanish-speaking country has?) in which the possibility of a civil war is removed from the range of practical politics. On the whole, the present situation of Mexico, financial, industrial, and social, is highly critical. It will require all the skill and political experience of President Diaz and his Government to maintain peace, restore confidence, and re-establish normal conditions in the territories of the Republic.

THE SITUATION IN THE TORY PARTY.

The rejection of the Budget by the House of Lords might seem—after examination—a thing impossible. So appeared, in the summer of ten years ago, actual and real warfare between the forces of the British Empire and two tiny South African Republics. Yet—as so often in history—the impossible happened yesterday: it may happen to-morrow. It happened, not by a deliberate effort of determination, but as a result of the policy of drift. It would appear inconceivable that a group, not merely of sober minds like the Tory leaders, but even of the wildest "backwoodsmen peers," could, in a cool hour, and with all the forces rightly estimated, accept a choice which must end either in revolution or their own political suicide. But it may well happen that, inflamed by their popular Press, egged on by the panic of one class interest or the desperation of another, loaded with promises of violent action which may be sweet to the mouth, but bitter to the belly, they may find themselves before the end of October in a position the only practicable exit from which would be this wild declaration of war.

It is interesting, even at this moment, to analyse the forces which are tearing and upheaving the Tory Party: amongst those behind which are crying forward and those before which are crying back. Few of them are saying—or, indeed, can be expected to say—what is really in their minds; many are advocating policies by arguments or appeals which represent exactly the opposite of what they really think. All recognise that the rejection of the Budget would be a violation of the unwritten Constitution and a reduction into temporary chaos of the finances of the country. But all recognise also that such a rejection must result in a General Election. Whatever manœuvres may precede such an appeal, it is the people of the country, electing, not a House of Lords, but a House of Commons, which would settle finally the relationships between the two Houses. Nor would it be in the least degree possible for the Liberal Party to appear to be shirking such an issue.

There are four possible results of such an election, and four only.

The first is that the anti-Lord parties (Liberal, Labor, and Irish) would be returned with such a majority that not only the Budget would go through, but the veto of the Lords on all legislation be swept away.

The second is that the anti-Lord parties would be returned by such a small and uncertain majority that the Budget (perhaps reconstructed) would be passed, but that little further constructive legislation could be dealt with, and another election be certain in a few months' time.

The third is that the Tories would be returned by a small, precarious majority, large enough to remove the offensive features of the Budget, but powerless to accept the work of constructing a protective Tariff.

The fourth is that the Conservatives would be returned with such a majority as to be able to sweep the Budget away and construct a protective system.

Of these four possibilities the last may be ruled out as negligible. No one believes that either in November or in January next any such result is conceivable.

All Tories would dislike the first of these results, but with varying degrees of intensity. And the attitude of the various sections of the party is largely determined by the odds which they are prepared to risk against such a consummation.

On one side stand the bellicose party of Tariff Reformers, weak in the Houses of Parliament, but strong in the Press, mainly through the work of Mr. Garvin in the "Observer" and "Daily Telegraph," backed by the "Standard" and the "Pall Mall Gazette," and the exhilarating insanities of the "National Review." These are frankly prepared to risk the loss of the Lords' veto, because they have no particular desire to ensure its preservation. They have long ago ceased to care for the things which the Lords' veto is preserving. The Disestablishment of the Church or its ejection from the schools, one man one vote, reform of the land system, seem to them trivial things. Even the question of Home Rule is parochial in character, and as Paris was well worth a Mass, so eighty Irish votes are well worth "devolution." These men have set their minds on two objects. The first is the construction of a national Tariff upon which can be interwoven Imperial preferences. The second is a war with Germany, as speedily as possible; or, if war be impossible, such piling up of armaments against the Germans as will render England insolent in its domination of the seas. Both these are financial matters. Both are independent of the veto. Neither can be obtained without a Tory and Tariff-loving House of Commons. The extremists' position, therefore, is simple. They will risk without hesitation the existence of the Lords' veto, because it is of little value to their ideals. If the first possible result happens, they are none the worse off. They hope for a reaction after the Budget, with a Liberal Government wallowing in Home Rule and educational matters and in Welsh Disestablishment, while the work of the Tariff Reform missionaries—rudely interrupted by the Budget enthusiasm—may once more proceed in the country. They have a faint hope of the second possible result. Then there will be fishing in troubled waters, and perhaps, after a second election, victory. In any case, most of the hatred of the Budget and fear of the Lords' abolition leave their withers unwrung. They are out for bigger things than this right to check, but not to change, the kind of reforms desired by a Liberal Government.

Now, this party is gathering behind it, by appeals indited with tongue in cheek, all those backwoodsmen who really are acting from entirely opposite motives. Daily it calls upon them to "do or die": daily it asks them if they are still men, if they are the men that their fathers were. Daily it inflames them with the vision of a Socialist "Terror," the grabbing of the land or the collapse of aristocratic power. And the wild men are excited and stiffened by these appeals; they see themselves walking proudly, and not without dignity, to a struggle in defence of their order. These Radicals intend to destroy you piecemeal, they are told, is it not better to fight at the beginning? They believe it. If they thought the first result was in the least degree possible they would hesitate. The risks would be too great. Because they care most for the very things for which the advanced Tariff Reformers care least—the position of the Lords as a check to violent legislation, religious education for the children of the working classes, opposition to Home Rule, Disestablishment, and land legislation. Lip homage is paid to these things by this Tory Press, but its thoughts are far away. And the violent newspapers of the Tariff Reformers continually tell them that there is no chance of the first result; that the utmost they need fear is the second; that they are justified in demanding a "referendum" upon a "Revolutionary Budget"; that Lord Rosebery or some other impossible leader will go before them into battle; and that, even if they lose at the election, they will be in no worse position than they are at the present time. The Budget may pass, but it would pass in either case, the country will be grateful to the Lords for giving it an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon these proposals; the Liberals will return, if not completely overthrown, yet weakened and in part discredited.

It is against the hypnotic influence of this repeated asseveration that Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Balfour are contending at the present time. In the columns of the "Times" the official view is continually propagated, that, whether it be desired or no, the rejection of the Budget is a step of extraordinary gravity. Mr. Balfour certainly does not desire to return with a triumphant Tariff majority and a huge deficit to be filled, on the other hand he would be prepared to sacrifice all the dreams of Imperial and Colonial consolidation rather than risk the destruction of the veto. The first result and the last are equally abhorrent to him. He would be happy in the third result, much happier in the second. He is waiting to know if there is any reasonable chance of the second or third being attained. He is, that is to say, a genuine Conservative, the representative of an aristocracy, contemptuous of Colonial politics, sceptical of all constructive programmes, on one side or the other. He is convinced that only by some kind of a miracle is the accepted order, which guarantees the continuance of the leisured and aristocratic life, to be maintained. Outside this order is a hungry mass (in his vision) of artless, bathless, ignorant, inexplicable proletariat, at whose patience and acquiescence in their resignation of all life's good things to a tiny class who enjoy the sunshine he is continually wondering. He has no personal fear, and would make a good end at the tumbrils; but he has nothing of that link of sympathy and understanding of the common people possessed by Mr. Chamberlain or Lord Randolph Churchill. And he has no intention—if he can help it—of risking the destruction of the Constitution in a vast proletariat uprising, for the sake of a constructive Conservative Programme which his intellect still repudiates.

The third and last party represent that small body of Free Traders who find articulate utterance in the columns of the "Spectator." They were all for the excision of the land clauses, which drove them into almost hysterical fury. But they are afraid of the result of rejecting the Budget as a whole. They were convinced, by some absurd chain of reasoning, that if the Lords threatened to reject, or rejected, the Land Taxes, the Liberal Party would acquiesce in this decision, and accept the Budget without them. To anyone who knows the spirit of either party, it sounds like the politics of the lunatic asylum. The Liberal Party would sooner have the Land Taxes without the Budget than the Budget without the Land Taxes. And such action by the House of Lords would immediately alienate the one interest upon which alone they can rely for popular support—the liquor interest, whose taxation the Lords would have accepted while exempting the big landlord. To-day they fear the great issue. The Budget is abhorrent to them, but the fear of the possibility of a permanent destruction of the veto is more abhorrent. They would rather bear the ills they have than fly to others that they know not of. They belong to that class of literary and intellectual politicians who can always be trusted to fall back on the "safe" course at the end.

Upon such a welter and turmoil the Liberal Party can gaze to-day with some degree of equanimity. They believe that if the Lords reject the Budget they can obtain a substantial, perhaps an overwhelming, victory. They believe that if the Lords pass the Budget, there will be such an eating of brave words, so many sore champions who have "protested too much," so many trades like the brewers and ground landlords who will cry out that the Lords have betrayed them through cowardice, that the whole Tory Party will be reduced to chaos and contending factions. Whichever the decision, the results to the Opposition can but be deplorable. The political world has been transformed by the Budget and the nature of the opposition to it. In a few short months great opportunities seem to have been thrown open to those who desire reform.

"FIRED IN ANGER."

If you associate with war correspondents and military men you may sometimes hear them refer to their more peaceable fellow-creatures with a certain scorn as never having seen a shot fired in anger. It is their constant phrase for civilians who venture to express an opinion on war, but especially they keep it for soldiers and military correspondents whose experience is limited to the ringing plains of Aldershot. The touch of implied scorn is natural enough, for no one who has not seen war need speak of it, and a soldier never under fire is like a member of a Parents' League who never had a child. Deep down in man's nature there is the further instinct which drove even Dr. Johnson to say that every man thinks meanly of himself for not having been a soldier. And when Boswell objected that Lord Mansfield (then Lord Chancellor) did not, Dr. Johnson replied, "Sir, if Lord Mansfield were in the company of general officers and admirals who had been in service, he would shrink; he would wish to creep under the table."

So that we will excuse the touch of scorn, as natural to men of blood, and think only of the expression, how absurd the course of time is making it! "Fired in anger!"—it calls up a picture of a war-maddened figure, breathing out fury and slaughter against an impious and detested foe. We see him striking men down with rage in his heart, conscious of a righteous cause, inspired at the least with a savage's resolve to keep his hearth and bed unsullied by the loathly invaders of his habitation. We see Garibaldi purging his country from the oppression of centuries; at the worst we see Weiss and Laurent, in Zola's "Débacle," taking shots at the Germans as they crept up the street at Bazeilles, or Mr. Brown, with smoking rifle, standing defiant before the shattered overmantel of an Englishman's home. By such scenes all mankind is instinctively attracted, and if we may not rise to military scorn for one who has never seen a shot fired in anger, we do, at least, feel for him a certain pity.

But supposing we wished to free ourselves from this reproach, and took the opportunity of the only war now being waged on earth, what should we really see when a shot was fired? We should go to Melilla, and, dragging ourselves through the dust and heat for something over a mile up a rocky acclivity, we should welcome the yard or two of shade cast by the Camillos Fort, in front of which four six-inch guns are ranged, with less powerful guns on either side. We should see, with pleasure, that the officers are asleep in their tents, all but one, who keeps himself awake by sipping a cooling drink; and the men are all asleep in the ditches or wherever there is a speck of shelter from the burning sun—all but one, who is watching through a telescope. Slowly the hours pass, and perhaps a few people stroll up from the town on the chance of a little evening breeze and some shooting.

Suddenly the man at the telescope goes to the officer and reports he thinks he can see two or three white specks moving among the rocks on the mountain about three miles away, or rather more. Or, perhaps, a blinking message comes from the helio down the coast, suggesting a shot or two dropped at random into a defile in that direction. The officer stands up, the men are roused, the covers are taken off the muzzles of the four guns, with great effort the shells are placed in the breeches, their fuses so arranged that they will burst at 6,000 yards, the blocks are closed, the guns are sighted in the required direction, the officer utters a shout, and, amid great noise and columns of smoke, four elaborate constructions of iron, valued at £2 apiece, are hurled through the air till, after traversing the due distance, they burst with thin white wreaths of smoke, followed by distant reports, and fling a large number of bullets and fragments of hardware violently among the rocks. The performance is repeated two or three times; in the course of a day it may be repeated ten times. The spectators go away satisfied. They have assisted at a baptism of fire, though not at their own baptism, as they are inclined to boast. They have escaped the reproach of never having seen a shot fired in anger, and when they return to Spain they will enter their native town in khaki and a helmet.

It is the same with the rifle as with the shell. A young man, who would much prefer to be at home in the shop or workroom or marking time in a café's shade, is marched out and ordered to lie down and shoot at any figure he may see, or at any little puff of smoke that may rise from an old-fashioned cartridge. So he lies down and fires away manfully into the mountain-side about 1,000 or 2,000 yards away. Probably he enjoys some touch of the sportsman's excitement, for it is always just possible that he may hit something and see it fall. In some cases he feels also the emotion of fear, for if his rifle will kill at 1,000 yards, someone on the mountain may also have a rifle that will kill at the same distance when fired in the opposite direction. But he is said to fire his shots in anger, and of anger what trace is there in his bosom? Why should he be angry with a little white speck moving among the rocks, or with a puff of smoke behind a cactus hedge? He is no more angry than a boy with a catapult is angry with a sparrow, or a lion-hunter with a distant lion. He might almost as well be angry with the landscape.

It is partly a matter of range. To love the man who is obviously intending to kill you is an achievement only divine, and when a brawny creature with a long, sharp knife gets within two or three yards; when you feel his breath and see his eyes fixed with the purpose of drawing that long, sharp knife across your throat, then hatred rises and, joined with terror, produces the rage that exultingly fires the revolver into his head or plunges a bayonet through his heart. In ancient conflicts anger grew with fighting, just as appetite comes with eating, and up to the Peninsular War a wholesome wrath could be counted upon as soon as the order came to hold the fire till the whites of the eyes were visible, and then go in with the steel. It was a matter of kill or die, and the very absurdity of being killed by the foreigner opposite you sufficed to create the needful rage. But with the scientific improvement of armaments death has become less certain and war less personal. You cannot rage against an invisible foe, nor fire shots in anger at a dimly discerned microbe crawling on a mountain. For anger, like gravity, and some kinds of love, varies inversely with the square of the distance.

But chiefly it is the modern causes of war that are destroying the old impulse of rage. We know that famous passage in the "Sartor," describing how some thirty able-bodied men are taken from the British village of Dumdrudge, shipped away to the south of Spain, and fed there till wanted; and how thirty French artisans from a French Dumdrudge are treated in the same manner, till, after infinite effort, the two parties come into actual juxtaposition, the word "Fire!" is given, and they blow the souls out of one another.

> "Had these men any quarrel? Busy as the Devil is, not the smallest. . . . How then? Simpleton! Their governors had fallen out; and, instead of shooting one another, had the cunning to make these poor blockheads shoot."

Instead of governors, it is now the financiers, the capitalists, the shareholders who make the poor blockheads shoot; but the change only diminishes the ingredient of anger, for some men still find it possible to fight with anger on a king's or queen's behalf, but no man on a stockjobber's. What rage could Britons feel in killing Boers for the profit of Barnatos, or could Russians feel in killing Japanese for the Grand-Ducal speculators in Yalu timber, or the Spaniards now in killing Moors for the French concessionaires in Melilla mines?

Drop by drop the element of anger has exuded from the battle. We see it vanishing already in the days of chivalry, and in the half-hearted wars when Italian princes objected to the death of their beautiful and expensive men. From such scenes as the capitulation of Breda, in the well-known Velasquez picture called "The Lances," it has almost gone. Its disappearance was marked by such silly courtesies as the invitation to the enemy to fire first, and the introduction of diplomatic amenities on the field only reveals the degradation of warfare, just as the boasted amenities of political life only prove the unreality of parties. Anger alone is conflict's justification, and even the law finds condonation for murder in a rage. Stoic philosophers plumed themselves on their self-restraint when they said to a slave, "If I were not angry, I would flay you with the lash, but I will wait till I am calm." They did not perceive how much better it is to kill a man in anger than to order him six strokes on calculation, nor how much more degraded in soul the legal executioner is than the assassin of wrath. For anger implies a sense of justice, or at least of wrong, and a child's most unendurable enemy is the monster who beats it more in sorrow than in anger. What, then, is left for war? It is a chilly thing to kill a man either for fun or for fear, and if the ancient motives of hatred and anger are removed from battle, the best we can hope from our officers is the cold indifference of the judge, and from our rank and file the official cruelty of gaolers arranging a triangle for the cat.

THE BUSINESS OF MARRIAGE.

The mercenary side of marriage has always been a favorite theme of the male satirist. The anxious matron with a bunch of marketable daughters, angling in "Society" for eligible husbands, the maiden past her prime plying her craft with bolder and more conscious coquetry, the young beauty fresh from the schoolroom assessing the captures of her first season, have furnished coarse humor to a hundred novelists. Few have even had the heart to recognise with Thackeray the pathos, the tragic import, of this marriage-market. The sober moralists who have bewailed such mercenary intrigues as a profanation of true marriage and a sure source of marital unhappiness have, as a rule, failed equally to gauge the real issue. The breadth and the depth of the matter alike escape their vision. Imputing the fault to a levity of nature, or a too eager drive of sex, or to a dread of "social failure" on the part of woman—the three favorite male explanations—they fail to diagnose the case.

The view that every woman craves to be a wife and mother, that she wants to attach herself to a man and to serve him in a home, that her claims of self-development, and of careers and duties outside the realm of domesticity, are, except in rare examples of "unsexed" women, unsubstantial, still holds the field. Not only most men accept it, but most women. Does this consensus guarantee its truth? Not at all, if we admit the searching analysis of the psychology and economics of marriage and the sex relation given by Miss Cicely Hamilton in her book "Marriage as a Trade" (Chapman & Hall). Her argument may be briefly stated thus: Woman as she appears in civilised society to-day is not as Nature makes her; her bearing and conduct, her very thoughts and feelings, have been "made over" by man. Man, the physically stronger being, has been impelled, primarily by his sexual feeling, to keep woman in close personal subjection. Law and usage, through all the complex course of civilisation, have been constantly moulded so as to deprive woman of any option but to sell her person for a livelihood to a man. Any real power to acquire independent property or to pursue a profitable career in a business or profession, which should release any large number of women from the necessity of finding a husband, would evidently break the sex dominion exercised by man. To prevent any such successful revolt, man, with half-conscious cunning, has woven a whole fantastic code of ethics and of chivalry. She is to be the angel of the home, man is to protect and worship her, by gentle craft she is to influence him and exercise control in all the minor details of their life. Mother and housekeeper, she is to have, not pay, not liberty, but a subtler power and joy which proceeds from the sure satisfaction of her nature as a woman. She must be screened from full personal knowledge of the harsher facts of life, she must not take part in the coarse struggle of politics or business for fear of damaging the delicacy of her nature. She should not be keenly intellectual, beyond the point of feigning an intelligent sympathy with the life of her husband: even in these days the blue-stocking is still at a discount in the marriage market. Men do not like a woman who can and will stand up to them in argument. Why? In the last resort, because intellect is a badge and an instrument of liberty. Miss Hamilton, in developing her thesis, lays, perhaps, overmuch stress upon the sex factor as the conscious guiding force. Male pride of personal prowess, as expressed in a life of luxurious display and ornament, has played a very important part in directing the life and character of woman among the well-to-do classes, and even by servile imitation among the poorer classes. The successful American who uses his wife as a pendant for diamonds has grafted on to the original desire of male possession an important secondary use.

But among our upper and middle-class life the real force of this economic interpretation of marriage is obscured by a host of refinements which have helped to preserve a more romantic view. It is among the working-classes that the difference between the masculine and the feminine attitude towards marriage stands out most clearly. Marriage is a voluntary matter for the man; for the great mass of women it is compulsory, their only practicable mode of earning and of keeping an "honest" livelihood. No one who fairly faces the damning fact that the normal wage for an able-bodied, capable working-woman is a "sweating" wage, definitely below the true cost of physical subsistence, can possibly dispute this statement. We may, and do, maintain that Miss Hamilton unjustly charges man with the conscious intentional contrivance of a situation which thus drives woman under male "protection," but the moral, almost the physical, compulsion is undeniable. The conditions of girls' and women's employment in most trades are so unremunerative, so onerous, and so degrading, that it is no wonder they are driven to declare "I would marry any one, to get out of this." Those who realise what this means for women, for marriage, and the family, will get a stronger hold of the meaning of the phrase "emancipation of women" than in any other way. Until women of all classes are free to choose marriage and maternity, not as a trade but as a vocation, "the family" will remain despotic, shorn of its finer spiritual uses, and out of keeping with the modern conception of personal liberty as the requisite of social progress. The suggestion that the brief romance of courtship affords any true condition for a choice in marriage, or that the survival of masculine affection is a sufficient guarantee against domestic tyranny, is hardly sincere. Though we hold that among the better-to-do classes the wife and mother has made a real advance in practical liberty of late, male predominance in determining most of the larger issues upon which the judgment of the wife ought equally to weigh is still the rule, while among large sections of the wage-earners family life is a frank tyranny, tempered by female "management."

This illiberalism of the family has reactions in the wider fields of politics. For despotism in the home is inconsistent with democracy in the city and the State. The abuse of law, custom, and morality, in forcing women into a single common mould determined by the desires of the ordinary husband, has been a chief retarding influence in civilisation. That such an abuse begets exaggerated protests is inevitable, and that such exaggeration shall be seized by man as a means of evading the real issue equally follows from the logic of the case. The treatment of this book by the English press bears out this interpretation. Miss Hamilton's work has received considerable attention as a witty rendering of a perversely paradoxical position; its brightness, even brilliancy, of literary expression has been turned into a pretext for escaping all serious consideration of its sociological thesis.

Now, her contention that "woman, as we know her, is largely the product of the conditions imposed upon her by her staple industry" deserves closer discussion, as one of the three or four fundamental questions of the age. We make this avowal more freely because we differ widely from the estimate which the writer appears to set upon the work of woman as wife and mother. We accept Miss Hamilton's account of the supreme wrong done by man to woman. It consists in setting up a single standard of character and life for her, thus educating her not towards free self-development along the lines of her natural capacities, but towards pleasing someone else, to wit, the prospective husband and father of her children. Now, this endeavor to make all women approximate to a single type is a flying in the face of Nature. "It is ridiculous to suppose that Nature, who never makes two blades of grass alike, desired to turn out indefinite millions of women all cut to the regulation pattern of wifehood; that is to say, all home-loving, charming, submissive, industrious, unintelligent, tidy, possessed with a desire to please, well-dressed, jealous of their own sex, self-sacrificing, cowardly, filled with a burning passion for maternity, endowed with a talent for cooking, narrowly uninterested in the world outside their own gates, and capable of sinking their own identity and interests in the interests and identity of a husband."

Although this vigorous portraiture of the wifely type may at first sight be resented as a bitter caricature by most men open-minded enough to read such a book, reflection will win from most of them a candid recognition of its substantial accuracy. There is a masculine desire to force or induce all women within their sphere of influence to conform to this ideal, and religion, education, literature, and art have all been subtly pressed into this service. The personality of woman and her individuality of character and career have thus been cramped and mutilated. But our account of the supreme injury differs from Miss Hamilton's. One quite amazing sentence in her book brings out this divergence. "To him the accidental factor in woman's life is the all-important." Sex and marriage are for woman merely an "accidental factor," one among many possible and equally desirable careers! Her protest is made on behalf of the right of every woman to live a complete life of her own for her separate well-being and enjoyment. Now this refusal to recognise the dominant part of maternity in the life of woman, this dogmatic assertion of feminine individualism, appears to us an utterly erroneous account of what "Nature" demands for woman. The notion of counteracting the egoism of man by setting up a corresponding egoism of woman is surely the most hopeless of all solutions and the most unworthy. The true rationale of the revolt of woman is based on recognising that the free self-development of woman and her choice of a career are essential to the progress of society

Part of the loss society sustains is due, no doubt, to the refusal of permission to women to engage in the arts and industries on equal terms with men. But a far graver injury consists in the evil effects which compulsory marriage and maternity produce in the character of the family and the home. A finer, freer, and more varied type of womanhood is needed, primarily, for the education and the elevation of the race. The free personality of woman, as of man, is not an all-sufficient end; the wide service of humanity must qualify such freedom. If man has learned this lesson ill, it is for woman not to copy his mistake but to correct it. The self-assertion of a sex, and of individuality within the sex, is no solution of this, the most perplexed of all our social problems.

THE EARLY MASTERS.

It would seem that, once in the course of the Ages, a pure flower of joy sprang out of the dark earth. In the works of the early German and Flemish and Lombard Masters—of any pre-sixteenth century Masters, in fact—we get a glimpse of a world so much better than the real world, that it seems the latter must exist only to afford the materials out of which the world of the painters could be constructed. We all know that better country, that earthly Paradise of the old painters, where all fruits and flowers flourish together. We have seen the Holy Family rest on their flight into Egypt, under shaggy pine trees, by some brawling mountain stream, while the gay, stiff little angels, so alert and sincere, eternally unirritated and unfatigued, play bag-pipes and offer cherries to the Child. The writer confesses—it is doubtless his limitation—that when in a picture gallery he leaves all these things behind, and passes on to Flemish kermesses, and naked nymphs, "sea pieces" and battle scenes, powdered actresses, and vacant Royal children, a deep weariness falls on his spirit, and he feels that something is gone which is worth all the rest put together. Nothing makes up for the loss of these crude, naïve, sweet, childish things.

There surely could have been no happier life ever lived on earth than that of these old painters. They must have had a great gaiety of heart, a great blitheness of spirit, a great freedom from care, or, at least, power of detachment from it, to have painted as they did. "Worry is the worst dog in the pack," and it seems he must have been far from those who lingered with such delight on a goldfinch's feathers, or the white blossom and red fruit of the wild strawberries in the grass. It was surely in a golden, tranquil leisure that they painted all those details, the great pot of pinks by the bedside, the red and white silk of the diapered quilt, the scolloped valance, and the carved Evangelists at the four posts of the bed on which the Virgin falls asleep, in her painless passage to her Son. It is strange to think of the old painter whose name and personality has been absorbed in this scene, and who is known to posterity only as "le Maître de la Mort de Marie," "the Master of the Death of the Virgin."

About these pictures, almost alone of the works of men, there is nothing acrid, nothing gloomy, nothing bitter. Good is evidently victorious, even in its moments of deepest adversity. The martyrdoms are triumphs—the St. Sebastian who stands up, "as thick with arrows as an urchin is full of pricks," has already his palm. Looking on the dragons and the executioners—

> "We feel no horror, but delight,
> Because the colors are so bright,
> Likewise we note the specks of white
> And the great plates of burnished gold."

Compare any early Florentine or German "Decollation of St. John," with its ceremonious attendant angels, and air of unshaken faith in the triumph of righteousness, with a late sixteenth century martyrdom, or one of Rubens's scenes of torture, or with the horrors of some Elizabethan tragedy, like "Titus Andronicus," and you will see the gloom that descended on the human mind with the passing away of all that sacred butterfly world.

The world of the old painters is a world of good will to men of good will. It is a world where the good are good, and the good are always the merry, and the gorgeous and the bright. The bad are bad, and their cruelty and treachery are so flagrant and patent that no one feels a pained and puzzled sympathy for them. The pilgrim man is guided on his journey, as the angel guides the boy Tobias, and however badly things go wrong, they are not hopeless, and "la misericordia divina ha si gran bracchia, che prende ciòche si rivolge a lei." "Reality is a mass hard to penetrate," but the old painters penetrated it with the utmost ease. Fourteenth century writers of saints' lives often say in the course of their narration, "it pleases me to think that it was so." Above the earth is that heavenly court to which so many ladies turned their thoughts in the hour of their abandonment and disillusion—a court where there are no rivalries and no heart-burnings, where the Queen Mother is beloved of all the servants of the King, where St. Catherine is not jealous of St. Margaret, and St. Mary Magdalene does not intrigue against St. John the Evangelist.

Which is the loveliest of all these pictures? Which would one choose if one could have but one? Some three or four stand out—the "Adoration of the Lamb" at Ghent, Hans Memling's chasse painted with the story of St. Ursula in the Hôpital de St. Jean at Bruges, Carpaccio's "Dream of St. Ursula" at Venice, and the Perugino triptych with Michael and Raphael in the National Gallery.

It can never be again, that April morning time. The following passage from a fourteenth century "Life of St. Mary Magdalene" belongs to the world of the old painters, and is like one of their pictures in words. It shows the lovely thoughts which it was possible for men to have, amid all the wars and tumults of the outer world. The scene is the house at Bethany, on the morning of Palm Sunday. "I think, that all that morning until tierce, the Magdalene was alert and watchful for the return of any one to tell her news. . . . I think, that, at that hour, that is, about tierce, the first messenger she had sent returned in great joy with a branch of olive in his hand, and he came to the Magdalene, and immediately she saw him, she thought he was bringing good news. And the messenger began to tell of the events of the Sunday of Olives, as it is told in the Gospel, how the populace of Jerusalem went out to meet Him with loud shouts of joy, escorting Him into the city, and taking off their garments, and casting them to the ground, and also branches of olive. 'And behold, here is the sign; this branch of olive which I have brought is one gathered in honor of Jesus, and they cried with loud voices, "Hosanna in excelsis!"' And I think the Magdalene, full of joy, took the olive branch and carried it to Madonna, and told her the tidings with great gladness; and His mother rendered sweet thanks to God."

THE INFINITE SEA.

Geographically, of course, the sea is not infinite. Its moods, however, are demonstrably endless. If each tide were to take exactly twelve hours to rise to the flood and sob back to the ebb, a great part of the sea's changeableness would be lost. But missing coincidence with the sun's movement by twenty minutes, there must be thirty-six tides, eighteen full days before to-day's full tide will be repeated, by which time the days will be so appreciably shorter that, though clock time is kept, sun time will still be missed, while the varying height and speed of the tide during the sway of one moon is another factor that seems to postpone for ever the recurrence of a particular ocean scene. To these regular variants add the altogether incalculable changes of wind, cloud, sunshine, rain, mist, and atmospheric texture, and we have a complexity of variability that makes even a mile of sea-coast an endless panorama of surprise.

It is our delight this holiday-time to have a portion of the sea continually under gaze—to sleep with the sound of its angry or placid goings and comings in our ears; to have its briny breath in the nostrils without intervention of wall or window; to fall asleep watching it under moonlight, and awaken to find it enpurpled by the early sun. Some of its night mysteries have vanished with familiarity. We know which rock it is that greets the three-quarter tide with clapping; how the sound of thunder is produced; and which wind sucks deepest at the sand, or piles it up most in the place of the morning dip. We know to an inch or two how high the tide will come, and within ten minutes or so at what time it will reach its climax. Yet the sea has not lost that air of always attempting something it may not be able to achieve, or of doubting whether to continue its retreat into the very depths.

It is the crispness of encounter between our own element and another that we can never wholly conquer that makes the edge of the sea so fascinating. On our shore, that crispness is unusually accentuated by form, color and change of organism. At the headland a great purple scar descends sheer to the sea. The waves leap up leaden blue, flinging up their white caps which have their answer in storm-time in straight, thin streams of land water pouring from the cliff brow. This morning, when a pelting south-easter riddled our tent as with bullets of rain, the streams were flung back over the cliff edge and went towering heavenward in trees of spray. In the bend of the bay, the shale and clay have slipped seaward in a medley of round steps, like the clods of snow that an avalanche produces, and the whole is clothed with luxuriant verdure right down to the sea. It is a tangle often waist-high—purple knapweed, clambering vetch, great pink-headed agrimony, rounding sharper irregularities into a softness like that of the clouds. The waves toss their spume into this triumphant flora, silencing for awhile the chirrup of the grasshopper and driving the bee from the sea convolvulus. In the rock pools we catch the snake-like spotted gunnel, and scarcely ten yards up the green bank we have seen the slow-worm reluctantly drag away its silvery coils as we climbed over its basking-place.

We know of the vetch and knapweed and hemp agrimony, because we slide and tumble through them on our way to the sea. In the middle distance they become mere velvet bosses, capable of intense brilliance when the sun strikes them fully. Then the cliffs fire with purple, the sea becomes turquoise and emerald, the sky glows like a bowl of sapphire, the whole scene is in the highest key of magnificent joy. We like to have the tide out beyond the flats for this mood. The sea loses a little of its turquoise when it is stirred with sand, and the brilliance of the deep water has a better neighbor in the flats of ironstone and shale and the miles of orange "pop-weed."

There is nothing of the monotony of sunshine this summer. Our bay is, in fact, far more often in some other mood. The wind strikes the note of rain, and soon the sky, the sea, the shore, are one leaden grey. Below, the solid sea or a sea of steel; above, an atmosphere almost as effectively wet, a sort of sea in suspense. A mile or two away, upper and under wetness run together in a neutral chaos. Dazzling gulls and a few bursting waves make the most of a perfect background for their whiteness. On another day, the sea just lay and brooded its next mischief or frolic. There was not a breath of air. The water was apparently dead-still, that is if we stood so back from the cliff edge as not to see the ripples with which it sobbed on the sand. Steamers came and went, leaving their trails of smoke, which clung to the cool mirror and stayed there in pointed heaps or crawled ever so slowly as the never-resting sea-current furtively moved in that deathly stillness.

Then dazzling white thunder-clouds moved in the far distance; anon black rolls of clouds came round the shoulder of the land, and presently the lightning leapt from sea to air, thunder crashed, the heavens were opened, and the rain descended, the cliffs streamed with water, mud, and stones, as everything seemed about to be overwhelmed with the power of the water. It was pitiable to see the little birds darting close to the earth as the deluge drove them from one shelter to the next. And, now will the thunder clear the air and settle the weather, or will it just bring round again the long procession of elemental effects that belong to an unsettled time?

This morning there is some blue sky and no rain. April clouds are scattered about like hounds strayed from yesterday's hunt. In a shiny pool about a hundred lapwings are standing, their heads all one way, and every bird doubled in the mirror. Round the northern headland comes a flock of them on the wing, thick-pinioned as no other birds are, lolloping and turning in unison, now black, now snowy white, as they turn; now glinting in a streak of sunshine; now passing beneath a cloud. Perhaps the plovers have got tired of this summer earlier than usual, and are about to flock along the shore to their winter quarters. Perhaps they know no more of the weather than we do, and are waiting to see whether sun or cloud is to have the upper hand.

Present-Day Problems.

THE HEALTH OF CRICKET.

A PARTY of English cricketers are going out to South Africa, and already the voice of the croaker is heard crying that this will not be a representative team; it will be not "England," but only "an English eleven." Well, for some of us, that has its consolations. If the players are happily conscious that they are not the very cream of English cricket and that the national reputation does not depend on every stroke they make, perhaps they will play with the lightness of heart, the spirit and the joyousness which are proper to the game—and have been conspicuously absent from it in the five Test Matches of this summer. Perhaps they will even bethink themselves on some occasion of that I. Zingari team which in the olden days drew lots to settle the order of batting, and if, greatly daring, they followed that example, perhaps their tenth man in would make a century, as did A. G. Steel, most brilliant of that I. Zingari band. But even in South Africa, one fears, cricket has become too grave an avocation for such frivolity.

Is there anything amiss with English cricket? If there is, it is not merely the record of the recent Test Matches that gives cause for the belief. Our failures there were but the symptoms of the sickness. It is conceivable that every Test Match might have been lost and no one of us had cause to shed a tear; only, if English cricket were at its healthiest and best, the great exhibition games would either not be lost or would be lost with greater credit to the losers. Cricket, said an old Sheffield newspaper in 1827, is "an exercise calculated to improve the physical as well as the corporeal powers of its votaries. There is something so manly and noble in this game, something so body-exhilarating, that we do not wonder at its soon making material inroad in the affections and favor of the public, and tempting them to exclaim:—

> 'Come, see what pleasures in our plains abound,
> The woods, the fountains, and the flow'rs around,
> Come, see the combatants, how firm they stand
> To face all dangers at the first command.'"

Cricket is still a "body-exhilarating" game, as the Sheffield writer elegantly says, but how far does that element enter into it to-day? To what extent is it considered by player or spectator in the great competitions? About as much, perhaps, as woods, fountains, and flowers abound at the Oval, or smoke-begrimed Bramall Lane, or stern Old Trafford. The fact is that if there be anything amiss with cricket, it is a sickness of a slow, creeping kind: a sickness which makes the game ever more and more serious, more and more an occupation for men who have to think not of its interests as a sport, not of the joy of rivalry and sheer pride in successful doing, but of their position and prospects as entertainers of the public, of the importance of keeping "fit," of not overstraining, of raising themselves high up in what Lord Hawke well calls "those beastly weekly averages"—of everything, in fact, which does not really matter when two elevens meet to prove, within a given time, which is the better side "at Crickets." It is a sickness of which statistics are one cause and the multiplication of Leagues and Cups and championships another. The Oxford Colleges are wise that refuse to hold League competitions instead of merely "friendly" matches—a type of game too tame to attract support in the world where the professional rules. No one, of course, blames the professional for looking after his own interests rather than those of the game from which he gets his living. But he is gradually bringing cricket to the pass which professional football now has reached for a good many years. In 1751, to quote again a Yorkshire newspaper, "the Sheffield authorities engaged professional cricketers to amuse the populace and so draw them from cock-fighting exhibitions." No very lofty ideals about this type of cricket, it may be admitted, nor about the contests waged for heavy stakes between famous cricketers. But it is to this type that we are now reverting. Soon we shall be asking how we are to draw the populace from the exhibitions of professional cricketers. Only we would fain draw them to something more "body-exhilarating" than a mere exhibition of another type.

It is bad that the amateur element should be diminishing in cricket; it is not good that the professional footballers should be entering the summer game in increasing numbers. Amateurs are the breath of life to an eleven. It is to them one looks for carelessness of personal success, for zest in the game however fortune's balance is inclining, for keenness to the last ball of the day, for readiness to spend every ounce of energy while the struggle lasts, for equal alertness and endurance whether much or nothing depend on the fortunes of the match. One looks to them, too, to inspire these qualities in the team with which they play, and the great names of the past show that it can be done. (Not all amateurs play so. The Australians have been different men in some of their ordinary county matches from what they have been in the "Tests.") And alas! in some of the great county teams—Surrey and Yorkshire, for example—the number of amateurs is decreasing, and with the diminution comes a loss of alertness and determination to risk defeat in the hope of achieving victory. Kent, with its fine youthful team, points the way to better things; indeed, the success of such counties as Kent and Worcester would be of better augury than the continued triumph of the popular and wealthy clubs of Surrey, Lancashire, and Yorkshire. Of the professional footballer we shall probably have more and more as time goes on. He has the leisure and athletic fitness; what more natural than that he should acquire cricket-skill which will bring him in a comfortable income during the summer months? But, once included in a county team, he must not risk too much; he must maintain his average; he must be slow and sure—there are, of course, exceptions—he must prolong his career into as many seasons as may be. Every man for himself, is the motto, and the devil take the game.

If there were many more amateurs passing into first-class cricket from the Public Schools and Universities, the sickness might abate, especially if they set themselves against all multiplying of mere show events and encouraged local cricket as a part of their duty to the game. But the number of amateurs does not grow, and, after all, though one laments their absence from the game, it is impossible to regret that so many men who might devote themselves to cricket are finding some worthier occupation for their energies. Games are for leisure only, though Lord Hawke's career shows how much time a man may devote to them with honor. The Jacksons and Spooners and R. E. Fosters who are partly or wholly lost to county cricket would be salutary influences on the field, but serious work in life, if less "body-exhilarating" than cricket, is more "noble and manly" than complete absorption in mere sport.

PLUTOCRATIC PAGANISM.

ONE effect "Mid-Channel" cannot but have on all candid observers—it must confirm and enhance their respect for Sir Arthur Pinero as a sternly conscientious artist, determined, at all costs, to paint the world as he sees it. We may not like the world he sees; but that is our affair, not his. He has long ago ceased to give ear to box-office blandishments and managerial or critical expositions of "what the public wants." He depicts what he sees, he tells what he knows, unflinchingly and uncompromisingly, with a directness and power in which he stands unrivalled. It is possible and even reasonable to dislike his subjects, his touch, his tone; but it is unreasonable, and will one day be held impossible, to deny that he is a great artist.

"Will one day," I say, for it seems to me unquestionable that these later plays of his will take an abiding place in our dramatic literature. How long they will be acted no one can foretell; but they will be read so long as people are found to interest themselves in the plutocratic society of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. They will be read as Hogarth's plates are studied to-day. I foresee a book of (say) two hundred years hence, to be called "The Culmination of Capitalism," in which, assuredly, there will be a chapter on "The Plays of Pinero." Of course, they will have to be read with a certain discount; the critic will have to allow for the author's personal equation. He will recognise, for one thing, that it is only a section, a stratum, of plutocratic society that is here depicted, and that not all, even of the rich, were so unidea'd, so sensual, so purblind. But, within its due limitations, the picture, I imagine, will be found terribly convincing—all the more so for the fact that the author does not set out to be a satirist. He writes, not without irony indeed, but without indignation. He says "Thus and thus does character disclose itself among the idle and luxurious town-dwellers of my time—men and women with no occupation or interest beyond gambling, dress, sport, and the satisfaction of the lower appetites—a generation without faith, without hope, and with very little charity. I show you, as in a clear, uncommenting mirror, some of the crises in their hapless existences. It is for you to consider what the social system is worth which begets such phenomena, and to fit them, if you can, into a rational scheme of things." It is the stupidest misnomer to call such a play as "Mid-Channel" a problem play. No problem is stated in it—much less solved—and no general view is indicated. It is hinted, no doubt, that a childless marriage is heavily handicapped when middle age has to be faced; but no emphasis is laid on the suggestion, which arises quite casually as a trait in the heroine's character. Think how M. Brieux would have—or rather has—elaborated the theme, and hammered the idea home! The contrast illustrates to perfection the passionless objectivity of Sir Arthur Pinero's manner.

"Mid-Channel," like so many other modern plays, is the tragedy of idleness. Zoe Blundell, the heroine, is the childless wife of a rich stockbroker. She has a handsome house in Lancaster Gate—a house, so far as we can see, without a picture or a book or even a piano in it. The "Sketch" is the nearest approach to literature or art that enlivens her drawing-room. She has no interest but dress to occupy the seventeen waking hours of her day. At one time she had a certain amount of social ambition. When she and her husband lived in Fitzjohn's Avenue, they were still climbing. They had their furrow to drive, and Zoe could further her husband's business interests by making herself agreeable to his associates. It was not always pleasant, but it was an occupation of a sort. Now, on the other hand, they appear to have clomb. Their ambition does not soar above Lancaster Gate: Mayfair they perceive to be unattainable. In Tyburnia their life stagnates, and peccant humors are engendered. Apparently they have not even the safety-valve of bridge. When Theo comes home from business—a business not absolutely abounding in nutriment for the spiritual nature—they have nothing before them but an interminable evening at home, or a dinner with some other wealthy people, as bored and boring as themselves, or a meal at a "cook-shop" with a couple of stalls to follow at "The Spring Chicken" or "The Merry Widow." Zoe, who has a certain bright attractiveness, whiles away the tedium of the day in the company of a little band of young men whom she calls her "tame robins"—Harry Estridge, Jim Mallandain, Cossy Rawlings, and (last, not least) Lenny Ferris. Theo is not positively jealous of her Cossies and Lennies; he probably knows that there is safety in numbers; but it annoys him that she should be all amiability to them, and all discontent and exigence to him. They have, in short, after thirteen years of married life, no substitute or supplement for the slackening sensual bond. In vain does Zoe expend all her art in her adornment. "As for my gowns or my hats—anything I put on—I might dress in sackcloth; he'd never observe it." Theo, though not essentially cruel or vicious, is of a heavy, overbearing disposition; and the vivacity of Zoe's nature is not without a tinge of irritability. They have got so thoroughly on each other's nerves that they cannot meet without bickering; and it is in vain that their philosophic friend, the Honorable Peter Mottram, drops in and talks Roundabout Papers to them. A momentary reconciliation is only followed by a more violent quarrel. Zoe flies into a rage because Theo proposes to take her to a second-class hotel in Paris; and Theo flings out of the house, never to return.

This quarrel over a little more or a little less of luxury is symbolically excellent, but seems to me, from the point of view of character, a little abrupt. It makes Zoe's irascibility seem almost insane. Just at the moment when she is beaming at the prospect of the trip to Paris, and ought to be particularly careful to keep her temper in hand, she goes off into a tantrum over the difference between a swagger and a less swagger hotel! As I saw this situation looming ahead, I wondered what cause of quarrel the author was going to invent; and when it came I could not quite feel that he had risen to the occasion. I do not see how a woman who could behave in such a way at such a moment could ever be decently amiable even to her "tame robins." Her conduct here is that of an ungovernable and intolerable shrew, which is not my reading of her nature. The author, I take it, meant to convey, not that either her character or her husband's was radically impossible, but that each was fatally apt to rub the other the wrong way. After such an episode, on the other hand, one cannot wonder that the luckless Theo despaired of ever rubbing her the right way. This is the only point at which the actual character-development seems unconvincing.

From their separation onwards the unhappy couple sink deeper and deeper into the morass. The root of their tragedy is still the same: they have staked everything on a life of egoistic sensation, and when that fails them they have no resources to fall back upon—neither duties, nor interests, nor even any necessary and sedative occupation. The husband finds only intolerable boredom and self-contempt in the society of an addle-pated mistress. The wife clutches despairingly at a mirage of happiness in the love of one of her "pals," Lenny Ferris, a man five years her junior, who imagines himself devoted to her. But this relation, founded on disgust and disillusionment, quickly proves to be as torturing as the other; and in a series of close-woven, poignant, sometimes brutal scenes, occupying one summer afternoon, poor Zoe is bandied like a shuttlecock from humiliation to humiliation, until she hurls herself to nothingness from her lover's balcony. There is just so much good in her that she cannot part with the last shred of her self-respect, and live.

In saying that she hurls herself "to nothingness" I may appear to be begging a great question. But I do not intend any general negation of immortality; I merely assert that for this particular woman death could mean nothing but extinction. She lived in her sensations; and when these ceased there was nothing to continue. Here, I think, we can lay our finger on the characteristic which so often arouses a sort of hostility to Sir Arthur Pinero's creations—his people, take them all round, have never a soul to be saved. With a few doubtful exceptions, they have not a spark of spiritual life. They live in their senses, their affections, their social relations; but they are wholly innocent of any relation to the Unseen. The faculty of wonder is denied them: "there is no speculation in those eyes." They do not believe in anything from the roof upwards—and neither do they disbelieve. That aspect of existence does not enter their heads. They are careful and cumbered about many things, but never about the whence, the why, or the whither of their busy little gleam of consciousness. Were the world actually peopled with such pagans, the conception of immortality could never have arisen, so manifest is the impossibility of viewing them "sub specie æternitatis." This is not a criticism of Sir Arthur Pinero's art, for certainly such people exist in their thousands. They are, indeed, one of the characteristic products of our present phase of civilisation. It must be remembered, too, that when he has essayed to draw a man or woman with a soul, as in "The Thunderbolt" or "Mrs. Ebbsmith," we have not always shown ourselves very grateful. Nevertheless, one could wish that, if only for the sake of artistic relief, he would take a little more cognisance of things immaterial, of aspiration, of wonder, and of awe.

Miss Irene Vanbrugh has never done anything better than her Zoe. It is a performance which raises her above the very high position she has hitherto held. She was as good as possible throughout; but in the first and second acts she was quite peculiarly excellent. She indicated subtle shades, transitions, and interfusions of emotion with extraordinary skill, so that her performance had something of that shimmering iridescence which fascinates us in the best work of Eleonora Duse. Mr. Lyn Harding was good as the "dour" and heavy Theo, and Mr. C. M. Lowne played the philosophic Mottram with excellent geniality and tact. I am not quite sure about Mr. Eric Maturin's Lenny Ferris. It was a clever rendering of a certain type of modern young man; but was it quite the type the author intended? It is generally safe to assume that Sir Arthur Pinero gets what he wants from his actors; but I can imagine a more convincing performance of this part.

"Madame X" at the Globe Theatre is a solid, sentimental French melodrama, of a type much admired thirty years ago, and still, no doubt, attractive enough to a certain class of audience. It contains two acts of unrelieved tedium and two acts of more or less "sensational" interest, in which Miss Lena Ashwell finds an opportunity for some extremely effective acting. It is a pure article of commerce, wholly outside the dramatic movement, whether English or European. The box-office returns form its only valid criticism—a criticism which may, perhaps, be favorable, but scarcely, I should think, enthusiastic.

THE VIEWS OF RUSSIAN LIBERALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Two recent events of our Russian life have clearly shown how well THE NATION has understood the present state of "Reform" in Russia. The arrest and deportation, without any public accusation or trial, of the secretary of our greatest living man of letters, Count Leo Tolstoy (the police-constable forbidding Tolstoy to say good-bye to his friend!) and the sudden closure of the old and purely philanthropic organisation, known as "The Invalid and Deceased Writers' Fund," are explicit enough to reveal the peculiar kind of constitutionalism personified by MM. Stolypin, Isvolsky, and Co.

In his speech about "his Majesty's Opposition," Professor Miliukow was certainly thinking of his own line of action in the third Duma, forgetting the view of Russian Liberals. Now the true Liberals are, and always have been, loyal to the monarchy, and would like to be "the Opposition" in the English style. But their conscience does not allow them to establish illusions and to hide the truth.

The reality is: we have no constitution. The third Duma is a mere registry-department. The most arbitrary bureaucratic power everywhere prevails. The law is despised.

Such a system of governing a country as that of the Stolypin Cabinet kills initiative, stops economic and political progress, and engenders general discontent, confusion, and anarchy.

Pretending to fight an imaginary revolution and skilfully profiting by the unsteadiness or servility of some of the Duma party leaders, Russian bureaucracy is again becoming omnipotent, and has surrounded the Crown with a Chinese wall of hollow phraseology, incapacity, and selfishness.

M. Stolypin's Government is trying ingeniously to give the Russian Eagle a double aspect. One of its faces is turned to the Western Powers, and puts on quasi-constitutional features (without which no foreign loan could be realised). The other one, looking to the East (Prussia included) sets up a Tartar system, protects the pogrom-makers, and sympathises with the furious anti-Semitism of the "Black Gang." Because, therefore, the reactionists, and all those who hate the idea of serious reform in Russia, are naturally attracted by the congenial temper and institutions of their Prussian and German-Austrian neighbors, we fear that the Anglo-Russian entente, so dear to us and so indispensable to both our countries, may be endangered.

We want a lasting understanding with England, which should lead to an alliance like that with France, in order to assure the peace of Europe. But we know that such an alliance, or even an honest entente, between English Liberals and Russian reactionaries, open like Doubrovin, or hidden like Stolypin, is an unnatural bond.

For the regeneration and greatness of Russia we want a real, and not a quasi, Parliament, with a responsible Cabinet; we firmly believe that only a truly constitutional Russia can be a great ally and an indomitable foe.

We are for fighting high-handed, arbitrary, and corrupt administration, whatever may be the shield under which it covers itself. Such an administration compromises the Crown before the country, and the country before civilisation. —Yours, &c.,

A Group of Russian Liberals.

THE SET-BACK TO WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Amid the confusion of tongues and the whirlwind of unregulated emotion which have prevailed during these last four years, it has seemed to some of us best to abstain from words, even good words. But I feel, and I speak only for myself, that the moment has come for strong, definite protest against a policy which not only destroys any hope of our enfranchisement in the near future, but which—much worse than that—degrades the ideal of womanhood and exhibits a passionate unreason that says little for the intelligence of the women who adopt it. There are, we all admit, many women in the violent party, of high character and honest aims, who have been captivated by this new and strange fanaticism, but it is impossible to separate them from their colleagues. They must stand or fall by the policy they maintain, by the company they keep. Stone-throwing, muffin-bell ringing, spitting, face-slapping, the invasion of the private and domestic life of statesmen in the supposed interest of public questions, and now this melodramatic tomfoolery at Lympne Castle with lassoes, can never be described as "political" action by intelligent people, at any rate for long. Strongly as I have desired the right to vote, and steadfastly as I have worked for it for many years, I say deliberately that I do not desire to gain the right through such practices as these. If this policy, even in appearance, were to win, it would be disastrous. It would set a premium upon violence as a means of gaining social and political reform, and public life would become practically impossible for rational beings.

The militant party demand that the Government shall forthwith bring in a definitely conservative limited Bill and pass it before the General Election. No Government is entitled to do any such thing. It would be a dangerous precedent, indeed, to make so fundamental a change in the law until the will of the nation is known, and until the methods of enfranchisement have been thrashed out. To pass such a law now would be to legislate not only in the teeth of the electorate, but in the teeth of the majority of women.

I grieve over the fact—but it is idle to blink it—that the tide has, for the time, set strongly against women's suffrage among women as well as men, and that ebb is precisely coterminous with the militant policy. Great advances had been made during the previous thirty years, by reason of the higher education of women and the proved fitness of thousands of them for professional and public service. Their presence was welcomed on public bodies, and their success was measured in exact ratio to their tact and discretion. This line of policy proved persuasive, and brought Women's Suffrage into practical politics. To-day it is extremely difficult for wise and expert women to gain admission to civic bodies. The ordinary voter does not discriminate, he lumps us all together, is "sick of them rows at Westminster," as one of them put it, and votes against the woman candidate, however unimpeachable her qualifications.

But the question cuts deeper than this. The militant policy is based on sex-rivalry, sex-antagonism, things which nature forbids. All organic life is based on sex-affinity, sex-co-operation. There alone can growth and development be found. Rivalry and antagonism bring sterility, death. That is why I have always distrusted feminist movements. There was considerable excuse for them, no doubt, in the faulty framework of society and law which men built up in a sort of one-eyed way, without reference to women, but many men have been quick to see that women's hands were needed in the repair of this framework; and as the laws interfere more and more intimately with the industrial, social, and domestic life of the people, the national need for women's help became more and more obvious. But who will desire the help of these militant women in the grave counsels of government?

Physical force is the worst and, from the point of view of ethics, the weakest of arguments when it is used by men. Its use by women seems to me the denial of their womanhood. It finds itself in only too fitting companionship with the broken word of honor not to disturb political meetings and the defence of those broken words as justifiable "strategy." This is, indeed, "to debase the moral currency."

Viewed as tactics, the policy is deplorable, as anyone may see. Your own warning, sir, was clear enough last year: "the fate of women's suffrage in the near future depends on the impression made by women in public life." The exhibitions of political incapacity by a group of extreme women have, for the time—and for the time only—obscured the valid claims and faithful service of the majority.—Yours, &c., S. A. B.

THE GORRINGE CASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I gladly take the opportunity of assuring "Leodiensis" that I intended no personal discourtesy by my use of the phrase "special pleading," even if I am unable to accept the definition he gives of it as expressing exactly what was in my mind.

It will not be necessary to trespass on your space by following him through the whole of his letter. I am not an expert in rating matters—it was for that reason, not with any dark design, that I used his own figures to illustrate my point—and I shall not, therefore, offer any criticism of the figures and calculations he now sets out.

It is admitted by "Leodiensis" that rates and taxes are payments in respect of services rendered, and the gentle sarcasm with which he accompanies the admission may be accepted without comment. It will scarcely serve to disguise the fact that, in his statement of the value of the land at £9,000, this unobtrusive "fundamental principle" somehow got completely overlooked.

Now, while the economic return from one portion of the rates expenditure (police, sanitary services, &c.) may be more immediately and directly evident than that from another portion (poor rate, &c.), the return from that other portion, if more remote, is none the less a matter of experience and fact.

Broadly speaking, and taking the community as a whole, my position is that rates must be regarded as necessary outlays, as essential for the full development and successful carrying on of business as any other working expenses; and the fallacy of the claim that, but for these local levies, landowners would be able to demand higher tribute, lies in overlooking the fact that, in that case, there would be so much less to levy tribute upon. It would be just as reasonable to say that if manufacturers stopped spending money upon materials and wages, they would be able to pay more rent.

"But," "Leodiensis" argues, "there are other considerations. The incidence of rating is such that contributions are demanded in proportion to ability to pay, rather than in proportion to the services rendered"—and he quotes figures to show that, in the Gorringe case, a considerable margin over and above the cost of the services is actually so demanded.

In proportion to the value of the land for a particular purpose, would be a more accurate description, and I am not at all sure that it would not be possible to establish a much closer relationship between that value and the services for which payment is demanded than "Leodiensis" seems willing to allow. Assuming his view of the matter, however, the position reached is this: that his original statement that the Duke could have insisted on a rental of £9,000 remains "obviously incorrect," inasmuch as part at least of the £3,000 is taken for services rendered to the efficiency of the land, and my criticism is equally found to be too sweeping, inasmuch as the whole £3,000 is not taken for that purpose.

My intervention, it would seem, then, was only partially justified; but the general principle that rates as a whole are working expenses, and must not be confused with fixed value or increment, is, to my mind, so important, even if its application is rendered imperfect in individual cases by rating anomalies, that I cannot feel unduly concerned at this conclusion.

But the most interesting feature of "Leodiensis's" letters is the mental attitude illustrated by his evident conviction that Messrs. Gorringe's contributions to the rates must naturally and properly be regarded in the light of payments made by the Duke of Westminster.

According to his view, the landowner pays the rates, because, if there were no rates, he could demand more rent. But why stop at rates? By the same reasoning, he also pays his tenants' income tax, together with every other form of public revenue; and as it is evident that, if the sole expense of a tenant were his rent, he could pay his whole income as rent, it follows that the landowners already "pay" the whole difference between the entire national income and what they now receive as land rent!

The "straightforward logic" of this proposition should commend itself to "Leodiensis."

Of course, in a certain negative sense, it may be said to be true; but it leaves out of account the vital fact that the national income is not self-created, but is the product of the people's labor, and that to it the landowner, as such, contributes nothing at all.

The statement that the Duke of Westminster already contributes largely to the public revenue, per Messrs. Gorringe's rates, bears the same relation to the realities underlying words as does the equally true statement that pins save thousands of lives by not being swallowed, and the Duke deserves exactly as much social and political consideration for his "payments" as the pins for their "life-saving."

One word, sir, as to the "elementary doctrine" that any subvention given in aid of rates would go into the pocket of the landowner. This is undeniable; but is it any proof that the landowner pays the rates? On the same lines, a subvention in aid of a manufacturer would prove that the ground landlord pays, say, his wages bill; or one in aid of your present contributor that it is the same ubiquitous philanthropist who really settles with the milkman and the baker. It may be so, but—I hae ma doots.—Yours, &c.,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—All sympathy for Mr. Gorringe and abuse of the Duke of Westminster are out of place and only confuse the issue. When Mr. Gorringe became the lessee of the property he knew for a certainty the length of the lease, and when the term expired he had no grounds whatever for complaint. He had received all he had expected or was entitled to. Likewise the Duke was entitled to resume possession of his property. He had fulfilled his part of the bargain.

Suppose the Duke had agreed to deliver to Mr. Gorringe 1,000 bushels of wheat during each of the next twelve months; at the end of that period would Mr. Gorringe be entitled to dub the Duke a blackmailer if he would not go on delivering except at the then increased market price? If not, why not? Because land differs from wheat? So it does (and that is the foundation of the increment tax), but a bargain is a bargain, whether it relates to land or the produce thereof, and when it has been carried out as originally intended, it is an abuse of language to call one of the parties a blackmailer because he will not do something beyond. Would Mr. Gorringe have been a blackmailer if he had obtained from the Duke a new lease at a reduced ground rent? If not, why should the Duke, for renewing at an increased rent?

I believe that the increment tax, when properly explained, meets with the approval of most men; but it must not be advocated with vague claims for ex-lessees (for whom it does nothing and could do nothing) or with cries of blackmail (of which it proposes to take twenty per cent!). Such advocacy does harm, and the case for the tax is better without it.—Yours, &c.,

LEONARD J. CLEGG.

THE MOTOR ROADS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You have rendered an important public service by calling attention to the proposal to provide special roads for motorists, independently of the County Councils, the Local Government Board, and the ratepayers. The present Government, with all its virtues, has an overweening love of creating "Boards" of all kinds, for social experiments of very doubtful utility, and of piling up expenditure in all directions, whether likely to be "remunerative" or not. By all means let motorists have roads of their own—the general public will be very glad to get rid of them—but let them pay for them, even if it should involve the creation of a "road tax" in addition to the other sources of revenue to be ear-marked in their favor. It is idle to suppose that the non-motoring public would pay for the privilege (?) of using the new roads, when there is to be no limit of speed for motors, which would become even more deadly than they are at present with a more or less illusory limit. If motorists desire to smash each other up, that is their own affair; but they ought not to be aided and abetted by the Government to entrap the general public into using roads which would be quite unsafe for ordinary slow-moving traffic.

If there is any money to spare, let it be used for the improvement of the existing roads, many of which are in a perfectly disgraceful condition. In many cases there are no footpaths, or "side-walks," so that pedestrians are constantly driven into the hedge, and sometimes even into a ditch, in order to avoid the scorching motor. The narrowness of some roads, of which we had an appalling example in the death of Lord de Clifford a few days ago, is a fruitful cause of accidents. In this case a steep hill, curved like the letter S, was only twelve feet wide, or less than the length of his lordship's car, which took the hill at fifteen or twenty miles an hour, to be speedily confronted by a couple of farm waggons, which, with their drivers, would have been smashed into atoms, had not the car been turned up the bank. This, probably the worst bit of road in the Kingdom, was quite unprotected by warning boards, and cannot be repaired until the Steyning Rural District Council can collect sufficient "subscriptions" (not rates) to pay for the work!—Yours, &c.,

R. W. J.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Joshua Brookes, does well in calling attention to the undemocratic character of a part of the Development Bill, which is framed upon the principle that the proceeds of a tax should be used in the interests of the class that pays it.

If this principle were adopted throughout, and it could be shown, for example, that the new licensing duties would be expended in the interests of the brewers, and the new land taxes for the benefit of the landlords, I venture to predict that all the storm of opposition that rages against the Budget would quickly die away. The wicked would cease from troubling, and the Government would be at rest.

But taxation would have become a farce, for it would then produce nothing for the State.

The new Bill may well be acceptable to motorists, for instead of protecting the public from the motor tyranny, it would leave the motorists free to use the ordinary roads without exacting from them even the modest payment they now have to make towards their maintenance. There appears, moreover, to be a grave danger that the Road Board, with its formidable powers, may be captured in the motor interest, which evidently means to make the attempt.—Yours, &c.,

RIGHTS OF WAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I draw the attention of your readers to a dispute of some years' standing in Cornwall, affecting the public rights of access to the coast, which once again emphasises the need for considerable reforms on the question of public rights of way?

This Cornish case raises the same public issues as were raised by the sensational struggles over the rights of public access to the Giant's Causeway and to Stonehenge.

In 1905, a local dispute at Prussia Cove, in Cornwall, resulted in an action, heard by Mr. Justice Buckley in London, between Mr. Louis Wilhelm Ferdinand Behrens and fishermen and others "concerning the right of public access to certain parts of the cliff at Prussia Cove." I can best describe the dispute by quoting from the speech of the judge in delivering judgment:—

> "The scene of the dispute in this case is laid upon a beautiful rocky piece of the Cornish coast near Marazion. . . . The Defendants are fishermen and others of a like station in life who have, most of them, lived there all their lives. The Plaintiff is a gentleman who, from the year 1862 and onwards, has resorted to this beautiful piece of country from time to time, and who ultimately, some eighteen months ago, became the purchaser of several acres of land extending to the sea, and including the sites of these beautiful places. Unfortunately, he has not made himself popular in the district. Being of opinion, whether rightly or wrongly, that he is within his rights, he took physical means to prevent the country people from using the disputed way. He dug a trench across the road immediately to the north of the purple and green ways, so that no cart could go that way, and also built a wall. It is material to note that this obstruction of the existing way was not made in the course of the erection of new buildings, or of any development of this part of the property for new purposes (although the Plaintiff says that this is what he had, in fact, in contemplation), but was made for the physical interference with the possibility of access. He also put a fence at the junction of the green way and the purple way. He filled up the gap leading to Pixie's Cove to a height of five feet, so that access could not be obtained to the Cove by the old path; and he planted the passing place."
> "It is a matter of regret rather than of surprise that the local inhabitants in these circumstances took forcible, although not justifiable, steps to assert rights which they conceived they possessed. They did so in a manner which is to be deprecated. They trampled on his hyacinths; they filled up his trench; they re-opened the gap to Pixie's Cove, and they demolished his fence. Local feeling has run high, and large and, I daresay, disorderly crowds have assembled to assert what the local inhabitants conceived to be their rights."
> "Under these circumstances, this action was brought. The Plaintiff asks for an injunction to restrain the Defendants from trespassing on the disputed ways. The Defendants believe that all the ways in question are common public highways."

As a result of this action:—

1. The judge declared that the public rights of way had not been established, although "the plaintiff must bear in mind that, in proceedings properly instituted, he might have great difficulty in maintaining that there is not, at some one of these places here in dispute, a public right of access to the foreshore for fishing."

2. The injunction was refused, "the plaintiff voluntarily disclaiming any intention of preventing the fishermen in the district from reasonably exercising their calling, or of refusing to permit the defendants or any members of the public to exercise reasonable passage to and from such portions of the foreshore abutting on the plaintiff's property for the purpose of fishing or enjoying the beauties of the locality as may not from time to time interfere with his own or his tenants' user and enjoyment of his property."

3. The defendants had to pay "forty shillings damages."

That was four years ago. To-day barbed wire fences, spiked gates, new walls, and disconcerting notice boards are strangely out of harmony with Mr. Justice Buckley's speech and with Mr. Behrens's disclaimer. The splendid cliffs and rocks and caves at Prussia Cove, King's Cove, Bessie's Cove, Pixie's Cove and Little Cudden are being gradually monopolised, and the public no less than the local fishermen are being gradually edged away.

Here is a case in which the local fishermen and the greater public who desire to enjoy the beauties of a splendid coast appear to be alike powerless. The local fishermen and others, who have not recovered from the financial strain of four years ago, cannot be expected to bear the heavy costs of fighting further cases in London. May I suggest that this case strongly emphasises the need for some amendment of the laws relating to public rights of way; such an amendment, for instance, as was suggested in the Session of 1906 in a private Bill:—

> "Where any way upon or over any land or water has been actually enjoyed by the public without interruption for the full period of thirty years, such way shall be deemed conclusively to be a public highway unless it shall appear that the same was enjoyed by some consent or agreement expressly given or made for that purpose in writing."

The Commons and Footpaths Preservation Society, with its experiences, has also suggested the following clause as desirable in any new Bill bearing on this subject:—

> "The presumption that a way is a public highway shall not be deemed to be defeated or impaired because the terminus of such way is the seashore or the summit of a hill or cliff or a place of natural beauty or historic interest in private ownership."

Finally, may I suggest that it is desirable that there should be a public right of way round the coast of England, and that for this purpose the Coastguards' Paths should by legislation be declared to be the public rights of way? The Ordnance Survey Maps, already valuable, could be made more so if they could then be utilised as legal evidence for the existence of these public coastguards' paths.—Your, &c.,

GERMAN AND BRITISH ARMAMENTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As a Radical Englishman, I have read with distrust your comments on the few half-hearted expressions of regret at the expense of armaments, which have appeared in the German Press. Is it not time that our party learnt the main facts with regard to our relations with Germany? Is it not true,

(1) That the period of reduction of British naval estimates, 1906-1908, coincides with the period of the extension and acceleration of the German naval programme?

(2) That the laying down of the additional four battleships and the arrangement with the Colonies coincides with the beginnings of doubt as to the wisdom of the rejection of British overtures?

The facts of International politics are not to be learnt by a reference to our inner consciousness. Unless we learn and apply the lessons of history, our programme of social reform will perish with the destruction of the nation.—Yours, &c.,

REFORMER.

THE MONOPOLY OF GIVING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reading your article, "The Handwriting on the Wall," the thought recurred to me that one monopoly hitherto, by their own admission, largely controlled by the monied classes, is especially the subject of envy to those not so advantageously situated. I refer to the monopoly of "giving." Surely many a rich man will admit he has there an unfair monopoly in the gratification of his wishes, a monopoly denied to others equally wishful and worthy of indulging in the luxury.

Personally, I look forward to the time when such "giving" shall be rendered unnecessary and cease, owing to each man being paid sufficient for services rendered.—Yours, &c.

"ASKING THE WAY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—As one who has unfortunately had to produce an ear-trumpet when a stranger inquired the way, may I ask your correspondent why this should be an occasion for mirth, and why an ear-trumpet is more ridiculous than a fashionable lorgnette? He was "not prepared for the ear-trumpet," and is startled into italics. But is his knowledge of the world so small that he has no acquaintance and sympathy with the maimed, the halt, and the deaf? Let him enlarge his acquaintance and hope to enlarge his heart.

It is certainly not a pleasant thing to produce an ear-trumpet, and it is made harder by the fear of such an attitude as your correspondent assumes. But while the deaf people who will not avail themselves of helps and blunder about through all imaginable mistakes, like Aunt Maria in "Joe Vance" (we must all of us have laughed at her, though some deaf readers may have winced a little, too), may be fair game, surely those who do all in their power, and at no small cost to their feelings, to hear, are entitled to courtesy. Sir, my sympathy is all with the old duffer by the road side, for I know what it is to strive in vain, even in this way, to hear what is said

Without reflecting on your correspondent's manners, may I say that deafness is a rare touchstone of good breeding and good feeling; and I should be graceless and unthankful did I not add that one of its compensations is the general kindness and helpfulness with which it is met.

As for asking the way, a crowd of souls inquired of Dante and Virgil on the outskirts of Purgatory, and met the usual reply:—

"Voi credete
Forse che siamo sperti d'esto loco
Ma noi sem peregrin come voi siete."

Purg. II. 61-63.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—A good many of your readers must have been grieved, as I have been, at the recent tone of your references to Japan, and particularly at the article on "The Ruthlessness of Japan" in your issue of the 14th ult. I hoped that someone better qualified than I am would have answered it in The Nation, but am disappointed to find that it has called forth no criticism from your readers.

I was in China last March, and, being anxious to see Port Arthur before returning home, viâ Japan and the United States, I went by rail from Pekin to Mukden, and thence to Dalny and Port Arthur. Fortunately, I found a cargo steamer loading at Dalny for Chemulpo, the port of Seoul in Korea, otherwise I should have had to return to Mukden and take the narrow-gauge railway in question to An-tung-hsien. The weather was bitterly cold, with occasional falls of snow. The line is, I think, of 21 in. or 24 in. gauge, instead of the usual 4 ft. 8½ in. It was laid by the Japanese engineers in the thick of the late war, and so roughly that derailments and consequent delays were frequent. In any case, two days were required to perform the journey, although the distance is only 189 miles, a halt having to be made for a night at Tsao-Ho-Kou, about half way. The merchants and traders whom I met in the district all looked forward with satisfaction to its being reconstructed of standard gauge in the near future, and pressure was actually being brought to bear on the Japanese authorities to get the initial steps accelerated. Everyone in the district stood to gain by the reconstruction, and none so much as the Manchurian farmers and traders. I was assured that the work would have been in progress last year but for the traditional procrastination of the Chinese.

Your leader writer speaks "of the utter disregard which the Japanese have invariably shown alike in Korea and in Manchuria for the rights and susceptibilities of the conquered." Everything depends, of course, on the point of view; notwithstanding the persistent efforts for generations of the Liberal Party, we are treated to similar criticisms from the Irish Nationalists. But even in my brief visit to Manchuria and Korea I was able to satisfy myself that a large proportion, if not a majority, of the most enlightened inhabitants welcomed the action of Japan, which they saw was opening up a new era of prosperity from which the natives would be the first to benefit. I believe that the future peace and prosperity of the Far East will depend largely on Japan and China learning to live together "in good intelligence," as the French say, and working harmoniously for the development of the resources of both countries. So far as I can judge, the leading men of both nations are striving towards this end, whereas the jealousy and ill-will of which we hear from time to time are mainly the result of Western interference, the outcome of Western selfishness.

I hope that the powerful voice of The Nation will be raised in favor of these interesting, intelligent, and hard-working peoples being left to work out their own salvation in their own way.—Yours, &c.,

D. M. Stevenson.

MALTA FEVER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—May I trespass upon your space to draw attention to an article upon "Malta Fever and Goats' Milk," by Dr. Walter R. Hadwen, honorary secretary of the British Union for Abolition of Vivisection, in the August number of the "Contemporary Review"?

It will be remembered that some time ago glowing notices appeared in most of the leading papers, claiming the decrease of Malta Fever as a triumph of the research work which led Colonel Sir David Bruce to announce goats' milk as the cause of the malady. Further study of the case, however, throws doubt upon this conclusion, and nowhere could the arguments against it be better stated than in the above-mentioned article.

(1) How the fever, known by the name of "Malta," is common to many localities besides that island, including places where goats' milk is never used.

(2) From precise data, given by Dr. Eyre, of a sea story, which Sir David Bruce eulogised as illustrative of the milk's action, it is shown that out of 90 people known to have drunk the milk during the transit of 65 goats from Malta, viâ Antwerp, to America, in addition to an unknown number of persons who consumed the same during a five-days' detention of the animals at Antwerp, only five could be convicted of suffering from Malta Fever, and that not by clinical symptoms, but by a laboratory examination after their recovery.

(3) The difficulty of differentiating Malta Fever from other fevers.

(4) By a careful examination of statistics, military, naval, and civil, is shown the curious fluctuation in the incidence of Malta Fever among the troops during the years that goats' milk was in continuous use; the abnormal rise during 1905; the abnormal decline during 1906, dating from January of that year, though the consumption of milk was not stopped until July; the inaccuracy shown in working out the averages of the former numbers of military patients; the significant increase of so-called "Simple Continued Fever" among the troops since the decrease of so-called "Malta Fever"; the disparity in incidence between the soldiers, sailors, and civilians.

(5) The apparent disbelief of Sir David Bruce in his own theory, for while asserting the cause of Malta Fever to be the presence in goats' milk of the minute organism, Micrococcus Melintensis, discovered in 1887 by a former Army medical officer, he goes on to express his willingness to give his own name to the fever once the Maltese have extirpated the much-maligned microbe!

(6) The insanitary condition of St. Elmo Barracks, Malta, as testified to by soldiers' wives.

(7) The filling of the military hospital by the inmates of St. Elmo Barracks during the fever epidemic of 1905.

(8) The crowding of St. Elmo Barracks up to the outbreak of 1905, and the reduction in 1906 of the troops there resident to the low number of eighty-three.

(9) The reduction by thirty-one per cent., during 1905 to 1907, of the whole Malta garrison.

(10) The improvement in health resulting from bettered sanitary conditions; the lowered death-rate in parts of the island where the new drainage system is completed; the more or less stationary death-rate in the parts where such improvements have still to be undertaken; the benefit derived from sensible medical regulations.—Yours, &c.,

E. Douglas Hume.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE LORDS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Cabinet Ministers have been speaking plainly lately, and have hinted that, should the Budget be blocked, it will be their duty to tender certain advice for the purpose of removing the obstacles.

All this is excellent, but what of the aftermath? Will the Government continue to speak sterner and stronger after the Lords have been cowed into submission over the Budget, or will they resume the previous habit of gently roaring when measure after measure was flung contemptuously back at them at the behests of Mr. Balfour?

If they do, then slackness, weariness, and defeat will be the lot of the Party even as it was before the revival over the Budget, and deep disgust will be felt if the Government bring forward Welsh Disestablishment and a Reform Bill without forcing them through the Lords.

The tame acquiescence in the loss of the Education and Licensing Bills did them untold harm, and it is not too late for their re-introduction and forcible passing into law.

Discussing the permission given to Earl Grey in 1832 to create new Peers, Payne says: "This brief paper may be called the Magna Charta of responsible government. It established the right of a Ministry to break down, by some convenient means, a factious opposition in the Lords, and this right has never since been practically disputed."

Let the Government remember these words and complete its programme.—Yours, &c.,

H. H. Robson.

Poetry.

A NEW POET.

THREE EXAMPLES OF HIS STYLE.

IN THE COOL OF THE EVENING.

I thought I heard Him calling. Did you hear
A sound, a little sound? My curious ear
Is dinned with flying noises, and this tree
Goes whisper, whisper, whisper silently
Till all its whispers spread into the sound
Of a dull roar. Lie closer to the ground,
The shade is deep, and He may pass us by,
We are so very small, and His great eye,
Customed to starry majesties, may gaze
Too wide to spy us hiding in the maze.
Ah, misery!—the sun is not yet gone
And we are naked: He will look upon
Our crouching shame, may make us stand upright
Burning in terror—O, that it were night!
He may not come . . what? listen, listen now—
He's here, lie closer . . . "Adam, where art thou?"

NOTHING AT ALL.

There was a man was very old:
He sat beside a little fire,
And watched the flame begin to tire.

He held his hands unto the heat,
And in a voice was half a scold
Informed Creation he was cold.

And very, very, feeble, too.
He could not lift up from his seat
To reach the fuel at his feet.

Perhaps, said he, God does not know
That I'm nearly frozen through;
He mightn't like it if He knew

That an old man cannot stretch,
When his blood's too weak to flow,
Frozen sitting in the snow.

. . . . .

Poor old chattering, grumbling wight.
God will hardly come to fetch
Wood for such an ancient wretch.

But He'll send you rain more cold,
To quench that little flickering light,
Just like this, and freeze you quite.
. . Men must die when they get old.

WHAT THE DEVIL SAID.

It was the night time, God the Father Good,
Weary of praises, on a sudden stood
Up from His throne and leaned upon the sky,
For He had heard a sound, a little cry,
Thin as a whisper climbing up the steep.

And so He looked to where the Earth asleep
Rocked with the Moon, He saw the whirling sea
Swing round the world with surgent energy,
Tangling the Moonlight in its netted foam,
And nearer where the white and fretted dome
Of the ice-capped pole spun back a larded ray
To whistling stars, bright as a wizard's day.

But these He passed with eyes intently wide,
Till closer still the mountains He espied
Squatting tremendous on the broad-back'd Earth;
Each nursing twenty rivers at a birth.
And then minutely sought He, for the cry
Had climbed the slant of space so hugely high.

He found it in a ditch outside a town,
A tattered hungry woman crouching down
By a dead babe—so there was nought to do,
For what is done is done, and back He drew
Sad to His heaven of ivory and gold;
And as He sat, all suddenly there rolled,
From where the woman wept upon the sod,
Satan's deep voice, "O, thou unhappy God!"

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

As far as can be judged at present, the autumn publishing season promises well. Publishers are more hopeful than usual, and their announcement lists contain a great number of interesting titles and subjects. Messrs. Macmillan, for instance, promise us, under the heading of "Literature," three books of the first importance—a volume of verse, to be called "Time's Laughing Stocks, and other Poems," by Mr. Thomas Hardy, the third volume of Professor Saintsbury's "History of English Prosody," and the sixth volume of Professor Courthope's "History of English Poetry," which brings the narrative down to the death of Scott and completes the work. Professor Courthope's volume, which has already been announced in these columns, deals with the influence on English poetry of the French Revolution. The point of view adopted throughout the whole work is that poetry is an imaginative reflection of the social life of the nation, and, after treating of the democratic lyrical movement in poetry heralded by Burns and Blake, Professor Courthope traces the influence of the political views of the Foxite Whigs on the work of men like Rogers, Campbell, and Moore. He also discusses the effects of the Revolution on the Lake School and its bearing upon Byron, Shelley, Keats, and others who belong to the later Romantic movement. The volume ends with a short chapter in which the author summarises the character of his "History" and explains his reasons for ending with the death of Scott. Professor Courthope is to be heartily congratulated on the completion of a work which no English scholar since Warton has had the courage to attempt.

UNDER the heading of "Biography and History," the same publishers announce Lord Acton's long-expected "Lectures on the French Revolution," a biography of Lord Kelvin by Professor Silvanus Thompson, the fifth and sixth volumes of Mr. Fortescue's "History of the British Army," "The English Church in the Nineteenth Century" by Mr. F. Warre Cornish, and Professor H. M. Gwatkin's "Early Church History to A.D. 313." Professor Gwatkin's aim has been to trace the growth of Christianity in its connection with the general history of the time, indicating the lines of thought, and noting the forces that made for change. He states in his preface that he has made no attempt to conceal his personal opinions. "The mere annalist may be able to do it, but the historian cannot, unless he accepts theories of determinism which turn Universal Law into universal nonsense, by refusing to recognise the plainest facts of universal experience. . . . Impartiality does not consist in a refusal to form opinions, or in a futile concealment of them under a lofty affectation of treating history scientifically, but in forming them by a single-hearted effort to realise their thoughts again, and understand their whole environment." Independent judgment and freshness of treatment are valuable qualities in a writer who treats of early Church history, and Professor Gwatkin's former work, as well as his preface, leads us to look for both in his coming volumes.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S list is, as usual, particularly strong in historical biographies. One of the most promising is Mr. Hilaire Belloc's "Marie Antoinette." The view taken is that Marie Antoinette's life resembles a Greek tragedy, the events that determined her fate being not accidental, but an inevitable result of the great alliance of 1756, a dynastic arrangement entered upon when she was less than a year old. Another book by Mr. Belloc is to be called "On Everything," and will be a companion volume to his last collection of essays, "On Nothing." It is chiefly made up of Mr. Belloc's contributions to the "Morning Post."

MEMOIRS of distinguished lawyers are noted for the number of racy and entertaining anecdotes which they usually contain, and Mr. T. E. Crispe's "Reminiscences of a K.C." promises to be no exception. Its opening chapters treat of London in the 'fifties of the last century, and give some glimpses of men of letters, actors, and actresses, with whom the author had acquaintance. These are followed by sketches of life at the bar, with reminiscences of past judges and advocates. Mr. Crispe gives hints to young barristers in regard to advocacy, elocution, and the best way of dealing with judges, juries, and witnesses, and also discusses a number of legal reforms which he holds to be desirable.

GOOD biographies of theatrical celebrities are rare, but in her book on "David Garrick and his Circle," Mrs. Clement Parsons showed that such a chronicle may be made lively and effective. She has now written "The Incomparable Siddons," which is intended to be a contribution to the study of acting, as well as a portrait of one of the most famous of English actresses. The book is not without literary interest, for Mrs. Siddons was a friend of Sir Walter Scott, while her long life enabled her to know both the London of Johnson and the London of Byron.

"THE DAYS OF THE DIRECTOIRE" is the title of a book by Mr. Alfred Allinson, which Mr. John Lane has in the press. The period abounds in picturesque figures and dramatic situations—Barras, Carnot, Babeuf, Madame Tallien, and Ange Pitou, are a few names that present themselves at once—and the crowd of adventurers who thronged the Luxembourg should furnish Mr. Allinson with plenty of material. Use is made of the diaries and correspondence of foreign travellers in France at the time, and by the help of these the author gives some vivid glimpses of the rural districts, and of Paris, in the days immediately succeeding the Revolution.

A BIOGRAPHICAL study of "Pascal" has been written by Lord St. Cyres, and will be published in the autumn by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. Recent French criticism has cleared up several difficult points concerning Pascal's life and thought, so that the coming work will contain material that has not hitherto been brought before English readers. Lord St. Cyres writes from the Catholic standpoint, and it will be interesting to see how he deals with Pascal's attractive but enigmatic personality.

DURING the present month Messrs. Longmans will issue Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's "Garibaldi and the Thousand," a continuation of the same author's "Garibaldi's Defence of the Roman Empire." Messrs. Longmans have also in preparation a new edition of Mill's "Principles of Political Economy," in which the editor, Professor W. J. Ashley, indicates, with their dates, all the changes in the text which show any variation or development in Mill's views. In the introduction Professor Ashley examines Mill's position in the history of economic thought, and an appendix treats of his influence upon later writers.

MR. ARTHUR RANSOME'S "History of Story-Telling: Studies in the Development of Narrative," is to be published shortly by Messrs. Jack. It consists of a series of essays, beginning with an account of early stories in verse, and ending with Gautier, French Romanticism, and Flaubert. Each essay is intended to be a portrait of some particular writer, together with an examination of his influence upon the technique of the art.

DANTE'S SYSTEM OF MORALS.*

When Virgil and Dante have passed through the circles of Hell, wherein sins of incontinence are punished, and are pausing in the circle of heretics, Virgil explains to his companion the system of the three circles they have still to traverse. He begins by saying (Inf. XI., 22-23) that injuria is the goal or finis of all malitia; and proceeds to show that all the denizens of the lower hell have been guilty of injuria, either open (violent) or secret (fraudulent). Mr. Reade's book, of nearly 450 pages, is practically a commentary upon these words.

He maintains: First: that the term malitia is not (as is generally, and I think rightly, assumed) a translation of Aristotle's κακία, but is used in the strictly technical sense in which sins committed ex passione are contrasted by Aquinas with those committed ex malitia. And further, that "the finis of one who sins ex malitia is never the gratification of passion" (p. 228). Second: That justitia being a passionless virtue is (in its narrower sense) directly opposed to malitia, so that "only when passion is superseded by sheer voluntas nocendi, or, in other words, when the act is committed ex malitia, is there in the full moral sense a sin against justice" (p. 272). Third: That all such acts of injustice are prompted by odium, and "cannot be deliberately willed until mere anger or envy have given place to odium. . . . for to hate, and to will murder or theft for its own sake, are but two expressions of the same thing" (p. 264). The man who commits an injustice ex malitia, and in odio, therefore, "wills the crime because he knows that it will damage his neighbour: he does it without passion, and with cold-blooded deliberateness" (p. 262).

If all this could be made good it would certainly enable us to read the celebrated lines in question as a technically accurate statement, in which the word finis might be pressed to the very utmost. The injury inflicted upon another, and not any gratification or advantage accruing to the sinner himself, would, in that case, be the goal or final end and purpose of the injurious acts of every one of the sinners in the last three circles of Hell. The conclusion is sufficiently startling, and it suggests at once that Dante's technical accuracy in the use of philosophical terms is being defended at too heavy a price. It would involve us, for instance, in the conclusion that Jason (who is in the first bolgia of the eighth circle) seduced Medea neither from passion, nor from a desire to make use of her in his quest, but from a wish, arising out of dispassionate hatred, to interfere with her matrimonial prospects, to facilitate her passage to a disreputable life, and to bring discredit upon her father; for it is in these things, according to Aquinas, that the injuria of seduction consists (Summa. $2^a$ $2^{ae}$ cliv. 6. c.). Now an argument must be strong indeed if it is to support such a conclusion, and Mr. Reade's argument is weak—nay, his premises are positively and directly false—at almost every critical point.

At the basis of the whole edifice lies a complete misconception, and therefore misrepresentation, of the doctrine of Aquinas as to the difference between sins committed ex passione and those committed ex malitia. It is astonishing, and until one has checked it over and over again incredible, that so patient and diligent a student of Aquinas as Mr. Reade shows himself to be can have failed to understand a point at once so obvious and so fundamental. Aquinas defines sinning ex malitia as the deliberate preferring of a lesser to a greater good, and he illustrates it by the case of a man who loves "riches or pleasure" more, for instance, than "the order of reason or of the divine law." And he further explains very carefully that even the man who sins ex malitia does not love evil in itself, instancing "the lascivious man who would prefer to secure his indulgence (frui delectatione) without offence to God, but, of the two, prefers offending God by sinning to forfeiting his indulgence" (S. $1^a$ $2^{ae}$ lxxviii. 1).

The finis, then, in such cases, is exactly what Mr. Reade says it can never be, namely, "the gratification of passion." The man who is inspired by odium does, indeed, as Mr. Reade correctly maintains, do a wrong to another simply for the sake of injuring him, and finds his goal in the injury, regarding it as a bonum to himself, because it is a malum to one whom he regards as, in his whole being, repugnant and noxious to himself (S. $1^a$ $2^{ae}$ xxix. 1). But to regard all sins that are committed ex malitia as due to odium, is directly counter to the definitions.

What, then, is the meaning of the contrast between passio and malitia? It is very simple. The man who sins ex passione prefers the lesser to the greater good, only when directly under the blinding influence of the passion itself, whereas the other deliberately, and in advance, sets out to secure the lesser good in preference to the greater. Such, in the words of the Apostle, "make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." Naturally the possession of wealth, of honor, or the gratification of pure hatred, may be deliberately preferred to better things, so that they too may give rise to sins ex malitia; but passion in the narrower sense is in no way excluded, and the man who is intemperate "ex malitia" is quite a typical case (S. $1^a$ $2^{ae}$ lxxviii. 4. c.), though Mr. Reade regards him as a paradoxical person, whom he confessedly does not know what to do with (pp. 289, 336). In short, Mr. Reade does not understand or recognise the man who in his absolutely or relatively passionless moments deliberately schemes and plans to secure the gratification of his passions when the time comes, whatever wrong it may involve; and, consequently, he confounds the absence of passion in the act of choice with the exclusion of the gratification of passion as an object. This vitiates his whole analysis, and reduces his conclusions to a string of psychological monstrosities.

It would be easy to show that the same radical mistake leads to a similar ignoring of plain texts, and consequently to a similar misrepresentation of the teaching of Aquinas as to injustice (Cf. S. $1^a$ $2^{ae}$ lxxxviii. 5. c., and many other passages); but we will turn to the more gracious and more grateful task of acknowledging our deep sense of personal obligation to Mr. Reade's study, in spite of its radical unsoundness. The net outcome of a careful perusal of his book, with the concomitant study of Aquinas, has been to bring the present reviewer to a far clearer conception than he had ever before been able to reach of the root ideas that dominate Dante's treatment of sin, both in the Purgatory and in the Hell. The following exposition is not Mr. Reade's, and in some respects it runs directly counter to his contentions, but it is rooted in his repeated and luminous statements that, in the Christian tradition of the thirteenth century, sins of the animal nature that we should call brutish, such as gluttony and carnality, are for that very reason regarded as less grave, or, at least, less fundamental, than sins of the spiritual nature, such as pride or envy.

Sins, for the most part, may be regarded under either of two aspects. They always imply inordinate affections, that is to say, what we should now describe as a false scheme of values. The sinner loves the absolutely or relatively unlovely. But in many, if not most, cases there is an objective as well as a subjective aspect of sin. It injures others or infringes in some way upon their dues. In the Purgatory sin is regarded primarily as ill-regulated affection; and here the disturbances of due order, induced by the appetites of the flesh, are treated as less fundamental than pride or envy, because the latter corrupt the affections at their very source, and teach a man actually to regard another's evil as his good and another's good as his evil.

Even here the actuating principle is not necessarily odium in the full technical sense; for if you envy a man (for instance) you only wish him ill in those things wherein he has the advantage of you, whereas if you hate him you wish him ill in everything (De malo X. 2. $1^m$). Nevertheless the domineering or envious man does seek the humiliation of others as a goal in itself. It is not that he pursues his good reckless of the evil inflicted on others, but that he seeks their evil as an essential part of his good. The gluttonous seek the lesser good to the neglect of the greater. The envious seek evil. Gluttony may be recalcitrance of the lower appetites against the rule of reason, envy involves treachery on the part of the ruling intelligence itself, not mere rebellion on the part of the subject appetites. In the one case the garrison has been overpowered, in the other it has been corrupted. Thus, in the two lowest circles of Purgatory there is at least an approach (though an approach only) to the principle that Mr. Reade endeavors to find in the three lowest circles of Hell. The main point on which we are insisting, however, is that in Purgatory sins are treated primarily under the aspect of disorder in the affections, and for that reason pride and envy (the sins of the devil) are regarded as worse than sins to which the world and the flesh seduce our weakness.

In Hell, on the other hand, sin is regarded, successively, under both its aspects; first, as inordinate affection in the sinner himself, and, second, as injurious to others. The incontinent sins are treated under the former aspect (though without any implication that they do not actually inflict injury on others), but after the seventh canto, where internal evidence and tradition combine to indicate a "joint," we pass (through certain transitional cantos) to the contemplation of sins as inflicting deliberate injury upon others. The essential characteristic of these sins is that the injury they work is not incidental, but inherent in the act itself. The man who deliberately robs or cheats, injures his neighbor, not as an incidental consequence, but as an integral, essential and inseparable constituent of the act he directly contemplates. In this sense injury is directly aimed at and is an end, though (and here we sacrifice the one point which Mr. Reade gains) it is not necessarily or generally the true finis of the action in the sense of the thing for the sake of which it is done. It may be this; for odium may be, though in the case of the majority of the sinners in these circles it obviously was not, the principle of action. But the injurious intention is essential. Now, Aristotle points out that acts of deliberate injustice may be open (violent) or secret (fraudulent); and in another passage that they may be unhuman (brutish) or specifically human (vicious). The conception of "violence" in Aristotle's general philosophy (though not in this specific connection) includes all violation of natural tendencies; so that the motion of a stone upwards, for instance, is violent; and since it is natural to man to love God, himself and his neighbor, pure and disinterested hatred, or perverse love of the naturally loathsome, is, in a sense, violent. And monstrous proclivities of this order are placed by Aristotle (at any rate as understood in the Middle Ages) amongst "brutish" acts, as are also acts of abnormal cruelty and savagery; and since "mutilation" and rapine had already been placed by him amongst acts of violence, it was natural for Dante to equate the violently injurious with the brutally vicious. Hence the two classes of violent and brutish offences were amalgamated and systematised by him, were contrasted with secret or fraudulent wrongs, and were treated as less grave than these latter. This is as it should be. The open tyrant is a rebel against society, the secret peculator, forger, or instigator to evil is a traitor against society. Moreover, the latter group abuse the specifically human gift of reason, and so again pollute the fountain of good and turn it to evil. Lowest of all are those doubly treacherous, who trade on the natural confidence inspired by kindred or other special tie, for "injurious" purposes, whether their ultimate motive be avarice, or pure hatred, or any other passion or impulse.

Mr. Reade, as already stated, takes a different view on many of the points now raised. But it is rash to tax Dante with a "dishonest" use of words (p. 422). Even if he could bring home confusion or perversity to Dante, his own book sufficiently indicates that a man may be perverse without being dishonest.

THE POETRY OF JAMES STEPHENS.*

In the month that Mr. Synge's "Poems and Translations" came out there was published in Dublin a first volume by a new writer. "Insurrections," by James Stephens, had also the attitude of revolt. But while Mr. Synge's revolt is against art forms and art philosophies, Mr. Stephens's revolt is against an environment. Mr. Synge looks at the pictures in a Dublin exhibition, and says:—

> Adieu, sweet Angus, Maeve, and Fand,
> Ye plumed and skinny Shee,
> That poets walked with hand-in-hand
> To learn their ecstasy.
> We'll stretch in Red Dan Sally's ditch
> And drink in Tubber fair,
> Or poach with Red Dan Philly's bitch
> The badger and the hare.

Mr. Stephens looks down a Dublin street, and says:—

> Those rigid houses, black and sour,
> Each dark thin building stretching high,
> Rank after rank
> Of windows blank
> Stare from a sullen eye,
> With doleful aspect scowl and glower
> At the timid passer-by.
> * * *
> See in the doorway, squatting there
> Back in the blackness, rocking slow—
> That a babe can rest
> On the battered breast
> She urges to and fro,
> She croons no song, she prays no prayer
> If any such she know.

So far, Irish poetry has been written by those who are Catholics, by those who have reached the Catholic point of view through their Celtic sympathies, or by those who have adopted a cosmopolitan philosophy. Mr. Stephens has also adopted a philosophy, but in his characteristic verse there is an ingenuous Protestantism. An Irish Catholic distinguishes the Protestantism in the intimacy with the Deity revealed in the poem which Mr. Stephens names, "What Tomas an Buile Said in a Pub":—

> I saw God. Do you doubt it?
> Do you dare to doubt
> I saw the Almighty Man. His hand
> Was resting on a mountain, and
> He looked upon the World and all about it:
> I saw Him plainer than you see me now,
> You mustn't doubt it.
> He was not satisfied;
> His look was all dissatisfied.
> His beard swung on a wind far out of sight
> Behind the world's curve, and there was light
> Most fearful from His forehead, and He sighed,
> "That star went always wrong, and from the start
> I was dissatisfied."
> He lifted up His hand,
> I say He heaved a dreadful hand
> Over the spinning Earth, then I said, "Stay,
> You must not strike it, God; I'm in the way;
> And I will never move from where I stand."
> He said, "Dear child, I feared that you were dead,"
> And stayed His hand.

Mr. Stephens has substituted the street for the country road, and "the literary picturesque" of the country, so much exploited by contemporary Irish writers, has no place in this book. Nevertheless Mr. Stephens has the real folk imagination. It is most obviously shown in the little poem called "Seumas Beg." Here is the mind of a freakish child, a child for whom the folk-tale is within the covers of a "penny dreadful":—

> A man was sitting underneath a tree
> Outside the village, and he asked me what > Name was upon this place, and said he > Was never here before. He told a lot
> Of stories to me too. His nose was flat.
> I asked him how it happened, and he said
> The first mate of the Mary Ann done that
> With a marling-spike one day, but he was dead,
> And jolly good job too; and he'd have gone
> A long way to have killed him, and he had > A gold ring in one ear; the other one
> "Was bit off by a crocodile, bedad."
> That's what he said. He taught me how to chew.
> He was a real nice man. He liked me too.

It is the mind of Seumas Beg that Mr. Stephens carries through all his own adventures. It is Seumas Beg who calls upon God to stay his hand. It is Seumas Beg who tells us of the old man who glowers over the fire in the grate—the fistful of red coal. In the best of Mr. Stephens's poems we get the notion of a child, or, at all events, of a little creature, freakish, friendly, and fearless. He delights in adventures, in irony, in feats of strength and cunning. It is significant that in his most characteristic love poem, "Fossils," the woman is won by the chase, by screams, by the victor's grip.

> And then she saw me creeping,
> Saw and stood
> Transfixed upon the fringes of the wood
> And straight went leaping.
> * * *

* "Insurrections." By James Stephens. Dublin: Maunsel. 1s. net.

Her hair swung far behind,
Straight as a stream, balanced upon the wind.
O, it was black, dipped
In the dregs of midnight with a spark
Caught from a star that smouldered in the dark.
It I gripped,
Drew for a moment tight,
Jerked with a victor's cry
Down in the grasses high,
Her to the hot, brown earth and threatened—daft,
And then she laughed.

In "The Rebel," "The Red Haired Man's Wife," "The Dancer," poems in which women speak for themselves, Mr. Stephens shows Browning influences. One feels that he is external also in pantheistic rhapsodies like "Nature" and "The Whisperer," though "Nature" has some fine stanzas, and the verse in the "Whisperer" has a real emotional quality. The language of Mr. Stephens's poetry is not distinguished in itself, but it is often used with startling aptness. His rhythms are not subtle in the sense that the rhythms used by another young Irish poet, Mr. Seumas O'Sullivan, are subtle, but sometimes his verse has charming music, as in the poem, "Chill of the Eve":—

A long green swell
Slopes soft to the sea,
And a far-off bell
Swings sweet to me.
As the grey, chill day
Slips away from the lea.

And in the rhyme of "The Watcher":—

He who is waiting
In the rain outside,
He who is standing
Where the dew drops wide,
He who is watching
In the wind must ride
(Tho' the pale hands cling)
With the rose
And the ring
And the bride;
Must ride
With the red of the rose
And the gold of the ring
And the lips and the hair of the bride.

It is in the arrangement of the piece that Mr. Stephens shows his technical skill. His poem, "Fossils," and the piece called "The Dancer," are examples of skilful dramatisation in verse. Mr. Stephens sometimes fails through his tendency to over-emphasise, and add to the significant statement. "The Dancer" is too violent for verse, and in "Teirg Gorabh and the Liar" a fine satire on the charming in life loses itself in an irrelevant denuciation of gold. The third stanza in "To the Four Courts, Please," adds a platitude to an extraordinarily vivid impression. Mr. Stephens must not lend his talent to the illustration of grandiose ideas, nor allow himself to be obsessed by theories of monism or pantheism.

"Insurrections" is an exceptionally able first book, and we have reason to believe that the writer has done better work since its publication. Mr. Stephens's poetry is certain to achieve a great contemporary success.

TOWN-PLANNING AND A GUIDE TO IT.*

HERE at length we have substantially such a volume as has long and urgently been needed to bring together the varied knowledge too much scattered among groups of specialists hitherto often distinct, and which goes far to harmonise their varied points of view—geographic, historical and cultural, hygienic and economic, constructive and artistic.

The author's experience and qualifications, as a working leader of our excellent and increasing group and school of Garden City architects, are well known; and the practical chapters of his book, with its useful criticisms of bye-laws, and his experience of site planning and road arrangement, of plotting and spacing, of variety of design yet harmony in grouping, and the like, will not only be read with interest and profit by the technically competent and those desirous of becoming so, but by the intelligent layman who is beginning to feel his responsibilities and opportunities in regard to his own borough or city—and this whether he is practically to participate in the immediate enjoyment of such betterments as Mr. Unwin and his fellows so alluringly offer, or no. Architecture has, no doubt, always been one of the most readable and attractive of technical subjects to the general reader—but here is an unusual example of this. His opening presentment is quite the right one:—Starting with plans of two London districts, in Norwood and Fulham respectively, one an extreme case of the street-muddling, the other an ordinary sample of the site-spoiling, which have hitherto in the main taken the place of town-planning in our cities, he thence tactfully conducts us, used as we are to living among surroundings in which beauty has little or no place, first to realise "what a remarkable and unique feature the ugliness of modern life is," and how recent also; next, to see what art really is; not that external veneering of unnecessary "decorations," that slavish and wasteful imitation of these, which explains and almost justifies the harshest utilitarianism, but "the well doing of what needs doing." Thence straightway he takes us to the conception of "Civic Art the expression of Civic Life," which is the very touchstone of architecture true and false—the one arising from the needs and growth of a healthy material life and activity, and as its sensuous yet spiritual expression also—the other with its paper frontages gorgonised into stone, and its ornament useless as the decorations upon a coffin.

Next comes a chapter on "The Individuality of Towns," in which the reader is conducted upon an illuminating tour through cities, British and foreign, ancient, medieval and modern, and learns something of how to read town plans in their rationale, both geographic and historic, their qualities of use and art. This tour is, of course, personal, and therefore not comprehensive, but all the more it is the best of introductions to its subject, and prepares not only for the scientific monograph such as someone has next to write, but, what is still better, for his readers' intelligent observation and enquiry meanwhile. In the chapter "Of Formal and Informal Beauty," he puts the arguments reasonably for either side, yet each with a certain lack of intensity, which betrays the one limitation of the book. A writer sound and sane, practical and tasteful, he has as yet a touch of the paralysis of the too conscious student, and with this a limitation of creative fire. If this should come to him—as come it may—with some larger and statelier task than his suburban areas, one truly and fully civic, we might find in him for our generation that leadership which William Morris so nearly attained in the last but for his absorption by romantic luxuries, and which still awaits the man in whom the constructive efficiency of the city builder becomes infused and uplifted by the spirit of the poet. Yet this too will come in its season; and for the present need, that of an introductory text book for our own councillors and M.P.'s—for their constituents also—Mr. Unwin is the best of guides; and he has not only gone as far as his temperament and his prudence dictated, but left his readers where they can hardly escape going further.

Similarly, as regards the "City Surveys" which are advocated not only by the Sociological Society, but, indeed, on all hands, all grounds—geographical and historic, economic and social, ethical and educational, architectural and artistic—and which are therefore not only the needful preliminary of each and every town-planning scheme, but increasingly of all would-be efficient endeavors towards that organised effort towards city betterment, in each and all its elements and aspects, of which town-planners are but the heralds. That an architect should have put the case more convincingly than the sociologists have yet succeeded in doing is a most hopeful sign; while his touch of hesitation, as if these things were too scientific to be practicable, would have been abated had he known that though city surveys here, despite Mr Charles Booth's and other initiatives, are still only in the day of small things, those of the United States are now being systematically undertaken, and this upon a scale of unprecedented completeness, fully comparable to those of geology and other sciences, and even with funds far exceeding those previously devoted to any other scientific enquiry on record.

Within their limits, we avoid bringing up any of the small details of criticism such as the scrutiny of a volume of such varied elements naturally affords, or even discussing many matters of controversial interest; such matters may safely be left to the architectural and other specialist journals, and to the author in his next edition. It is better here to end as we began, by a hearty welcome to what is one of the most opportune and useful books of the year, and, indeed, more than this—one of the most hopeful, because illuminative and suggestive contributions to that uplift of our whole phase of life and civilisation, which we begin increasingly to see as the central problem of political and imperial politics.

A SKETCH OF VICTORIAN LITERATURE.*

Mr. Magnus is to be congratulated on the point of view from which he approaches the study of our nineteenth century literature. We have no lack of hand-books which furnish condensed biographies of famous writers, together with appreciations of their work, sometimes fresh and suggestive, but more often repetitions of what has been said many times before. We have no lack either of gossiping compilations in which a great writer is made a mere peg for all sorts of tittle-tattle that has but the remotest bearing upon his achievement. Mr. Magnus's book belongs to neither of these classes. It has the merit of seeing literature as something living and moving, a noble stream in which man's love of beauty and truth is reflected. "The literary form," says Mr. Magnus, has, of all art-forms, "proved best suited to English inspiration, and to the literature of the nineteenth century, accordingly, we look for the spiritual evaluation of the works and business of that age." His "essay in criticism" is therefore more concerned with tendencies than with details, for his object is less to appreciate the writers separately than to discover the formula of the age, the main principles which urged them on or against which they re-acted.

The first section of Mr. Magnus's book covers the period between 1784, the year of Johnson's death, and 1832, the year of Scott's death and of the great Reform Act. The watchword of the period was emancipation, its predominant influence that of the French Revolution. The theme has been often handled, and in discussing the effect of the Revolutionary ideas upon Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, Byron, and Shelley, there is little room for originality. Such books as Professor Dowden's "The French Revolution and English Literature" or M. Charles Cestre's "La Révolution Française et les Poètes Anglais" have not, indeed, said the last word upon the subject, but they disclose its main lines and prevent other critics from going very far wrong. Mr. Magnus's treatment of the period is sound and judicious if we except his disregard of Burke, an omission which we find it difficult to explain. Burke survived Johnson by thirteen years, and his passionate hatred for the Revolution was, beyond question, one of the formative influences on the succeeding generation. Moreover, Burke's teaching that society and institutions have their roots in the past and are organic in their nature, was taken up and amplified by Coleridge, who, in his turn, became the prophet of a school that has left its mark upon our literature.

After examining, in a section entitled "The Transit through 1832," the forces that were to make themselves felt during the later years of the century, Mr. Magnus proceeds to the Victorian Age. Here he reaches more debatable ground. His main thesis, that the dominant fact of the age is the Darwinian hypothesis, and the readjustment of attitudes which it involved, can hardly be denied, but many of his particular judgments will not find equal acceptance. To describe F. D. Maurice as "a kind of Plato of Christianity," and to say that "in certain respects of style" Maurice is "hardly inferior" to Plato, is an inexcusable exaggeration. This, however, is not typical of Mr. Magnus's judgments. As a rule he tempers his enthusiasm with discretion. Meredith he classes, we think with justice, as "among the greatest English poets." "He offers the revelation sought in the morning of the century, and he rests it on no divorce between human knowledge and heavenly wisdom, on no antagonism of reason and faith, no compromise disguised by association, but on a real union of the two. . . . All his poetry is a prayer of thanksgiving for light manifest and truth full-grown." Tennyson, on the other hand, comes in for severe handling. His thought is pronounced superficial, and, after a close analysis of his rhythmical devices, the conclusion reached is that the "'crowning commonplace' of his own ideal was, perhaps, his mark as a thinker, recommended always by the charm of his perfect craftsmanship in execution."

His verdicts upon living writers are, we think, the least valuable portion of Mr. Magnus's work. He praises Mr. Kipling, and treats Mrs. Humphry Ward with the respect due to a novelist of distinction. The three pages given to Mr. Stephen Phillips are out of all proportion in a work of this scope, and might well have been given to Mr. Hardy, who is dismissed in three sentences. But upon the whole Mr. Magnus has performed a very difficult task with credit. His style is a thought too ornate, but his matter bears the impress of first-hand converse with the authors he treats, of care in interpreting them, and of a fine enthusiasm for what is best in literature.

THE STORY OF A CRIME.*

In "The Mount" Mr. Keary, who has several novels to his credit, shows the courage of his school of impressionism. The characters are introduced to us, and whisked away before our eyes in the hap-hazard, perfunctory fashion of life itself. Little scraps of information about people are interspersed with conversations giving clues to their motives and doings, and here and there, in pauses in the narrative, solid pages are devoted to their family history, and to an analysis of the effect of the environment of Hartlebury on the characters of its residents. The novel is not an easy one to master, and a reader who fails to reach Chapter XX. will have good reason for asking whether this lengthy chronicle of the social history and the past and present standing of the Ingrams of "The Mount" is worth Mr. Keary's conscientious pains. Granted that the distaste of the hero, Wilfred Ingram, "an officer and a gentleman," for the banality and flatness of the Hartlebury atmosphere is quite true to life, and that the manners of the villa residents, small professional men, leading tradesmen on the Town Council, and so forth, are cleverly caught, is it worth while reproducing so exhaustively the prosaic outlook of the provincial society of a Staffordshire manufacturing centre? In Chapter XX., however, a dramatic crisis is precipitated upon us, and when the last page of the novel has been turned, it is impossible to deny that this story of a man's life is a close study of the effect of uncongenial surroundings on an exceptional temperament.

The first nineteen chapters introduce to us a great variety of Hartlebury characters with whom Wilfred Ingram and his mother and sisters at "The Mount" are in social touch. Though "a high family," in the estimation of the townspeople, and sprung from the ranks of the country gentry, the Ingrams, a generation back, had dropped in the social scale. Wilfred himself, after a short career in the army, has been forced by illness to resign his commission, and has succeeded his father as the manager of the Hartlebury Brewery, now a branch of Allbury's, Ltd. Wilfred, more or less ignored by "the parvenus who composed the bulk of county society," is respected, though not liked, by the leading citizens of Hartlebury, such as the Mayor, Mr. Hector Robertson of the big chemical works, Mr. Miller, the borough surveyor, Mr. Leadbeater, grocer and ex-Mayor, Mr. Swift, the owner of town slums, and other lights of the Hartlebury Unionist Club. Little by little, in the confusion of minor issues, a serious situation begins to loom up. A Miss Margaret Vaughan, a beautiful girl, "with a face like a quattrocento angel," who has been studying art in Munich, returns to Hartlebury, and people begin to whisper that she has a liaison with her guardian and employer, Mr. Hector Robertson, whose loudness of manner and genial vulgarity are specially detested by Wilfred. All the latter's innate chivalry is aroused by these whispers and innuendoes which he cannot refute, and by the evasions and reticence of his mother and sister when it is a question of Margaret's coming to "The Mount." By an infinite series of tiny, almost imperceptible touches, the author succeeds in creating in us the conviction that Wilfred's morbid state of mind will lead him to decisive action of some kind; but we are shattered as by a bomb shell when the scene of Robertson's murder passes before our eye. The Mayor, invited to a tête-à-tête at nine o'clock at night in Wilfred's study, is asked to take an oath on the Bible that the report that he has seduced Miss Vaughan, his ward, is false. The Mayor refuses point blank, and then realising that he is facing Wilfred's revolver, makes a rush for his enemy, and, in the act, is shot dead. We are left with Wilfred gazing at the huddled body, confronting the monstrous fact of a murder committed on an automatic impulse, in a flash of temporary insanity.

That, psychologically, the ground for the murder has been skilfully prepared, is proved by the fact that we do not question that it happened as narrated. Its interest is that a deed so incredible, so senseless, should have emerged in a flash from the fog of Wilfred's moral indignation, refined impulses, active antagonism, and chivalrous instincts. With such an act in question, the flaw in the perpetrator's temperament is everything, and often it is the excess of fine qualities in the idealist's head or heart that destroys his moral balance. Mr. Keary, artful in his impressionism, leaves the exact nature of Wilfred's controlling impulses obscure, and it is curious that the inadequate analysis he contributes of Wilfred's gloom, indefinite fears, and fixed determination to "vindicate the principles of men of honor," does not weaken the illusion of the whole situation, but suggests that the author, like a well-meaning friend, is hard put to account for the action that he cannot deny. Mr. Keary's strength lies in the suggestiveness of his general picture, and he must be warmly congratulated on the life-like scenes that follow the murder. Luck has it that the plan of the old family servant, Turner, for getting rid of the body by throwing it down an old mining shaft in Brightman's Ground, is completely successful. The only person who sees Captain Ingram's carriage, as it turns at night into the lane near Brightman's Ground, is the youth Willie Sutherland, and Willie's lips are sealed, because he is romantically in love with Miss Ingram, "the pearl of womankind." An anonymous letter is sent by Willie to the police, containing the sentence, "Robertson's body in Brightman's Ground," and the Mayor's body is discovered. But there is no clue to the murderer, or any reasons known for the Mayor's murder, and Wilfred, living in a waking dream, has sufficient self-control not to betray himself.

The mental agony of comporting himself exactly as usual, of talking the murder over with the vulgar members of the Borough Council, of attending the funeral, of driving home with old Mrs. Robertson, and of listening to her pathetic confidences, constitutes the first stage of his punishment, which is followed by the intolerable strain of the scene of the murder re-enacting itself each night in the room in which his mother sits. The background of wearing anxiety, of the feeling of being watched by his womenkind, of being ill and off his balance, and of concealing it from all and sundry, leads Wilfred further and further into a solitary and inward life, and this takes shape again in a deepening religious sense of the vanity of existence. His interview, when it comes, a year later, with Margaret, is profound in its sense of the ironic futility of a deed that separates the two who might have loved. Margaret, womanlike, having divined that Wilfred has killed Robertson (who has never been much to her) out of a confused idea that she has been shamefully misled and mishandled, loves him because he has suffered for her, because she feels motherly towards him, because of his delicate and chivalrous nature. Wilfred, on the other hand, because she tempts him, and because she seems oblivious of her past with Robertson, feels that she has been all along an accomplice in the crime, that she has in a manner induced his crime. "Had he done all this for the sake of a girl who was not innocent at heart?" he asks himself. And Margaret recognises then that he will come to feel even hate for her. "You would despise and you would hate me in the end . . . for knowing. . . . And we should both feel miserable hypocrites before the world." The contrast between the two natures is subtly drawn, and we, with Margaret, understand that nothing can stop Wilfred's seeking to expiate his sin by converting other men to a sense of their sins. And, in fact, Wilfred ends by building a mission room in which he preaches to the workmen at Bartley's End.

An infinite number of glancing, indirect touches go to make up the moving complexity and lifelike casualness of the author's impressionistic picture. We would be the last to deny the author's clever workmanship, but he may perhaps not have realised that his novel is deficient in aesthetic charm. And this means that the story, the fruit of a genuine talent and much insight, must speedily perish. Does not this in turn reflect on the school of literary aims, of which "The Mount" is quite a favorable example?

SOME THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.

"Further Studies in the Prayer-Book," by John Dowden, D.D., Bishop of Edinburgh (Methuen, 6s.), is a volume supplemental to the earlier and smaller "Workmanship of the Prayer-Book in its Liturgical and Literary Aspects," which was so favorably received a few years ago. Bishop Dowden's learning in this field is exceptionally wide and accurate; he is an historian as well as a literary man, and he holds a brief on behalf of no ecclesiastical party. The volume contains papers on the meaning of the phrase "alms and oblations," on the minatory clauses of the Athanasian Creed, and on other details, which have already appeared in print elsewhere; but there is also a good deal of new matter, all marked by the same knowledge and the same reasonable temper. As an historical work, the book frankly recognises how much the Prayer-Book owes to Cranmer and to his use of "Church Orders" put forth by the German Reformers, and it is thus a valuable antidote to many recent publications, which assume that the Anglican Liturgy is essentially pre-Reformation, both in language and teaching, and that it should be interpreted on that assumption. Candidates for ordination should be expected to know both Dr. Dowden's books; they are, moreover, quite readable for laymen.

"The Philology of the Greek Bible," by Adolph Deissmann, Professor of New Testament History in the University of Heidelberg (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. net), contains the four lectures delivered last year at Cambridge to the "Summer School of the Free Churches." They have recently been printed in the "Expositor," and are reprinted here with "a few additions that recent publications have rendered necessary." The titles of the four lectures are "The Greek Bible as a Compact Unity—The New Linguistic Records"; "The Problem of Biblical Greek"; "Septuagint Philology"; and "New Testament Philology." Dr. Deissmann's reputation stands so high in this department of study that there is no need to do more than announce the fact of publication. And people who know nothing of his subject may be grateful to him for his courteously worded preface, in which he expresses the hope that he has "forged another small link in the chain of Anglo-German reciprocity and friendship."

The somewhat rhetorical title of "The Beliefs of Unbelief: Studies in the Alternatives to Faith," by W. H. Fitchett, B.A., LL.D. (Cassell, 3s. 6d. net), is based on a phrase of Dr. Newman Smyth's: "How many things hard to credit one must believe in order not to be a Christian." And the idea is worked out in chapters wherein the difficulties are discussed, first of atheism and agnosticism, and then of believing that Christ was an impostor or a myth, or that the Bible is a forgery, or a book of dreams, or only one of the Sacred Books of the human race. This last alternative is rather weak. Orthodox believers hold themselves free to accept it, within limits; and the inclusion of it rather suggests the "terrible infidel," to whom Cardinal Newman once humorously referred, as "not believing in the existence of the Bible." And, though there is some powerful writing in this volume, and there are thoughts in it, especially about the Bible, which arrest attention, the general character of the essays would seem to be too combative and rhetorical to convince those for whom presumably its arguments are intended.

"Common Sense in Religion," a little book by Martin R. Smith (Longmans, 2s. net), written from the point of view of a devout theist, rather of the school of Mr. Voysey than of the ordinary Unitarian, is divided into eight chapters, which deal with: "What man may hope from his Creator"; "This life not the genesis of existence"; "The future, its prospects and opportunities"; "Religion"; "The Bible"; "A new reformation"; "The purpose of human existence"; and "The Religion of Common Sense." This last is, in the opening chapter, defined as "the product of reason, the completed work of reason . . . unassailable by argument or difference of opinion"; and the author assumes throughout that his views are the outcome of this "Common Sense." He is severe on all the Churches, but he does not show much familiarity with the spirit that now so largely prevails in them. His polemic is, in fact, somewhat old-fashioned, and it does not seem to occur to him that the personal theism which he takes for granted, and in which he clearly finds delight and satisfaction, might be ruled out of court as untenable by other people's "Common Sense." These capital letters are used throughout, and seem essential to his argument.

"The Analysed Bible," by the Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton, 3 vols., 3s. 6d. each). The title of this work rather suggests the "Analysis Biblica," used in Tridentine seminaries, and there is, in fact, considerable similarity between the two. Both assume a certain homogeneity, which modern scholarship does not support, and also a continuity of development, in accordance with the order in which the books stand in the printed Bible; and this idea has long ago been abandoned by the critical school. In a word, Dr. Morgan's attitude towards the Bible is more that of Pius X. than that of any Protestant scholar of repute. But, when this has been said, it may be admitted that these volumes do afford "a broad and general idea of the scope and main structure of the Divine Library," in accordance with the author's claim; though the word "structure" is hardly one that a scholar would pass. But for preachers, for Sunday School teachers, and for the non-critical layman, the volumes will have much value, the sub-titles given to the several books being useful as a memoria technica to those who accept the Bible as a whole, in the sense that our grandfathers accepted it.

"My Belief: Answers to Certain Religious Difficulties," by R. F. Horton, M.A., D.D., formerly Fellow of New College, Oxford (James Clarke, 3s. 6d. net). This is a vigorously written book, on lines that are at once broad and conservative. Generally speaking, the position taken is that of the Ritschlians, but Dr. Horton is too independent a thinker to suffer himself to be bound to anyone's chariot, and the discussions cover a wider field than is enclosed within the purview of any theological school. Perhaps the wideness of the field makes the treatment in places somewhat thin; but both laymen and clergymen will find the reading of it as interesting as it is instructive. The author deals more frankly than Protestant writers usually deal with the possibility of a great Roman reaction in this country, but he also points out that the attitude towards Rome of the modern instructed Protestant, while it is more courteous and considerate than that of an earlier generation, is, by reason of the strength afforded by the "new learning," more convinced than ever in its opposition to the assumptions of Rome. The modern return to Paganism is also effectively handled.

Is it Cosmos or Chaos? That is the ultimate question which faces every thinker who essays to examine the fundamental problems of man and the universe. Mr. G. H. Percival recognises this fact, and the title of his book is sufficient evidence of the character of his answer. "The Incarnate Purpose" (Williams & Norgate, 2s. 6d. net) is a series of "Essays on the Spiritual Unity of Life." The central theme of the book is that a knowledge of all the facts would show the existence of the same coherency in man's spiritual evolution as can be traced in his material progress in the past. The writer has much of interest to say on the mystery of suffering and the significance of prayer. The opening chapter on "The Spirit of Truth" pays somewhat unnecessary attention to the pretensions of Ecclesiasticism. These are, as he himself suggests, effete through the advance of scientific and historic research, and are not likely to interfere much in the future development of Christian thought.

"Epochs in the Life of Jesus: A Study of Development and Struggle in the Messiah's Work," by A. T. Robertson, M.A., D.D., Professor of New Testament interpretation in the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville (Hodder & Stoughton, 2s. 6d. net). This American writer has the advantage of an introduction to English readers from the Rev. David Smith, M.A., D.D., who regards this book as filling a niche that has not hitherto been occupied. It is a simply written account of the life of Jesus, emphasising the critical moments in his career, and drawing out their lessons on orthodox lines. He believes that "if Jesus is indeed the God-man, Son of God and Son of Man, the Virgin Birth is the only conceivable way for that great event to happen." Of the final scene on Mount Olivet, he says: "A cloud swept by and he was gone."

Professor Schmiedel's name has been well known in this country since he wrote his articles in the "Encyclopedia Biblica." Messrs. Adam & Charles Black have recently issued in one volume a translation of three of his contributions to the "Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbuecher," under the title of "The Johannine Writings" (translated by Maurice A. Canney, M.A., price 3s. 6d. net). Professor Schmiedel's aim is to arrive at what he calls the foundation pillars of a really scientific life of Jesus, and his exhaustive examination of St. John's Gospel is an essential preliminary step towards this. Whether the reader agrees with all his conclusions or not, he is compelled to admire the exhaustive character of the enquiry and the ability with which the Professor supports his various points. In the second part, he considers the origin and value of the Gospel, Epistles, and Revelation of John.

Christianity: Its Nature and Truth, by Arthur S. Peake, D.D., Professor of Biblical Exegesis in the University of Manchester (Duckworth & Co., 2s. 6d. net), is intended "to expound the truths of Christianity and the grounds on which they may still be accepted." Dr. Peake is an able and broad-minded Christian Apologist. He is aware of many of the difficulties which have to be faced to-day through the comparative study of religion and the criticism of the New Testament narratives. He is prepared to defend their substantial accuracy, and to maintain the supernatural character of the life of Christ. He defends the generally accepted positions with vigor, and the case could not, perhaps, be put more ably.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. Charles Thomas-Stanford has culled a very various assortment of "Leaves from a Madeira Garden" (Lane, 5s. net). In other words his book is one half garden literature, based upon personal experiment and observation on his own estate during a winter sojourn in the island; and one half discursive reflections upon the geographical, social, and political aspects of Madeira, and on any other subject—such as the Canary Islands—that can be conveniently associated with that favored spot. What he has to say about the floral and arboricultural possibilities of the terraced Madeira garden is said gracefully enough and with indisputable authority, and his remarks on more general topics, brief as they are, contain sound sense and not a little humor. On the whole, he is disposed to be sympathetic to Madeira's "aloofness from the modern stream of improvements," the while he deprecates the presence of bad roads and worse things, the absence of telephones, and the Portuguese Government's paternal management of the country. Certainly we doubt whether even the most ardent Tariff Reformer in this country ever dreamed of a fiscal system such as that which Mr. Thomas-Stanford criticises. So thorough, indeed, is the protectiveness of its scheme of Protection—it appears to be based on the imposition of a three hundred per cent. duty on sugar, the staple industry—that it protects the home producer almost out of existence, by establishing in a few industries a standard of prices so artificial that the consumer will not pay them. In Madeira, we understand, the practice of doing without things that in other countries are regarded as necessaries has been brought to a fine art, the genial climate rendering this easier than it would be in less sunny quarters of the earth. Of the Portuguese in society and service Mr. Thomas-Stanford writes with kindly appreciation, recognising that the antiquated finance and the making of laws which cannot be enforced are no reflection on the graciousness of those who chiefly suffer by them. Madeira has not much history; but he summarises the little that there is, and tells us also of some recent instances of plague and riot, of local superstition, and of some unexpected articles, such as old furniture and books, that may be picked up cheap. The volume is pleasantly illustrated with half tone pictures of gardens and other landscape.

For most English readers the chief interest of Mr. Collison-Morley's agreeable volume on "Guiseppe Baretti and His Friends" (Murray, 10s. 6d. net) will lie in the glimpses it gives of Johnson, Goldsmith, Burke, Garrick, and others of that famous circle. Yet Baretti holds a respectable, almost a distinguished, place in Italian letters, and is also the author of works both in English and French that require no apology. Johnson summed him up very well in one of his talks with Boswell. "Sir, I know no man who carries his head higher in conversation than Baretti. There are strong powers in his mind. He has not, indeed, many hooks, but with what hooks he has he grapples very forcibly." Baretti's view of Johnson may be put beside this judgment. "Johnson," he wrote, "was a real true-born Englishman. He hated the Scotch, the French, the Dutch, the Hanoverians, and had the greatest contempt for all other European nations; such were his early prejudices, which he never conquered." There was a close friendship, not unclouded by occasional quarrels, between the two men, and Johnson, as well as Burke, Goldsmith, and Garrick, came forward in Baretti's defence when he was tried for killing a bully who attacked him in the Haymarket. There is much interesting matter from Italian sources in Mr. Collison-Morley's volume. It gives us an admirable portrait of an eighteenth century man of letters who deserves to be remembered, both on his own account and because of the famous people who thought him worthy of their friendship.

Mr. M. W. Patterson makes no claim to original research in his "History of the Church of England" (Longmans, 7s. 6d. net), but he more than justifies his wish that it should embody the results of recent research by others. For a candid and trustworthy account of English church history, we know of no single volume that is better. Wakeman's brilliant sketch has had a great influence in disseminating Anglo-Catholic views, but the author's bias is felt on every page and his statements have not always stood the fire of criticism. Mr. Patterson's standpoint is almost that of the early Tractarians. He is not afraid to say that "the Reformation, so far from being a thing which requires apology, has been in every sphere of life, both in thought and action, the source of incalculable blessings to the English people," and in an excellent appendix on the sacrificial aspect of the Holy Communion he goes back to the main line of Anglican thought, and ranges himself with Hooker and Lightfoot. It is possible that for this reason his book may not find favor with the Bishops' chaplains of to-day, but Mr. Patterson is a trained historian and does not play fast and loose with facts in the interest of preconceived notions. The disinterested student will value his book all the more on this account. He will not find a better account in a brief compass of the history of the English Church.

"The Englishman in Italy" (Clarendon Press, 5s. net) is an anthology of verses "written by some of those who have loved Italy," compiled by Mr. G. Wollaston. The mention of Byron, Shelley, Landor, the Brownings, and John Addington Symonds is enough to show that a large part of English poetry has been inspired by Italy, and Mr. Wollaston has had a wealth of material from which to choose. There is, perhaps, too much of Archbishop Trench in the volume, and Swinburne is not represented. But every lover of poetry and of Italy will be glad to possess it.

As the magnates are still making holiday, financial activity has not yet revived in the City; but doubtless a flood of new issues is being prepared. A relapse in Mr. Harriman's health was followed by another relapse in the American railway market, and his death was marked by another decline yesterday. The parallelism will not help Wall Street in the eyes of the world. In other departments the markets have been quietly firm. Home industrials, home railways, and bank shares stand to benefit by the revival of trade, which seems to be definitely established by the Board of Trade Returns for August. The Cuban 4½ per cent. loan issued at 96 is thought attractive by many simply because it is expected that on some pretence or other the American garrison will return to the island. The subscription lists were closed on Wednesday almost immediately, and a premium of 2¼ was established. Thursday's bank return disclosed such an abundance of money that discounts which had been 1½ dropped back to 1 7-16. It is reported, however, that both Egypt and Russia will take gold in a few days.

Franco-American Tariff War.

Information has been received at Washington from Paris to the effect that, dating from the time when the rates provided under the new Payne-Aldrich tariff take effect against France (i.e., on November 1st), France will subject the United States to her highest rates of duty on all commodities. Nothing could more clearly illustrate the value of Free Trade, which gives us most-favored-nation treatment in all cases. The notice, as given in the "Moniteur Officiel du Commerce," of August 12th, runs in translation as follows:—

> "Through the application of these provisions [of the new tariff] in the American law owing to the fact that the United States did not insert in the arrangements with certain countries, among them France and Switzerland, any definite period of advance notification for ending the treaties, French goods mentioned in these commercial treaties will cease to benefit when entering the United States from the rates which are therein provided for.
> "This will occur on November 1st next. And reciprocally starting from the same date American goods mentioned in these treaties will cease to benefit by the lower rates which are applicable to them upon their entry into France by virtue of these arrangements."

The notice goes on to remark upon the fact that the treaties with various other countries are to be continued in effect for a longer period, and that thereby the countries benefiting from these provisions will have a corresponding advantage in the trade with the United States.

Death of Harriman.

Mr. Harriman was a good specimen of a type which is passing away, a combination of the old railroad buccaneer with the modern gambler. He was really fond of playing the railroad magnate, making new lines, acquiring and improving old ones. I remember a leading man in Pennsylvania telling me that the engineering improvements made by Harriman, or largely at his instigation, on the Union Pacific during the last ten years have been quite extraordinary. What Harriman lived for, however, was the consciousness that he was about the biggest man in Wall Street. He loved the bustle and excitement, the violent perturbations and oscillations that the merest rumor of his intentions produced. His own enormous fortune was largely made by speculating on his own account with other people's money, and using huge funds of which he was trustee for gambling purposes. That the three men to whom he has left his "system" will be half as clever or dashing as he was is unlikely. But if they are twice as honest the genuine investor may be all right. There is, however, very great doubt as to how far the Union and Southern Pacific railroads are really stable and paying lines. American railroad accounts have always been ambiguous and deceitful.

Diary of the Week.

There is reason to believe that the most active pressure on the Lords to throw out the Finance Bill comes from the brewing interest, which fought the licensing clauses in the Commons with little vigor, and is thought to be resting all its hopes on the action of the Peers. The brewers are said to have told the Unionist leaders that unless the Bill is thrown out they will decline to support the party at the next election. On the other hand there are definite reports of Lord Lansdowne's aversion from this course, and of Mr. Balfour's sympathy with his attitude. If this resistance fails, an immediate financial crisis supervenes. Tea duty and other taxes will unquestionably be withheld, and an attempt made to pour in consignments of free tea. The Attorney-General will then have to sue for taxes. A Commons' money resolution holds good during a session, and the question is whether its binding force would be lost because it was previously based on the expectation of the Finance Bill becoming law, and this expectation had been disappointed. It is doubtful whether this plea can hold good, the force of the Commons' resolutions having been affirmed by unbroken custom, and no defaulting taxpayer having apparently raised the plea that they required validation by the assent of the Lords and the Crown. Of course, their effect would cease with the dissolution or prorogation of Parliament.

Lord Rosebery spoke on Friday week at Glasgow to an audience which, under the familiar mask of an assembly of "business men," consisted in the main of Tories, and, as the volume of cheers which followed the speaker's tentative abandonment of Free Trade showed, of Protectionists. The main personal interest of the speech was its unqualified desertion of Liberalism. Lord Rosebery prefaced it by resigning the Presidency of the Liberal League, his own special "tabernacle," and followed it by also abandoning the Presidency of the Scottish Liberal Club. The speech, which was read, was at times lively and epigrammatic, but exaggerative and often contradictory in argument. It made an unsparing attack upon the Government, dividing them into "unconscious" or "puppet" Socialists and "conscious" Socialists, and treating the Budget as tending directly to Socialism, which, in its turn, was "the end of all, the negation of faith, of family, of property, of the Monarchy and Empire." This description, it appeared, was based upon the Land Taxes and the Death Duties, which preserve the old scales unaltered, or very slightly altered, on estates up to £20,000.

The speaker's passionate objection to these proposals was that they treated the rich and the Dukes—"a poor but honest class"—as if they were "criminals," though he added the usual paradox that such taxation soon reached "the very poor." For the rest, he dealt mainly in a set of laboriously collected and inaccurately stated hard cases, such as that of a millionaire dying without relatives, and only allowed to leave £750,000 to a partner who, dying also without a single blood relation, could only bequeath his friend a paltry half-million or so. This was not "taxation, but sequestration." The principles of the Budget were "contagious," and might be applied to all forms of property. Economically they meant that the Government was taking "great chunks of capital" from the nation and living, in spendthrift fashion, upon them.

As for the Death Duties, they had their "nauseous" aspect. Thus, instead of consecrating the memories of its dead South African heroes, the State waited on their corpses "like a vulture or a camp follower," to see if they had left any effects behind them. Lord Rosebery forgot to add that the "vulture" was himself, for the scale of duties prevailing during the South African War was fixed by his own Government. The evils of the Budget were political as well as economic, for it destroyed personal liberty and set up a pitiless bureaucracy, which was "strangling France." Personally, he was an "old Liberal," and the Government would never have dared to present such a Budget to the "centenarian Gladstone." If this were the only alternative to Free Trade, many, "though sadly and reluctantly," would cease to defend it.

On the point of tactics Lord Rosebery struck a different and characteristic note. He declined all responsibility. He would not advise the Peers in the gravest situation which confronted them since 1832. He had come to the "deliberate conclusion" that the Government wished the Lords to throw out the Finance Bill, and that they "dared them to do it" in the "Machiavellian" belief that this action would bring about their wicked purpose. Lord Rosebery seemed, therefore, to give his vote against rejection, for if this Machiavellian Ministry want the Lords to throw out the Budget it is because they believe that the country will back them, and as Lord Rosebery dislikes the Budget and would like to see it destroyed, it would seem that he shares their belief. The other alternative is that Lord Rosebery thinks that the country hates the Lords even more than they hate the Budget. It is not surprising, therefore, that the speech has produced a "cold fit" among the extremists, succeeding to the hot fit of the previous week. Mr. Lloyd George, asked what he thought of the fiery speech and its tame conclusion, described it as a "soft-nosed torpedo."

On Friday Lord Rosebery issued his usual apologia in the shape of a foreword to the republication of his speech. His defence of his attitude to Liberalism is not that he has left it, but that it has left him—behind. Just as the Great Seal is broken up with the accession of each new monarch, and a new Seal substituted for it, so each fresh General Election a new "brand" is made for Liberalism. In other words, Liberalism has obeyed the law of progress, and he has not. But this, the renegade's usual plea, does not happen to be correct. Lord Rosebery has not merely stood still; he has gone back. He has repudiated Home Rule; he has recanted his old views on the taxation of land values; and it is clear that, if he dared, he would goad on the Lords to an attack on the historic privilege of the Commons. This is the attitude not of a moderate but of a reactionary.

Meanwhile, the Opposition remain acutely divided. The proposal of the Unionist leaders to secure, on terms, the re-instatement of leading "Free Food Unionists" (excluding Lord Hugh Cecil) as official candidates is bitterly opposed by the "Morning Post," which seems to carry with it Unionist opinion in the constituencies affected. It complains of Lord Robert Cecil that he is a mere individualist, opposed to the principle of State action, and that his attitude and that of the "Spectator" to the Budget and to the Development Bill give color to the Liberal contention that the opposition is a timid and selfish class movement. It admits that "a tax on corn is an essential element of the programme of Tariff Reform," and that the refusal of the Unionist "mandarins" to discuss the constructive side of Protection tends to make the whole policy look odious and out of date. On their side, the Moderates press their compromise, and accuse the Protectionists of intolerance. But the "Post's" argument shows that a great body in the Tory rank and file believe the anti-Budget campaign to have been a mistake, and they now call for the supersession of the Budget Protest League by the Tariff Reform League.

The death duties clauses passed through the House of Commons, after a rather mild opposition from Mr. Balfour and his party, contrasting significantly with the vehemence of Lord Rosebery's attack. Mr. Balfour admitted that this part of the scheme was more like a normal Budget than other portions of it. The Chancellor made an effective defence of his scale, pointing out that it was equivalent, in capitalised income tax, to 3¾d. in the £ ("threepence three farthings is the end of all things," he added, parodying Lord Rosebery), and that Sir John Pakington (a sort of Chaplin of the 'fifties) had attacked the Gladstone Budget of 1853 as a "war upon property." He made two concessions, reducing the period within which gifts inter vivos were counted in the corpus of an estate from five to three years before death, and excluding marriage settlements altogether. The extension of the Harcourt period of twelve months was, of course, intended to prevent the flagrant "tax dodging" which has occurred.

The Dukes are still popularising the Budget. The Duke of Bedford, following, it seems, a family tradition of courtesy, has written to his tenantry, who wished to make a present to Lord Tavistock, his heir, on coming of age, to say that, owing to "rapid changes" owners and tenants could not hope to maintain their old relations to each other. Therefore he could not invite them to join him in celebrating his son's birthday. If the Dukes lose their heads in the coming Revolution, our stock of manners will not be seriously depleted. Other precautionary measures against the coming Terror have been taken by, or, perhaps, we should say, on behalf of, the Duke of Buccleuch. The Duke had been asked to subscribe to the Nithsdale Wanderers' Football Club, and his "chamberlain" replied that "owing to the large prospective increase in taxation caused by the present Budget" his Grace was obliged to curtail his subscriptions. It was, at first, suggested that the Duke was a regular subscriber to the club, an innuendo which the Budget Protest League hastened to deny. The Duke has made a further insurance against Want by reducing the pensions of his old retainers on the Drumlanrig estate from 15s. to 7s. 6d. (not 10s.) since the Old Age Pensions Act came into force.

A strong business memorial in favor of the Budget has been presented by a number of representative men, who include such strong names as Lord Swaythling, Mr. Arthur Chamberlain, Sir William Mather, Sir John Barker, Mr. K. Crossley (of Crossley Brothers), Mr. Figgis, and Sir Richard Stapley.—At the other side of the social scale, the Liberal agents report an unprecedented rush of voters for registration, especially in London. "We may want our votes, this time, governor," said one workman. Everything goes to show that the Budget will sweep the country from end to end.

An important change has been made in the structure of the Development Bill. In the Standing Committee, the Chancellor practically accepted an amendment by Lord Robert Cecil substituting for the Advisory Committee, on whose counsels the Treasury was to advance money, a permanent Commission, independent of the Executive. This Commission can veto any scheme, but its approval must be ratified by the Treasury. We should have thought the character of the Treasury for independence was a strong enough barrier against mere political running of the Bill, but the Treasury is a revising, not a spending Department. Also the House and the Committee seemed nervous, and it is well to be on the safe side. Mr. Lloyd George suggested a Commission of five, with a paid head, who is to be a man of standing, and a simpler procedure than that which the Light Railway Commission follows. The Opposition seemed much gratified, and the "Times" now hopes for the passage of the Bill, whose purpose it "always" thought to be "excellent."

The crisis in Greece, which it was thought had been settled by the retirement of the Royal Princes from the army, has recurred. It seems doubtful whether the Military League has as much support in the country as in the capital. At any rate, the passing of the Crown Prince through Patras and Corfu on his way to Germany was made the occasion of a great popular demonstration in his favor. He is reported to have criticised the Military League; he certainly was closeted for a long time with M. Theotoki, the leader of the Greek Parliamentary majority, who subsequently, in an interview with the editor of the "Athenae," demanded the resignation of the Government, talked of wholesale disbandment of the army, and threatened that if the Crown Prince were definitely deprived of his command of the army the King was resolved to abdicate. He seems to have spoken not without authority. The King is known to be bitterly angry with the army, and the Crown Prince has shown a rather petty spirit in treating the demands of the League as marks of disloyalty to the Throne. Whatever else may be thought of the pronunciamento, it was certainly not disloyal to the throne. But M. Theotoki's attempts to form a party of King's friends and the indiscretions of the Crown Prince might easily change its character.

There are now 40,000 Spanish troops in Morocco, and it only remains for General Marina's strategy to unfold itself. His moves are deliberate, and it is to be hoped deep. It is not very obvious, however, why the occupation of Zeluan, on which he is advancing slowly, should clear the defiles of Gurugu between it and Melilla. Yet it was to avoid these defiles that the new base was formed at the eastern end of the Mar Chica lagoon. Señor Lerroux, Republican member for Barcelona, is apparently of opinion that the war is doing as well as could be expected; but he prophesies a great upheaval in Spain should the army meet with another reverse, or the Powers intervene to deprive Spain of the "fruits" of victory, as he calls them. Neither the one nor the other is out of the question; nor is there, unfortunately, any reason to think that the Spanish Government has made a more careful calculation of the political elements in her problem than she did of the military. The Consuls who were commissioned to protest to Mulai Hafid in the name of the Powers against his treatment of El Roghi, have been received in audience. The Sultan said that he thought it more humane to chop off rebels' hands than to execute them, that his people were not civilised, and that he was obliged to employ methods which had been abandoned in Europe, but that he hoped not to use the same punishments again.

Mr. Arthur Henderson has asked in the House of Commons whether the Government also meant to make representations to Spain on her methods of repression in Barcelona, but received a discouraging reply. Yet the state of Spain is bad almost beyond belief. In Barcelona alone 4,000 persons have been thrown into prison for supposed complicity with the anti-war riots; in the province the number is over 10,000. All the schools in Catalonia are closed, and none may be opened except by permission of the parish priest and the mayor. No civil courts are sitting, and all the prisoners will be tried by martial law. The best known among them is Señor Ferrer, whose danger has excited the warmest sympathy amongst Liberals and Socialists, particularly in France.

Documents have been published by the police which are said to have been discovered in his house and to implicate him in the wildest plots against society; but they carry their own refutation. Ferrer is a great educationalist, and founded the only secondary school in Spain free from the domination of the priests. It is his fame as an opponent of clerical influence on education that marked him out for punishment, both now and before, when he was arrested for complicity in the attempt on the King and Queen. "Ferrer's sole crime," writes Anatole France, "is that he has established schools. If he is condemned, that will be the reason." His arrest is an example of persecution of opinions, pure and simple. His friends, particularly in France, are working actively to save him a second time from the hatred of the Spanish Clericals, and there are ways in which our own Government could help to save Spain from the shame of Ferrer's death.

We much regret to record the death of Lord Tweedmouth, which has quickly followed his retirement from the Presidency of the Council. Lord Tweedmouth will be remembered in Liberal politics not so much by his administration of the Admiralty as by his really heroic services to the Gladstone Administration of 1892. It is safe to say that without Lord Tweedmouth as chief Whip, the Government, with its trifling majority of forty, could never have carried the second Home Rule Bill. His labors could only be appreciated by those who saw him and worked with him and shared the loyal enthusiasm which was of the essence of his character. Lord Tweedmouth in those days was not only a most attractive figure, but he embodied the genius of party management and discipline as we do not think it was ever realised by his predecessors. There are some men who give the best of their minds and characters to politics. This was the mark of Lord Tweedmouth's career, and, though his later years were heavily clouded, they hardly dim the memory of its most vivid passages.

On Wednesday Lord Rosebery delivered the address at Lichfield in commemoration of the bi-centenary of Johnson's birth. He well called Johnson the "sublime type" of John Bull, and thought all his literary work which men cared to read was contained in "two noble poems, the 'Lives of the Poets,' and the Dictionary." "Rasselas," the "Rambler," and the "Idler," he could not read, a too sweeping verdict, for "Rasselas" is nobly written, and if it is the mark of literature to express character, feeling, and wisdom, many of Johnson's essays deserve that name. Lord Rosebery repeated the rather exploded Macaulayan view of the ineptitude of Boswell, and exclaimed, "What a journalist Johnson would have been!" It would have been more accurate to say what a journalist Johnson was. Was he not the first of the Parliamentary "sketch-writers," who, to this day, affirm Johnson's approved principle of never letting the Whig (or Tory) dogs have the best of it?

Sir Herbert Tree produced on Tuesday night a translation by Mr. Fagan of Brieux's "La Foi" under the rather misleading title "False Gods." This is a really bold and important step in the emancipation of the drama. Sir Herbert Tree's power in the theatrical world has enabled him to outflank the censorship at a time when his less important colleagues are clinging desperately to it. In form an Egyptian melodrama, Brieux's work is, of course, thoroughly modern in intention. It is a "pamphlet" play, and though we could imagine a Roman Catholic objecting to its thesis and its conclusion, it has the merit of throwing on to the stage one of the greatest of historic controversies. It is a new sensation to see a play at an English theatre which makes us think of Voltaire, Pascal, the Modernist controversy, Socialism, and many other figures and causes at the same time. It is still more surprising to find such a work accepted for its intellectual sincerity as much as for its dramatic qualities.

Politics and Affairs.

"RATTLING INTO REVOLUTION."

If Lord Rosebery, having lost many gifts and all his opportunities, retains the power of self-criticism, he might search his heart to discover why the whole of his old party and the greater number of his new associates have received his Glasgow speech with indifference. An ex-Prime Minister formally transfers himself from Liberalism to Toryism, and not a soul offers to follow him. A statesman of parts sets out to destroy a Liberal Budget; and the ablest Tory journal rejects his lead, and tells him coldly that he belongs to an obsolete school of politics. His attack has not touched the Government, and if it has shaken anything at all, it is the little society that was set up a few years ago to keep his sinking head above the waters. We may, if we will, set down his failure to the general belief, justified by a hundred examples, that Lord Rosebery is neither a stable nor a sincere politician, and that his engaging personality is deficient both in character and in ideas. Or we may attribute it to the not unimportant fact that this diligent student of the crowd has for once spoken at the wrong moment and on the wrong side. Certain it is that though the Glasgow speech may have frightened those who were frightened already, the country remains unpersuaded and unaffected by it. The Prophet of Woe retires, unaccompanied, in the familiar direction of the desert, to nurse a luxurious sorrow in a number of not ill-furnished retreats, and to re-emerge a few hours later with some cheerfully trite comments on the character of Dr. Johnson; while common folk, who have to work for their living, make appropriate remarks on the deceitfulness of riches. What other treatment does a man deserve who merely supplies a fresh note of shrillness to the unmanly complaints of privilege?

But if our first criticism of Lord Rosebery's speech is that it is neither Liberal nor Tory statesmanship, our second is that it is the utterance of a man who at the close of a long political career has hardly realised what public responsibility and the practice of government mean. In this light the Glasgow oration is little more than a series of paradoxes and self-contradictions. What can be said of the public man who describes the State as waiting "like a vulture" on the bodies of the men who died in the South African war in order to collect—the death duties that his own Administration levied? If any theory lies behind these fantastic views, it is that the State, which guarantees the possession and transmission of wealth, and, in this country, now one of the chief pleasure-centres of the world, secures it in a position of exceptional amenity, has no right to take toll even of its superfluities in the hour when their possessor has ceased to enjoy them. Was that the theory of the "centenarian Gladstone" invoked by Lord Rosebery, the Gladstone who established the succession duties, and long before his death gave express approval to the doctrine of the taxation of unearned increment. Have we reached "the end of all things" and has Socialism come in with a flood, when, every kind of past accumulation being left untouched, the State proposes by small, slow, continuous, minutely regulated advances, to take one-fifth, not of the profits of future land speculations, but of that portion of them which social labor clearly creates? But we may well ask this irresponsible critic what financial basis he proposes for the modern State. Lord Rosebery passes over every tax in this Budget which presses on labor and industry, though its direct economic effect on individuals, in hampering their spending powers and cutting down their luxuries, is the same in kind as if they were all Dukes, and by his declaration that Protection is an incomparably smaller evil than the "Socialism" of which he conceives the Budget to be full, is ready to let in the flood of moral and physical ills that a harsh system of food and labor taxes carries with it. The only object in the great landscape of the activities of a working nation which catches Lord Rosebery's eye and fixes his tearful sympathy, is not the workmen, not the organisers and superintendents and carriers of our thousand industries, but just the class to which he himself belongs, or rather the two classes, the landowners and the higher ranges of dividend-drawers. Lord Rosebery speaks as the Chief Brahmin of this sacred caste. To it he is clearly prepared to sacrifice Free Trade, together with the attenuated ghost of his half-forgotten and now abandoned Liberalism. It needs some assurance to invoke the name of Bright in connection with two such causes as the English land system and the revival of Protection. Bright's conception of politics, limited as it was on the side of the activities of the modern State, went much further than Lord Rosebery's purely aristocratic vision, while Cobden's Free Trade propaganda was directly and logically associated with the destruction of feudal tenures.

Lord Rosebery's theory of politics belongs, therefore, neither to the old Liberalism, which he betrayed over Armenia, nor to the new, which he deserts to-day. It is the mere impulsive reflection of the unthinking timidities of wealth. What is its practice? Here Lord Rosebery, ever the most unfruitful of critics, is even more barren than usual. He proposes no alternative taxes. Beyond what the "Morning Post" calls "a few "platitudes" on economy in the Civil Services, a good cause with which we have never identified Lord Rosebery, he suggests no single source for a reduction of the deficit. But what of the Lords? The Budget is a plunge into Socialism, and Socialism, says Lord Rosebery, is the "end of all things." The Lords will, therefore, pluck the country back from the brink of ruin, and all will be comparatively well. Not a bit of it! During a fortnight's retreat for meditation, they will ponder the "Machiavellian" design of the Government to cajole and hustle them into rejecting the Budget, and presumably will defeat it in the conviction that the country, if appealed to, would become a willing accomplice in its own destruction. We must leave our readers to say whether this conclusion impresses them more with the insincerity of the Glasgow speech, or with its author's lack of spirit, or with the popularity of the Budget, and the hopelessness of looking to the Lords to destroy it. It is, we are afraid, characteristic of Lord Rosebery that while he provides the rhetorical stimulant and the theatrical atmosphere amid which the Lords may "rattle into Revolution," he draws back from the task of effective leadership. Who, therefore, bids for Revolution—vice Lord Rosebery, "scratched"? Lord Lansdowne? Mr. Balfour? We see no sign. Lord Rosebery's speech is a signal, not to the heads of parties, but to private prejudice. A flighty artist in words, driven by the half-whimsical fears that beset an ingenious but essentially unpractised intelligence, may, indeed, distract the counsels of more responsible men. That is the only practical effect which it can exert on the course of politics.

THE TAXATION OF CAPITAL.

This week's criticism of the Death Duties has mostly been devoted to a preternaturally solemn exhibition of the several eggs contained in the economic mare's nest which Lord Rosebery discovered at Glasgow. No feature of this revolutionary Budget, we are told, is so wantonly destructive as the increased estate duties. The high income tax, however injurious to the workers who are "found" wages and employment by the expenditure of the money upon which the State lays predatory hands, does not, except so far as it stops saving, impair the fund of capital which is the foundation of the industrial order. The moderate death duties of Sir William Harcourt, gladly accepted by the Conservative Chancellors who followed him, might reasonably be met by a special provision out of annual income. But henceforth the State will swoop down on the childless millionaire and claim from the defenceless stranger, to whom he wills his estate, a quarter of the land and of the other property. One of two things must then happen. Either the State will take bodily its share of the land and capital, thus reducing the amount available for private enterprise and employment, or else it will oblige the legatee to cut up the estate and find a market for the other investments in order to pay to the Exchequer its share in cash. This process must, according to the economics of Lord Rosebery and Mr. Balfour, cause a diminution of industrial capital, dislocate whole trades, and, by reducing the fund out of which wages are advanced to labor, spread unemployment far and wide over the land.

It is a curious sidelight upon the state of political education in this country that the economic instruction of these statesmen appears to have stopped in 1868, and that they still suppose the wage-fund theory to stand as an accepted doctrine of political economy. But we need not theorise upon an issue which can be submitted to the plainest test of concrete fact. Why should the assertion of the State's claim to a share of the property, which public protection and other social services have helped to make, cause any capital to disappear or to cease to work as capital? If the State took over, on the decease of a great landowner, a piece of his estate and devoted it to afforestation or the promotion of small holdings, in what way would industry or employment be detrimentally affected? It might, indeed, be urged that private management of land is more productive than public management, though that statement is difficult to square with the declarations of so many great landlords that they are really making next to no net income from their estates. But the levy of death duties can certainly do nothing to reduce the land, as capital. If, as will generally be the case, the State does not want to take over any of the land, but wants the death duty in cash, a portion of the estate must be sold. It may even be the case that, by a few such acts of transfer, some large estate may be broken into small estates. But this will only broaden the basis of land ownership, leading normally to a more productive use of the land.

Is the case really any different where the property on which the death duties are levied is the share capital of a railway or of some industrial business? No real capital will disappear from existence or from use: the buildings, machinery, materials, cash, goodwill, which constitute this capital, will none of them evaporate by process of taxation. A portion of them will pass to some new owner, who will buy them with his fluid capital, the savings which he has not yet invested. There will be no destruction of any existing capital, no disturbance of any existing industry, no loss of any existing employment. Of course, it is true that as a result of the death duties the State becomes possessed of certain wealth which otherwise would have remained in private hands. But this is not peculiar to death duties; it occurs equally in the event of any other tax. It is also true that some of this private wealth, if it had not been taken by the State, would have been used as capital. If, then, the State were to apply it all to unproductive expenditure, as the "Times" appears to think it must, there would be just ground for holding that the aggregate capital of the country had been impaired. But this assumption is entirely without warrant. There is no sense whatever in Lord Rosebery's indictment of the policy of death duties on the ground that they "enable Governments to spend capital as income." His confusion of thought is obvious. Portions of private capital do, indeed, pass, at the time they are taken, into the public income account for the year. But that does not mean that the public use or consumption got out of the wealth thus obtained is exhausted within the year. Truly productive or permanently useful expenditure of the State is not a conversion of private capital into public income, but of private capital into public capital.

We should be the last to deny that there exists waste in our public services, and we doubt whether the lavish expenditure on armaments, for which the Opposition are clamorous, is as serviceable as they contend. But this raises another issue, not for discussion here. Death duties, applied by the State to armaments, education, police, public hygiene, even to old age pensions, is rightly regarded as a capital expenditure incurred in the maintenance and improvement of the material and moral capital of the nation for the enhancement of its productivity. If this inclusion of the human factor under the term "capital," and the insistence that the funds expended on its improvement are capital expenditure, be regarded as exceeding the purely economic use of the terms, we are willing to defend the extension, and to challenge Lord Rosebery and Mr. Balfour to denounce as uneconomical and damaging the taking of a tithe of a millionaire property in order to improve the education of the people. Nay, set the issue in its narrowest shape. To take from the rich a portion of their large unearned income or property in order to apply it to improving the material and moral condition of the workers, is a profitable policy in the sense that it will best contribute to the industrial and commercial progress of the nation. The object of all sound national expenditure is the maintenance and development of the resources of the nation, its land and its people. Such expenditure is not, indeed, exclusively directed to the furtherance of marketable wealth. But, so far as it makes for a higher standard of life, its true and prime motive, it inevitably improves the arts of industry, thus raising the wealth-producing capacity of the nation. So, whether taken on the wider or the narrower test, Lord Rosebery's charge is equally baseless.

CHARACTER AND BUREAUCRACY.

The critics have already been busy for a week in discovering startling discrepancies between what Lord Rosebery said last Friday, and earlier utterances from the same mercurial temperament. It is a somewhat unprofitable exercise. One does not blame the chameleon for inconsistency. A wise man thanks its Creator for the versatility of its coloring. More interesting are the fundamental inconsistencies to be found within the speech itself. Its gravest passages are in the peroration where Lord Rosebery, a rich man addressing an audience of rich men, took a high moral line against "the new Liberalism," which he identifies with "Socialism." He declaimed against the new ideals of social assistance, ranging apparently from the Development Fund to Old Age Pensions and the various insurance schemes, partly on the ground that "men work better for themselves than they work for the State," and even more strongly on the ground that "character" demands as its basis a lonely and self-dependent individualism. He contrasted the "strong independent thinking," which the latter system produced in Scotland, with the danger of making a nation of parasitic "creepers," which he detects in the New Liberalism. That is an intelligible position. It is the position of a man in whose conception of "character" neither altruism nor sympathy nor the habit of mutual aid has any real part, for whom life is a warfare among the individually strong, and virtue is translated in wholly self-regarding terms. The ideal is to "strengthen, not weaken, character," which means in this contest to develop the harder, more combative and competitive, qualities. Mankind on this showing is capable of "virtues" for which "Socialism" would give no exercise. But midway between two passages of this kind, we suddenly encounter a wholly different vision. "Socialism" is, indeed, a beautiful vision, but wholly impossible, not because men are too good and too strong for it, but because they are too selfish. To achieve it, it would be "necessary to reform human nature from top to bottom," for we are "so individualistic at this moment as almost to seem in some cases to have approached selfishness." In one sentence unrestricted individualism is the goal and the ideal, the basis of religion, the State, the family, and the Empire; in the next it is the original sin which for ever renders impossible a closer organisation of society than the present. The contradiction is worth noting. It is more than an accident which might befall a hasty speaker. It would have been impossible to any mind which has a fixed vision, an assured outlook on life. It suggests that more fundamental than any lack of a political philosophy in Lord Rosebery's case is the want of a moral philosophy. He dislikes what he calls "Socialism" for the obvious and simple reason that he is a great landowner. But he cannot be sure whether he dislikes it because it is too bad for mankind, or because mankind is too bad for it.

Another puzzle confronts us when we pass from the speech itself to a little discourse which Lord Rosebery delivered afterwards by way of complimenting the North British Locomotive Company upon its formation out of three competing firms, which have now agreed to amalgamate. He could see "nothing but good in saving the waste, in the concentration, the union, of three great firms which produce the same article and wish to produce it as economically as possible. . . . They had joined forces to promote efficiency, and long might the word be their motto." One gasps in a momentary amazement on reading such a speech as this, delivered with hardly a pause for breath after the great oration against "Socialism." This company, to be sure, is not the State, nor does it profess to be working for the good of mankind. But the evolution of industry towards these great combinations and amalgamations marks none the less an emphatic departure from the ideals which seemed to reign in the attack upon the Budget. These amalgamations, whether they yet deserve the name of Trusts or not, have left behind them the theory of unrestricted competition which was the basis of the Manchester School. They have realised the inevitable waste of competition, and perceived that the blessed word "efficiency" drives them to methods of production in which the individual counts steadily for less, and the habit of co-operation as steadily for more. The self-made man of the epoch of Smiles, the independent producer who ploughed his own lonely furrow, have been left behind. The morals and economics of what one may call the "John Halifax" stage of industry are becoming as obsolete as the morals and economics of the Hans Sachs stage. So much Lord Rosebery seems to perceive when he talks as a man of business at a company meeting. But his practical experience has not yet modified his political theory. The significance of these great amalgamations is simply this—that they have destroyed Lord Rosebery's fundamental antithesis between the man who works for himself and the man who works for the State. In one sense, of course, every man works for himself, whether he is a policeman or a financier, a post-office official or a self-made manufacturer. He works for a living and the maintenance of his family. But it might puzzle a more ingenious man than Lord Rosebery to explain in what moral or economic essential the employee of a big modern amalgamated joint-stock company differs from an employee of the State. Both have their places in a great organised hierarchy. Neither has any expectation of profit or gain other than the wage or salary which his regular services will bring. Zeal and intelligence may bring promotion and an increase of salary, ranging up to high "wages of ability," but they will not bring the indefinite and almost unlimited gains which stimulate the "captain of industry," the promoter and the financier. The more industry, in pursuit of efficiency, organises itself into a few non-competitive concerns, the smaller becomes the number of individuals who can be said to "work for themselves." Where there were thousands in that case before the industrial revolution, and hundreds in the Cobdenite epoch, there are only tens to-day. Take what view one may of State or municipal Socialism, the fact remains that the middle-class is becoming a salaried class, a comfortable proletariat, and bureaucracy, public or private, the prevailing type of modern organisation. Even of the directors of these great concerns one cannot fairly say, after the first profitable stage of "promotion," that they work solely for themselves. They are the elect of the shareholders, and in theory, at least, the custodians and representatives of their interests. The amalgamation is a bureaucracy over which the public has no control. The State Department is a bureaucracy over which democracy has a partial and nominal control, and might, if it were more vigilant and better organised, exert a real control.

Without a doubt the development of the New Liberalism does mean an increase of the bureaucratic machinery. To-day we are witnessing the enrolment of the new officials of the labor exchanges. Next year we shall have to create the human mechanism of the insurance schemes. At no distant date we may see the growth of a State industry of forestry, and probably the experimental nationalisation at least of the Irish railways. The movement as certainly keeps pace with a parallel concentration in private industry, which is also reducing the numbers of those who "work for themselves." Is this expansion of the organised mechanism, this contraction of the sphere of unchecked individual responsibility, the menace to character which Lord Rosebery evidently fears? Clearly it has its dangers. One is familiar enough with the traditional type of the civil servant—a young man whose aim is to evade the risks and stimulative efforts of competitive work, who hopes for a "permanence" and a "soft job," who does not dream of making his desk work any part of his real existence, and lives, so far as he lives at all, in the literary or social preoccupations of a somewhat ample leisure. Such a conception of life, if widely held, would undoubtedly mean a large subtraction from the vital energies and the productive capacities of a people. The growth of a class of "slackers" is, indeed, a sign of the times, for which the great accumulations of the last three generations are partly responsible. But while we watch the expansion of the civil service let us not forget the parallel and inevitable process which is going on in industry, or ignore the demoralisation which goes on almost unmarked among the more numerous army of drudges and clerks, who do their hopeless and aimless work in the mills of the commercial bureaucracy.

But this traditional portrait is false as a picture of the men who commonly rise to the higher posts in a great Government Department. One cannot glance at the reports of the factory or school inspectors without realising that most of them are making a conscience of what they do, that their work interests and stimulates them, that they are doing much more than the mechanical minimum, and that an ideal of social service is steadily in their minds. They are not working for themselves; they are working for their fellow-men. It is a crude cynicism which assumes that nothing but the hope of unlimited gain can spur to energy or evoke the manhood of a mind. The brief industrial experience of the nineteenth century based its reading of human nature on a purely transitory phase. Gain was not the chief stimulus of the medieval craftsman. It had even in the nineteenth century only a secondary place in the lives of scholars, artists, scientists, architects, engineers, and medical men. Generations of doctors have worked with incessant energy and self-sacrifice upon discoveries and inventions, which the etiquette of their caste forbade them to patent or monopolise. The really virile mind is more often an intelligence which desires to fling itself into some largely disinterested work of organisation or reform, discovery or social service, than a mechanism which will give forth its best only under the stimulus of great profit. The truly adventurous type of intellect may expand in the public service as well as in the field of speculation and commercial generalship, interesting as that is. The ideal of a disinterested yet energetic civil service is no contradiction of a broad human experience. A medieval craftsman, a Franciscan friar, a Jesuit missionary, a German scholar, a medical man of any age or race—to none of them would it have seemed so strange or so undesirable as it seems to Lord Rosebery. The development of bureaucracy is the inevitable consequence of the effort of modern society to organise itself for mutual aid and corporate activity, to attain the full "efficiency" which is possible only when the lower phases of competition have been left behind. It is too late to inquire whether we can do without it. The practical questions are rather, whether we have yet discovered the best conditions for its recruitment and promotion, and, above all, whether we cannot turn our old-world Parliament into a more competent engine of control.

THE CASE OF THE POPHAM ESTATE.

In the famous speech at Limehouse, in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave the people of England their first vivid notion of the working of their land system, he referred to a case arising at Richmond in which the Town Council had to pay £2,000 an acre for land required for workmen's dwellings, although the land had previously been assessed at only £4 an acre. Mr. Lloyd George's statements were challenged, but the controversy entirely established his main contention as to the marked discrepancy between the valuation of land when the public had to pay for it and its valuation when it was a question of the public getting anything out of it. It is to be regretted that the dispute went no farther, for it affords a vivid illustration of the way in which a community may be shorn by a landlord who has the advantage over it, first, of holding land on its borders; secondly, of seeing the value of his land growing by leaps and bounds as the population increases and as the township begins to provide for social needs; thirdly, of compelling it to buy for public purposes at prices which its own action and expenditure have largely created; and, fourthly, of withholding his land from the market till such time as the top range of monopoly values may have been reached.

We propose, therefore, to give a short history of the recent growth of the estate in question, known locally as the Popham Estate. It consisted originally of about 250 acres of agricultural land lying between the great populous London suburbs of Richmond and Mortlake. In 1866, by a very advantageous sale to the London and South-Western Railway, a strip was cut from the extreme western edge of the estate, and the main part, a quadrilateral of about 210 acres, was left intact, divided from Richmond by the line of rails.. A few years later it changed hands, was disentailed, and nearly all the area we have described was mortgaged between 1884 and 1889 for a total sum of £16,000. At this point the public authority made the first of its many contributions to the growing value of the Popham Estate. The Richmond Main Sewerage Board, which was established to improve the drainage of the district, laid main sewers in the roads which bounded the estate, and Richmond's share of the cost of the whole system was £10,000. In the same year the London and South-Western Railway agreed to construct and maintain a bridge over their line, where it ran through the Popham land, on condition that the owners filled in the earthwork and maintained the roadway. Thus the first steps towards development were taken at the expense of others, and the same process was, as we shall see, followed all through the later history of the estate. The effect was immediate. In one year the mortgage sprang up from £16,000 to £29,000. Next year it was possible to mortgage about one-fifteenth of the estate for £7,000, almost half the earlier mortgage of the whole, or nearly the whole, area. In the same year the Sewerage Works were opened, and in 1892 Richmond had grown so fast that the boundaries were extended, and a large slice of the Popham Estate was included in them. Twelve months later the mortgage had grown to £43,000, and in five years it was possible to raise £70,000 on 238 acres, in spite of the fact that the older houses were naturally deteriorating, and that no new ones had been built.

Soon customers began to come in. The members of a social club, the Victoria Working Men's Club, required a site. They paid £160 for a morsel of ground just exceeding one tenth of an acre, so that the estate was already selling at the rate of £1,500 an acre. A large area of several acres was sold at a still higher rate. In 1900 a large building scheme was initiated, and 12 to 14 acres were let at ground rents varying from £4 to £5 a house. It is estimated that the total revenue thus received is over £1,200. The cost of making the roads has been divided between these ground rents and between the leaseholders and tenants. Unfortunately the ground rent, a high one for workmen's dwellings, drove the builders to choose two-storey flats of three rooms, instead of separate cottages, the rents varying from 6s. 3d. to 7s. 6d., while the tenants of the municipal cottages paid no more for their four or five rooms and gardens.

The closely packed community began to develop the usual needs. Their children required a school, and who but the Richmond ratepayers could provide it? The land was isolated, and the children could not be asked to travel long distances. So the Education Committee were forced, in 1905, to go to the Popham trustees for a site, and they obligingly cut off one of their 14 acres to secure it. This, like its companions, was rated at £5 an acre, but the ratepayers had to pay £2,000 for it, and to spend about £100 in making up the adjacent road. When they had finally equipped the estate with the means of education, they had laid a capital charge on the ratepayers of over £13,000, and an annual burden of several hundred pounds, increasing yearly as the estate develops.

Meanwhile, sales went merrily on. Richmond wanted a school, Fulham a cemetery. Twenty acres were bought for the latter purpose at £20,000, while Hammersmith purchased thirty acres for £30,000, with a liability to compensate occupiers of the land as it was gradually taken up. Again the local authority intervened. The owners had omitted to find any playground for their tenants. The Richmond Town Council proposed that the estate should make good this deficiency. The trustees then offered it a site which, as the railway line cut it off from the rest of Richmond, was practically an estate recreation ground. The terms on which this concession, if that be the right word to use, was made, were remarkable. On the working-class side of the estate the Council were required to build a 6-ft. wall, shutting off the tenants from the ground; on the other side a mere iron fence was to be set up so that the ground would constitute an amenity for any richer and newer tenants who might come in, but little enough for the older and poorer. On these terms the Town Council paid £2,000 for two acres, on account of which the owners were contributing just £10 a year to its treasury, and two acres and £350 were given in. As the authority discharged the whole cost of fencing and walling, the real price amounted to over £3,000 for four acres. Later on other works and amenities were added, and paid for, it is superfluous to say, by the public.

In 1906 occurred the transaction to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer referred in his Limehouse speech. The Richmond Town Council, as the result of a clearance scheme under the Housing of the Working-Classes Act, found themselves compelled to provide houses for 200 people who had been displaced. The Council chose a site which formed part of the Popham Estate, and the price asked was £2,000 an acre. At once a strong body of protest was formed, a Tenants' Protection Committee was set up, and it was represented to the Council that the land was inaccessible, that its cost was outrageously high, and that cheaper and less remote sites could readily be found. The Council replied that they had already paid £2,000 an acre for the land on which they built their school, and Mr. Alderman Burt mentioned at the Local Government Board inquiry that the trustees first demanded £2,600 an acre for the school site, and had told him that they had sold other land in close proximity to that now suggested for more than £2,000 an acre. The opposition failed, but their prediction that, if the scheme went through, not one of the tenants of the old slum area could afford to live in the new cottages proved to be perfectly correct.

The letting of the estate goes merrily on. An area of thirty-five acres at the Kew end has been covered with shops and villas at a ground rent of about £80 an acre as against a previous ratable value of £5, and the total ground rents gathered in from a quarter of the estate amount to about £4,000 a year. As the law stands, in respect of these fifty acres, the owners make no contribution to the local rates. Now a new main sewer is being carried through the centre of the estate at a cost of £20,000 to the ratepayers, and the Popham Estate is responsible for at least half the present and the prospective increase of buildings in Richmond which has made it necessary. At the same time the disparity between what the estate has got out of the public and what it has contributed to them continues in an especially glaring form. About 100 acres of it are still let as agricultural land, and they are rated at about £5 an acre. Judging from the selling prices we have recorded, the owner considers this land to be worth about £200,000. On the other hand, £200,000 spent in bricks and mortar on part of the estate involved a contribution by the occupiers of about £5,000 in rates. The estate forms two-thirds of the parish of North Sheen, and when complaints are made that the rates have gone up 7d. in the £, and that they are higher in North Sheen than elsewhere, the official explanation is that newly developed estates add to the assessment of the parish to which they are attached, because all new houses go into the assessable value, whether they are occupied or not. On the other hand, the ground rents of empty houses escape local taxation, so that the occupiers pay not only for their own houses, but for an exceptional number of empty ones.

We will now give our readers a picture in miniature of the rise of the Popham Estate and of its relation to the ratepayers and people of Richmond. 204 out of the 210 acres of the Popham Estate were mortgaged twenty years ago for £16,000. Now less than one-fourth of the land has been sold to the ratepayers of Fulham and Hammersmith for £50,000; one-seventieth part has gone to the Richmond ratepayers for £6,000; only one-fiftieth part has been devoted to an open space, and for this a sum of £2,000 has been charged. One-fourth has been covered with buildings which pay a ground rent of £80 an acre, which is equivalent to a capital value of £100,000. The remaining half of the estate, which, the owners value for sale at £2,000 an acre, would yield £200,000, while other portions sold to clubs, companies, and individuals come to another £11,000. Thus we arrive at a grand total value of nearly £370,000.

What have the owners done towards the creation of this value? Ten new roads have been made at a cost of from about £15,000, half of which has been charged on the occupiers, while the other half is included in the ground rents. On the other hand, the Town Council have expended £16,500 on schools and playgrounds for the estate tenants. How would the Budget have operated upon this series of transactions? If the Land Clauses had been in operation during the last twenty years the ½d. tax on undeveloped land might have realised, after allowing for development expenses, 150,000 halfpennies, or £312 a year, £156 of which would have gone to the relief of the rates now burdened with the cost of developing this estate. We may fairly fix the unearned increment on the portion sold at £50,000. This again would have paid the tax of £10,000, which again would have been divided between Richmond and the estate. Summarising these figures, we arrive at the following results:—

|---|---|---|---|
| Land Value of Estate ... ... | £370,000 | 0 | 0 |
| Increment, say ... ... ... | 320,000 | 0 | 0 |
| Charges imposed by the Land Clauses:— | | | |
| (a) Undeveloped Land Tax | £312 | 0 | 0 |
| (b) One-fifth on any increase in land value above £2,000 an acre, which will be very small for the next few years, say, per annum ... ... | 188 | 0 | 0 |
| Total charges ... ... | £500 | 0 | 0 a year, |

£250 of which goes to local rates, as against £8,000 a year paid to the rates in respect of the same amount invested in building. Will even Lord Rosebery venture to call this an improper charge on this estate?

But the uses of the Budget do not end here. The real value of the Popham Estate is not as high as the monopoly value of £2,000 an acre which its owner puts upon it. The effect of taxing land at the artificial value assigned it by its owner would be to reduce that value in many cases by as much as one-half. Thus we shall at last arrive at a breakdown of the land corner round our towns, and be able to set up a reasonable scale of prices for houses, factories, public buildings, small holdings, open spaces, and the multifarious needs of our working communities.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE COUNTRY.

At the end of the fourth year of its existence the Liberal Government is approaching a climax which no carefully preconceived stage-management could have arranged with a more dramatic and telling effect, and which no council of statesmen could have thought out in a way more conducive to secure party unity and rouse party loyalty and enthusiasm. In whatever way the events of the next month may shape themselves, there can be but one final issue—a triumph for Liberalism. This exuberant optimism is not based alone on pride at a fine record of legislation, culminating in a great Budget which comprehends so much to satisfy the best aspirations of all who work for progress, and which has been fought with patience and persistence by the leaders, backed by the eager and willing assistance of the rank and file. Nor is it based on the dilemma and confusion from which year after year, in season and out of season, our opponents appear unable to extricate themselves. But it is prompted more especially by the knowledge, at first uncertain, but now fully confirmed, that the country is behind us, and as ready as we are to fight any opposition and break down any obstacle that may stand between us and the accomplishment of our purpose.

Members are constantly returning to the House, not from holiday-making, but from campaigning in their own constituencies and elsewhere; and, whether it is rural districts or towns, whether it is in the North or in the South, in Scotland or in Wales, there is always the same report given of crowded meetings receiving the Budget proposals with acclamation, and of electors flocking to hear speeches, as if a general election were actually proceeding. Seats which were in danger now appear safe; the despondency and depression of a year, or even six months, ago is completely dispelled. Liberalism and Labor are joined in the fight, and even the Unionist voice of qualified approval is not uncommon. The length of the controversy, the methods of the attack, the tears of the Dukes, the unashamed clutching of money-bags by the plutocracy, the nature of the forces drawn up for combat—brewers, landlords, plutocrats, and peers ranged against the people, the users against the creators of the nation's wealth—all these features of the contest, which week by week have become more salient, have demonstrated, better even than reasoned argument, the justice and need of this great measure.

The Anti-Budget League's activity meanwhile is confined to posters of a childish nature and dissertations on appropriation and robbery composed at headquarters, and read out in small meetings to a selected audience. Except for Mr. Long, the members of the front Opposition Bench prefer to avoid facing the electors and to keep a discreet silence.

This enthusiasm for the Budget throughout the provinces, and even in London, is not fictitious, is not artificially engineered. It is a genuine expression of approval, and of a keen desire to combat the forces which too long have thwarted the advance of democratic principles. If there is one portion of the Finance Bill more than another that meets with special attention and receives the most complete and cordial support, it is the land clauses, which open out the view to a future of which many have been dreaming.

As to the action of the Lords, there is endless speculation. Among Liberals hopes may vary, but there are no fears, whatever the eventual decision may be. It is inconceivable that the responsible leaders should favor rejection. But the question is, have they any control over their wild and desperate colleagues, who will emerge just for this occasion from their various holes and corners? In the event of amendment or rejection, the course to be taken is clear enough, though some regret that a sharp weapon in the shape of a Veto Bill is not ready to hand for such a crisis. But more courage and determination is required of the Government if the Bill gets a safe passage through the other House, which, taking all things into consideration, would seem to be the more probable eventuality. Courage to renounce the temptation to prolong the life of this Parliament for another year or so, and determination still to fight the Lords, and to ask the country, on the record of their achievements, to return them again to office for another spell in which to continue their programme of social legislation—a question which, if put while feeling still runs strong and the tide of appreciation is at its flood, will receive a hearty and vigorous response.

It is a unique, historical opportunity. The Liberal Party cannot possibly expect the recurrence of such a moment in the lifetime of this Parliament, even if extended to its utmost limit, and much depends on the exact psychological moment chosen for a dissolution, because the collective imagination of the electorate is very sensitive. These are considerations which will not be ignored by leaders in whom the party, both inside and outside the House, have complete confidence.

TWO SORTS OF AMERICAN.

What does America stand for in modern civilisation? European men of culture, who have sought to assess the value of a new rising nation by applying those standards of achievement accepted in the refined coteries which they adorn, still issue judgments of disparagement as they contemplate the life of America. The average man, they admit, may be a little better fed, a little healthier and happier, less ignorant and torpid-minded than in the older countries. But the pattern of the civilisation remains crude and garish; there is everywhere a lack of ease and permanence; so much energy is still going out in material growth and structural repair that little remains for the cultivation of the finer arts of life. So it has been easy to construct from outside a plausible theory of the barrenness of the United States in art, literature, and other departments of disinterested culture. To most Europeans America has thus come to be represented as a great business world, dominated by a vulgar scramble for wealth and a profuse sensational expenditure. This spirit, though pervasive everywhere, has attained a more whole-hearted supremacy in America than elsewhere. So many outward and visible signs attest this supremacy of the purely quantitative standard of success. The architectural grandiloquence of America, the magnitude of business operations, the perpetual advertisement of size and number, speed and cost and distance, which falls upon the eye and ear, the scale upon which the movements of material apparatus are everywhere conducted, overwhelm the visitor. Thus one notion of the representative American is formed as that of the man who moves the largest masses of this raw rude energy, as if he, he alone and he peculiarly, embodied the meaning and the worth of America.

Such an American has just passed away, and the newspapers, as is natural, have been "full of him." Mr. Harriman played the great business game upon its highest level, that of finance, and played it with consummate skill, stretching to its utmost limit every rule of the game. Rising to the front as a stock speculator and gambler in the 'eighties and 'nineties, he fastened himself upon the railway system as the controlling factor in American industry. The very size of America gives dominion to the master of her roads. Partly by the exercise of genuine ability, an eye for neglected facts, partly by unrivalled audacity in the use of other people's money, he built up a number of broken, bankrupt railways into a solid, remunerative system, and, consolidating them with great trunk roads, became the virtual dictator, financial and industrial, of half the railroads of the country. So for the last decade Mr. Harriman, though stigmatised by President Roosevelt as "an undesirable citizen," may certainly be taken to represent more than any other man the spirit of business enterprise in America. It is hard to determine how such a man really stands among his fellow-countrymen. Success goes further in America than anywhere else, and many thoughtful people hold that the formal reprobation dealt out to a notoriously unscrupulous financier is easily outweighed by the meed of instinctive worship accorded to the winner.

If this were really what America stood for, it would be difficult to deal with her detractors. Nothing is easier than to paint a picture of corrupt commercialism under which the fundamental liberties of the Republic—"life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—have been degraded into a base lust for material luxury and selfish power, in which the many losers differ from the few winners, not in their motives and aspirations, but only in their skill or luck. But this would be a most unjust portrayal, for it would leave out of consideration another spirit of America, another standard of success. Follow the career of such men as Jay Gould, Rockefeller, and Harriman, read the detailed study of machine-politics in Ostrogorski, or the amazing revelations of municipal corruption in Lincoln Steffens's "Shame of the Cities," add the newspaper accounts of negro lynching, the official statistics of unpunished homicide and of railroad slaughter, the histories of labor struggles between armed strikers and sheriffs' posses, and America, by all the rules of human history, must be slipping rapidly backwards into sheer anarchy.

The reason it does not is that there is another quite different type of American, who is always at work countering these disruptive influences. Men of the Harriman type have not really made America, they are not its true representatives, nor do they determine its career in the ultimate resort: they are what the border ruffian was to the true pioneer in an earlier stage, extravagant sports, whose wasteful energy doubtless contained some elements of use, but not in the direct line of civilisation. By a mournful coincidence we are able to illustrate this better, this saving spirit, by the name of one of the real makers of America, one of those quiet, yet ardent and industrious, workers for a greater commonwealth, who died a few days later than the great financier. This man bore a name which will live in his country's history, and awake a throb of noble sympathy long after that of Mr. Harriman has sunk into oblivion. Though there fell to the later William Lloyd Garrison no such strenuous part in history as that held by his great father through the turbulent campaign of liberationism, the same sense of public service possessed him, the same spirit of entire devotion to those causes which make for the attainment and enlargement of good citizenship. For many years he had given his time and energy to the special advocacy of the policy of Free Trade which he rightly regarded as a direct spiritual legacy from the labors of his father. For the wars of liberty are many. In the last generation slavery was the enemy to be crushed. But, as Lincoln himself in a moment of prophetic vision foretold, a new monstrous form was already beginning to exhibit itself, the power of gigantic corporations, laying monopolistic hands upon the land and railroads, extorting franchises and other privileges from State Governments, their creatures, and crowning their edifice of iniquity by the erection of a tariff whose moral infamy was even more injurious than its economic waste. In one form or another, every public-spirited man in America to-day is engaged in the struggle to free his city and his country from the coils of this monster of corrupted capitalism. The later generation of Garrisons were in the forefront of this battle, working in the Press, or on the platform, or in those rallies of "good citizens" which everywhere have gathered in defence of the liberties of the people.

The distinctive features of this type of good citizen are two, first his faith in the efficacy of moral appeals, and secondly his optimism. Perhaps one should say that these are but the two aspects of that definitely spiritual nature, that democratic idealism, which has always done the great deeds in American history, and which is so much more conscious and pronounced a character of American reform movements than European. This reliance upon moral or sentimental appeals is admirably illustrated by Mr. Lloyd Garrison's fight against Protection in his little journal the "Free Trade Broadside." The stress throughout is laid, not on commercial prosperity, or even upon the interests of the wage-earner and the consumer, but upon the really essential fact that Protection is a dividing and antagonising influence in the relations of men, of classes, and of nations, whereas free commercial intercourse is an instrument of that moral union which, by securing peace and promoting amicable intercourse, makes for the spiritual solidarity of nations.

The same faith prevails in all the countless little struggles which are carried on in the cities and villages of America against the greed and corruption of business and political machines and bosses. It is the persistent, powerful survival of the spiritual current of that puritanism which has flowed through American history, its revolution, its federation, and its civil war, moulding its formative principles and constituting what is sometimes called its "manifest destiny." It is precisely because there are many thousands of men and women born and bred of this spiritual stock and nourished in the faith that "the success of any great moral enterprise does not depend on numbers," that men like Harriman and Rockefeller, with all their financial power, are not destined to be the rulers of America. Not in Boston and New England only, but in the great fertile plains of the Middle West, and on the far-off Pacific slope, are men of the breed of Lloyd Garrison and Wendell Phillips, who know that the masses of their fellow-citizens are not mere money-worshippers, bondsmen to material success, but are capable of responding to ideals of justice and human fellowship. Our political philosophers are often scornful of what they consider antiquated doctrines of natural rights. But to the good American they still have a deep meaning and a powerful appeal, and the sons of Lloyd Garrison in the spirit, as in the flesh, have not shrunk from the duties involved in his widest assertion of the principle, "I claim to be a Human Rights Man; and wherever there is a human being, I see God-given rights inherent in that being, whatever may be the sex or the complexion."

MARBLE'S LANGUAGE.

It is hard to bring a trained judgment to bear on the subjects that have trained it; for familiarity and many associations, often unpleasant, have dulled their proper brightness. With what zest and admiration a student of literature or religion, already highly educated in character and criticism, would approach the Psalms or the prophetic books of the Bible, if he approached them for the first time! With what freshness of insight and perception a man who knew the world and the ways of men would read the Gospels for the first time at forty! But the thing is hardly possible. Though the Bible is no longer the basis of higher education, as it was some fifty years ago, it is hardly possible for an Englishman to know literature and the world without acquiring on his way an intimate acquaintance with its language and teaching. And so the familiar words slide off him, and the very rhythm of their sound leaves their beauty and meaning unrealised; or else they are tainted with dim memories of hassocks and pews, of unintelligible sermons and compulsory stillness, and of an impatient interval before breakfast.

Associations and familiarity are not bad; they are often a delight in themselves; but they benumb the sense of values. In the case of most educated men, it is the same with their Latin and Greek. Those are the instruments by which their judgment has been chiefly formed; but habit and years of boredom blunt their appreciation of the instruments themselves. An enthusiastic botanist in India asked a sapper if the men did not learn something about the trees, while making roads through the jungle. "Oh, yes, we learns a lot," was the answer; "we learns one tree's damned tough and another tree's not so damned tough." It is an exact parallel to what most public-school boys learn of the classics. Pindar and Persius are tough; Herodotus and Cæsar are not so tough. That is the main upshot of our learning, and a half-conscious belief prevails that the Greeks and Romans wrote books on an ascending scale of difficulty, graduated to suit the "removes" in English public schools. Few of us in maturity take the time or trouble to reconsider those classics. We leave them off, as we leave off football, or "the mile," and with much smaller regret. If we think of them at all, familiarity dulls our appreciation, just as it dulls our appreciation of our parents, and their true value is overweighted by memories of vain struggles to make sense, of lessons unprepared, of impositions, wrath, and the escape into sunny air.

Every great art has to be restudied at each stage of life, and our opinions of twenty years ago are no longer ours. We owe the more gratitude to scholars like Professor Wight Duff for drawing us back to reconsider those Latin authors whose well-worn names of Virgil, Horace, Cicero, and Livy, played so prominent, and on the whole so ungrateful, a part in our boyhood. His book, entitled "A Literary History of Rome" (Fisher Unwin) compels us to listen. To those who even dimly remember their Latin, there is something irresistible in his style and arrangement, in his knowledge, and the temperate freshness of his criticism. He begins with the very origins of the Roman language, rooted in the strange admixture of races—Celts, Greeks, gloomy Etruscans, and the peoples we call Latin—who divided among them the length of that Saturnian land from the Alps to the Sicilian Sea, until Rome gathered them all under her imperial sway. And he carries us on to the end of the brief age—hardly more than two generations—in which the intellect of Rome reached its finest development. The book is so filled with the interest of mortality, it is so free from pedantic trammels and second-hand judgments, that there is only one thing we regret about it. We regret only that it ends. Professor Duff is, no doubt, right in urging that the close of the Augustan age marks a period and a change. It is true there is a change. Something has been lost in the Silver Age; we should say, perhaps, that it is hope which has vanished, rather than that language has declined. Yet we could wish that Professor Duff had carried the story onward till the appearance of the Christian Fathers put a violent end to that world of thought which seems so much more modern than their doctrines. We would have given much for just two chapters more to reveal the living reality of Juvenal's indignation, of Martial's sting, of those encaustic sentences in which Tacitus almost burlesqued the power of the Roman tongue, and of the mood whereby the Stoics of the study and the palace at last attained to the desired equilibrium of golden mediocrity.

The scroll of Roman literature is finished and rolled up. Like all great literatures, it expresses the distinct and incommunicable soul of a great people, and as we contemplate it there rises before us the image of the race which found an utterance in those words that still go winged from mouth to mouth. We see a people in many respects like a people we know better—religious without sanctitude; unspiritual but careful of old morality; conservative by precedent, but tolerating vast revolutions under constitutional forms; priding themselves on country life and rural traditions, while inhabiting the greatest city of the world; chaotic in theory and muddled in knowledge, but capable of organisation, and arriving punctual as the stars; despising all foreigners, but contemptuously tolerant of foreign ways; kindly in nature, but delighting in cruel sports, and too unsympathetic even to imagine the objections of the races they slaughtered or subdued; devoted to the State, and worshipping law as divine, but boiling with rage if the State or the law touched a single hair that was entitled to freedom. We see a nation of engineers rather than of architects, more successful in sewage than in sculpture, better at commandments than at visions, more respectful to property than to genius, honoring the god of landmarks side by side with the God of heaven, and the spirit of the municipal council far above the spirit of the dawn.

If every language reveals the character of its race, the Roman language was pre-eminent in that power. Clear, solemn, and brief, it is designed for proclamations, for laws, for the record of events, and, above all, for inscriptions. It is, as St. Praxed's bishop said, "marble's language, Latin pure, discreet." Up till yesterday our fathers found a Latin epitaph easier to write than an English, and to-day Professor Duff dedicates his book in Latin. The very sight of the letters reminds us of the keen edges of marble freshly inscribed. The form and order of the words is like the construction of a fortress, and in the masters of Roman prose the sentences are compact together, like the cubic stones that built the rampart from the Solway to the Tyne. It is significant that the man who first revealed the genius of that prose was Cato the Censor, the Sabine countryman, the author of books on farming, the scornful enemy of Greeks, women, and extravagance, the statesman whose foreign policy was summed up in the extirpation of Rome's one rival. Of all Livy's history, the most significant parts—the parts that are most characteristic of Rome and have most profoundly influenced the world—are just those untrustworthy chapters containing the legends in which Romans loved to see proclaimed the ancestral qualities of their race, discovering a natural kinship with Cincinnatus at the plough, with Curtius plunging into the gulf, and with the mother of Coriolanus when she made her great appeal to Woman's Fortune. But it is most significant of all that Cæsar, the greatest and most typical of the Romans, also used the language with the most forcible and succinct perfection.

Marble found its language in Rome, and wherever the emblem of the Senate and the Roman People appeared throughout the world, there arose the sense of marble permanence and severity. But, as in the endearments of a strong and silent nature, what unexpected pleasure arises when the marble suddenly glows and this language of silence becomes eloquent with passionate emotion! To that very contrast is due much of the peculiar beauty of the Roman poets. Into the language of cold entablatures they have infused the stir and crimson of our common life, and the surprise of finding there also the touch of mortal things gives to those memorable expressions a double worth. So it is when Horace smiles, or when Tibullus calls to his lover to meet him barefooted, with her tangled hair let down, or when Propertius laments the many ladies dead:—

"Sunt apud infernos tot milia formosarum."

And so it is when Terence shows the girl taking refuge for grief in her lover's arms—"flens quam familiariter"—or when he utters his famous "Homo sum." Catullus could fire that chilly language with every mood of happy and tortured love. "Odi et amo," he cries, and every lover knows his meaning:—

"Odi et amo: quare id faciam fortasse requiris, Nescio, sed fieri sentio et excrucior."

In a single line Lucretius could picture the vision of man's generations handing on the torch of life, like runners in the torchlight game, and in three lines he could inscribe his eternal panegyric on the master whose soul had journeyed far beyond the flaming ramparts of the world and traversed the immeasurable Whole.

But more than all the others—more even than Catullus—Virgil possessed the secret of this power. Perhaps no ear till Wordsworth came was so sensitive to the still, sad music of humanity, and he compelled that language of stones to utter it. In the mere use of words he had Milton's gift of suggesting intangible associations and inner meanings. As Prof. Duff says in an admirable chapter:—

> "Words were by Virgil so experimented on as to raise in the mind indefinable associations, transcending the ordinary meaning and transcending ordinary experience. A sense is constantly produced as of some dim realm of moods almost beyond expression—a background consisting of another world."

Instances of that mysterious skill in words are abundant, if we did not forget them; instances, too, of that still deeper and rarer power of sympathy in all human things, of regret over the long sorrows of mankind, of misgiving under the burden of the mystery—the heavy and the weary weight of all this unintelligible world. It was a power hardly to be found again till it reappeared among our fathers little over a century ago; and it was a power that Virgil's imposed theme rather hampered than called out; but in unmistakable glimpses we discover it. We need not recall the "lacrimæ rerum," but rather let us remember such few lines as:—

"Non ignara mali miseris succurrere disco."

Or:—

"Habes tota quod mente petisti, Infelix."

Or:—

"Venit summa dies et ineluctabile tempus."

Or:—

"Quisque suos patimur Manes."

Or the great passage in the sixth book, beginning:—

"Ibant obscuri sola sub nocte per umbram
Perque domos Ditis vacuas et inania regna:
Quale per incertam lunam sub luce maligna
Est iter in silvis."

Those and the verses that follow are lines in which one might almost say that the Roman tongue reached its highest poetic accomplishment, and with the music of them vibrating in our memory we may close.

THE COLORS OF SEPTEMBER.

Summer ends where it began—with a strong note of yellow. If we may say that it opens with the pale primroses, it passes to the yellow satin of the buttercups, then into the pink of wild roses, the red of campion, the purple of geraniums, the scarlet of poppies. In September it returns to its first love, with ragwort as its chief oriflamme. Nearly the same thing has happened in our gardens. The crimson glories of the roses are quenched, the heavenly blues of the larkspurs have faded, and September bees and butterflies make free with sunflowers, African marigolds, and golden rod.

The gold of spring is exhibited in a multitude of little dots. Primroses, daffodils, buttercups are single flowers, each content to fight its own battle, and producing their masses of color by a sort of mob law. The principal flowers of late autumn, in the other colors as well as in yellow, mass their blossoms co-operatively, either in close phalanx like the flea-bane, hawkweed, scabious, or in looser but not less effective umbels like the ragwort, yarrow, tansy, and hemlock. There is a lavishness about these discs of color, larger and more gorgeous than sunflowers, that nothing but a complete summer could produce. The stems that bear them upward are not the outcome of a mere month's growth. They are several feet high, and contain so much woody fibre that they will be here as mementoes of the blossoms they now carry, long after winter has done its worst on them. And it is now that Flora indulges in the luxury of flowers above flowers. Where the earth-borne primroses starred the wood, and where the roots now sleep, first the tall ragwort blossoms swim in mid air and beneath them there is a foot-high forest of basil afire with delicate pink. Under the hemp agrimony is horse mint, under the yarrow, wild pansies, under the tree, heliotrope, whatever the gardener chooses to put there.

The gold of the cornfields was quite another thing than the gold of buttercups. Anyone who had never seen bread growing could tell it for the heavy gold of fulfilment. The hundred-acre field was like a great lake, brimful of rippling waves. The hedge, close cut so as to hinder no air and harbor no birds, was just the height of the corn which tossed its ears against the trim hawthorn, and made one level sea from one shore to the other. It seemed that there was nothing in all that field but the grain for which the farmer tilled it. All the weeds were overtopped, and not till the reaper had laid the trusses low was it evident that convolvolus and buckwheat were climbing the stems and a wealth of other weeds was thriving deep down at their base. The grass fields that have been mown have a yellow, mellow green that they had at no other time of the year. It belongs also to the fields that have been well bitten down by sheep, but not to those wasted fields of dry, grey, uneaten bennets that have been too sparsely stocked. Those standards of poverty must remain till the spring growth pulls them down and hides them in beauty.

We have here no extended hill-tops aglow with heather. If it had been so, we should have scarcely been able to write of golden September. But there is another way in which to enjoy the heather than living in a world of it. It is that of coming unexpectedly upon a patch of it between corn fields. The Barrow field has fourteen acres of oats, and where they stop, without hedge or ditch of any kind, the heather begins, running off into the woods, where they dispute the carpeting of the aisles with bracken and blue-berry. This waste at the end of the Barrow field is delightful even beyond standing corn. The short, well-flowered bell heather alternates with tufts of dwarf furze covered with its yellow blossoms. It is an ideal autumn pleasaunce for the lizards and adders that we occasionally meet there, the lizards waxing fat on countless insects, and the adders knowing many places where they can find a sleek vole or dainty wood mouse. Beyond the purple-floored pine wood is another field, won with much kind treatment from the rule of the wild. All the gorgeous weeds of autumn seem to revel in it—spikenard, hawkweed, knapweed, poppies, and a wilderness of others that after a while group themselves as weeds of cultivation. The tangle is enlivened here and there with little heads of vivid purple, sometimes varying towards a cerulean blue. A new flower, neither corydalis nor purple vetch, nor viper's bugloss. What can it be? With some disappointment we find it to be lucerne, the alfalfa that has made whole sandy territories of America prosperous, but which is yet only grown in England to the extent of some sixty thousand acres.

Lucerne was to have reclaimed this field, and with care and science no doubt it would have done so, giving instead of cotton grass and weeds, two tons of good hay per acre. But the lease was short, and the patience of the farmer gave out. The field is tumbling back into the wild, and its agricultural value may already be written down as nil. So they are about to sell it as building land—most eligible sites for villas among the healthy pines, and very few miles from a railway station. We are curious to see whether it will fetch £50 or £100 or two or three hundred pounds an acre, and a ground rent of £10, £20, or £40, instead of its late agricultural rack-rent of twelve shillings.

From the hill's edge we can see much country, and take choice of whither we will go next. Five partridges whirr out from the bracken and go floating down the vale, throwing their shadows now on corn, now on stubble, and at length pitching into the mellow shelter of a swede field. The sun is at early afternoon, and flooding the country with those level shafts through clear air that account for most of the distinctive coloring of the harvest month. It gleams into the pile of standing wheat, and adds the color of the stalks to the bronzed perfection of the ears. It brightens up the stubbles and accentuates the gold of the stucks with indigo shadows thrown along behind them. It gives a sort of funereal liveliness even to the beans standing in their field in black bundles or going out to the stack-yard behind a team of glossy horses.

We have come down to the western side of an orchard, poured upon by the sun that has been fitfully ripening its apples these three months. Scarlet and highly polished, the old-fashioned cider apples shine astonishingly amid the unimpaired green of the leaves. On the mighty pear trees every pear on this side can be counted, though their slightly glowing russet is little removed in color from the foliage. The great green-and-yellow cooking apples hanging in the still air seem about to drop at any moment. Every now and then the thud of a falling cider pear accentuates the silence and the peace of the plenteous scene. Again the ragwort crops up as the decorator. The long aisles of the orchard are radiant with its yellow curds, and the silence sings with drowsy humble-bees carousing in one of the sweetest dishes of late summer.

Beyond the orchard the sun still lights up wild fruit everywhere. The oaks are full of points of light as it strikes on innumerable acorns. Gaping horse-chestnuts show the shining "buck-eyes" within their green husks; nuts are browning within their green cups; hips and haws are reddening where the roses and the May-blossom grew; bryony is studding its garlands with fruit first lemon-yellow, afterwards scarlet. But the glory of none of them equals that which has fallen upon the bushes of wild guelder. The flat young berries have grown canary-colored, then have plumped out large and round like red currants, and now are hanging in brightest, shiniest scarlet among fiery leaves like those of the maple. Poisonous, of course? Let him who has read all these lines be rewarded with a secret that shall put in his cupboard some pots of delicious jelly for roast mutton days. The wild guelder is called by the Canadians "high-bush cranberry," for they make of its berries a sort of cranberry jam that is said to have a very agreeable flavor. Yet we have met no one in England, even among returned Canadians, who has gathered and used this tempting fruit. Perhaps it is too precious as the supreme beauty of our English autumn.

Present-Day Problems.

LIFE IN A CAVALRY REGIMENT.

A WIDE open space of bare earth, dusty in summer, muddy in winter, with large ugly buildings round it or near it—this is the regiment's home. The space is the barrack square. "Square" (without the "the") means foot-drill—word of ominous meaning to the newly joined subaltern.

Twenty or thirty officers, five hundred or so of men, five hundred or so of horses, inhabit the place. There are four squadrons, and the men of each "mess" together. There are the barrack-rooms, the canteen, the stables, the riding-school, the "sick lines" for disabled horses, the chapel, the school, the married men's quarters, the sergeant's mess, the various "shops," the reading-room; slightly apart, the officers' quarters; at the entrance, the Adjutant's office, and the guard-room.

The year is divided into a regular course of work, beginning in March. The training of recruits, the training of "drafts" to supply the "linked" regiment in India or elsewhere, the training of the horses, the training of troops first, and then of the squadrons, one by one; these follow one another in a more or less regular progression. Then the regiment is ready, and in its turn becomes a unit in the brigade, which again becomes a unit in the division, handled by someone with a big name, part of a "Red" or a "Blue" Army, moving during September over Berkshire and Oxfordshire and Gloucestershire, victorious or defeated. This is "Manœuvres."

After that the tension relaxes. Winter is the time for "leave," both for officers and men. Things are "kept going," but the regiment is short-handed throughout, until March comes round again.

The life in the officers' quarters cannot be said to be strenuous, judged by the standard of other professions. Hunting four days a week in the winter, polo as often in the summer, social functions in plenty, while away the time. "Stables" for an hour or more every morning—which means a little criticism and much looking on; "orderly" duty, which keeps the subaltern on the go from 6 a.m. to 11.30 p.m. once or twice in a fortnight; these labors are the occasion for bitter complaints, though the complaints are more, perhaps, a matter of convention than anything else. "Leave," and how to spend it, engrosses a large part of the officer's thoughts. He looks forward to manœuvres as a time, not so much of excitement and interest, as of excessive restraint, toil, and hardship.

Opinions differ much about work. "Dash and resourcefulness," say the books, are the chief needs of the cavalry officer. Many colonels consider that these can best be acquired on the hunting field and the polo-ground, and deliberately relegate all other means of education to the second place. Others believe in "staff-rides," map-drawing, and the like. A few believe in the study of books; but these are the most unpopular of all. The studious officer, unless he be also very sociable, is somewhat "out of it." He may not be "ragged"; more probably he is regarded as a mild kind of joke. He is never in the main stream of the regiment's life; always in a backwater.

The life is very expensive. It is hard to see how anyone, without many hundreds a year beyond his pay, could afford it. Hunting means two hunters; polo two ponies. Mess expenses—with a chef at (say) £150 a year—are high. The accumulation of silver plate—everyone who ever passed through the regiment having presented something—represents some expense all round, and continuous servant-labor for cleaning. Sometimes there is the regimental coach and four, and the regimental brougham, to be maintained. Finally, there is an extremely costly set of uniforms. This luxurious living does not mean that the officer cannot endure hardships. He can, and does.

But the chief feature of this life is its dreadful monotony. Drill, indeed, is not so dull as it seems to the civilian; but looking on at other people grooming horses and scrubbing bits, day after day, becomes after a time, to some men at least, intolerable. There is not much variety in the society functions. For the unmarried officer, the chief factor in life is the social atmosphere of the ante-room—the club-like place adjoining the dining-room. Here, on the leather-covered chairs, innumerable hours are spent, innumerable cigarettes consumed. It is pleasant and friendly and hospitable, but the unit is too small; the people who meet there are too few to make a society, and ineffable boredom is the result. Conversation, also, is too narrow in its range to compensate for the limited numbers. Three subjects predominate: sport, with its innumerable sub-divisions; women; and dress. Personal appearance is one of the serious preoccupations of life. This, like hunting, is frequently justified on principle, the principle that if a man is "smart" in his appearance he will be "smart" in his conduct throughout. All "shop"—discussion of military subjects—is rigorously excluded. The civilian who wanted to learn something about Army Reform, or the probability of a German invasion, would be disappointed. Cards, or the illustrated weeklies, occupy the evening. The Unionist newspapers—no others—lie on the table. The general tone is that of the jolly, sensible schoolboy, rather than of the grown man.

What of the "men"? They are largely drawn from the lowest strata of society; unemployment is still the chief recruiting sergeant. They come in increasing proportion from the towns—though they are not necessarily the worse for that. The Army, under the short service system, attracts a totally different class from the Navy. Yet, with such unpromising material, it is wonderful what progress is made. Education, under the influence of the Army schoolmaster, is rapidly increasing; the modern soldier is taught many things connected with his duties which promote general intelligence; disorderly conduct is becoming rarer; the standard of living is on the rise. The finest product of the system is seen, of course, in the non-commissioned officers. The sergeant-majors, the sergeants, and the corporals—here is the real soldier-class of England. Seen from below, they are grandees; the sergeants' mess imitates, from afar, the officers' mess. And they are little tyrants, too; an oligarchy, with practical power to admit to, or exclude from, their ranks; holding "Tommy" and his prospects in the hollow of their hand. But they rule, one feels, by right; every line of their bodies, every tone of their well-controlled voices, spells efficiency; they know their work, and they love it. One cannot despise a system which, from such raw material, creates a finished article like this.

These are the parts of the machine; how does it work? Between the officers and the men there is a gulf fixed. It is part of the system to make that gulf as wide as possible. All communications between the two are made through the non-commissioned officers. This distance, this absence of familiarity, breeds respect. It is reinforced by all the strict formalities—the saluting, the discipline. The smart, luxurious life of the officer-class marks them off, in the minds of the rank and file, as beings of some order superior to their own. They "look up to" them. The necessary subordination is maintained; and with it, the cohesion of the whole; a mechanical cohesion, it is true, but effective when it comes to the supreme test. The system is based upon the feudal spirit—upon the negation of the democratic ideal. In its turn, of course, it fosters that spirit in all who come within its influence.

But the question is legitimate: Could it be based upon any other spirit? Would it work on any other principle? It is not perfect. The finest cavalry that England ever produced—the cavalry of Cromwell—were held together by a very different bond. Again, a soldiery which contained all classes, as under Conscription, would refuse to submit to our present system; they would only accept military service on conditions of greater freedom, better chances, more connection between rulers and ruled. But when we consider the origin and upbringing of the private soldier as he is, we may well doubt whether any freer system would be workable. He belongs to a class in which snobbery is deeply implanted. He looks up to wealth. He admires "gentlemanly" conduct far more than efficiency. He thinks less of the officer who has risen from the ranks—less, for example, of the Riding-Master and the Quartermaster—than of the cheery, sporting young men who take to their position of command with such ease and confidence. He accepts his position. He has not learned to substitute the discipline which is self-imposed for the discipline which is drummed into him from without. Other men, other manners. Meantime, the Army works, and works astonishingly well.

The Drama.

TWO KING LEARS.

What standpoint is one to adopt in estimating Mr. Herbert Trench's production of "King Lear" at the Haymarket? Ought it to be criticised as a long-run performance, or as a repertory performance? The ambiguous nature of his enterprise leaves us in doubt. Perhaps we may take it that Mr. Trench is a theatrical aviator who seeks to give his machine a good long run on the solid earth, before he soars into a precarious and untried element.

"But what can it matter," you may say, "whether the Haymarket is a long-run or a repertory theatre? If the performance is good it is good, if bad, bad; and Mr. Trench's intentions have nothing to do with the question." Not so! A great deal depends upon the point of view from which the performance is to be regarded. The manager of a repertory theatre is permitted, and even bound, to make experiments with imperfect material; whereas there is no reason why a long-run manager should attempt anything he cannot thoroughly achieve. A performance which is only one incident in a large artistic campaign may interest us by reason of its very imperfections; but a performance which stands alone, on which the whole resources of the theatre are concentrated, must be judged, so to speak, by an absolute standard. A repertory manager, desiring, and rightly desiring, to present as much Shakespeare as possible, must inevitably be content to give us intelligent approximations to this character and that, since it is manifest that no company could ever be assembled which could fill to perfection all the vast range of Shakespearean characters. A long-run manager, on the other hand, has no reasonable ground for choosing any particular play of Shakespeare, except the belief that he can fill all the leading parts in it, if not to perfection, at any rate with very high excellence.

Applying these principles to the case in point, we may say that a repertory manager, who is bound to do "King Lear" some time, shows courage and enterprise in tackling that giant problem early in his career, and making what he can of it with the resources at his command; whereas a long-run manager has no excuse for selecting that play, of all others, unless it be that he can lay his hand on a Lear of genius. This was clearly not Mr. Trench's case. Mr. Norman McKinnell is a most valuable actor, to whom we are indebted for much excellent work; but his qualities, with the exception of his fine voice, are precisely those which do him least service in Lear. What is the first characteristic that everyone associates with Mr. McKinnell? Is it not a dour, massive immobility? And what is the first requisite for Lear if not high-strung, hysterical mobility, instability, effervescence and ebullience? In the opening scene, where Lear is only the choleric, overbearing egoist, Mr. McKinnell was strong and impressive; but the moment we reached the point where the thing to be indicated is weakness, the creeping paralysis of moral and intellectual control, the actor ceased to do anything more than give a forcible reading of the lines—there was an end of physical and pathological impersonation. We ought to see the tempest in Lear's soul, shaking and racking his enfeebled and senile frame; whereas Mr. McKinnell was to the end a strong man, irritated and badgered, but never near the last extremity of agonised impotence. He was never really mad; the glint of insanity was never in his eye; the sallies of his frenzy seemed didactically ironic, and thus lost their harrowing pathos. His rock-hewn temperament proved itself incapable of putting on the flexibility, the spontaneity, the volcanic and yet tremulous impetuosity required for the part. It was Ben Nevis pretending to be Etna.

This is merely to say that Lear is the most tremendous and overwhelming part in the world's drama, and that Mr. McKinnell is not a tragic genius of the first order. His very intelligent rendering of the part would be acceptable enough as one of a series of Shakespearean studies; but it is not an achievement of high individual distinction. And "King Lear," more than any other of the great tragedies, is dependent on its central figure; for it cannot be said that the story is in itself theatrically effective, or that the subordinate characters are specially interesting. If we are not deeply moved by the great protagonist, we are apt to feel that this raw, grey world of monstrous barbarity and crime has been somewhat gratuitously evoked for our physical and spiritual discomfort.

A more touching and poetic Cordelia than Miss Ellen O'Malley could scarcely have been desired, and Miss Ada Ferrar and Miss Marie Polini made effective figures of Goneril and Regan respectively, though Miss Polini's diction was not always very clear. Mr. James Hearn's Gloucester was an admirable performance, and Mr. C. V. France, though in the first act a little too cutting in his tones, was on the whole a very good Kent. Mr. Dawson Milward, a capital actor, was scarcely suited for the part of Edmund, which Mr. McKinnell, by the way, was born to play. Mr. Charles Quartermain, as Edgar, improved as he went on: in the first scene his nervous, excitable manner conspired with an unfortunate dress to render him curiously unlike the part. Mr. Fisher White's Cornwall was strikingly picturesque, and Mr. Kenyon Musgrave was good as Albany. In the part of the Fool, Mr. Hignett had an impossible task imposed on him. When Macready, with many misgivings, restored the Fool to the acted text, he assigned the part to a woman, Miss Priscilla Horton. I would not have Mr. Trench do likewise, for women in male parts are always unillusive; but Macready's casting pointed in the right direction. The Fool should be a fragile, hectic stripling, a delicate and sensitive organism with a fevered rather than a frenzied brain. All Mr. Hignett's ability would not transmute him into such a personage. His fooling was heavy and frigid, and he was further handicapped by having to speak and sing many lines which could convey no sort of meaning to the generality of the audience. At risk of being denounced by the Shakespearean whole-hoggers, I hereby declare my fixed opinion that, in such a part as this, lines which cannot be understood without half-an-acre of commentary, should be resolutely cut—to say nothing of lines which are almost certainly interpolations of the clowns whom Shakespeare himself reproved. For the beauty and originality of Mr. Charles Ricketts's scenery there can be nothing but praise. One only wishes that Mr. Trench had had the strength of mind to revert to front scenes, and so get rid of the deplorable modern habit of dropping the curtain and making a long pause in the action at every change of place.

I gather from the daily papers that Mr. Alfred Sutro's "King Lear," otherwise known as "Making a Gentleman," was not a great first-night success. On the second night, when I saw it, the audience seemed to like it hugely; and, for my part, I can see no reason why it should not be popular. Its faults, or rather its limitations, are precisely of a sort to strike the disillusioned and would-be intellectual first-night audience; whereas its merits are eminently calculated to appeal to the wide middle stratum of the public, which cares neither for bitter realism on the one hand, nor, on the other hand, for poisonous twaddle, vended under the Lord Chamberlain's licence. I myself belong to the would-be intellectuals, and find "Making a Gentleman" a little too superficial and sentimental to stir my enthusiasm: yet I recognise and enjoy in it many excellent qualities—wit, vivacity, lightness of touch, scenic instinct, and honest human feeling.

The tale is soon told. A highly successful pickle manufacturer, who has married a woman of higher social standing, and lost her after a brief period of married happiness, adores the two children she has brought him, and devotes himself to making a gentleman and lady of them. He succeeds in making the son a good-natured but flippant and inefficient man-about-town; while the daughter, a heartless minx, marries a brainless booby who happens to be heir to a title. Having divested himself of much of his property for his children's benefit, the luckless Sam Carey loses the rest in speculation. He has just enough left to set up in business again, if only his son will join him; and at first the young man consents to do so. The father is overjoyed; he blesses the disaster which seems to have restored to him a son he had practically lost. But the young man's resolution presently wavers; and, acting under his sister's influence, he determines, instead of accompanying his father to Canada, to marry a very rich woman with a tarnished past. The father regards this union as a degradation, and turns his back on his thankless children, to start life afresh in company with a Cordelia who is his daughter only by adoption.

Now, this is far from a bad subject. Shakespeare, Balzac and Turguenev have encouraged a superstition that filial callousness is peculiar to daughters; but, as a matter of fact, there is ample material for poignant drama in the relation of a father to an estranged and unsympathetic son. In order to do justice to his theme, however, Mr. Sutro ought to have made the issue between father and son quite clear and trenchant. Either the son's marriage ought to have been unmistakably mercenary and degrading, or we ought to have been made to feel that the son was, in this instance, right, the father's objections to his marriage being conventional and egoistic, based upon his eagerness to undo the work of education, and remake the young man in his own image. Mr. Sutro has chosen neither of these alternatives; or rather he has chosen the latter alternative, and made old Carey act as though he had chosen the former. The Baroness von Ritzen, with her £20,000 a year, is an extremely charming, refined, and high-principled person, far too good for such a feather-brained young loafer as Archie Carey. The story of her past is never revealed to us, but we utterly decline to believe that it can have been anything unpardonable. Consequently Sam Carey's resolute adoption of the attitude of M. Duval towards Marguerite Gautier seems, so far as we can judge, wholly wrong-headed. We can sympathise neither with him nor with Archie, since neither of them takes the only rational course of inquiring whether the Baroness is really, or only conventionally, a tainted woman. By making her a thorough "bad lot," Mr. Sutro might have brought his play to a bitterly powerful close. Since he eschewed that course, his only logical alternative was to bring the Baroness on in the last act, and make her prove to old Carey, as she easily might, that his opposition to his son's marriage was nothing but egoism under the unpleasing mask of pharisaic conventionality. Carey is man enough to realise this; and the realisation would have brought the play to a satisfactory if not a wholly happy ending.

Miss Ethel Irving's exquisite and most winning performance of the Baroness, while it may probably make the fortune of the play, helps to emphasise the indecision of the author's design. Miss Irving has one fault—she plays too much with the furniture. Otherwise the sincerity and beauty of her performance are beyond praise. A very able character-study—by far the best in the play—is that of the incorrigible Rosie, cleverly acted by Miss Muriel Beaumont; but the kissing incident in the second act is overdone, and might well be omitted. Mr. Bourchier is never credible to me in such parts as Sam Carey, but he undoubtedly holds and moves his audiences. Mr. Kenneth Douglas is excellent as Archie, and Mr. Edmund Maurice is good in the purely conventional part of Lord Parkhurst—by far the worst in the play. Miss Agnes Thomas and Miss Athene Seyler do valuable service in minor parts.

THE GORRINGE CASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Sympathy with Mr. Gorringe or the Duke may be, as Mr. Clegg suggests, somewhat beside the question. But the one criticism of the Limehouse speech, so far as I have heard, has related simply to the taste shown, and that on the strength of the one word, "blackmail." Mr. Clegg's case of 1,000 bushels of wheat is not at all parallel. It concerns two men equally free, and neither of them favored by a one-sided law.

The important letter from Mr. John Lewis which you published last week indicates that Mr. Lloyd-George knew the facts of the Gorringe case and did not choose his language hastily. "The Duke was entitled to resume possession of his property: he had fulfilled his part of the bargain," says Mr. Clegg, and it sounds very simple and logical. His property was the land to which he was entitled by law and the buildings which by law passed to him because they had been put upon his land.

Mr. Gorringe also had a property recognised by law, and known as goodwill depending upon reputation. The enjoyment of that goodwill and reputation depended, however, on his remaining in the place where it had been built up. It may be admitted that for other reasons the land had become somewhat more valuable than at the inception of the lease. The buildings belonged to the Duke, though he did nothing towards putting them there. We have grown accustomed to that sort of "justice." But what of the goodwill?

When a man enjoys the reputation of respectability he regards the reputation as valuable. Suppose, however, that some secret of his origin or history would, if generally known, damage that reputation or his enjoyment of it. It may be something to which he attaches exaggerated importance, or owing to no fault of his own; something his father did or failed to do. Possibly a full statement of the facts would clear his reputation. The secret is closely kept, however, and the respectable man enjoys his reputation to the full, until one man who knows the secret threatens to tell abroad certain bald, indisputable facts which will destroy the reputation. He has a legal right to tell them. If they involve no real disgrace, or are capable of justification, the respectable man is free to follow up the other's statements with due explanation. He thinks it cheaper and easier to pay the man to hold his tongue. We call that blackmail, having no other word for it. The blackmailer does not even attempt to steal anything for his own use. He only refrains from exercising his legal right, and gets paid for refraining.

From Mr. Lewis's letter the only possible inference is that Mr. Gorringe knew he could only enjoy the goodwill of his own business, depending on the commercial reputation he had himself built up, by the consent of the Duke of Westminster. And he found he had to pay for that consent. The Duke could not have enjoyed the reputation or goodwill himself. But he could have prevented Mr. Gorringe from doing so. He had only to exercise his legal rights. He was willing to refrain on being paid for it, and on the whole Mr. Gorringe preferred to pay him for refraining.

Mr. Clegg does not raise the question of taste, but he alleges a simplicity in the transaction which did not exist. Mr. Gorringe had to pay for consent to enjoy something which was essentially his own, besides the market value of the land and buildings which the law concedes to the Duke. How often it occurs that a landowner insists on terms dictated by his knowledge of the leaseholder's inability to remove the particular business he has built up. Sometimes he over-estimates the leaseholder's willingness to pay for his own, and the result is seen in derelict works or abandoned businesses. The real value of the land arising from general demand is then seen to have been comparatively small, and the larger claim to have been based on the special requirements of a particular tenant's circumstances. Mr. Clegg must know at least one such case on a large scale within ten miles of Sheffield.

The increment tax is not going to cure this facility for levying "blackmail." As Mr. Clegg points out, it merely gives the Government a fifth of the "blackmail." But when the undeveloped land tax, so called, is extended, as all real land reformers desire, lessors will be glad to enfranchise their leaseholders on terms of perpetual chief rent which will cure this glaring injustice. Mere tampering with terms of tenancy, such as Mr. Lewis hints at, cannot be contrived to cure it. The remedy lies with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the more unflinching he is the more sweeping and certain will be his victory.—Yours, &c.,

F. U. Laycock.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Surely Mr. Clegg must admit that at the expiry of the lease taken from the Duke of Westminster by Messrs. Gorringe there were inextricably mixed a property belonging to the Duke and a property (viz., the goodwill of the drapery business) belonging to Messrs. Gorringe. If Irish landlords are restrained by law from appropriating their tenants' property, why not landlords in this country? In a similar case on the Westminster estate some years since the tenant, a chemist, obtained a satisfactory settlement, thanks principally to the now defunct "Echo" newspaper. The Duke's agents, after arguing as to their rights in the same manner as Mr. Clegg is doing, more or less ungracefully surrendered to the claims of justice. These pleas for the strict carrying out of one-sided contracts remind me that "Punch" once said some people's notions were that contract of freedom was freedom of contract. Mr. Clegg asks if Messrs. Gorringe had obtained a lease at a reduced rent, would they have been blackmailing the Duke? Unquestionably yes; had they been in a position to have enforced their terms against the Duke's will.

I cannot, however, see anything in the Budget that will better the position of persons in the position of Messrs. Gorringe. That can only come by legislation.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. Marriott.

THE UNEARNED INCREMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Lord Rosebery's speech the other day in Glasgow has at least served one purpose. It has been educational. It is astounding how little educated people turn their minds to politics.

The other day, after the speech, I travelled with two educated, ordinary business men. They seemed to be not strongly party men on either side. Both of them united in condemning Lord Rosebery. Not, however, as you might have supposed, for his opposition to the Budget, though both approved of the land clauses in it, and of its general scope. Their opposition came from other grounds. They thought Lord Rosebery was mad.

To my inquiries why they thought the Pia Mater of his lordship's learning was over or under-heated, the one replied: "I've always pinned my faith on Rossberry. A grand speaker, Rossberry." "Yes," said the other, "and a man of property. My God, McInnes, I never thought to hear him talk such washy sort of stuff as yesterday."

I was still surprised, hoping against hope that they had misjudged the case, for no one possibly could have been so businesslike as either looked, when once again McInnes took up his parable. "Yes, aye, that is so, I'm a good Leeberal, and in conseederable sympathy with the Land Restoration League . . . that is, I used to be; but nonsense I canna' stand. To think of what a bagful of perneecious nonsense Rossberry talked in the City Hall"—Campbell broke in, "aye, Rossberry's a fluent speaker, never makes a snant." I pricked up my ears, and the hard-bitten Mac went on. "The unearned increment, just so. It's a fair scandal all Scotland should be owned by sixteen, or is it sixty, lords. I mind, too, the other day I was at Malling, and thought I'd go and take some photographs, over on a bit island, just opposite the place. Man, I could no get landing; a pairfect army of gamekeepers just stood me off. I say, the whole community impairted the value to the land, and it is only just that what a man has worked for, should be taxed and the proceeds be used for all. But Rossberry just says, the unearned increment does no' stop there. He says it just as well applies to every kind of wealth the community creates. Campbell, do you take the nod?" To do him justice, Mr. Campbell was quick enough at what we call the "uptak," and cut in at once, becoming much more Doric in his excitement. "Dod aye, I see the point. Why, losh me, what about a wee bit investment of my own in a thread company, if it comes to that? Ye ken the £1 shares are now worth £8, and some folk say the dividends range to seventy, eighty, or eighty-five per cent. Where would I be if unearned increment were taxed? . . . Lord Rossberry's fair mad, I'm tellin' ye." Then it seemed to me that thread is one of the greatest monopolies of modern life. Right to the furthest Hebridean Isles; in all the slums of the great towns, in English cottages, every old woman pays too much for her thread, on account of this monopoly. I saw a smaller firm (in my mind's eye, Mr. Editor) propose to start, let us say, in Paisley, to make thread. I saw their struggles, and, at last, imagined that they had received an order—let us say, from France. Then I beheld myself a managing director of the monopoly, and instantly saw what I should do. To send an ultimatum to the intruding thread-maker was (in my new capacity) the work but of the twinkling of an eye. I wrote at once, ordering the acceptance of the French order to be cancelled under pain of our company starting some works in Paisley to crush the interlopers out. Still in my new-found character, I opened next morning a humble letter from the offending firm, saying they had reconsidered the French order and found it would not pay.

Then I fell off into a doze till the train stopped and a voice said: "This ull be the Troon," and to it one of my fellow-travellers answered, "Aye, Troon. . . . Rossberry's mad, I tell ye . . . let them tax land, that's naitural; but tax the unearned increment all round, God, fair dementia. . . . Weel, I bid ye a good-night."

They got out of the train and stood, two sturdy, ivory-whiskered figures, in the rain, holding their black and shiny paper bags, one in his teeth, the other hooked on his little finger, as they turned up the collars of their coats. I fell a-wondering whether, if Mr. Lloyd-George should venture to lay a sacrilegious Celtic fist upon some of the great monopolies in which we all invest our money and receive dividends, made by the toil of the community, without an effort of our own, what would the directors of the great monopoly do to meet the difficulty? I saw at once that they would laugh at him and say, "All right, tax us, and we shut all mills, and then restart them in, let us say, Korea, and where now your reel of cotton costs you twopence, it shall be sixpence, and how will you like that?"

The unearned increment is wealth made by the effort and the presence of the whole community, not only on the land, but in respect to any industry in which some work and others hold the shares. Let Mr. Lloyd-George take heart of grace. By his democratic Budget he has shown the way for future Chancellors to derive an income far, far beyond the dreams of avarice, for every industry throughout the land, if it gives dividends, can only show them through the work of the community.

As for displacement of the capital employed, in the case that I have cited, the resources of civilisation, as Mr. Gladstone said, are not exhausted, and Mr. Lloyd-George would have the people at his back, if he desired to bring them into play.—Yours, &c.,

R. B. Cunninghame Graham.

AN EXPERIMENT IN RURAL HOUSING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have read with interest the correspondence you have recently published with reference to cottages in rural districts, and as the same problems your correspondents mention have faced us in this parish, you may like to hear of the experiment we have tried to remedy some of the evil.

This is a south coast village of about 1,000 inhabitants, a small proportion of whom are fortunate enough to live in good houses, well lighted and ventilated, with every modern convenience that makes for domestic comfort, and good gardens for their pleasure and profit; but the rest of the inhabitants are huddled together in poor little cottages, many of them at least 200 years old, built often back to back, with tiny windows that barely open, bad roofs, crumbly walls, floors often below the level of the street, not one large bath amongst them all, the sanitary arrangements insufficient and barely decent, some with wretched little backyards, some without; in these cramped homes the majority of the population grow up strumous and readily exposed to the germs of diseases that can only be resisted by abundance of light, fresh air, and ventilation. All round the village there are acres and acres of land suitable for building, now let at a low agricultural rent, but held up in the hope that the place will some day become a residential district and large prices will be obtained for freehold building sites.

The rights of ownership are shared by two landlords. Some years ago we asked one of them, who owns the most suitable building land near the village, for an acre or two for the purpose of erecting working-men's cottages. Our proposal was met with scorn; we were told the land was too valuable as prospective sites for houses of a more ambitious kind—the present cottages were good enough—if we must have cottages there was land available about half-a-mile beyond the village, a position out of reach of such conveniences as drainage or artificial light, and too far for the men to go backwards and forwards from their work. So matters stood for some while, till last year we learnt that the lease of a very conveniently situated piece of land would shortly fall in: this was the property of the second landlord, to whom we represented the village needs and the suitability of this land for cottages. We were met in a most considerate and generous spirit, the various difficulties that arose were speedily overcome, and before long about one acre of land, divided into ten freehold plots, was offered for sale, the conditions being that the ten purchasers must be bonâ fide working-men resident in the parish who would, within twelve months, build their cottages for their own occupation, the plans being first approved by the vendor. There was no difficulty in finding ten eager purchasers, and in helping them to make the necessary financial arrangements: some had saved the necessary money, or were helped to find it by friends, others had most of the required amount advanced by their various employers on mortgage at a low rate of interest to be repaid by annual instalments, the balance being made up from their own savings. One set of plans was prepared and adopted by all: the cottages were quickly erected in pairs at a total cost, including the freehold of the land, costs of conveyance, builders' charges and share of laying a common sewer, of £285 per cottage, some spending a little more on the extra convenience of a bath-room or enlarged wash-house. All ten cottages are now occupied by their proud owners to whom the interest and pleasure of building their own houses has been intense, and the small increase of rent they now pay in repayment of principal and interest, amounting to about one shilling and sixpence a week, is amply compensated by the advantages of the new home and garden, and the self-respect gained from the sense of ownership. Others, also, have reaped a benefit, for the ten cottages vacated have enabled some of the worse housed to move into better quarters

I do not see anything exceptional in the conditions of our village life to prevent the experiment being tried elsewhere. What is most needed is that one or two residents of some influence should set the scheme afloat by finding a possible site, negotiating with the landlord for a lease or sale, and then secure that the right kind of men are given the opportunity of building. There are in every community a number of industrious, thrifty working-men who have some money saved, or who can command the confidence of others willing to lend on sufficient security, but the difficulty is to get them to combine for their mutual advantage; this they will be ready enough to do when a definite scheme is put before them which they could not easily have evolved themselves. It is also important that the small tradesman or retired publican with a little capital should not be allowed to get hold of such sites: he is always very ready to grasp cottage property as an investment, but when he gets it he generally proves the worst possible landlord.—Yours, &c.,

THE SET-BACK TO WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE.

SIR,—The letter signed "S. A. B.," in your issue of September 11th, is representative, I think, of a fairly considerable body of opinion. And, because I believe that those who hold such opinion are in general reasonable and sincere, I hope that you will be able to grant me space for a brief examination of the points which that letter raises.

I may premise by saying that I write in no sense as representing the militant party of women suffragists. I am not an advocate of the limited Bill. But I seem to remember that the earlier demand of the forward suffragists was for a Government pledge to introduce or give facilities for a Women's Suffrage Bill. In all the history of mankind reasonable demands have not been wont to grow more reasonable by refusal, but less so.

Nor have I ever adopted any of the special methods of the militant party. But in this regard I have never deluded myself by the plea that I am too "womanly," but rather recognised that I am too selfish—too fearful of the separation (during probable periods of incarceration) from my two-year-old laddie. None the less do I honor those women who have braved what I have not—personal insults, privation, and who knows what of domestic anguish—in defence of the principles they whole-heartedly support.

As for "the broken word of honor," I have nothing but reprobation for it, whether found among women or men.

But, setting aside questions both of individual preferences and of individual lapses, the wider considerations raised by your correspondent's letter seem to me to show a curious misreading of the facts.

She speaks of the proved fitness of women for professional and public service, and says, "Their presence was welcomed on public bodies." True; yet how came it that some years back—distinctly before the militant party's activities had been initiated—so retrograde a step in legislation was taken as the exclusion of women from certain public bodies where formerly they had been eligible to sit? Your correspondent speaks of the hostility now exhibited towards women candidates by "the ordinary voter," who justifies his attitude by the remark that he is "sick of them rows at Westminster." Does it strike her as satisfactory that women should shape their policy towards the attainment of the Parliamentary franchise by the fact that their election or non-election to those public bodies where their presence is admittedly necessary is determined by an electorate of that mental calibre?

For forty and odd years women have sued of that electorate the bare justice of being accorded the status of full citizenship, and not classed with paupers and lunatics in regard to the exercise of one important function of citizens. What was the reply, time after time, and (for our present purpose) in particular that time when the first Women's Suffrage Bill of 1906 was introduced and impudently talked out—that occasion from which precisely dates the present militant movement?

"S. A. B." is wholly right in the considerations urged with force and feeling in her fourth paragraph: sex-rivalry, sex-antagonism, are "things which Nature forbids." Let her look a little deeper and see how this unnatural state of things has come to pass. With whom—men or women?—rests the responsibility for having initiated, perpetuated, and increasingly embittered this sex-antagonism and refused sex-co-operation on any terms of equality? That which your correspondent speaks of as "the faulty framework of society and law which men built up in a sort of one-eyed way, without reference to women," is one long record of a policy consistently directed to secure the dominance of men and the subservience of women. The one-eyed builders must at any rate have kept their solitary optic keenly fixed on that object, for they have achieved it with remarkable thoroughness. "Without reference to women," is a phrase which, I confess, puzzles me, for the legislation I have in mind had close reference to women and always to their disadvantage. Take but a few instances: the inequalities of the marriage law, the bastardy law, the infamous C.D. Acts (repealed mainly through the heroic exertions of a woman, the "unwomanly" Josephine Butler)—in whose interests were they framed? Would women be worthy of their sex if they did not antagonise against such things as these? Take again the legislative omissions, the national evils that cry to be remedied: is it contended that the large matters of intemperance, insanitary housing, contaminated milk supply, &c., would be now in their present condition if the sex most intimately and cruelly affected by them had had its rightful place in the counsels of the nation? True, indeed, is it that "the need for women's help became more and more obvious." Yet what steps have men taken to secure that help, to make what tardy reparation they can for the rotten structure resulting from their one-eyed performances?

No one, I think, "desires" to gain her right to vote "through such practices" as some of the violent methods adopted by the militant party, were other means practicable; but our desire to gain it peaceably has been flouted not once but times unnumbered; and it is not the least evil consequence of men's dogged obstinacy in the matter, that they are breeding against themselves in women of modesty and soul-refinement a bitter resentment for these odious methods which that obstinacy has rendered necessary.

The question "Who will desire the help of these militant women in the grave counsels of government?" is surely beside the mark. The qualities necessary and admirable in an attacking force are not always those most desirable in their successors upon whom devolves the work of administration in the newly-won territories. But it will ill become the enfranchised women of to-morrow to discredit and disown the militant section through whom, largely, their enfranchisement will have been won. Whether or not the help of these militant women will be desired in the grave counsels of government, that help is at any rate proving invaluable now in the attainment of a voice in those grave counsels for any women at all.

For, as tactics, the success of their methods has been emphatic. Where justice is withheld there is ancient warrant for the client to gain her suit by simply making herself a nuisance. Has your correspondent forgotten the case of a certain unjust judge and an importunate widow, cited not without approval by high authority? For very many years, supported by incontestable and "obvious" facts, women have paid men the compliment of assuming them to be, in general, reasonable beings amenable to methods of reasonable argument. Assured by countless painful experiences that they must be otherwise approached, some women have lately changed their methods accordingly. And the effect of their action during the past three years has, I venture to say, amply justified their course. The question of women's suffrage, so far from being set back, has been advanced during this time from the position of an academic thesis to that of one of the burning questions of the day. Those who are wise will see to it that it does not burn too long, lest in its consuming fires there be lost for many years to come the possibility of fruitful sex-co-operation after the vote has been secured.—Yours, &c.,

E. M. White.

[Would it not be wise for our correspondent to look upon the other side of the shield, and ask herself what men either of "soul-refinement," or of average common-place judgment on politics, think of such "methods" as those pursued against Mr. Asquith at Lympne, and how their view is likely to influence their attitude to women's suffrage?—Ed., Nation.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I have just seen Mrs. Brailsford's criticism of my letter in The Nation of a few weeks back, and should be very much obliged if you would kindly permit me to make a formal protest against her parody of my remarks. Parody, however, seems to be a well-used weapon in the suffragette armory. Its popularity may explain the quaintly distorted mental attitude these ladies assume. I say "assume," because no one believes them to be quite so foolish as they pretend to be.

For instance, when Mrs. Pankhurst elected herself Prime Minister and announced that a particular measure (absolutely unnoticed by the "other" Government at the General Election) was to be passed "this Session," she, in her anxiety to hustle things, unfortunately omitted to provide herself with the machinery necessary to carry out the work she had undertaken, and when the Government refused to adopt her, or her policy, she at once resolved to teach them their business.

No one knew, or knows, better than the suffragette leaders that a successful attempt to force the woman's vote question to the front at all costs would shatter the Government. Here, then, was the opportunity for revenge ready to hand, and "Keep the Liberal out" became the war cry of the extremists.

Of course, if the suffragettes really believed that this policy would help their cause no one would blame them for doing all they knew to make it effective. It is certainly a popular cry, at any rate in the City and West End of London, though, personally, I have very little doubt that as it was born immediately after the Liberals came into power, it is not quite so disinterested as many of the wealthy suffragettes would have us believe, and it may even have a distinct value with such, independent of any question of the vote at all. The Liberal men and women, however, are not quite so stupid as the suffragette ladies would make them out. They see that after years of work the ideals of a lifetime begin to look like realisation, and now their only fear is not that the suffragettes will fight against them—that they can bear—but that they may pretend to fight on their side and that would, indeed, for a generation at least, "keep the Liberal out."—Yours, &c.,

Wm. S. Campbell.

Sir,—I wish to thank you for the letter which appeared over the initials "S. A. B." in your issue of last week. It is a cogent piece of writing that will be endorsed by many who have been favorable to the movement for the enfranchisement of women.

I can, out of a somewhat wide experience, endorse your correspondent's opinion that "it is idle to blink the fact that the tide has, for the time, set strongly against women's suffrage among women as well as men," and that the ebb is owing to the militants' deplorable proceedings.

"S. A. B." says, "during these last four years it has seemed to some of us best to abstain from words, even good words." But why? Has she, then, come at last to realise that this studied silence has been not merely a failure to respond to one's best instincts but also a tactical blunder?

Many of us have felt regret throughout this sorry business that the Constitutional suffragists, instead of persistently and emphatically showing their disapproval of the "passionate unreason" of the militants, have deliberately declined to find fault with their degrading and even brutal tactics—I hesitate to use the latter epithet, but we have it from some of these women that, in throwing iron balls through glass windows into a crowded meeting, they fully realised beforehand that they would endanger the lives of women and men.

The "silence" of the Constitutional suffragists has "given consent" to the party of violence and disorder, and therefore the former cannot escape their full share of blame for the set-back to women's suffrage.

But some of the lost ground might be regained if "S. A. B." and her friends would henceforth make it a feature in their propaganda to condemn, in adequate terms, the senseless proceedings of certain women who, if the enfranchisement of women had been their single aim, would ere this have candidly admitted that they realised the suicidal effect of their tactics.—Yours, &c.,

THE HAYMARKET LEAR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I witnessed the performance of "King Lear" last night, and would suggest a point or two, which, seemingly trivial, has yet its bearing upon the modern dramatic realisation of Shakespeare. It is necessary, under the stress of the stage appliances and contrivances of to-day, to concentrate the dramatic interest pre-eminently upon the development of the character of Lear himself. The imaginative illusion of vastness of suggestion cannot be conveyed, but the psychological interest of what Professor Dowden calls the "purification" of King Lear offers in its gradations a dramatic intensity almost as highly pitched as the last acts in "Othello." Why, then, in Mr. Trench's presentment is there omitted that soliloquy of the King's before the hovel—Act III., sc. IV.:—

> "Poor naked wretches, wheresoe'er you are,
> That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
> How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,
> Your loop'd and window'd raggedness, defend you
> From seasons such as these? O, I have ta'en
> Too little care of this! Take physic, pomp;
> Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel,
> That thou mayst shake the superflux to them,
> And show the heavens more just."

This marks a fundamental crisis in the weaning of the old king from self-absorption to absorption in his kind—a transition from the particular kindliness to the fool, which comes just before, to a humanity universal in its application. Professor Bradley has pointed out that the insanity of Lear is such as "to stimulate that power of moral perception and reflection which has been already quickened by his sufferings." The character of the play is parallel to and woven with the spiritual regeneration. How, then, can the passage quoted above be said to negative the dramatic advance, which is the sole excuse for expurgation? One last point. Why must the pathos of the agony and death of Lear be dissipated by the rising of the curtain after the play is over—to show us a resurrected and self-satisfied King bowing to the plaudits of the audience? May not illusion be given some rein by an enlightened stage-manager?—Yours, &c.,

IF THE LORDS REJECT THE BUDGET?

Sir,—Do let us have some clear thinking in view of the great constitutional crisis before us—a crisis the like of which the country has not experienced since Cromwell's time. The question everyone is asking is, What will the Government do if the Lords reject or mutilate the Budget? There are three alternatives.

First—an appeal to the country. This, to my mind, would be simply playing into the hands of the Lords. Supposing the Liberal Party returned to power again with another large majority, what then? The best part of the first Session of the new Parliament would be wasted in driving the Finance Bill once more through the House of Commons, and the Lords would then gracefully bow to the "will of the people." But so far as pulling the teeth of the House of Lords is concerned, we should be just where we were. We should have done absolutely nothing to put an end to their veto, and to make the House of Commons supreme. The Lords would still have the power to bring the machinery of legislation to a standstill and to force a dissolution when they liked.

In the more likely event, however, of the General Election resulting in the return of the Liberals to power by a reduced majority, perhaps more or less dependent on the Irish vote, the position would be infinitely worse. It would be much more difficult to force the Budget through the House of Commons against an opposition reinforced and strengthened by partial success at the polls. Then, when it reached the Lords, is it not possible that they might reject it once more? The last position of the Commons would then be worse than the first. Surely it is evident to all that it would be the height of folly for the Government to dissolve in the event of the Lords rejecting the Bill.

The second alternative is for the Government to resign. This might be heroic, but it would not be war. It would be suicide. Mr. Balfour would jump at the chance of taking office. He would at once borrow the £50,000,000 or so, required for the current year's expenditure, and would then go to the country with the enormous advantage of being in office, if not in power. We have only to remember what a great advantage this gave Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman in 1905 to reject this alternative at once.

The third alternative is to answer revolution by counter-revolution. On the rejection of the Budget by the Lords let the House of Commons pass a resolution setting forth the unconstitutional act of the Lords in throwing down one of the main pillars of the Constitution, viz., the unfettered control of the Commons over the National Purse, and calling upon the King to come to the rescue of the Constitution by giving his consent to the Bill over the heads of the Lords, or by creating a sufficient number of new peers to pass the Bill through the House of Lords at the second time of asking.

The King, if he is wise, would accept one or other of these alternatives in order to save the country from revolution. If, on the contrary, he should refuse, he will only have himself to blame if his place in the Constitution, as well as that of the Lords, is thrown into the melting-pot.

The point I wish to emphasise is that such an unprecedented and unconstitutional act as the rejection of the Budget by the Lords can only be met in an unprecedented and unconstitutional way. Let the Government stick to power whatever happens until they have once for all abolished the veto of the Lords. If the Lords act in a revolutionary manner, the Government and the Commons must not be afraid to take up the gauntlet. They will have at their back the most enthusiastic support of the great mass of the people. The country is ripe for revolutionary methods of dealing with the Lords. It is sick of "ploughing the sands," and is prepared to go to extremes in order to lop off from the Constitution a mischievous anachronism which has been permitted far too long, and can never be got rid of by rose-water methods.—Yours, &c.,

AN OLD HOUSE.

In fancy I can see thee stand
Again in the green meadow land;
As in thine infancy, long past,
When Southwark was a lovely waste;
And larks and blackbirds sang around,
As common as their children found
So far away in these late days.
And thou didst like a lighthouse raise
Thy windows, that their light could show
Across the broad, green calm below;
And there were trees, beneath whose boughs
Stood happy horses, sheep, and cows.
From thy back windows thou couldst see,
Half-way between St. Paul's and thee,
Swans with their shadows, and the barge
Of State old Thames took in his charge.
Ah, wert thou now what thou wert then,
There were no need to fly from men.
Instead of those green meadows, now
Three hundred hungry children show
Rags and white faces at thy door
For charity. We see no more
Green lanes, but alleys dark instead;
Where none can walk but fear to tread
On babes that crawl in dirt and slime.
And from thy windows, at this time,
Thou canst not see ten yards beyond,
For the high blocks that stand around;
Buildings that ofttimes only give
One room in which five souls must live,
With but one window for their air.
Foul art thou now with lives of care,
For hungry children and men poor
Seek food and lodging at thy door.
Thou that didst hear, in thy first hours,
Birds sing, and saw the sweet wild flowers.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

AMONG the papers left by George Meredith were several poems, some of which will appear in the volume already announced by Messrs. Constable. Of even greater interest is the fact that a large portion of an unfinished novel, "Celt and Saxon," is likely to be published this autumn. "Celt and Saxon" is a work on which Mr. Meredith was engaged on and off for many years, and we have reason to believe that the portion he had completed is quite as long as an ordinary novel.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON has been engaged during the past year upon a book of considerable length which is to contain his "last words." The work is now almost completed, but no decision has as yet been made as to the time of publication. Mr. Harrison's seventy-eighth birthday occurs within a week or so; and the anniversary will be interesting to the admirers of the most stalwart and athletic of English intellectuals.

FATHER FOUQUERAY, of the Society of Jesus, is engaged upon a comprehensive history of the French Jesuits from the first organisation of the Society to its expulsion from France through the influence of Choiseul in 1762. The work is to be semi-authoritative, and the Jesuit archives have been placed at Father Fouqueray's disposal. The first volume will be issued towards the end of the year.

A CHEERING announcement is that next month we are to have a new collection of essays by Mr. Max Beerbohm. Although "Max's" journalism is as witty and entertaining as ever, he has for several years allowed Mr. Shaw and Mr. Chesterton to monopolise the field of paradox as far at least as books are concerned. "The Works of Max Beerbohm" and "More" are proofs that his criticism, with its very delicate form, is well worth a more permanent fame than weekly journalism usually secures, and the coming volume will be looked for with interest. The essays it contains are not dramatic criticisms, as may be judged from some of their titles—"The Fire," "On Seeing People Off," "Porro Unum," "Memories of a Midnight Express," "The Decline of the Grace," and "Whistler's Writing."

AMONG Mr. Edward Arnold's announcements is a volume of reminiscences, to be called "Memories of Fifty Years," by Lady St. Heliers. The book promises to be of special interest, for Lady St. Heliers—who will, perhaps, be more widely recognised under her former title of Lady Jeune—is one of the few Englishwomen endowed with the qualities necessary for the management of that peculiarly French institution, the salon. During the last thirty years of the nineteenth century her house in Harley Street was visited by the most distinguished representatives of the worlds of politics, law, literature, art, and science, and her receptions had a fame that was international. Her memories of the many famous people she knew can hardly fail to make one of the most agreeable books of the season.

THE same publisher has in preparation a memoir by Mr. E. T. Cook of the late Edmund Garrett, at one time his colleague on the staff of the "Pall Mall Gazette," and later editor of the "Cape Times." Mr. Garrett was a brilliant journalist whose support of the policy that led to the Jameson Raid and, later on, to the South African War had some weight in determining the course of world-politics. His style was vivid and nervous, with signs of distinction that appeared in his admirable translation of Ibsen's "Brand," and suggested the interesting and original personality that inspired it. Ill health dogged his career, but as it led him to South Africa it may be said to have been responsible for the most exciting passage in it. Mr. Garrett lacked a thoroughly balanced mind, but he had a fine and charming character, and many must have regretted his association with such an enterprise as the Raid, and the views of the South African policy which it suggested. We may expect some fresh information in regard to the course of events preceding the war from Mr. Cook's volume.

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON'S introductions to Dickens's novels in the "Everyman Library" have been collected into a single volume and, together with some fresh material including an "Introduction to Introductions," will be issued during the season by Messrs. Dent. The essays are fresh and suggestive, and the book is likely to prove an entertaining approach to the study of English social life as seen by Dickens.

* * *

IN "The Return of Louis XVIII.," by M. Gilbert Stenger, an English translation of which is to be issued by Mr. Heinemann next week, we are given a picture, based on contemporary memoirs, letters, and journals, of the entry of the Bourbon family into Paris in the wake of the victorious allies. M. Stenger's purpose has been to paint the Bourbons "loyally, but pitilessly," and his book contains a fresh and informing account of the events that led to their definite overthrow in 1848. He writes with indulgence of Louis XVIII., whose sense of humor he believes to have delayed the final catastrophe. Another book treating of the same period is "The Bourbon Restoration," by Major John Hall. It will be published by Messrs. Alston Rivers, who hope to have it ready early in October.

IN the current number of "La Revue Historique," Mr. Andrew Lang's "Maid of France" is reviewed in an article entitled "Encore un historien de Jeanne d'Arc," by M. Esmein of the Institute. "The dominant impression produced by Mr. Lang's story," writes the French critic, "is that he feels for the Maid the same passionate admiration which Carlyle felt for Cromwell, when he edited his 'Letters and Speeches.' Mr. Lang's adoration of Jeanne d'Arc causes him to hate her enemies with a fierce hatred, and among her enemies he includes not only those who were her contemporaries, but some in our own day, notably M. Anatole France, whom he regards as her detractors." M. Esmein then proceeds to discuss certain inconsistencies in Mr. Lang's book. He disagrees with him on the questions of Joan's military genius, her position in the French army, and the nature of her visions.

MR. E. D. MOREL, who has taken a leading part in the efforts to put an end to the cruelties and misgovernment in the Congo, has written a book upon the subject, "Great Britain and the Congo," which will be issued early in October by Messrs. Smith, Elder. Besides an examination of the position taken up by the Foreign Office in regard to the question, and a clear statement of the moral issue involved, the book also contains chapters on the attitude of Germany and France.

* * *

A VOLUME of memoirs, by Madame Charles de Bunsen, entitled "In Three Legations: Tunis, Florence, The Hague, 1856-1872," is to be published shortly by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Among those mentioned in the book are the Emperor Frederick of Germany, Queen Margherita of Italy, Cavour, and Bismarck, and fresh information about the inside history of the unification of Italy and of the Franco-German war is promised.

SHELLEY'S LETTERS.*

Mr. Roger Ingpen has accomplished a difficult, but doubtless also a delightful, task. The letters which he has brought together and placed in chronological order lay scattered in many quarters wide apart, in printed books, in journals, in manuscript. Much, indeed, had been done by his predecessors, by Mary Shelley, Mr. Buxton Forman, Mr. Wise, Mr. Bertram Dobell, and others. But nothing so nearly approaching completeness as these volumes has hitherto appeared. Absolute completeness, indeed, is not and could not at present be attained. But any additions which time may bring to light are likely to be no more than something of the nature of a supplement to this collection, which fills nearly a thousand pages. The letters here given number about 480, "considerably more than three times as many," declares the editor, "as have appeared in any one previous collection." Of these, thirty-eight letters, he adds, are printed for the first time, and upwards of fifty contain hitherto unpublished matter. Mr. Ingpen's notes are valuable elucidations of the letters, full of information, always to the point, and not erring through excess of number or of length. Here and there, no doubt, some slight inaccuracy may be detected, but Mr. Ingpen is an alert, intelligent, and careful craftsman. The illustrations number over forty, and add materially to the attraction and value of the book. Short notices of Shelley's various correspondents are prefixed, and the volumes possess the advantage of a copious index. We congratulate the editor and his readers.

For a newcomer to Shelley's poems it is rather a misfortune that he should possess a complete edition arranged in chronological order. If of a dutiful, submissive disposition, he is likely to begin at the beginning and falter upon the way which leads towards the true Shelley—the author of "Prometheus" and the "Ode to the West Wind." He ought to start with the poems written in Italy, and, having read these, work his way backwards to the Juvenilia. The origins become interesting when we know that which developed from them. Advice of a like kind might be given to one who comes for the first time to Shelley's letters. He might prepare himself for Mr. Ingpen's volumes by reading Garnett's charming little volume of selections published long since in the Parchment Library. Or, with Mr. Ingpen's collection in his hands, he might commence at p. 591, with the letter addressed from Milan to Peacock in April, 1818, and having read to the end, he might return to the earlier years. Of the fifty-three letters given by Garnett, whose taste and judgment in Shelleyan matters were almost infallible, only nine are of an earlier date than the letter from Milan just referred to, though in many instances, in order to include the best, delightful things were necessarily omitted. Much of the development of a man's mind lies in the gradual coalescence of faculties that at first work apart. Shelley's intellect and Shelley's imagination did not embrace and interpenetrate each the other during his earlier years, and the extraordinary beauty of his later prose and verse arises from the perfect union and co-operation of intellect and imagination.

It would be idle to name anyone as the best English letter-writer. There are many kinds of "best." Cowper is certainly the best; but no less truly is Horace Walpole, and in his own province no less truly is Shelley the best. Our most admirable letter-writers have not been women—though to surpass Jane Welsh Carlyle in her happiest achievements of the bitter-sweet kind were not easy. They have been men in whom dwelt something feminine, a feminine fineness in observing and interpreting the signs and symptoms of the spirit, a feminine tenderness (as with Cowper), or sprightliness, or exquisite malice. The "soul where man and woman meet," as Tennyson puts it, has the advantage of a two-fold range of perceptions. Shelley was not the eternal child, as Francis Thompson refashioned him that he might form the centre of certain bewildering fantasies, nor was he in any respect lacking in masculine strength of intellect and will; but he had nerves that thrilled and tingled to subtle provocations of pleasure and of pain like a woman's nerves. To the stirring of the lightest breeze or breath of beauty he trembled forth an instant, perfect, and melodious response. And no letters in the English language are so entirely a poet's letters, giving in words of aerial music a pure response to beauty, as those sent from Italy by Shelley at short intervals to his friend Peacock. Through these the genius of the woman-country "wooed, not won," is breathed to the male land of the North as it never was before and as it never has been since they were written. Never elsewhere has the luminous Italian atmosphere so saturated human words and filtered through them. There is in these letters no bravura writing, as there sometimes is in the eloquent descriptive passages of Ruskin; they are "spirit and fire and dew," because they were the spontaneous outflow of the poet's sensibilities and imagination. And, having read these letters, we can go back to the origins and conjecture as to how the eager, abstract speculator and the declamatory rhetorician of Shelley's nonage were gradually evolved into the poet.

Of the letters printed by Mr. Ingpen for the first time several are short business notes, of interest only as affording the student of Shelley's life a possible clue to other things; but some are welcome additions to our means of intimacy with his intellect and character. We had known that he communicated with Thomas Moore on the subject of those alterations which converted "Laon and Cythna" into "The Revolt of Islam," but we knew little more than the fact. "The truth is," he writes to Moore in a letter hitherto unpublished, "that the seclusion of my habits has confined me so much within the circle of my own thoughts, that I have formed to myself a very different measure of approbation or disapprobation for actions than that which is in use among mankind; and the result of that peculiarity, contrary to my intention, revolts and shocks many who might be inclined to sympathise with me in my general views. As soon as I discovered that this effect was produced by the circumstance alluded to, I hastened to cancel it—not from any personal feeling of terror, or repentance, but from the sincere desire of doing all the good and conferring all the pleasure which might flow from so obscure a person as myself." For a time Shelley was reluctant to effect the desired changes in the poem; but it is evident that he accepted the necessity and found a characteristic reason of his own for yielding to it. And this passage will remain as a justification of future editors who give the poem—"The Revolt of Islam"—in its later form.

A letter, also hitherto unpublished, written from Italy to Dr. Hume not long before Shelley's death, is of touching interest. Dr. Hume was chosen by Shelley to be the guardian of the two children, who by a Chancery decree were placed out of their father's immediate superintendence, and Shelley's choice had been approved by the Master in Chancery. Two or three years later Shelley writes from Pisa to the children's guardian: "Allow me to take this opportunity of inquiring into the present state of the health and intellectual improvement of my children. I feel assured, though I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with you, that you will excuse and comply with this request of a father who is the victim of the unexampled oppression of being forbidden the exercise of his paternal duties; suffering in his own person the violation of those rights and those ties which, until this instance, the fiercest religious persecutions had ever considered sacred. I only revert to my own wrongs—for the hour of redress is yet to arrive—that I may anticipate the gratitude which I shall owe to yourself and Mrs. Hume for the kindness and attention with which you doubtless perform all those (duties, I can hardly call them) to my unfortunate children, except those which none but a parent can perform. I doubt not when they shall be restored to me, but that the period which they have spent under your care will be remembered both by them and by me as having in some degree softened the inevitable ill of this unnatural separation."

The latest of Shelley's remaining letters was addressed from Pisa to his wife at Casa Magni. "How are you, my best Mary?" he inquires. "Write especially how is your health and how your spirits are, and whether you are not more reconciled to staying at Lerici, at least during the summer." Four days later came the end.

MR. GRANVILLE BARKER'S PLAYS.*

THE three plays included in this volume evidently stamp their author as a man of wide and unusual power—power of style, power of thought, and power of dramatic characterisation and construction. They leave us, we confess, a little puzzled as to his personality and future. Mr. Barker is not, like Mr. Shaw, a defined, and in a sense finished, writer and man. We know what Mr. Shaw was, is, and will be—where we must look for the general direction of his assortment of gifts as a wit, a dialectician, and a critic of life. Mr. Shaw reads himself into all his characters; male and female, he creates them in his own image, and peoples a most diverting and seemingly varied world with copies and adaptations of the original, with foils and butts to set off their distracting qualities.

Mr. Barker has no such artistic fixity and no such personal end. Not only are the "three plays" all different, but they might have been written by different persons. We discover no special intellectual kinship between "The Marrying of Ann Leete" and either of the succeeding plays, and not much resemblance between "The Voysey Inheritance" and "Waste." Did the same hand really trace the delicate, sensuous, half-modish, half-poetic atmosphere of "Ann Leete," achieve the careful, almost labored, realistic painting of the Voysey family, and then dash off the hard, powerful coloring of the concluding play? A remarkable talent lies here; perhaps a very great one. Mr. Barker's literary faculty is in itself unusual. He is a serious and highly competent workman; he writes no dull or weak lines; he can be both allusive and direct, and now and then he approaches Ibsen's power of imparting to prose the incomparable emotional effect of poetry. What, then, is wanting in his work to give it a complete impression of mastery? Is it charm, or feeling, or variety of experience, or a deliberate suppression of sympathy and moral intensity in pursuit of a hard, clear intellectuality, or has a young writer, moved by various influences, but always searching for the most suitable form of self-expression, not yet found exactly what he seeks?

Leaving these puzzles, we may for the moment dismiss the two earlier plays, interesting as they are, and return to "Waste," the acute and vigorous study of political character which our illiterate censorship refused to license. Here, indeed, are the signs of a dramatist of consequence and authority. He has flown high; has taken all sorts of types in the field of action he has chosen to study; and though he sometimes emphasises and elaborates over-much, can write (as in the seduction and the suicide scenes) with unsparing sharpness and poignancy of touch. Perhaps those who know politics from the outside will be less impressed by "Waste" than those who watch it from within; and both classes may feel that this bold portrayal of the characters of the men who work the machinery of modern statesmanship needs some lightening, some suggestion of the existence of softer and more disinterested elements. A country which has known the elder Pitt, Fox, Cobden, Bright, and Gladstone, and supplied the stock from which Abraham Lincoln sprang, is not quite fully or characteristically represented by men like Trebell, Horsham, and Blackborough. Mr. Barker sketches these types with great humor and spirit, and they all exist, though Lord Charles Cantelupe seems to us more verifiable than any of them. But even in politics there is something deeper than this assemblage of astute manipulators of opinion or mild plotters for place and power, something, for example, which Ibsen, in his studies of the narrower stage of Norwegian life, rarely failed to supply. Take three events within the memory of the oldest living men—the achievement of Italian liberty, the overthrow of chattel slavery in the United States, and the unsuccessful attempt of Liberal statesmanship to give Home Rule to Ireland. All these events were either aided or thwarted by the Trebells and Farrants of their time. But the rather materialistic school of Socialism to which Mr. Barker may have gone for some of his political thinking either denies or ignores the dynamics of all these movements, and cannot therefore give a thoroughly faithful account of the actors in them, or of the forces which achieve the really powerful changes in the constitutions of States and the affections of peoples.

We come to Mr. Barker's method as a writer and dramatist, and especially to his most ambitious and carefully constructed piece of workmanship, the study of Henry Trebell. Here, as elsewhere, Mr. Barker owns some, but only a partial, affinity to Mr. Shaw. Trebell is certainly a Fabian statesman; if his morals are super-manish, his political ideas are a little amateurish, and in nearly all of them we recognise the true Fabian brand. Trebell will square the circle, reconcile Liberalism and Toryism, make Lord Halifax and Dr. Clifford embrace in public, and reconcile all the interests by bribing each of them "fairly." En passant, in the intervals of his hard, ambitious drive to power and accomplishment, he has an hour of "drunkenness," which leaves a silly, selfish, helpless woman on his impatient hands. This relationship, and the hopeless entanglement it involves, make the really fine and persuasive feature of "Waste." And it is developed with a fineness of vision which stamps the artist. For the woman, Trebell cares nothing, and can care nothing. But her virtual self-murder, and the loss of his and her unborn child, bring him up sharp with ineluctable facts of life which he has chosen to ignore. First there are the political consequences. A public scandal is just averted; and here the motives of Trebell's fellow-statesmen are nicely balanced, and very dramatically set out. But he has lost power; and his associates in the scheme for a Tory-Liberal Cabinet, which is to bring about disestablishment, think it better on the whole to play the game without him. Ambition is thus defeated; the master-workman has lost his job, and may never get it back again. Then a dim sense of fatherhood has been suddenly crushed; so that the world's judgment, which he despises, rises against him, while from within unexpected foes emerge, and join hands with the exterior assailants. Thus beset, how shall the citadel hold out? The genius for action cannot plod his way back to power, and, if he did, the world might not really want him. The hard, pushing, concentrated nature finds unexplored tracts of life which he has not the time or the means to conquer. The dramatic and the spiritual problems thus coincide, and together lead to the inevitable catastrophe. A dramatist who can thus imagine and pursue a situation fixed in so rare a plane of thought and circumstance is of no common quality.

Mr. Barker always writes with distinction. "You love to think idly," is an excellent description of an idealist; "I can be pleasant to talk to and give good advice through the years that remain," of a kind, clever, disillusioned woman, with nothing left to live for. Such sayings could be quoted from nearly every page of these plays. They mark the excessive subtlety of Mr. Barker's method, which, in different modes, exhibits itself in each of them. His stage directions are minute, and exhibit the work of a keen intelligence, which realises and acutely notes the mental and moral development of his characters and the physical play which accompanies and illustrates the various phases of their thought and action. All three works require a somewhat broader, simpler, human element, the element which at some period of a great writer's experiences suddenly detaches itself from mere talent, from all imitative work, and reveals the resistless personality and far-reaching aims of genius.

THE PROBLEM OF AUSTRIA.*

No question is of more importance to England at the present day than that of the Balkans. To that question Austro-Hungarian politics form the key, and that key is neither in the hands of our Foreign Office nor of our educated public. A dozen newspapers have vilified Austria, a dozen cheap and popular works have extravagantly belauded Hungary, so that our ignorance of the first and our knowledge of the second have become equally distressing to those acquainted with the true condition of either country. That there is room for a work which deals with Austria-Hungary from the historical, political, and economic aspects, is therefore indisputable, but how far does Mr. Drage's "Austria-Hungary" satisfy these conditions?

No one will deny Mr. Drage some qualifications for his task. He has travelled far and met many prominent statesmen, both Austrian and Magyar, and has a wide experience in the criticism of statistics and of official reports. Above all, he looks on the world with tolerance, and on Austro-Hungarian politics with considerable impartiality, and with a real desire to do justice to both sides, and to present both cases in any dispute. This gift is far the most important of all qualifications for studying Balkan politics, and it is unquestionably possessed by Mr. Drage.

At the same time, when we begin to examine his work more closely we observe considerable defects. He explains that his book is not for scholars (p. viii.) but for the general public, but this plea can hardly disarm criticism. The system of nomenclature which he follows is best described as no system at all, and is, in every way, confusing. It is true that it may be pedantic to alter a well-known name like Kossuth or Goluchowski, but if the system is to adopt that at present in use it would be as reasonable to write Ofen for Buda as Klausenberg for Koloszvár. Again Mr. Drage claims that there is "an immense amount of information condensed" into his maps (p. ix.), a claim we can hardly endorse. The first six maps look remarkably like some which appeared in a series of small text-books on European history. In any case they show chiefly the changes in West Europe, mark hardly any towns in Austria or Hungary, and in at least one instance make serious errors as to the boundaries of the Balkan States, and are practically useless in all cases. The last six maps are very much better, but even they are not without faults, and might have been more carefully prepared. The best general map (p. 29), for example, is much inferior to the map in Mr. Seton Watson's "Racial Problems in Hungary."

We do not, therefore, feel confidence that Mr. Drage has worked up the best sources of information for his maps, an observation which applies with less force to his text. He has found it needful to contribute short historical introductions at different points, which are, in general, interesting and apparently trustworthy. But the authorities on which they are based are truly amazing. Such books as J. F. Bright's small volume "Joseph II.," and Lowell's chapters on Austria-Hungary in "Governments and Parties in Continental Europe," have no pretensions to be first-hand authorities. For the history of Austria-Hungary in the eighteenth century, the works of Arneth and Professor Marczali are essential, and we cannot find that either have been used. Similarly for the nineteenth century, the Magyar historians have been but slightly—the German not sufficiently—consulted. The result is a number of curious blunders—p. 2, "Don Juan of Austria" was, properly speaking, not connected with Austria at all, but with Spain; p. 25, "Confirmation of Hungarian rights and liberties at Pressburg (1748)" refers to the incident of seven years before, when the Hungarians exclaimed not "moriamur pro rege nostro," but "vitam et sanguinem"; p. 262, Emperor of Germany for Holy Roman Emperor, though popular, is inaccurate; p. 267, Széchenyi was certainly not the first person to address the Hungarian Parliament in Magyar; p. 455, Charles is III. of Hungary or VI. Holy Roman Emperor, II. of no country; p. 481, more than the Zips fell to Austria in 1772, and the Bukowina was not formally annexed till 1786. There are also a number of minute blunders: p. 276, Maygar for Magyar; p. 298, Federvary for Fejervary; p. 570, Supido for Supilo, &c. A more serious error is found on p. 293, where we have erroneous descriptions alike of the Hungarian county system and Parliamentary system before 1848. Accounts and views differ a good deal upon both, but Mr. Drage's account is certainly inaccurate and misleading. It is the more deplorable as the English public has the haziest ideas upon the subject.

Mr. Drage would, however, tell us that his history was only an introduction to the political and economic discussions of his book. Even in these latter we cannot feel complete confidence—except in the author's desire to be fair. For example, the whole account of the negotiations leading to the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina from 1878 downwards is journalistic in tone, and based on inadequate materials, though it is only fair to say that much of this part was probably written before these questions became of European importance. So it is with all the other questions treated—we have abundance of references to second-hand authorities—magazine and newspaper articles—a paucity of quotations from standard and recognised works. Here, again, the book is excellent for ensuring a general acquaintance with the subjects discussed, but we are not sure that we can always turn to it for reliance on particular facts.

The part of the book dealing with economic and social problems is the most original and important contribution, but even here we meet with some difficulties. We have only discovered one specific reference to Hungarian official statistics (p. 288), and should like to have much more evidence of a complete study of the Magyar statistical records than is afforded by the medley of miscellaneous books referred to by Mr. Drage, which are hardly any of them written in Magyar. The evidence of Mr. Drage's research even in this direction (which is specially his own) is, as far as Hungary is concerned, infinitely less than that presented by Mr. Seton Watson in his book on Hungary. Moreover, we are not always sure of his general conclusions. Thus, he tells us that labor is cheaper in Austria than in England. As a general statement this cannot be denied, but we believe that it has important exceptions. For instance, the wages of the Austrian cotton-worker are certainly much lower than in England, but, as one Englishman does the work of three Austrians, the price of labor for producing cotton per pound is probably more in Austria than in England. These statements were recently made to us by a great authority on the cotton industry in Austria. The lesson which they convey might well be applied elsewhere, and there is no sign that Mr. Drage has apprehended it. In general, we think, rather more careful study and reflection would have produced a much more valuable book.

Still, though we miss a good deal of scientific and systematic examination of sources, the general conclusions of the book seem on the whole correct. Whatever be the method, the result generally seems satisfactory. Mr. Drage often balances carefully between opinions, but is too candid to hide his own, as when he endorses—with admirable calmness of judgment—the view that the Magyar oligarchy oppresses the other nationalities of Hungary (p. 565). His views on the Anglo-German question (p. 721) are expressed with rather more obvious bias, but with real moderation. His general view that economic forces will be the solution of nationalistic disputes is perhaps unduly optimistic. One must remember that Universal Suffrage is as yet only in the honeymoon stage in Austria, and that Mr. Drage's interest in economics may, perhaps, influence his outlook.

On the whole the book is hard to characterise. It has the merit of analysing and digesting large masses of facts, and of revealing much that is new to the British public. From its subject matter it could hardly be brilliant; it is, none the less, seldom dull. From its methods of securing information it cannot always be accurate; but, on the large questions, it is seldom in error. To end as to begin—its crowning merit is an honest attempt to secure impartiality, not always perhaps successful, but none the less real, and this quality might well be imitated by more brilliant writers and more learned historians.

TURKISH DELIGHT.*

A Greek girl, born a Turkish subject, returns, after six years' life in England and America, her mind stored with "occidental questionings," to visit her friends in their harems in Constantinople. The subjugated ladies welcome her back with enthusiasm; she is their "little blossom of the almond tree," "Allah's sun-ray," "little bride of the river," &c., and is petted, caressed, and tenderly condoled with on the misfortune of her single state. Long days are passed together in the luxurious Turkish houses:—

> "In the morning we would get up and spend a good part of the forenoon in the Turkish bath together. After luncheon we would lie about on couches, reading and playing cards and backgammon, or listening to the dramatic or spicy tales of the miradjus, the professional women story tellers. Then we would go for long walks, and sit on hilltops to watch the sun set."

Retinues of slaves stand ready to offer the ladies sweetmeats and sherbet, to rub rose-leaves on their bodies or perfume on their hair. For literature there is the French novel, for conversation the single but sufficient theme of love.

In obedience, however, to the promptings of her emancipated intellect, the visitor every now and again breaks through this exquisite atmosphere with the jarring note of an occidental interrogation. How is it possible, she enquires, to share a husband without jealousy? The sole response of the two wives in question is a burst of laughter and a mutual embrace. The next lady, the fourth wife of an elderly pasha, having betrayed in girlhood a "vigorous and original mind," and ideas on the relations of the sexes so advanced as to be considered by her early playmate "frightful," is challenged to explain the transformation of her mental attitude. With "a little scorn in her rippling young laugh," she replies:—

> "You dear little crest of the wave, because you have been studying and running around the world, 'improving' and 'enlarging' your mind, you think you know something. Why, you are as ignorant as my baby. You may think you are ahead of me, but really you are very far behind. The mysteries of the world, which you do not even dream of, are mine. You will never know them until you love a man and are his. Then——"

At this point her loveliness becomes "mystic and holy," and in a voice "tremulous and full of melody," she speaks of motherhood.

A third, a beautiful but unloved and childless third wife, is discovered painting. The writer, observing her to be possessed of considerable talent, enquires whether she would not care to go abroad to study To every suggestion, however, concerning the advantages of instruction, progress and enlightenment, the lady answers with monotonous sublimity, "What for?" A fourth devotes her youth to a study of the works of "Kant and Schopenhauer." After a fortnight of matrimony with a husband she has never previously seen, she makes the discovery that love is best, and throws her volumes out of the window.

All this, as the advertisement on the cover announces, "is a revelation to English readers." They had expected to hear of jealousy, discontent, and possibly revolt, and lo, all is joy, harmony, and religious exaltation. The ladies are apparently in such happy condition that they do not even covet the possession of a soul. "A woman has no soul," observes the erstwhile esprit fort. "It may be that if she had she would spend her life cultivating it, and forget that she had to devote herself to those to whom she must give a soul." Woman is "a one-thought creature," and stands for abnegation. Such heights of moral sublimity are rarely if ever reached by Western women, who, groping vainly after frivolous ends, are blind to the lofty ideals of the harem. "It is true," observes the writer, "that in Europe and America there are and have been women who sacrifice their lives for big causes." But the explanation is usually to be found in vanity or "that sentimentality which is so colossal in European women."

Some of this sentimentality has, however, unfortunately penetrated even as far as sober Turkey. Mrs. Kenneth Brown makes very merry over the harem Suffragettes. These "advanced" ladies wear corsets and Parisian gowns, swear eternal enmity to man, and frame a resolution that six of their number should be chosen by lot to kill themselves as a protest against the existing order of things. When the folly of their pretensions and the insufficiency of their arguments have been amply demonstrated, the writer goes on to describe how in a few sensible and well-chosen words she persuades the revolutionaries to moderate their ambitions, abandon corsets, and retain their lives.

The perusal of a very few pages of this work will convince the reader that the author's "occidental" point of view is a disguise of the thinnest material. Turkey, in Mrs. Brown's opinion—"although," as she admits, "recent political events do not seem to bear me out"—would be very much better off without the influence of European thought. There is much "charm and poetry" in the present system of feminine subjection, and the Turkish women, in the writer's experience, evidently hug their chains. Why abolish a custom that has the sanction of centuries, to attain an end which can never be won but at the cost of infinite difficulty, danger and pain? The argument has the force that appeals to instinct invariably command. For every one who desires an amelioration of the existing state, there will be twenty content to keep it as it is. Mrs. Kenneth Brown would drown the thirst for knowledge with a draught of sherbet, and quench the fires of revolution in a Turkish bath. But the movement over which she pours so much ridicule is mightier even than the forces of indolence, cowardice, and sensuality. There are women in Turkey to-day who hunger for liberty, women who would renounce peace, security, comfort and bodily delight, to satisfy the more difficult requirements of the spirit. There are women, on the writer's own admittance, ready to die for an idea. What does Mrs. Brown offer to such as these? Slavery—and a sugar plum.

"MARGARET HEVER."*

One closes "Margaret Hever" with a feeling of gratitude In place of the motiveless modern novel, weakly constructed, rich in manufactured incidents, superfluous figures, and unnecessary descriptions, the author has treated a serious situation, and developed it in a few significant scenes, while eliminating all the accidental circumstances and issues. Elizabeth Martindale no doubt owes something to the example of masters such as Maupassant, but her artistic directness and clarity are refreshing in a period when novelists fatigue us by introducing into their pictures a superabundance of trivial details.

The subject of "Margaret Hever" is the struggle in a girl's nature when invaded and hypnotised by the passion of a man whom she fears and strives to repulse. Margaret Hever, a tender, sweet and ingenuous nature, is happily engaged to Richard Cheyne, the distinguished writer, a man of European reputation and of singular intellectual fascination. But Cheyne is more than double Margaret's age, and though by the charm of his faith in her and of his "lately born hopes of which she was so much the centre," as well as by his courtesy and old-world dignity, he "has won her heart entirely, completely," the doubt is permissible whether, when she passes out of the stage of her girlhood, she may not learn and ask more from love. Cheyne himself sees in Margaret's slim grace, delicacy of taste, receptivity, and winning simplicity the qualities necessary for the woman who is to bring serene joy into his life, and to ward off the loneliness and the despondency that are beginning to weigh heavily in his bachelorhood. All the omens for their married happiness seem propitious till the day that Cheyne's cousin, Philip Hume, a young Australian writer, comes to him on a visit. From the first moment of their meeting Margaret is strongly affected by Hume's personality: she is embarrassed by his searching glance, by his brusque familiarity and by his stare of unconcealed admiration. She resents his assurance of manner, his unconventional conversation, and she is frightened by her own paralysis of speech in his presence. The author, in these pages, has drawn with a sparing, but sure, hand the confused but deep workings of a woman's instinct when the man, whose love is destined to conquer her, gazes at her. Hume, on his side, is possessed by Margaret's image. Of a passionate and wayward temperament, impatient of any restraint on his freedom, Hume has always followed his own impulses and considered the claims of his own egoism. In the ardent intensity of his self-willed temperament Hume shows the concentration of genius, and the mere idea of Cheyne's marrying such a girl, who is young enough to be his daughter, seems absurd and preposterous. Not feeling any scruples of delicacy or honor in the matter, Hume attacks Margaret openly on their second meeting and tells her she is doing a ridiculous thing in pretending to love Cheyne and that her marriage will be worse than a mistake. Margaret, much upset, declines to listen to him, and then, very femininely, finds it impossible to tell Cheyne of Hume's treachery, and of the hypnotic effect the latter has on her. How can she explain to him her fear when Hume looks at her and comes near? she argues. Is it her business to make trouble between the two men? Ought she not to screen Cheyne from all ugly annoyances and perplexing troubles? Besides, has she not exaggerated the whole matter? She feels it more and more impossible to speak, and this decision, which corresponds to the awakening in her of the obscure forces of the germinating love passion, determines the impasse that follows.

The force of the main disturbing situation is aided, artistically, by the sureness with which the relations of the Hever household with Cheyne and Hume are drawn. Margaret's cousin, Nell, a bright, but hard and selfish, girl, comes to stay at the Hevers' London house, and Hume's frequent visits are at first attributed by everyone but Margaret to the charm of Nell's society. Gradually Nell discovers that she is being used merely as a stalking-horse for what she considers is Margaret's heartless flirtation with Hume, and her fits of jealous irritation and gloomy moping because Hume continues indifferent to her, alternate with days of hope and strained gaiety. Mr. Hever, a shrewd and suave lawyer, is suspicious of Hume's motives, while Mrs. Hever, a motherly and dreamy woman, takes a fancy to the young man and encourages his visits. Admirable in its ironic truth is Cheyne's attitude to Hume. The elder man, who has been given no clue to the real situation, and has always treated the young Australian as a spoiled child, has deliberately thrown him and Margaret together, saying to his fiancée, "I want you to try to—influence him, to be as tolerant as you can. He has had few opportunities of the kind." And the fact that Cheyne should be so uncomprehending, should be so remote from guessing her agitation, creates a gulf between them. This is often the case in the relations between men and women. The woman expects the man to divine what he has never begun to suspect, with the result that a serious falsity in their relations grows and grows alarmingly the more she feels the impossibility of confession. In "Margaret Hever," the logical course of this alienation is traced with fine exactitude. Cheyne's absence in the country for a few weeks puts Margaret at Hume's mercy; the intense earnestness of the young man's face hypnotises her, all the little obstacles she puts in the way of their meeting only increase his wrathful determination to win her, and when he comes near her and gets her to himself for a little while, she is alarmed at feeling quite happy and oblivious of everything round her. When he puts a shawl round her shoulders one evening she feels his touch thrill through her whole body; in fact, all the forces of passion in the girl that Cheyne never could awake burst into flower, and the fight made by duty and principle only fans the fire of love. In Part II. the author brings the situation to such a fine, perplexing point that the reader does not feel competent to decide whether Cheyne or Hume should disappear. In fact, there are two Margarets, and the sweet and passive girl that Cheyne knows hates surrendering to the passion that colors the new Margaret's dream. It is as impossible to say whether the atmosphere of devoted tenderness that Cheyne planned to throw round her would always have satisfied her, as to know whether Hume's concentrated absorption in his own feelings would be compatible with her married happiness. The author cuts the knot, finally, by an interview in which Margaret, who has temporarily succumbed, wrenches herself out of Hume's arms, and finds force to declare: "Your sort of love is nothing to me. I am not yours. I don't wish to be. . . . I loathe you and I loathe myself for loving you." Hume leaves her in his fury, and Cheyne arrives, "attentive and affectionate as ever," to find her grave and sad. The immediate crisis is over, but the future cannot be forecast. The author might, indeed, have put on her title-page Meredith's line as a motto, "We are betrayed by what is false within."

A first book by a new hand is of excellent augury when it leaves the critic speculating as to the author's future. The theme in "Margaret Hever" is handled with such firmness and reserve power that we shall await the author's next work with lively interest. Her talent is indisputable. It would, of course, be possible to lay one's finger on a few artistic shortcomings, and it is possible that a certain tightness in the narrative and the curt conversations indicate that the author is drawing largely on her experience of life and little on her imagination. It may be added that Margaret is a figure not quite so true to type as she appears on the surface. But to lay stress on minor points such as these would be ungrateful in the case of a novel of such incisive force and high technical excellence as "Margaret Hever."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

Mr. Charles F. Warwick's "Mirabeau and the French Revolution" (Unwin, 8s. 6d. net) appears simultaneously with companion volumes on Danton and on Robespierre. Mr. Warwick's aim has been to group the principal events of the Revolution around these three men, each of whom is taken as representative of its prevailing principles and purposes during its three distinctive periods. Mirabeau, it is true, was never the recognised leader of any party and never won the full confidence of any, and it is scarcely accurate to take him as representative of any period of the Revolution. He was an adventurer of genius and the most dramatic figure of its early years. Mr. Warwick inclines to believe that the monarchy might have been saved had Mirabeau lived, but there is little doubt that his attacks upon the clergy lost him any influence he possessed with the king, and that his death did not affect the policy of the Court party. The fact is that Mr. Warwick's work is hardly worthy of a serious historian. His style is a mixture of the jejune and the rhetorical. He quotes freely from preceding writers, but his quotations are often without point and only suggest that he has not thoroughly mastered his material. For the life of Mirabeau he had an excellent guide in the biography by M. Charles de Loménie, but Mr. Warwick's want of judgment is especially shown in his handling of authorities. He takes whatever he finds and rarely shows any desire to sift evidence. All this is in marked contrast with another American writer, Dr. Fling, whose biography of Mirabeau, the first volume of which has already appeared, promises to be the standard work on the subject in English.

Dr. Talbot, the present Bishop of Southwark, is looked upon by many as an intellectual leader in the Church of England, and the little volume of sermons which he has recently published ("The Fulness of Christ," Macmillan, 1s. 6d.) will be read with interest on that account. If we may venture on a criticism, it is to say that Dr. Talbot touches on too many problems without touching on any of them thoroughly. In some cases it is not quite easy to see what he is driving at; his mind seems to be struggling with ideas which do not find adequate or lucid expression in his words. He says truly enough that Christianity is a life and not a system; but his volume conveys the impression that he is looking at that life through the medium of a system. If Christianity (as he expresses it) is Christ, its essence is the historical personality which appears before us in the pages of the Gospels as interpreted by historical criticism; it is not the metaphysical entity constructed three centuries afterwards by ecclesiastics. The old believer, in the person of Dr. Talbot, looks at the person of Christ as a metaphysical entity; the new believer looks upon him as a historical personality who lives in the Church as the supreme manifestation of the spirit of God.

Mr. Frank Podmore's "Mesmerism and Christian Science" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net) is a careful and unbiassed survey of the history of mental healing from the time of Mesmer to that of Mrs. Eddy. Mr. Podmore regards Mesmer as typical of "a man who believes in a half truth because he chooses to believe, and by his force of will becomes himself the chief of his own dupes." At the same time he dismisses the idea that Mesmer was a mere charlatan, and is rightly severe on the men of science who formed the Commission to inquire into Mesmer's discoveries in 1784 and who through their professional prejudice "pronounced the rejection of a pregnant scientific discovery—a discovery possibly rivalling in permanent significance all the contributions to the physical sciences made by the two most famous members of the commission—Lavoisier and Benjamin Franklin." Mr. Podmore treats of somnambulism, healing by suggestion, the attempts made to use the hypnotic state as an anæsthetic during surgical operations, and the development of animal magnetism in France and Germany. His last two chapters are given up to Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy, and many of the absurdities to be found in early editions of her writings are exposed.

ment of "personages," "The Voice of the Orient" (John Long, 3s. 6d. net) contains a good deal that is enlightening and curiously attractive. The writer, Mrs. Walter Tibbits, is a convert to the Hindu religion, and the series of articles—one might almost call them rhapsodies—on India and its history, which are included in this volume, are colored by her enthusiasm for the new-found faith. The route travelled is from Bombay to Bengal, thence to the snow hills of Kashmir; Simla and the Holy City of Benares are the subjects of particular observations; and Anglo-Indian society is reviewed in what might be styled a song of lamentation. An inevitable reference to the Indian unrest attributes the cause of this to "the race prejudice, the personal rudeness and contempt shown by white people in railway trains and other places of contact," and not to any sense of Government injustice. One of the best essays is that entitled "The Lights of Home," which is a brief exposition of the fundamental truths of Hinduism in their relation to those of other religions, and a reminder that, before the day of Mrs. Besant and Madame Blavatsky, Hegel and Schopenhauer were attracted by its tenets. Mrs. Tibbits has one strange story to tell of an "ordeal by fire" ceremony that she witnessed, but otherwise she is sparing of miracles and mysteries, contenting herself, wisely, with a general appeal to the precedents afforded by the history of other creeds. One or two allusions to living notabilities do not evidence quite the same discretion; one—to one of our best-known social philosophers—seems to be wanting in taste. However, as a blend of Western and Eastern habits of thought, and of Western directness and Eastern mysticism in language, the book provides food for reflective study. It is, at any rate, unlike any other book on India that we know.

The American market has been a little quieter since the death of Mr. Harriman, whose keenness in manipulating his stocks and planning fresh coups continued almost up to his death. Only a few days before the end he was interviewed by a number of journalists as to his schemes for the future. Cheap money is still the mainstay of those who hope for steadily rising prices in the gilt-edged markets. Home railways and Industrials should soon begin to benefit by the improvement of trade. Rubber flotations continue on a large scale, and the rubber market is very active. This is a genuinely profitable field of exploitation in which English capital and English capitalists are far ahead of other countries. Investors, however, should choose their company with the very greatest care, and remember that high dividends are essential in view of the possibilities of a substitute being found, or of any particular estate being half ruined by some insect pest. A good deal of anxious attention is being devoted just now to the concerns run by the Canadians in South America English investors have been entrapped by alluring prospectuses into purchasing a great deal of watered stock at high figures. The chief danger for the moment is the Mexican Light and Power Co., whose big dam at Necaxa has been damaged by floods How much nobody knows; so investors had better be careful and await official statements.

Money and Trade.

The money market remains a centre of doubt and interest. With a bank return so strong as Thursday's loans for short periods are likely to remain cheap for several weeks. But the demand for money from South America, Egypt, and Russia is becoming keen, and this fact has had a steadying influence on the discount market. Trade is admittedly improving all round, and this must soon employ more capital and credit. The Indian harvest has been a fine one, and Russia is supposed to have bumper crops. There is a distinct improvement in trade throughout the Midlands and the North, and the employment figures for August are quite promising, the gain upon August of last year being considerable.

South American Railways.

The constructor of railways and the investor in railways both find a very profitable field in South America. It is really astonishing how well the principal lines have paid, and there seems to be no limit to the number of new ones that are required to open up forests, and mines, and areas suitable for corn or cattle. Figures recently published show that at the end of last year the different South American States had no less than 35,403 miles of railway line, distributed as follows:—

| | Miles. |
|---|---|
| Argentine ... ... ... ... ... ... | 15,746 |
| Brazil ... ... ... ... ... ... | 11,940 |
| Chile ... ... ... ... ... ... | 2,938 |
| Peru ... ... ... ... ... ... | 1,471 |
| Uruguay ... ... ... ... ... ... | 1,447 |
| Venezuela ... ... ... ... ... ... | 540 |
| Colombia ... ... ... ... ... ... | 450 |
| Bolivia ... ... ... ... ... ... | 400 |
| Ecuador ... ... ... ... ... ... | 316 |
| Paraguay ... ... ... ... ... ... | 155 |
| Total ... ... ... ... ... ... | 35,403 |

The Argentine Republic and Brazil are leaders in railway mileage. In new construction, however, the greatest present activity is in Chile and Argentina, which supplied upward of 1,600 miles of new lines during 1908. Brazil added some 630 miles to the lines already in operation. These three countries possess nearly 30,000 miles of the total of 35,403 miles existing. Various projects are now under way which will extend the lines in operation in Peru and other South American States very considerably. It may also be mentioned that by far the largest portion of South American railways is privately owned, the principal exception being the Argentine, where about 2,000 miles were constructed and are operated by the government, including the Trans-Andean Railway.

THE RICCARDI PRESS BOOKS

The Medici Society has pleasure in announcing that the first books printed in the new Riccardi Fount are now at press. In this Fount Mr. H. P. Horne has undoubtedly surpassed both his previous attempts in the same direction. Based upon the design of the larger Fount used in the famous first Florentine editions of Horace, printed by Antonio Miscomino in 1492 the Riccardi Types may confidently be said to surpass both in brilliance and in legibility, all modern efforts to reproduce the ancient glories of the Printing Press. Encouraged by the public appreciation of the Medici Prints, of which the Burlington Magazine has said that "Nothing of the kind so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public," the Society hopes shortly to render available the noblest typography of modern times at prices within reach of the general purse.

Of the Riccardi Press Books, now at press, a list will shortly be ready to forward post free to all applicants.

PHOTO-RELIEFS.

Among the various recent advances in Photography, few, if any, are more striking than that whereby—as perfected by the well-known Italian firm of Giacomo Brogi—a flat surface offers to the beholder the illusion of a modelling in relief. Printed in the colours of the original Della Robbias, and other subjects, these Photo-Reliefs are confidently recommended to the attention of all lovers of Italian Art, other than the purely graphic.

THE DIVINE MINSTRELS.

A Narrative of the Life of S. Francis of Assisi, with his Companions. By AUGUSTE BAILLY. Translated by Major ERNEST BARNES. Crown 8vo, cloth, Coloured Tops, with Photogravure Frontispiece after the Picture of 'S. Francis,' by Geraard David, 5s. net. Whole limp vellum, silk ties, gilt tops, 12s. 6d. net. October 15.

In this simple but exquisitely sympathetic narrative of the life of the Saint of Assisi, free of all expository or other disturbing element, and written with the consummate literary art which is the secret of his nation, M. Bailly has given us a book which will not fail of appeal as well to the most confirmed "Franciscan" as to the unregenerate few who find, in these pages, their first introduction to one of the most perfect histories in the world.

Diary of the Week.

The great rival Bingley Hall meetings have been held; the Liberal meeting addressed by the Prime Minister being by far the more enthusiastic, hostile as was the centre. Mr. Asquith's tone was very firm and whole-hearted. Answering Lord Rosebery's charges of Socialism, he cited a cloud of non-Socialist witnesses in favor of the taxation of land values, ranging from Adam Smith, John Mill, and Gladstone, to Lord Rosebery himself. He showed that the death duties only involved an average rise of 1½ per cent. on the existing scales, and told Lord Rosebery sharply that as a peer he was both ignorant of finance and incompetent to deal with it. He again challenged Mr. Balfour to produce an alternative to the Budget, and to say whether he would advocate food taxes, and if so what taxes—duties on corn, meat, butter, or bacon? To this challenge Mr. Balfour, it need not be said, has made no response.

But the capital point of the speech was its impressive and uncompromising recital of the constitutional case. The idea of the House of Lords touching the Budget suggested the "most formidable and the most fundamental" of all the Revolutions since the Long Parliament. He quoted the significant preamble of Money Bills—namely, that "the Commons"—not the Lords and Commons—"of the United Kingdom have freely and voluntarily resolved to give and grant unto his Majesty the duties mentioned." These words were framed on the historic report of Coke and Selden in 1628, when the mention of the Lords was deliberately omitted, in spite of their protests. In support of the doctrine of the sole financial supremacy of the Commons he quoted a long catena of authorities—the elder Pitt, Wellington, Lord Salisbury—declaring that "even in the servile atmosphere of the Restoration," it had never been questioned. In finance, he concluded, the Lords were "impotent and the Commons supreme," rejection and amendment of the Budget by the peers being equally out of the question. If that doctrine were contested, the Liberal party were not only "ready, but anxious and eager" to take up the challenge.

Mr. Balfour's following appearance at Birmingham was carefully shepherded by the Protectionists, and was preceded by a visit to Mr. Chamberlain at Highbury, and a letter from Mr. Chamberlain, which, as usual, deliberately over-trumped the Balfourian hand. In this letter Mr. Chamberlain "hoped" that the House of Lords would "see their way to force a General Election," and declared that the Budget, which was meant to destroy Tariff Reform, found money but no "work," which was wanted even more than money.

Mr. Balfour's tone, save for its rhetorical acceptance of Tariff Reform as an up-grade policy, contrasted with the down-grade of Socialism, gave no specific adherence to the ex-Radical's doctrine of the right of the peers to force a plébiscite on a Budget. But he said that neither the Lords nor the Commons had the right to decide the issue, which must be remitted to the people. He denied that the Budget was a "poor man's Budget," for "any fool could destroy wealth," without benefiting the poor. Insisting that the old policy of Free Trade, which left capital to find its own market without State interference, was dead, he declared that the intervention which the Budget promoted must end in the "bottomless confusion" of Socialism. This double utterance has produced the usual uncertainty as to its meaning, and has revealed, for the twentieth time, that Mr. Balfour's intentional obscurity of expression distracts and divides his party. The "Morning Post" complains that Mr. Balfour has committed the party to Protection without defining what it means. But both the "Times" and the "Birmingham Post" of Thursday declared that the speech pointed to the rejection of the Budget by the Lords.

On Friday the muddlement produced by the last of Mr. Balfour's "great leads" increased. The "Times" modified its earlier note, declaring that, after all, Mr. Balfour had only upheld the right of the House of Lords to reject a Budget, but had not attempted to settle the fate of the Budget. On the other hand, the Protectionists were, or pretended to be, quite sure that he meant to destroy the Budget. So the welter goes on. Mr. Gladstone, speaking at Cinderford, declared that if the Lords rejected the Bill the Government would go to the country for the Bill and the whole Bill, for Free Trade, and for a change in the Constitution of the House of Lords.

We have reason to believe that the researches into precedents have revealed the remarkable fact that in no case has an omission to pay taxes imposed by a resolution of the House of Commons been made the subject of an action at law. That is to say, the defaulter has never ventured to challenge the validity of the resolution, and to plead that it was an insufficient warrant for payment in the absence of an Act sanctioned by the two Houses. We do not know what the legal effect of this position may be, but it clearly argues the great moral and constitutional force of the sole action of the Commons in the matter of finance. For our part, we should like to see this actual state of things formally embodied in the Constitution, and all Finance Bills passed by consent of the House of Commons alone—i.e., by the two parties concerned, omitting the Lords altogether. This point will, of course, be raised immediately after an election on the Veto. We see that Mr. Harrison asks the very pertinent question in the "Times" whether a formal revision of the Constitution could leave any of the powers in it—including the Monarchy—unaffected.

Meanwhile, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has confirmed the great concession to the rural landowners which he foreshadowed in his Budget speech. The concession takes the form of a bonus for the improving landlord. It was arranged with Lord Onslow, representing an association of landlords, so that with one voice the landowners are suing for favors and with the other denouncing their dispenser as a robber. At present the landowner gets an allowance under Schedule A of 12½ per cent. in respect of land and 16⅔ per cent. in respect of cottage property. These figures will stand, but if the landlord can show that he has spent more than this proportion of the gross rental on repairs and management, he may obtain an equivalent reduction in his income tax, up to a limit of 25 per cent. In other words he will not pay income-tax on his improvements. Both sides seemed willing to accept this concession, and the Tory statesmen and press were exuberant in their thanks. Such is the comedy of politics. The Chancellor has also agreed that the new roads promoted under the Developments Bill shall not be used exclusively for motor traffic—a valuable change.

The House of Lords has spent a characteristic week in mutilating the Housing Bill. The general method has been to deprive the Bill, both in its housing and town planning portions, of its merit of cheapness and simplicity of procedure. On Tuesday the Lords substituted for the easy method of compulsory purchase of land which the Government had taken from the Small Holdings Bill a much costlier plan borrowed from the Port of London Bill. This provides for a form of local inquiry by an outside person, who may force recourse to a Provisional Order. The Lords pressed the Amendment, though Lord Crewe warned them that it and similar changes would greatly impair the usefulness of the Bill. They also enacted that Housing Orders should lie on the table of the House thirty days, and that either Chamber should be able to stop them. They have also relieved County Councils and Councils of County Boroughs from compulsion by the central authority, and have almost destroyed the Town Planning clauses by setting up the machinery of provisional orders, which means great expense and great delay. Lord Crewe stated that if this amendment were carried, the Bill might as well go into the waste paper basket. But carried it was by a majority of 42, and unless Mr. Burns stands firm, a worthless Act must accrue from this mauling.

M. Cochery, the new French Finance Minister, is enjoying much better fortune than his predecessor M. Caillaux, and his Budget proposals are being well received by the Budget Committee and the Press. Apart, however, from the fact that he designs to meet the whole of the deficit of £8,000,000 by new taxation instead of settling half with borrowed money his scheme does not look very alluring. Five and a-half millions are to be raised from tobacco and liquor—that is, mainly from the working classes—some £800,000 from a host of little taxes on advertisements, motors, mines, &c., and only a million and a quarter by direct taxation. The direct taxes take the shape of a very mild increase in the death duties. The disproportion in the relative burdens imposed on property and labor makes the welcome given to M. Cochery's Budget by the Conservative Press intelligible, but it was supposed that M. Caillaux's suggested raising of the death duties on an equally modest scale set the Budget Committee against him. It looks rather as though what the Budget Committee struck at in M. Caillaux was the author of the income tax Bill.

The Austrian and Hungarian Ministries have been meeting to settle the estimates for the joint Budget, and some idea of the size of the bill for the Bosnian annexation is getting abroad. The "Neue Freie Presse" puts the joint estimates for this year at £33,000,000, or twice the figure for last year; £13,600,000 is attributed to the annexation crisis, and several more millions to the "Dreadnought" policy, which was one result of Anglo-Russian action. The "Arbeiter Zeitung" puts the total at £41,000,000; but even the most modest estimate is heavy enough to have caused a shock to Austrian and Hungarian opinion. There are insistent demands for stern reductions, and the difficulty of getting the Budget through the Delegations is intensified by the political chaos in Hungary. The Government, however, seems determined on building "Dreadnoughts," and the expenditure on the army during the Bosnian crisis has already been incurred, so that Austria is certain to be added to the countries whose finances have been deranged by the insane rivalry in armaments.

The talk has died down of King George's abdication, and if the draft of a manifesto to the Greek people, published in the foreign press, be authentic, he has made up his mind to bow to the superior power of the Military League. M. Theotoki's attempt to pledge his party against the officers has collapsed. His friends refused to follow him, and he has been compelled to concede them a free hand, and even to suspend his resignation of the leadership. There is little doubt now that a majority of the deputies will vote the army and financial reforms, including the dismissal of the Crown Prince, demanded by the army.

The German Socialist Congress at Leipzig has finished its sittings. There were no scenes and no split, and neither Revisionists nor Marxists did anything to damage the best electoral prospect the party has had for many years. The two sections fought as usual, but the tide is pretty certainly with the Reformists. The Congress rejected a motion for the drafting of a programme as a basis of co-operation with the Radicals and it re-affirmed the Dresden formula of a revolutionary party, but it approved the support given to Prince Bülow's inheritance tax, and it rejected a resolution condemning any and every co-operation with non-Socialist parties. This last decision undoubtedly marks the growing strength of the Reformists, and the change is probably due to the increased weight of the trade union influence. The Trade Unionists are inclined to condemn a policy of barren negation, and to press for concrete results, and as their opinions crystallise one may expect to see the German Social Democracy approximate much more closely to the English Labor Party.

On Monday 15,000 Spanish troops moved out to the west of Melilla and came into touch with a Moorish force. Heavy fighting took place, and though the Spanish general claims a brilliant victory, he admits that reinforcements had to be summoned from Melilla, and that he lost at least 19 dead and 106 wounded. On the same day the Sultan issued to the Powers a formal protest against Spain's action in assembling over 60,000 men in the Riff, presumably with an ulterior object. Mulai Hafid disclaims all financial or other responsibility. The Sultan's protest renders Spain's political position in Morocco very difficult at the same time that her military position shows no improvement. The possibility of open war with Morocco is nearer, and even though the Powers take no public steps they are certain to demand guarantees from Spain in private. There are rumors that France and England have already intervened at Madrid, and a significant article in the "Times" probably reflects the nervousness and dissatisfaction of our Foreign Office with an aggressive policy.

The prize for scurrility among the Dukes must clearly go to the Duke of Rutland. On Saturday this gentleman, who had previously declared that he would put a gag into the mouth of every Labor member in the country and keep it there—presumably while he was taxing their food—declared at Haddon Hall that the Government were a "pirate crew of political tatterdemalions," and that Mr. Churchill was a "wild and brutal Socialist," the violence of whose language was only equalled by the insincerity of his actions. The Duke further remarked that violent expressions were as a rule the sign of a weak case. The Duke is probably quite right in thinking that the Budget will diminish both the social influence of his class and their future power of living out of the labors of other people, and that it is meant to do so. But he and his friends seem to us a little unwise in making it so clear to the people of England that the country will be much better for the loss of a class so arrogant in speech and demeanor and so poor in public spirit.

Australia is beginning a system of compulsory military service. Mr. Cook, the Minister of Defence in the Commonwealth Government, has introduced a Bill enforcing military training on boys of twelve, and continuing it up to the age of twenty. The force is to be divided into junior and senior cadets, the yearly table of drills diminishing with increasing age. The scheme will mean an annual military expenditure of about two millions to begin with. Its friends calculate that in seven years it will provide a force of 240,000 men—50,000 in the first line, 50,000 in the second, and 140,000 as a reserve.

As usual the French and German manœuvres have vindicated the quality of the men and the machinery rather than the strategical equipment of the officers. There are the customary charges of antiquated tactics and spectacular display, but there is no question that in both France and Germany the men marched admirably and the supplies were excellently managed despite heavy weather. The French tried their new machine gun and found it to their satisfaction, but by far the most important and interesting experiment was in the case of dirigible balloons. The Germans employed the Gross—the Zeppelin could not be brought on the scene in time—and the French the République. In both cases the dependence of the dirigible upon the weather and its enormous utility under favorable conditions were demonstrated. The Gross, for instance, was waterlogged and had to descend on a rainy day, and a mist rendered the République useless, but on bright and fair days both the Gross and the République gave the completest description of the hostile forces spread out before them. The Gross communicated with headquarters by wireless telegraphy, but this was impracticable in the case of the République. With all its limitations the dirigible may revolutionise tactics.

Both Commander Peary and Dr. Cook landed in America on Tuesday, Peary in Nova Scotia and Cook in New York. Cook had a boisterous public welcome, and the municipality is to give him an official reception. Peary, however, intends to shut himself up in his Maine home and refuse all public honors until the controversy is settled. Cook's narrative, as it has so far been published, throws no light on the problem, and a letter supporting him from the important witness, Whitney, is denounced as a fake. Cook, however, assures the world that he has brought his materials with him to New York, and that within a fortnight his proofs will be on their way to the Copenhagen University. Meanwhile Peary stands to his guns, promises a crushing refutation of Cook, but begins to regret himself that he sent Captain Bartlett home before the Pole was reached. There can be no doubt that his reputation has only to gain from his belated determination to keep silent until Cook has spoken.

The presence at the Young Egypt Congress of delegates from the Nationalist Party and of Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. Barnes, and the prominence given to its proceedings in the Press, show that Young Egypt is still a political force. The zeal and the character of the delegates, most of them University men, were impressive, and the papers and speeches of high ability. Several political tendencies were represented—though the Nationalists do not speak for the fellaheen—but the dominant note was insistence upon the fullest national independence and the immediate evacuation of Egypt. This last demand is not practical business. English opinion can easily be rallied to the cause of more liberal institutions in Egypt, but not in favor of evacuation. The winning of Constitutional Government is, however, part of the Young Egypt programme, and the Parliamentary support of the Nationalist and Labor Parties will prove valuable in educating English opinion.

Two remarkable pieces of evidence on the censorship were given on Thursday by the Bishop of Southwark and Mr. Hall Caine. The Bishop said very boldly that he did not wish to interfere with the treatment, "free and bold, of what may be called moral questions, themes, problems, and arguments." But while he would give free play to the serious criticism of morals, he would put down indecency. This reverses the action of the censorship, whose net stops "moralities" and lets the indecencies through. Mr. Hall Caine also declared against the "dinner-table standard of morality" which the Censorship set up, and added that he had been completely turned against the Censorship by reading the evidence of its defenders—Mr. George Edwardes, Sir W. S. Gilbert, and Mr. George Alexander.

Politics and Affairs.

THE SIGNALS FROM BIRMINGHAM.

The "Westminster Gazette," in an amusing analysis of the reception prepared at Birmingham for Mr. Balfour by his watchful admirers of the Tariff Reform League, suggests that the Conservative leader has succeeded in maintaining his ancient and well-practised rôle of the "Veiled Prophet." For our part we are more interested in the proceedings of the Prophet who sits behind the Veil. The question is akin to that which M. Brieux raises in his play, "La Foi." Will the statue of Isis nod? If it nods, those who sit behind the scenes know who makes it nod. If it is motionless, we guess that the High Priest has had to stay his hand, or that the machinery has gone wrong. As usual, the witnesses differ on the question of fact. The most delicate of seismographic registers seem to record a slight inclination. But there is no room for doubting that the Highbury Priest has pulled the strings with his accustomed vehemence and decision. When Mr. Balfour—playing with the constitutional question as he plays with the fiscal problem—says that the question of the Budget is one which cannot be decided at Westminster, we light on a formula that can be used either to promote or to discourage the rejection of the Budget by the House of Lords, according as Mr. Balfour's interests, or the strength of the party current, incline him to one course or another. But when Mr. Chamberlain "signals" from Highbury that he hopes "the House of Lords will see their way to force a General Election," no man has any doubt as to the meaning of the message for the party which, in the favorite phrasing of his devoted Protectionist "followers," Mr. Balfour has "got to lead." In this tactic, the titular chieftain is at once everything and nothing. Everything for the purpose of party unity, nothing from the point of view of policy. Be he "whole-hogger" or "judicious Tariff Reformer," he must take the next step which is necessary for the establishment and maintenance of a fixed and strictly pledged party of Tariff Reformers, from which every other interest is excluded. That object may be obtained by one General Election, or, more probably, by a series of General Elections. But some day, by the repeated process of weeding out the weaklings, it must, they think, arrive. Meanwhile, the House of Lords may look after itself. What does Mr. Chamberlain, its old enemy, the forerunner of the Limehouse policy, the ancient scourge of Dukes and mocker at those who neither toil nor spin, care for the House of Lords? A fig for the House of Lords! The Liberals may destroy the veto if they please. It is not necessary to Protection. That measure will be decided on the floor of the House of Commons, and the examples of the United States and of our own Colonies may be quoted to show that modern democracies can be lured into the Protectionist net, even though they lack the special organisation of privilege represented by the House of Lords.

This line of action is, therefore, openly presented to Mr. Balfour, to be rejected if he dares. He, a Constitutional statesman, is asked to assent to and promote the overthrow of the old British Constitution, so that a path may be cleared for a revolution in State policy more far-reaching even than the Budget. A pretty scheme; and as the vote of a hundred peers may be relied on to answer the summons from Highbury, we must all reckon that from this moment the fate of the Budget hangs in the balance, and that every preparation must be made for facing its rejection. But on one point we fancy that Mr. Chamberlain, who unfortunately is not now able to fight the battle he desires to direct, is out of his reckoning. Since he retired from the field the whole face of the struggle has been altered. The Budget might have been fought on the pretence that the greater part of the deficit, more especially the sums obtained by such imposts as the spirit and tobacco duties, ought to have been found by the "foreigner." But this line has not been taken. The entire force of the Protectionist party has been thrown into the opposition to the land taxes, which, if they were submitted to a plébiscite of British and Irish voters, would be carried by an overwhelming majority, including, we suspect, nine out of ten Tory workmen. No such passionate pilgrimage has been set up in Tory politics since the Corn Laws were overthrown. It is inevitable, therefore, that when the Dukes, having destroyed the Budget, turn round to advocate Protection, they will be met by a universal shout, "You pretend that you want to tax the foreigner; now we know that it is your own backs that you want to spare, and ours that you want to burden; our food, our clothes, our savings and businesses. And you have used your own votes in your own House to bring about this result, and to put up an everlasting barrier against all future schemes for taxing your rents and royalties." That is a perfectly truthful issue, and it is the issue on which we are going to sweep the country.

Mr. Balfour does, indeed, propose a counter cry of Socialism versus Tariff Reform. But he makes it perfectly clear that he, like the Dukes, regards "Tariff Reform" as an inverted kind of Socialism, which is to exercise that interference with the "natural" flow of capital into certain channels of industry which he declares to be the evil of the Budget, and, we suppose, of the Development Bill. He repudiates the old laissez faire doctrines, and insists that we must direct the industrial machine. "What we want is business," says Mr. Balfour, adopting one of the slippery formulæ under which Protection in every modern country has set up the machinery for the corrupt interference with politics by rival sets of manufacturers, struggling for a "pull" over their neighbors. Such a policy is simplicity itself. The landlords want more unearned increment and no taxes. The Tory manufacturer wants the same, only he hopes to make the State find his "increment" for him, by way of taxes to enable him to sell his goods dear, and to shut out inconvenient foreign rivals. For these two interests the Tory party acts, as it is its nature to act. On behalf of the first it has spent hours, days, weeks, and months in working for the extinction of the land taxes, rarely proposing a single amendment which was not designed to save the great landlords, the people who, like one of the Dukes, draw £10,000 a year in royalties from a colliery that paid no profit to those who worked it. Even if the land taxes be Socialism, the country is still prepared to accept them, and to reject the other kind of Socialism in which the State is to be turned into a factory for the grinding out of rents and profits.

This is one issue; the other is so tremendous that it transforms the whole conditions of our politics. The Prime Minister said the right word in the right way in his powerful speech at Bingley Hall, that if the Lords touch the Budget they touch Revolution, for "in matters of finance the Lords are impotent and the Commons are supreme." Does any one dispute this? Does any one assert that the Lords have a "right"—i.e., a Constitutional right as against a formal, non-effective privilege of saying "Aye" to a Finance Bill—to the rejection of the Budget? The moment that "right" is exercised, the facts will show where the true "right" lies. But the House that denies it put itself "out of law"; the political England that would be left after that doctrine had been successfully asserted would be unrecognisable. Unappeasable war will be opened up; and if we were not as sure of winning it, and of beating down the usurper, as are the Tory leaders of the coming crash to their fortunes which the wrecking policy involves, we should say that the reign of King Edward was destined to be one of the stormiest in our history.

POOR LAW REFORM AND THE BUDGET.

THE practical policy embodied in the phrase "One thing at a time," upon which we, as a nation, pride ourselves, has its disadvantages. For things never stand utterly alone in nature, and the attempt to treat them so is a serious error for which one pays heavily in practice. It was, therefore, a timely interposition on the part of the Archbishop of Canterbury to remind the nation from his place in the House of Lords that the search for public revenue was not the only task which lies immediately before the country. An important group of practical proposals, commonly designated social reform, made part of the mandate laid upon this Government by the electorate, and among them the most urgent are those relating to poverty and unemployment. The history of these last years has not served to diminish the urgency with which these problems press for legislative solution. What must be described as a fresh outburst of poverty has accompanied the period of trade depression from which it is hoped the country is just beginning to emerge. The Archbishop reminded his wealthy audience of the existence of more than a million of their fellow-citizens who are at the present either in receipt of Poor Law relief or are dependent for subsistence upon private charity. The vast majority of this pauper class are the victims of physical or economic misfortunes for which they owe no personal responsibility. They are children, invalids, defectives, lunatics, aged poor, or other weaklings whose relatives are incapable of making adequate humane provision for their maintenance. Again and again this standing testimony to the failure of civilisation has been thrust before the faces of our legislature, to be subjected to some feeble palliative treatment. The individualism of Cain has always blocked the way. We have not been prepared to admit that we are our brother's keeper. We have commonly assumed that these men or their fathers must have "sinned," in order to explain their evil case. Never before have we been ready to admit that we, society, are the sinners, and owe reparation to our injured ones.

The Archbishop sketched vividly the change of head and heart that had occurred in the nation since the Act of 1834. It may be summed up in a single phrase, the recognition of social responsibility. This is no monopoly of Liberalism. Conservatives as well as Liberals admit the necessity of drastic constructive reforms affecting the condition of the poor. The Majority Report foreshadows a new policy as large and as expensive, were it fully carried into effect, as the bolder and compacter scheme of the Minority. Mr. Balfour, indeed, follows his Dukes in "booing" Socialism. But are he and his party prepared to repudiate the social obligation to remedy the intolerable grievances which their own Commission has disclosed? The forward wing of the Conservative Party has loudly acclaimed its willingness to introduce large measures for improving the condition of the people on lines not dissimilar from those to which the present Government has committed itself. It is only on the question of finance that a plain cleavage appears. The Liberals want the rich to pay out of their superfluity, Mr. Balfour and his Tariff Reformers want the working-classes to pay out of their poverty. For we still give sufficient credit to the intelligence of Mr. Balfour to refuse him the conviction that "the foreigner will pay."

The fight for the Budget, then, is no mere academic struggle for sound principles of taxation. It is the only means of securing a safe progressive revenue which will enable the Government to construct for the masses of the laboring population a decent standard of life and work. Though the measures which contribute to this task are many and are handled separately, the success of this great achievement depends upon the continued life and energy of a Government strong enough in the confidence of the people to carry out a complete organised policy. A sound beginning has been already made from several approaches. The Old Age Pensions Act, the Trades Boards Bill, the Small Holdings Act, the Town Planning Bill, and last, not least, the Labor Exchange Act, are valuable contributions towards the new social order. But it is no disparagement to these achievements to say that the greatest task still remains to be attempted, in devising a substitute for the present stagnant, degrading, inhumane, and wasteful Poor Law, and in supplying the important economic measures required to give efficacy to the machinery of Labor Exchanges, in dealing with able-bodied unemployed. The Prime Minister has again endorsed his former pledges for poor law and unemployed legislation, and the next session will see the introduction of at least one considerable section of the constructive work. We are glad to learn that the National Organisation for the Break-up of the Poor Law, formed to educate public opinion in favor of immediate action along the line of the Minority Report, is already casting the proposals of that Report in the draft of a Bill, which we hope the Government may see their way to adopting as a basis for legislative action. Now that the Report has had time to sink into the mind of the nation, we feel confident that, whatever differences of opinion may remain regarding the exact nature of the administrative machinery employed, the fundamental principle of the Minority proposals is gaining an ever wider acceptance. We do not want another Poor Law, whatever it be called, which shall maintain a base, injurious severance between a large class of "destitutes" and the rest of the nation, which shall continue the wasteful overlapping between the various public authorities, and shall leave virtually untouched the origins of poverty and incompetency. This task, the greatest measure of social reform any English Government has been confronted with, can never be performed by a Conservative Government, for two reasons. In the first place, as the reception of the Small Holdings Act implies, they would never place upon the Statute Book a measure securing real equality of economic opportunities to the dependent classes in town and country from whose enforced toil, excessive rents, sweated wages, overcrowding, over-drinking, so much of their private wealth and power is derived. Secondly, their fixed adhesion to Protection as the finance of social reform inhibits the efficacy of such reform, since, by diminishing the productive efficiency of the nation, and by placing an increased share of this reduced income in the hands of landowners and favored manufacturers, it must continually create more poverty than it can cure. The success of any genuine reforms of the Poor Law and any genuine remedies for unemployment is thus indissolubly bound to the enforcement of the new taxation to which the Government is committing the nation.

THE TACTICS OF VIOLENCE.

We hope that the general body of women suffragists will pause before they give their leaders full authority to pursue the tactics of violence which have been formally adopted and acted upon at Birmingham and elsewhere, and are avowed and excused in a remarkable letter to the "Times" by Miss Christabel Pankhurst. It is necessary to see what these methods are. They include gross personal assaults on the Prime Minister, and other members of the present Government, who cannot resent them physically on the ground of personal dignity and the feeling which forbids a man of refinement to strike a woman who attacks him. They also involve the throwing of stones or "metal missiles" into the private houses of Ministers, into crowded public meetings, into street throngs, and into railway carriages, without regard to the fact that physical injury, even death, may be the result. One of the women who threw a "metal missile" into Mr. Asquith's train, said that "she wished he had been in it," and the station-master at Birmingham added that she admitted to him she had aimed at a certain carriage because she thought it contained the Prime Minister. Presumably, therefore, she wished to injure him, and, indeed, it does not seem to us that between "metal missiles" and bombs, with wild girls excited by a vehement propaganda to throw them, a very considerable interval exists. It is clear that these criminal acts and intentions arise, not as an indirect and unpremeditated effect of the agitation, but as a deliberate development of it. Miss Pankhurst informs us that there have been two stages in the "militant suffragist campaign." The first, which contained no more violent incident than the persistent interruption of public meetings, in itself an interference with free speech, and the assembling of crowds to witness and aid attempts to "rush" the Houses of Parliament, ended when the Government declined to receive a deputation, and when women were excluded from meetings which they would have broken up. "The use of new methods," says Miss Pankhurst, "then came into play." Attempts were made to "force" the doors of public meetings, and when these gatherings were protected by a "countermove" on the part of the Government, "we took to the use of stones (time-honored political weapons)." The "crime" of resorting to "methods of violence," "repugnant" as they are to the suffragettes, rests with the Government, who must also, we suppose, be charged with the "danger to the general public" involved in a series of promiscuous outrages on public men.

We think we may say that these tactics are unexampled in British politics. If we are answered that there is a parallel in the case of the Irish Land League and the agrarian outrages which accompanied its agitation, we must point out that no such likeness exists. We are not thinking of the distinction—and it is a very real one—between the character of the quarrel between the Irish people and their landlords and the five-year-old agitation for securing the Parliamentary vote to some women. What we have specially in mind is that though "village ruffianism" played a part in that agitation, the central directing body took the line, we think with perfect honesty, of discouraging outrage, and successfully repelled all charges and insinuations based on the belief that violence was promoted or favored by the headquarters of the movement. The case of the Women's Social and Political Union is very different. The government of this body is autocratic, and its leaders have, wisely or unwisely, refused to conduct it on the basis of an average self-ruled body of political reformers. Its policy is dictated and controlled from the centre, and according to Miss Pankhurst, it is a policy of physical force. A few months of constitutional agitation in a free country have convinced its directors that there is nothing for it but recourse to the "time-honored political weapons" which presumably did the first murder. Cobden gave up a good part of a life-time to "agitating" Free Trade; nearly all the Chartists and the Radicals of the early nineteenth century died without coming into their kingdom, or after seeing but a very faint vision of it. Women, having succeeded notably in the not unimportant business of vividly interesting a part of their own sex in political business, and of converting a great number of men to the suffrage, must take to the one course of public action for which they are unfitted, and in which they are bound to fail. We suppose they will persist in it. But it is the action of a friend to point out that under the form in which they have resorted to force, they have laid themselves open to the most severe form of retort, and have left their leaders convicted, by their own words and by the form of political association they have adopted, of a responsibility which was never sought by Mr. Parnell, never brought home to him, and never justly attributed to him.

Now let us examine the effects of the official resort to violence in the women's campaign. That the movement in its earlier and more innocent phases has quickened the political interests of many hundreds of women we do not doubt. But while it has conquered some new territory it has lost much of the old. We do not consider the practical exclusion of women from Liberal and Free Trade meetings and their partial exclusion from Parliament to be light matters. Nor do we concede that the exciting, sentimental, passionate side of the work of the Women's Social and Political Union, with its central appeal to women of leisure and property, offers a good kind of political training or provides a preparation for that fruitful and happy intervention of women in our public life which we sincerely desire. But what can they gain if they succeed on the violent side? They might just conceivably frighten, harass, bore, and exasperate some weak statesman into seeming to concede their demand. But no moral force would be behind such a concession, improbable as it is. Neither the Liberal nor the Tory Party would allow their chiefs to take so serious a step as the enfranchisement of women at the instance of a campaign of "nagging," with the threat and the use of physical violence at the back of it. And even if this measure of progress were achieved, the country, or, let us say, the mass of male voters, with whom the issue lies, would not endorse it.

It is at this point that the capital error of the suffragettes has occurred. They have, indeed, made two mistakes, both of them springing from the original miscalculation. They thought that women could use force effectively, when it was clear that they could not so use it, and they hoped to frighten men—not in itself a worthy end—when they have merely irritated them into a blank denial of women's capacity to act with discretion in public life, or into a more rational refusal to concede a great change of political power in response to a calculated resort to violence. What are the evidences of a change of opinion on this subject, in a sense unfavorable to the women's cause? We can only judge by the feeling in the House of Commons. The election of 1906 yielded a majority of votes—for the most part a careless and unthinking majority—for some kind of a Suffrage Bill on democratic lines. Where is that majority now? A shrewd member of the House of Commons, personally favorable to the suffrage, assured the writer of this article that he did not know more than half-a-dozen of his colleagues who both believed in and would press a Suffrage Bill. The Tories have drawn back from their earlier coquetting with the movement. The Liberals have been scandalised and affronted by the persecution of their leader. The Labor men disagree as a body with the limited Bill, and for the most part dislike its propaganda. As practical politics the cause has gone back, and the mere willingness of enthusiastic young women to endure great physical privations, in the hope that they may win converts to their cause, will not advance that special phase of the women's movement. It will cause the State some inconvenience, and it will give pain and regret to individuals. But it will not alter the fact that the question of the women's vote is submitted to a jury of men, which has been so handled by the women's counsel that small hope remains of a favorable verdict.

However, we do not expect that these arguments of ours will appeal to the "militant" section. They will go on, as men and women go on in wrong courses, because they do not know how to draw back. It is, therefore, a case for the general body of women suffragists to intervene before it is too late. They must have been grieved and affronted by much that has been said and done in their behalf, and they cannot, we think, any longer conclude with reason that their cause has been promoted by it. The idea of women declaring war on men is repulsive, because in such a conflict the best men know that the meanest and least imaginative "sex view," and that which is most unjust to women, will prevail, and that the innumerable benefits and graces that flow from a harmonious relationship between men and women will be ignored or despised. This is really the calamity of a wrongly directed political movement for women, and it is one which women themselves are best fitted to repel. In spite of the unfavorable appearances of the hour, we hope to see a Women's Suffrage Bill carried into law, though we cannot put our fingers on the statesman in either party who has the will or the power to do it. But many of the most powerful friends of such a policy are reduced to silence and to shame; they can only leave it to women to put themselves and their sisters right with a world which, on the whole, is still, we hope, willing to do them justice.

AN AMERICAN EXPERIMENT.

Porto Rico, it was recently announced, is to have a new Governor, the seventh or eighth new Governor it has been privileged to welcome since it became an American possession. Unlike his predecessors, the newest Governor has a thorough knowledge of the Spanish language, and the hope was expressed, in the cablegram announcing his appointment, that this accomplishment would "aid Mr. Cotton in winning back the good-will of the natives." The inference that all is not going well with the American experiment in the West Indies is, we fear, justified. The Americans have done a great deal of excellent work in Porto Rico, but they have not yet succeeded in winning either the respect or the affection of the people. They have built some four hundred miles or roads, over two-and-a-half times as much as the Spaniards built in three centuries. They have set up one hundred and sixty schools. They have established free trade between Porto Rico and the United States, and the duties levied on Porto Rican products entering American ports during the first year or two of the occupation—amounting to some £400,000—they voluntarily turned over to the insular Government. All the moneys raised in the island by local taxation, except ten per cent. to defray the cost of collection, are distributed among the townships, and are expended by them without interference from the United States. All the moneys raised by Federal taxation—custom dues and internal revenue—are spent for the benefit of the Porto Ricans. The United States derives nothing in the nature of a tribute from her ownership of the island. On the contrary she loses by it. She pays out of her own pocket the cost of the local army, the revenue vessels, the light-house service, the coast surveys, the harbor improvements, the post-office deficit, the weather bureau, and the upkeep of the agricultural experiment station. She appropriated £40,000 to the relief of the islanders after the terrible hurricane of 1899. American energy has practically banished smallpox, and has greatly diminished anæmia among the natives. There can be no question that the island is better off materially than it ever was under Spanish rule. Trade has made considerable strides; land values have more than trebled. The people enjoy all the constitutional guarantees of American citizenship. They have an effective share in framing their own laws; they are freely admitted into the Civil Service; they have the advantage of living under a Government that, as Governments go, is honest, enterprising, and stable.

Yet they are not grateful, they are not happy. With every year that passes, their grievances seem to multiply and the gulf between themselves and their American rulers to widen. Last April they dispatched a delegation to lay their complaints before the American Congress, and a few weeks later President Taft felt obliged to send a special message to Congress dealing with the legislative deadlock in the island and recommending a far-reaching change in the organic law of its government. One of the grievances of the Porto Ricans is that they are now without a country. They have lost their Spanish citizenship and the United States has refused and probably will always refuse to admit them into the American Union. Another grievance is that, in spite of universal suffrage, they do not possess the reality of self-government. There are two Houses in the Porto Rican legislature, the House of Delegates, a popularly elected body, and the Senate, composed of five Porto Ricans and six Americans, the six Americans being also the heads of the chief executive departments. As there can be no legislation and no public expenditure without the consent of both these bodies, it follows either that the six Americans in the Senate get their own way in everything, or that there is a deadlock between the two Houses—the Senate, for instance, refusing to concur in legislation sent up by the House of Delegates, and the House of Delegates retaliating by declining to vote any moneys with which to carry on the Government until their measures are adopted. Again, by applying the American tariff to all foreign imports into Porto Rico, the Americans cut off the islanders from their familiar markets in Spain and France without furnishing them with a new one in the United States. This has been particularly the case in regard to the coffee trade, which is to-day considerably worse off than before the American occupation. Although the exports and imports figures as a whole are higher than they were in Spanish days, the increase is mainly due to the growing cultivation of sugar and tobacco, crops which for the most part are owned by absentee speculators in Spain and the United States. The flounderings of American lawyers among Spanish usages, the heedlessness of Congress in placing the island upon a gold basis almost at a moment's notice, and the laws enacted at Washington in the early days of the occupation, when the whole of America was in one of its periodic alarms over the trusts, penalising almost every form of corporate enterprise in Porto Rico, have all tended to hinder development and foster discontent.

But undoubtedly the most fertile source of friction between the Americans and their wards is the class of men hitherto sent to the island as officials and administrators. Here we touch a weakness that has already been painfully visible in the Philippines and Hawaii, and that seems likely to impair the whole American experiment in "colonial" government. Our own experience goes to show that, to rule successfully, a stable, competitive, high-salaried Civil Service is indispensable. But Americans habitually underpay all their public officials, and instinctively regard a system which does not make a clean sweep of all office-holders after every election as "undemocratic." Eleven years have gone by since the American plunge into Imperialism, yet nothing has been done to organise a colonial service that would attract the best men in the country. Moreover, the average American has no desire to rule. It is not a part of his make-up. He has neither inherited it in the blood nor does his school training supply it. A colonial career offers few inducements to him. If he is ambitious there is no country with one-hundredth part of the opportunities to offer that America throws at his feet. If he is pining for adventure, where will he find it if not in the United States? There is no problem of the younger son in America to supply an incentive to expatriation. The ordinary American youth shrinks almost as readily as the ordinary French youth from the idea of exile. He is unused to solitude; he is reared in an eminently sociable and gregarious environment; and the ideal of a comfortable old age on a pension hardly ever enters his head. The professional and commercial rewards open to him in his own country are so enormous and so tempting, and service under Government adds so little to an American's standing in his community, that the thought of accepting an office in the Philippines or Porto Rico seems almost like a confession of defeat in the battle of life. Moreover, Americans have little of the protecting, elder-brotherly feeling towards men of another color that unquestionably redeems the arrogance of British Imperialism. On the contrary, they are far more likely to feel a physical repugnance for the brown man and the black. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at that the governors in their dependencies should succeed one another with bewildering rapidity, and that the conduct, character, and personality of the officials under them should fail to win good-will for American rule.

Life and Letters.

THE LOST ART OF CONVERSATION.

THE Johnson commemoration has caused many persons to ask what has become of the art of conversation through which his great personality and powers of mind have come down to us in Boswell's inimitable record. The significance of such a question becomes evident when we reflect how small and how unrepresentative a part of such a man his writings were. Though Johnson wrote in many styles, and on a great variety of themes, he can never be said to have devoted himself to literature, unless it be during his seven years' task-work on his dictionary. Finishing that in early middle-life, he spent very little of his time and energy in writing. Nor was he a great reader, though he "tore out the heart" of a great many books. He lived for conversation, in the society of friends, with an occasional incursion of enemies. With some qualification the same statement applies to most of the best-known writers of that day. To Burke, Goldsmith, Sheridan, literature was never an absorbing occupation. The living word figured more largely in the intellectual life of the time than the dead word. Why was this, and is it matter for regret? Perhaps we have even begged the question in treating the written word as dead. The issue rather may be stated thus: "How far can a wise or witty man acquire and communicate his wisdom or his wit in live company with his fellows, and how far in the colder and more formal mode of literary composition?" It is, of course, evident that no general satisfactory answer can be given to such a question. It is, we shall be told, a question of the man, the matter, and the company. Some men's wit lies locked in the coffers of their slow-working brains. Such a man was Addison, who "had but sixpence in his pocket, though he could 'draw' for fifty pounds." Others, like Goldsmith, may do poor justice to themselves in presence of a dominant personality, though Boswell does not, in fact, sustain the libel of Sir Joshua. Then, again, there are matters too abstruse or complicated for successful conversation. Coleridge, in his broken age at Highgate, could discourse with copious facility upon "Omject" and "Sumject," but as Carlyle discovered, a visit to such a sage did not allow much give and take.

Indeed, we may doubt whether philosophers as such are fitted for conversation. For they will be apt to impose a too rigorous system of tests and standards upon each topic as it rises. Neither a professorial expatiation nor a Socratic dialogue is conversation. To put two or more intellectual persons in a room is evidently no guarantee of effective conversation. They may smoke apart in silence for a whole evening, as is no doubt falsely told of Tennyson and Carlyle, parting with the solitary remark, "Eh, mon, but we've had a grand evening." Or one may get his innings first and carry out his bat. There is no conversation when two continuous talkers meet under such circumstances as the famous meeting of Brougham and Macaulay, when the eager waiting for a break evoked from the French visitor the whispered comment, "S'il tousse, il est perdu."

It is, indeed, often contended with some show of reason that conversation is too polite an art for Britons. If the practice of the renowned French salons be taken as authoritative, this would be true. The lightness of touch, the swift allusiveness, the easy changefulness of tone, admitting every sort of emotional expression and intellectual instrument, seriousness, pathos, irony, brief runs of logic, verbal play, even anger and invective, handling every matter, grave or gay, even holding fire for a brief moment in the hand—everything seems possible, if swift equal intercourse can be maintained among those who accept the conditions of "the game." For to Englishmen such an amicable intercourse of minds, expressing themselves with apparently complete spontaniety, must always retain some air of artificiality. And indeed it is evident enough that the conversation of our clubs and coffee-houses, when they were used for free discussion, never approached this ideal of the salon. In the first place, too much of the tradition of the cock-pit prevailed in them. The finer French art was truly social; as much a co-operative art as the elaborate contre-dances of the age, it involved as much self-restraint as self-expression. The topic must pass from mind to mind, from lip to lip, brightened, reversed, adorned, reshaped: no dogmatist must down it, no monopolist devour it, no fool degrade it. Now the conversation in the companies which Johnson frequented was not of such a kind nor devoted to such ends. It was too combative, too individualistic. There was doubtless much amenity, much excellent fellowship in these club or tavern gatherings, where a man could "fold his legs and have his talk out" among friends whom he met regularly, whose frets and foibles he well understood, and who were accustomed to sharpen their wits on one another. But "contending for victory" is apt to damage the finer fruits of conversation: sound argument becomes entangled with sophistry, facts are distorted, and false analogies, flourished with brilliancy, too often win the day. In Johnson's prime there was too much of this gladiatorial display. A meeting between the Doctor and Burke was no doubt magnificent, but it could hardly be called conversation. "That fellow," he said at a time of illness, "calls forth all my powers. Were I to see Burke now it would kill me."

Yet even in such contests, though the note of controversy was too much stressed, there was great gain. "Thurlow is a fine fellow, he fairly puts his mind to yours." Here, after all, lies the true worth of conversation. No reading of books, no printed disputation, can take the place of this direct intellectual contact. How much is lost by the failure of modern society to make adequate provision for this fruitful interchange of thought! "Modern society," wrote Mr. Leslie Stephen, "is too vast and too restless to give a conversationalist a fair chance. For the formation of real proficiency in the art, friends should meet often, sit long, and be thoroughly at ease." They do none of these things, and they think they cannot. But they are mistaken, they are slaves of superstitious valuations of time and methods. In the struggle between the spoken and the written word the latter has of recent times gained an evil ascendency; the knowledge of human nature and of life which can only come through personal intercourse, and which is even falsified by the bookish life, is gravely under-rated. Among the educated professional classes, in particular, bookish specialisation has gone far, not, indeed, to breed a race of recluses, but to banish serious matter from all ordinary intercourse, and to keep conversation upon settled conventional planes. Indeed, if one reflects for a single moment upon the accepted code of polite society to-day, its intellectual sterility becomes evident. In an age of specialism it is "bad form" to talk shop, that is, to discuss what one knows best and what is most likely to inform others; any sustained allusions to religion, food, sex relations, or even politics are placed under a ban which extends to all the deeper and more serious affairs of life. Of course, grave matters are broached, for their avoidance would be impossible, but their sensational surface alone is subject to discussion; there must be no attempt to open up inner meanings, or to focus reflection. We are not here thinking of the frivolous or light-headed majority whose conversation remains what it ever was, and is at any rate sincere, a fairly free expression of shallow thought and feelings.

It is among those who must be called the "intellectuals" that the defect, and even falsity, of conversation is so strongly marked. A light tone of banter, with a studied avoidance of depths, a perpetual recourse to the formal minutiae of the intellectual life, talk "about" scholars, artists, playwrights and their works, anything to escape the big and really interesting issues which everywhere are lurking underneath our conscious life!

The cause is partly timidity, but largely a mischievous and even a morose secretiveness, a really selfish refusal to give oneself away in any truly free and generous talk, to contribute to any co-operative effort to clear thought or win truth, accompanied by a distrust in this social mode of intellectual effort. It is sometimes maintained that, in a day when most men of intellect are writers, words of wit and wisdom are deliberately withheld for the profitable uses of the literary market. If it were so, one might urge that some enlightened Chancellor of the Exchequer should impose an undeveloped brain-tax, in order to stop such a churlish policy.

But we fear the real trouble is deeper- seated. The collapse of the art of conversation, we surmise, belongs to a state of society which is inimical to the true art of friendship. For real conversation is only possible among friends of long and settled intimacy whose sympathy is both deep and wide-ranged. Under modern conditions of "civilised" life a circle of such friends becomes a rarity: division of labor, change of residence, the excessive demands of print, the elaborated organisation of interests, the spread of material luxury—in a word, the restlessness and dissipation of our life—render very difficult that sort of intercourse of friends in which conversation of the best sort can really flourish.

THE MID-VICTORIAN CHURCH AND CHAPEL.

We can conceive a scholar of the year 2009, commissioned by the Department of Historical Research to write an account of nineteenth century England, setting aside for "special reference" four writers of special interest and credit. The first would certainly be the authoress of "Pride and Prejudice," the second of "Cranford." The other two, we think, would be Anthony Trollope—the Trollope of the Barsetshire series—and the author who still calls himself "Mark Rutherford."* And we imagine that the "general heading" under which these writers would most naturally be grouped would be "Mid-Victorian Anglicanism and Dissent," with "cross references" to "Politics" and "Religion." At this point our author's difficulties would begin. "Barchester Towers" and "Mark Rutherford's Autobiography" are both works of genius, and they deal with almost the same period of time and the same general subject, namely, the way in which religious thought and worship were organised in provincial England fifty or sixty years ago. Yet it would be difficult to find a sharper contrast of style and literary treatment. The writers doubtless were widely different men, though both possess the same quietness of method, the same distaste for the mere strepitus verborum, the imposing clash and picturesque romance of words. Trollope was, above all, a humoristic writer, a dry impassive observer of life. "Mark Rutherford," on the other hand, is passionately interested in his subject, and of all English men of letters comes nearest to Rousseau in his power to make personal experience real—to speak of himself and to thrill his listeners with the story. And of the two writers, the latter, being the sincerer, is also the more trustworthy as an historical witness. Trollope's sense of fun, like Dickens's, overflowed when he worked on characters so purely comic as Mrs. Proudie or the Signora Neroni. In "Mark Rutherford," not only is the first-hand knowledge more intimate, but the image of the past rises untroubled by literary waywardness, and steeped only in the softened light of memory and emotion. And, therefore, on the whole, the Mid-Victorian Chapel is happier in its chronicler than is the Church and the Cathedral Close.

Indeed, Trollope, fair-minded as he was, and interested in Anglicanism, could hardly bring himself to discern any special spiritual texture in the life of the average Church dignitary of fifty years ago. He was acutely sensible of its dignity, self-restraint, propriety of bearing; and Mr. Slope, his nearest approach to a clerical villain, is still a long way off the malignant plotter of the "Curé de Tours." But he could not help conceiving the Establishment as a thoroughly Erastian institution, not vitally moved to extremes of "High" or "Low," but resting, broad-based, on endowments, the landed gentry, the State, and the diocesan system. Clericalism was a profession like any other; and the great thing in it, with an ample handicap for kind deeds, forbearance, and courtesy, was the race for preferment. A Bishopric was a good thing; a Deanery less good; a Canonry not to be despised. But the best of all was for your side to win; if you were of the Dean's party to see that he triumphed, if of the Bishop's to trample (without scandal) on the foe. Trollope's gallery of clerical portraits contains no saints, unless it be the rather negative Mr. Harding: even the fanatically upright Crawley is not allowed to draw any special consolation from the austere practice of his religion, but rather sustains himself in his trials by a kind of stoical ferocity. Nearly all Trollope's clerical books end with the double prize of a marriage and a preferment, as if the one human state were intolerable without the other. The play of morals is of the faintest and most ironical kind. Within the secluded circle, shielded from the grosser passions, appear in due order the clerical Vices and Virtues, gently pricking or restraining their subjects. The former, in due course, retire foiled. The Rev. Mr. Robarts almost, but not quite, outruns the constable. Archdeacon Grantly nearly wishes his father, the Bishop, to die before the Tory Government goes out, and his chance of the succession disappears. The weakness of Trollope's presentation, exquisitely humorous as it is, is that no visible cause for such a church appears to exist, unless it be an unintelligible preference of the English Crown and aristocracy for playing the game of clerical patronage. Trollope's parsons are shepherds without sheep; knowing neither the reproach of the Cross nor its glory.

No one can make this complaint of "Mark Rutherford's" pictures of the life of the small Dissenting chapel, Independent, or Baptist, or Unitarian, in the villages and market towns of the Eastern Midlands about two generations ago. Here the types are at once lower and more exalted, while the "professional" outlook is entirely changed. Even the parish of Hogglestock could hold no such tyrants as Snale and Hexton. Crawley warred with Mrs. Proudie and public opinion, not with the vulgar malignity or the more stupid arrogance which exudes from the petty masters of the rural tabernacle in "Mark Rutherford's" books. Probably no more cramping fetters were ever devised for the human soul than the old Calvinist theology, linked to a form of Church government in which the minister's happiness, good fame, and livelihood lay at the mercy of a diaconate of farmers and village drapers. For generations, thousands of sensitive men have groaned under this tyranny, and hundreds have gone down under it. Yet it has been a chief nursery of Liberal politics and social revolt in scores of centres of provincial life. Here are Pecksniff and Chadband, not caricatured, as by their creator, but set down literally and persuasively. Here are the utterly unspiritual types that for centuries kept going the fabric of evangelical Christianity in England. And here is the core of reality and profound religious sentiment which always restored and sweetened it. The present writer saw much of this life in his youth; "Mark Rutherford's" chronicles, astounding as they must appear to the uninitiated, seem to him photographic in their truth.

There is one difference between Trollope's and "Mark Rutherford's" account of religious forms in mid-century England; one is a picture of life, the other of a kind of death-in-life. Trollope's clerics are all, or nearly all, gentlemen. They are rarely even poor, and it would be excessive to call them sinners. Only a lighter or heavier touch of reserve, snobbery, refinement, ambition, honor, hypocrisy, high-mindedness, self-seeking, differentiates them. "Mark Rutherford's" are set in a much grosser frame of things—the frame of the shop parlor, the ill-lit, half-deserted country chapel, the "Dorcas meeting," the heavy mid-day dinner, and the ceremonial tea. They serve little circles of gossip and spite and fussy domination and average stolid human nature, here and there visited by a strain of pure aspiring thought and sentiment, or of defiance and revolt. They are either gross vulgarians, like Mr. Broad, or sly sensualists like his son, or stern, self-disciplined souls like the Calvinist minister in "Tanner's Lane," or heroic figures, struggling to the light amid incredibly mean surroundings, casting off one form of creed after another, beset by passion, weakness, sentimentalism, the craving for sympathy and self-revelation, all the slight creatures and vain longings and sweet perversities of earth—like "Mark" himself. It is impossible to give an idea of how this great and little known writer contrives to fling on to this tiny stage the deepest shadows and the transfiguring lights of human existence, and to mix them with its common experiences; it is enough to say that to him, as to the singer's grave in Wordsworth's poem, those who think and feel will increasingly resort. Essentially his books are histories of English Puritanism, as modern Nonconformity has carried it on; and yet their tone and setting are much more than Puritan. They tell of the waste of rich temperaments and passionate energies which Puritan repression has involved; they tell also of the strength of mind which has survived the struggle, equipped with the moral force it provided, and prepared to meet the phases of spiritual and social change of which they are the most suggestive and convincing harbingers.

IN MOTLEY.

A DOG smiles, but if, as philosophers used to tell us, laughter is the distinctive peculiarity of mankind, it is remarkable to what expense the rich and great have put themselves to remain human under the burden of their responsibilities and possessions. Most men laugh cheap, and their difficulty is to be solemn. Certainly, they love a music-hall for its comic song, and a circus for its clown. But if you suggested to the average wage-earner to obtain perpetual laughter by keeping Harry Lauder in the back kitchen, he would stare, even if he could afford it. Yet that is what the rich and great did for many centuries in this country, and in some parts of the world still do, so fearful are they of losing their human attribute among the cares of riches.

Ranged with black pages, monkeys, poets, and dwarfs, there is no question that kings and nobles kept a Fool as an essential part of their retinue. We are reminded of it just now by the performance of "King Lear" under Mr. Herbert Trench's direction, for Lear's Fool is one of the most delicate among Shakespeare's imaginations. But the Fool at Court was no mere poetic vision, no child's conception of happiness beyond the dreams of laughter. During at least forty generations of Christian history the rulers and owners of the known world paid and fed a man as a matter of course to make them laugh. Sometimes that was not his only office, for the Fool's other name of Jester points to better days when, as a minstrel, he sang of deeds that called for no grinning. Even the Elizabethan Fool is generally a singer too, just as a barber sometimes still retains the emblems of old surgery, and it is the subtle Fool in "Twelfth Night" who sings "O Mistress Mine," the best of love-songs. In Ireland also, where laughter was easier and the mighty hardly lived long enough to enjoy it, the Fool seems never to have supplanted the satiric bard, whose office was to make people, including his master, uncomfortable rather than jolly. But in the royal and baronial residences of Europe, the Fool's true function was not song or satire, but simply laughter, and in the English Court it was less than a century ago that the Fool's office became merged once more in that of the poet-laureate.

It need not surprise us that the Fool, besides being originally something of a poet, was often identical with the dwarf. From Homer down to the White-eyed Kaffir, gods and men have always thought deformity a fine subject for laughter, and if the very look of a Fool was enough to raise a roar, his value as a wit was proportionately augmented. We know from Velasquez with what delight the presence of a dwarf could penetrate even the gloomy Court of Spain, for the male and female monsters of the day are as immortal upon his canvas as his flounced princesses or Philip himself. We know that if two of these laughable deformities married in some European Court, the whole capital went into a paroxysm of amusement. Many of the best known Fools to our own Royal Family were in some way misshapen—too short, too long, or crooked in the legs; and on that account they were all the better received, just as the wealthy of to-day cherish pug dogs, dachshunds, and "toy Poms," with special affection for their deformities. Nor can we condemn our fathers for primitive merriment while we still see the maids giggling at a humpback, and when we recognise that a "funny" face is seldom beautiful, that a knocked-out tooth often gives a shrewdness to expression, that a stutter enforces the epigram, and a turned-up nose makes laughter catching.

It must have been a strange crisis in the life of a youth when he determined to be a Fool. Unless Nature had endowed him with some imbecility or dwarfish advantage—in which case his calling as village idiot or king's jester was but a Hobson's choice—how did he decide upon that profession rather than another? What were his qualifications as a boy for the career of Fool? Did he feel the wit quickening in his brain and spring it on a king, just as in youth we now spring jokes on the editor of "Punch" by post? Or, perhaps, his homespun parents larded his hair and, leading him up to the castle, blew the horn, crossed the drawbridge, and thus accosted their lord, who at that time occupied the position of a school-management committee:—

> "May it please your Lordship," they would say, "his mother and me, we don't know what to do with this here boy of ourn, he's that silly and blusterous. He's always a-sayin', and when he isn't a-saying', he starts doin' such as never. The things he do say, they be fit to make a cat laugh, let alone your Lordship, and as to doin', it's only yesterday he fixed a bag of flour so as the sexton coming in for a drop of ale lets it down on his head and covers himself white all over, whereby he warn't fit to be seen at the funeral after. And when she see that, his mother up and beats him, and says, 'That's just the sort of thing as his Lordship and the gentry do enjoy wonderful to keep 'em merry,' says she. So here we brings the boy to your Lordship in hopes you'll make a Fool on him."

Then, as a speculation in future merriment, the armored baron would take the boy into his retinue, shave his head bare, fit him a cap with ass's ears and the comb of a cock, hang him with bells, give him a bauble of a carved stick to play with, cover his body with patchwork, and make one leg yellow and the other scarlet, so that at the very look of him the lords and ladies might feel cheerful and inclined to laugh.

But the absurdity of the dress was not only for laughter. We know the advantages of a mask; what alien courage a domino gives to dancers, and a pseudonym to the critic of our books. In "King Lear" itself, even the excellent and sensible Edgar becomes a far more interesting character as crazy Tom o' Bedlam—so much more interesting that the poet himself seems to have forgotten that Tom was but a counterfeit. And thus, from behind his motley, the Fool could say things that no one would dare to say if clothed and in his right mind. It must have been a gruesome thing for the Fool if he failed in his profession and could not raise a laugh—as gruesome as when the man who lives by a daily joke sees the printer's boy waiting and the page is bare. Nor can we assume that, because the records of the Jesters are to us the dullest form of literature, it was therefore easier to be a Fool then than now. While Shakespeare lived, it was the duty of the King's Jester to divert the Queen when she was tired of playing the game, "Rise, pig, and go," with her maids, and it may well have been as difficult for him as it would be now to divert a literary dinner. The fashion of laughter changes fast, and we cannot doubt that, as far as laughter goes, those heavy-seeming Fools made their living as honestly as the Pierrots, Pantaloons, Clowns, and humorists who are the successors that democracy keeps. But laughter from behind his motley was not the Fool's only function.

From East to West, throughout man's history, a holy licence has been granted to Fools. It was early discovered how nearly insanity and inspiration might be allied, and a village imbecile is still called "the natural," as though he came closer to Nature's heart. He is called "the simpleton," too, and "the innocent," as though his mind were clear of complications, and his spirit incapable of sin. The same thought was in the poet's heart when he said, "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained praise," and when the Franciscans took the title of "the World's Fools," they did but follow the tradition of the unlearned. In like manner an order of great simplicity fell to be called the "Fools of God," and in later times we come to Tolstoy's "Ivan the Fool," and the "Simple Fool" of Wagner's "Parsifal." Even in Court Fools something of that clear insight of innocency was expected—something of that intimate relationship to the heart of life.

"I wear not motley in my brain," said Touchstone, but Lear's Fool is the best example of wisdom lying hid in folly. One remembers two sayings of historic Fools that come near his: one when the Jester dared to hint to the King of France that his navy had been destroyed at Sluys, "Prythee, Sire," he said, "why are French sailors so much braver than English? For they all jumped into the sea and swam away, but not a single Englishman dared jump." And the other is a saying of the Jester to Charles the Bold, who was always boasting himself like Hannibal; "Uncle," he cried to the Duke, as they fled headlong after the great defeat at Granson, near Neuchatel, "this is the prettiest way of being Hannibal I ever saw." But in Lear's Fool, though he, too, tells the truth of things in parable, there is that delicacy, that gentleness of touch which we do not find in any of the historic records. He has the Fool's privilege of truth, and is gifted with the Innocent's keen perception, but his knowledge fills him only with grief, and far more than the King himself he feels the pain of the sore he touches. We hear of him first that, since Cordelia went to France, he had much pined away; but for one half-smiling complaint against the storm, he never laments his own fortunes; and he disappears in the middle of the drama with the words, "And I'll to bed at noon," in which some interpreters read the prophecy of a broken heart. Then, like a spirit, he disappears and is seen no more.

Like a spirit he disappears from the midst of chaos, for he has fulfilled the Fool's part, hardly of laughter, but rather of the classic chorus—the Spirit of the Pities that pervades the play and is its justification. And, from his example, we might possibly argue that in historic life the Kings of the earth, from the days of Lear, whom Holinshed tells us was contemporary with Joash of Judah, down to the ex-Sultan now dwelling at Salonica, with his Jester and eleven wives—we might argue that Kings had kept the Fool so constantly at their side, not merely for the laugh of folly, or even for the wisdom of the insane, but as a warning voice, an outside conscience, a slave that whispered of mortality, a dog of truth that could not be whipped to kennel. Time, which stirs even within the sheepfold of Royal Courts, has assigned part of the Fool's functions to the poet laureate, as we saw, and part to the Lord Chamberlain, who sub-lets it to the Censor. On the side of laughter, the Fool's duties are carried on without a breach; but to what official of modern times shall the King and Nation go for the wisdom of holy simplicity, or for the affectionate solicitude of a public conscience?

THE UNDERGRADUATE OF 1670.

When Charles II. was on the eve of his return from his travels, he issued at Breda a declaration designed to hasten his home-coming. He declared "a liberty to tender consciences" where differences of opinion were concerned in matters of religion "which do not disturb the peace of the Kingdom." This was a qualifying clause; and it is wonderful how easily, in the judgment of some, the peace of a Kingdom may be disturbed. "John Bunyan, of the town of Bedford, labourer," runs an indictment of a year or so later, "devilishly and perniciously" abstained from coming to church, and went to a conventicle instead, "to the great disturbance and distraction of the good subjects of this Kingdom." Charles II. further qualified his declaration by making it depend on an Act of Parliament being sent to him "upon mature deliberation." His first Parliament sat eighteen years, and its maturest deliberation led to the Clarendon Code, the Test and Corporation and other Acts, which effectually cut England in two, as it remains to this day.

But our present object is not to write English history, nor to review "the mad work among the Presbyterian ministers" that Pepys predicted so accurately. Sometimes a new view is profitable—even if it is like that primitive Australian's picture of the emu sitting on her eggs, which he drew from the point of view (imaginary, let us hope) of one who saw the bird from beneath, looking up from under the eggs. The picture is historical, and, fortunately, it exists in reproduction. This shall give us our outlook for the moment. "Some things," wrote Bunyan:—

> "Some things are of that Nature as to make > One's fancie Checkle while his heart doth ake."

In Cambridge then, about 1670, there was a zealous supporter of the Government and of the Church of England, Stephen Perry by name, a brasier. It was not every one whose conscience was so stirred, but Mr. Perry was a man to despise the insinuations of slacker neighbors, and flung himself heartily into the business of making the Conventicle Act a reality, and an efficient agency for the reclamation of England to sound religion. It was provided by the Act that if two witnesses swore before a Justice of the Peace to having seen any person, aged sixteen or upward, at a Nonconformist meeting for worship—five persons to constitute a meeting—the Justice might there and then fine that person, without seeing him or hearing any defence, five shillings, or in case it were a second offence, ten. Such proceedings had to be taken within three months of the offence. There was also a provision that one-third of the fine should be paid to the informers, but it is always well not to impute motives.

There was a fellow of Trinity, Thomas Slater, a benefactor of his college, who, as a Royalist, had been deprived of his fellowship under the Commonwealth, and by way of recompense was made a baronet after the Restoration. He was a magistrate of the county, and to him Stephen Perry went for a warrant, June 25th, 1670. Sir Thomas, it is to be supposed, could not well refuse, and Perry, with his warrant, set about his work. What followed he shall say.

"On the day following I went to Toft, and hearing that there was a meeting in John Waites his house there, Simon Priest being with me, takeing the cunstable with us we went thither, and found onely fower persons there . . . After that we had parted with the cunstable (having charg'd him to search the suspected places, which he did not) we went aside, and after that return'd again towards night . . . We came to the house of William Eversden, and knock't severall times, none answering . . ." William would not let them in; however, "in the meanwhile we saw the number of 15 persons conveyed out of a back-doore."

"The day following I alone went to Sir Thomas Slater, who (I makeing my complaint to him, relating all the passage at Toft) tooke the warrant of me, and I requiring a conviction of the persons, telling him that Simon Priest who lives within 2 or 3 doors from his house, would be ready. Then Sir Thomas Slater said he was not at leisure. The next day I went to him. Then alsoe he made answer that he was busie." And so it went on; Stephen perpetually calling, and Sir Thomas "busie" or "gone to looke after his harvest" or "not within," till at last they met, and "he said it was too late, the three months were expired." Then Eversden took steps and went to an attorney ("he himself an encourager of the fanaticks") and got a writ, perhaps for malicious prosecution, against poor Stephen himself.

Stephen Perry now saw he must look higher to "be back'd out from above." So he went to the Master of St. John's with "a narrative of the wrongs done him, ridiculously drawn up, to be presented (by all means) to the King or to the Duke." He also "could not forbear bragging among the boys that he had acquainted his Majesty with all his matters." Such zeal was rewarded as it deserved, for before very long he received a letter, which we quote intact:—

CHARLES R.

Wee have received your letter from the hands of our Secretary, wherein wee are informed of your complaints against Sir

Thomas Slater, Justice of our Peace, how he hath not proceeded according to the order prescribed in our late Act, ratifyed in our late Session of Parliament. Wee do will and require you in our name forthwith to acquaint the said Sir Thomas Slater to be more vigorous in his proceedings, or he shall appeare before our Council Board to answer those things objected against him. We do furthermore authorise you to goe on in that part of a loyal subject as you have begun and in our name to show these our letters patents to our Maior of Cambridge, that he may uindicate you with his authority in your office, delivered in the presence of our Chief Secretary

ARLINGTON.

Given at our Court of Whitehall February 17th, in the year of our Lord 1670, in the three and twentieth yeare of our reign.

Addressed: To our Trusty and wellbeloved Stephen Perry, Brasier, Cambridge.

It was perhaps suspicious that the seal bore the impress of a crown piece.

Perry at once took the Royal letter to the Mayor and one of the Aldermen, who both gave credit to it. Then, in his evil hour, he took it to the Master of St. John's "with a great deal of joy." But masters of colleges are not always as guileless as the public fancies. "I knew it immediately to be a cheat," writes the Master, "and suspected the Knave that acted it. With much adoe, I persuaded Mr. Maior and our Informer that they were both gull'd."

But Mayors are serious men, and not to be played with, and the Mayor went to the Vice-Chancellor. "Wee then," continues Dr. Turner, of St. John's, "convented the boy, and he could not deny it. His impudence is inexcusable, but we are all satisfied there was no malicious designe, but pure roguery. This I must needs say for him: He has bin studious and inoffensive in all his carriage, except this great misdemeanor, and he is one of excellent facultys. He comes to us from the top of Westminster Schools, and thought this but a Westminster trick, not consideringe the consequence." It is curious how it is "high-spirited young English gentlemen," "of excellent facultys," who need the friendly aid of tutors and masters of colleges on such occasions.

The Vice-Chancellor wrote to my Lord Arlington, enclosing the Royal letter with its crown-piece seal, and a humble statement by Mr. Lewis Maidwell, of St. John's, to the effect that he had written the letter, "not out of any ill intencion, but to make sport with the saide Stephen Perry, haveinge heard that he had sent a letter to the Kinge concerning Sir Thomas Slater and the fanaticks." As Mr. Maidwell took his B.A. a year later, it is conceivable that he was forgiven.

But what a picture the episode gives us of an older Cambridge, very like the present one in many ways, and yet how different! The undergraduate hoax never, perhaps, was aimed so high, but the spirit is not unknown in our day. It is such commonplace happenings, with the forgotten names and titles, old dates and details, that bring the past before us—the harried Dissenters, the decent Justice who does not like his work, the bright lad—and the real squalor of Restoration ways of promoting true religion.

THE FLOWER-GATHERER.

"Herself a fairer flower."—MILTON.

So strong was the young beauty of the year, it might have seemed at its height were it not that each day it grew stronger. The new day excelled the one that was past, only to be outshone by the next. Day after day the sun poured out a great light and heat and joy over the earth and the delicately clouded sky. The south wind flowed in a river straight from the sun itself, and divided the fresh leaves with never-ceasing noise of amorous and joyous motion. So mighty was the sun that the miles of pale new foliage shimmered mistily like snow, yet each leaf was cool and moist with youth, and the voices of the birds creeping and fluttering among the branches were as the souls of that coolness and moistness and youth. If one moment the myriad forms of life and happiness intoxicated the delighted senses, at another a glimpse of the broad mild land stretched out below, and of the sun ruling it in the blue above, gave also a calm and a celestial dignity and simplicity to the whole. One after another the pools, the rivers and rivulets, the windows or glass roofs of the vale, caught the sun and sparkled as if Vega and Gemma and Arcturus and Sirius and Aldebaran and Algol had fallen among the meadows and woods.

On some days the sense of oneness, of wide power and splendor uniting earth and sky, of infinite simplicity, triumphed. On others the spirit was content to bathe and half lose itself in numbers, exuberance, complexity, in the odors and colors and forms, one by one, in the rich rising flood of the grass, in the hurrying to and fro of preparation that was nevertheless not over much troubled about the end.

The children seemed to be trying to gather all the flowers. It was their way of striving to grasp the infinite. They were scattered over the hillside, where the pale sward was made an airy or liquid substance by the innumerable cowslips nodding upon its surface, as upon a lake, that held their small shadows each quite clear. All day they gathered flowers, and threw them away, and gathered more, and still there were no less. The earth continued to murmur with blissful ease, as if, like the wandering humble bee, it were drowsed with the warmth and the abundance.

One child separated herself from the rest, moving down instead of across or up the hill. Often she went on her knees among the flowers, with bent eyes that saw only the hundreds close at hand. But from time to time she raised her head, her delicately browned and yet more rosy face, her gleamy hair, that was as pale as barley on her temples but elsewhere golden brown as wheat, her round and calm yet lively eyes, her restless happy lips—and looked steadily for a moment at the whole of earth and sky, and grew solemn, only to return to the other pleasure of the hundred cowslips just at her feet, the crystal and emerald wings among them, the pearly snails, the daisies and the chips of chalk like daisies. Tighter grew her hand round the swelling bunch. She slipped, the flowers fell, and not all were picked up again; and so there was yet room for bluebells when she reached the wood below. In the moister fields still lower there were kingcups of gold and cuckoo flowers pink and white, looking as if they had fluttered down from the sky; and for these also a place had to be found. The stitchworts of a hedge side lured and piloted her to the hollow, hardly larger than a cathedral, where a brook ran straight, for once in its life.

By the slow stream forget-me-nots made a continuous haze on either bank. She was now quite alone, under the old cherry tree of the forsaken garden at the water's edge. Six or eight huge crooked branches rising out of the rocky trunk bore up a dome that was all flowers. They were in rounded clusters as of bubbling snow, and close as honeycomb. The lovely freckled white smelt bitter and sweet at once. The flowers hummed with bees, and between the clusters were streaks and wedges of the blue. The child looked up suddenly at this glorious roof, and her smile of surprise passed into what would have been indifference, because the blossoms were inaccessible, if she had not caught sight of the forget-me-nots when the flight of a cuckoo that had been calling out of the cherry-tree carried her eyes away to where he skimmed the water. He did not fly far, nor cease to call while he was flying, or when he was seated on one of the alders by the brook. She looked at him as she was plucking the forget-me-nots. This narrow hollow was his room, she thought. Yet it was full of other songs. There were blackbirds hidden in the hazels, or clearly defined against the may flower or the bronzed flowering oaks. Thrushes talked and called out to her a hundred times: "Did she do it? Did she do it? Did she? Did she? She did, she did!" and she laughed. A swallow flew over his image in the water as if about to dive in after it, and then rose up and curved away. Smaller unfamiliar birds sang rillets and minute cascades of hurrying song. The goldcrest repeated a tune like the unwinding of a tiny sweetly-creaking winch, like the well-winch at home. But the lazy cuckoo was lord of all.

Now she had filled both hands, and each time she grasped a new stalk some of the old fell out. So presently she laid them down in the grass to rearrange them. But she now noticed the tall sedges of the brook and wanted some. She looked round to see if anyone could see her doing this forbidden thing, and then went to the edge and stretched out her hand: they were too far. The water was gliding under her, flashing like brandished steel, and yet as clear as the air over the green stars of its bed. Everything had always been kind to her, and this water was one of the kindest, so playful and bright, so pure that sometimes they came far to fetch some of it in a pail for the house. She leaned out, and even moved one foot as if to step towards the green sedge. She lost her footing and fell, not quite reaching the blades as she splashed. She was scolded for getting wet, but never much, and she used to laugh as they were dressing her in fresh clothes; and to-day it was so warm. . . . It was an adventure. But her hair was all wet; she did not like that: and the water, though so pure, was not pleasant in mouth, nostrils, eyes and ears, nor could she get rid of it. Her hands touched the green stars; she could see them; but the sky was gone. She was surprised, indignant, anxious to be out. Why this cruelty? It was not a game to go on like this. She was angry . . . terrified . . . numbed. She could see nothing but water, she heard, smelt, breathed, tasted, touched water everywhere. Who could have done it? Something is cruel! . . Why? . . She could not bear it. No! No! Where were her flowers? Where was her mother?

She rose up a little, and saw the sun, and the cuckoo on the branch through the waves, and heard the man calling to his horses in the next field. Then solitude: all pleasure gone, love, light, warmth, movement was nothing, was over there, was past, or never had been, would never be again. It was better now. Sleep, sleep. But in the sleep, songs, visions of the house, forms and faces moving to and fro, and herself going in and out amongst them, far away, long ago, over there, in that other place. She was hurrying faster and faster, running too fast for her legs, carried away off them into the air, but swaying and rising easily and more easily now. She sighed as she seemed to float higher and lighter into soft darkness, into utter darkness, into nothing at all, where there was never anything or will be anything. The mud settled down. The stream flowed clear and sweet. The sun had not so much to do but that he could wilt the flowers lying on the bank. Life went on exuberant, joyous, august, looking neither to the right nor to the left. The cuckoo called. The birds' songs became so drowsy that they were not missed when they ceased, and only its own echo replied to the cuckoo. The child's white forehead was just above the water, and a fly perched on it and preened his diamond wings. A quarter of a mile away the dinner bell at home was swung merrily again and again by a strong arm that enjoyed the task.

The Drama.

"LA FOI."

MIS-NAMED, and in some ways mis-produced and mis-acted, "False Gods" is, nevertheless, the finest effort of M. Brieux's gallant career, and a feather in Sir Herbert Tree's cap. Whatever else he may be, Sir Herbert is an idealist according to his lights. He "needs must love the highest when he sees it." He is not always happy in his method of showing his love, and he sometimes goes a-philandering after—false gods. But he always prefers the fine thing, as he understands it, to the merely safe thing; and that shall be accounted unto him for righteousness. Here he has taken an intensely serious drama of ideas, which has not even had the advertisement of Parisian production, and has staked the success of his autumn season upon a costly production in which he himself appears only in the fourth and fifth acts. This is a truly spirited and artistic policy, which deserves all appreciation. I trust that Sir Herbert's brilliant essay in spectacular philosophy will bring him in an ample reward.

As a rule I have little sympathy to spare for translations from the French; but "La Foi" is a quite exceptional case. It is hard to forgive Mr. Charles Frohman for wasting the talents of Miss Ashwell and Mr. Du Maurier on a couple of third-rate French melodramas. He owes us liberal reparation when the time comes for starting his repertory theatre. But though it is a great mistake to say that art knows no frontiers, this is perfectly true of philosophy. "La Foi" is in no sense a picture of manners; it is not even a historic or archæological reconstruction. It is simply a world-parable, an embodiment in dramatic form of certain general truths about the mind of man; and such a piece of literature is at home in any language and on any stage. It has neither the merits nor the defects of nationality. It is, indeed, an almost unique example of international art, for it is not even bound to its native soil by intimate ties of language or of poetic form. "Faust" and "Peer Gynt" suffer so greatly in translation that the universality of their thought avails them little when it comes to transcending the frontiers of their language. On foreign stages they are known either in debased forms or not at all. But "La Foi" is as translatable as a proposition in Euclid. It might have been written in Esperanto. Mr. J. B. Fagan's translation is, I fancy, vigorous and workmanlike. But, truth to tell, I paid no attention to the style of the play; I forgot that I was listening to a translation; which is at once a compliment to Mr. Fagan and a criticism of M. Brieux. It implies that with all his vigor as a thinker and skill as a dramatist, there is one thing he cannot claim to be, and that is—a poet.

His fable is very ingenious. A young Egyptian priest, Satni, goes abroad, doubtless to Greece, and returns a confirmed rationalist. He finds that Yaouma, his betrothed, has been chosen by the Nile-god to be his bride, or, in other words, to be drowned with all the honors, in order to ensure the annual rising of the river. She is fascinated by her glorious calling and election—to spend a blissful month, the admired, envied, and adored of all, then to lay down her life for the welfare of her people, and to awaken in Paradise, the bride of the supreme divinity. Satni's assurances that there is no such god, that the choice is made simply by the priests, and that the Nile will duly rise without her sacrifice, seem to her the most senseless of blasphemies. But it chances that, as she is being carried off to her splendid destiny, a sudden thunderstorm comes on, and the boat which was to have conveyed her is sunk. At once the people conclude that Satni has worked this miracle, and that his god is greater than theirs. In vain he disavows all miraculous powers. He is besieged with suppliants for healing; and some hysterical sufferers he heals in spite of himself. His reputation grows beyond all bounds, and at last he cannot resist the temptation to come forward openly as an iconoclast. "Yes," he says, in effect, "I will work a miracle—I will restore to sight the blind and suffering multitude, ground down by kings and priests!" He gathers all the wretched fellaheen, discourses to them on their miseries, shows that their gods are merely the instruments of their oppressors, and proceeds to overthrow the images they have adored. The fact that he can do this without being struck dead on the spot is regarded as the greatest of miracles, and creates a religious revolution.

But it soon appears that the people interpret the overthrow of their gods as an abrogation of moral law, and Satni has to combat an outbreak of robbery, vengefulness and licence—to the no small detriment of his popularity. His father is mortally wounded in a riot, and is tragically disappointed that Satni cannot work a miracle on his behalf. His mother, too, turns upon him and curses him because he will not utter the approved magic formula at his father's wake. Moreover, there is a lady named Mieris, wife of a local magnate, to whom Satni's advent has been in a double sense calamitous. She has been blind from birth, and he disappoints her hope of a miraculous cure. She has lost an only child, and he destroys her faith in the Paradise where she will not only embrace but see her darling. On all sides his agnosticism brings with it either ruin or misery.

Now comes the time for Church and State to intervene and crush the heretic; but the astute old High Priest does not want to make a martyr if he can help it. He has a private colloquy with Satni in which he does not hesitate to confess that his religion is a sham and that he himself and his agents work the alleged miracles; but he declares that it is all for the people's good, the necessary order of society demanding that the King shall supply the people with suffering in this life, while the priesthood supplies them with consolation in the prospect of a life to come. Then he tries to overcome Satni's resistance, first by appealing to an ineradicable survival of superstitious awe in his soul, and secondly by working on his pity for suffering humanity. So successful is the latter experiment that Satni himself operates the bogus miracle which is to restore to the people the faith of their fathers. In the reaction that follows, Satni is assassinated. But Mieris, in the end, proclaims herself faithful to the new light, or new darkness, which he has brought her; for she cannot revert to "a religion that kills."

"La Foi" is a very complete and luminous exposition of the weakness and the strength of supernaturalism. But in one respect M. Brieux's choice of an Egyptian scene has hampered him. Though his Egypt is no more real than the Babylon of "Zadig," or the Bulgaria of "Candide,' it would have been a too glaring anachronism to equip Satni with a knowledge of the majesty and marvellousness of the universe as revealed by the cumulative research of fifty centuries. Consequently Satni's rationalism had to be frigid and purely destructive. For a warm human belief, founded mainly on terror, but partly also on love, he sought to substitute a cold realisation of ignorance, powerlessness, subjection to inexorable law. He was, in fact—and that quite necessarily—a narrow-minded dogmatist, whose irreligion was as purblind as the religion he assailed. There was some fervor, indeed, in his humanitarian enthusiasm; but being wholly unscientific, it was foredoomed. On the whole, then, his attempt to substitute mere negation for a positive faith, however barbarous, was not only hopeless but essentially cruel. The man who can live on pure reason is more, or less, than human. Emotion is not only the inspiring, but the sustaining element in life; and Satni's rationalism was entirely untouched by emotion. He sought to destroy an emotion and place nothing in its stead; and this M. Brieux shows to be, on any large scale, impossible. But at this negative point the validity of his world-parable ceases; which is as much as to say that it scarcely touches the conditions of modern thought. Satni's type of rationalism is, if not fifty centuries, at least fifty years, behind the time. We realise to-day that only religion can drive out religion, and that the man who professes to sum up the universe in a negative formula is not a philosopher, but a fool. In what does spiritual progress consist if not in the power to extract religious emotion from concepts which are demonstrably true, instead of demonstrably false?

The production at His Majesty's is very splendid and tasteful, but does not grapple quite successfully with the difficulties presented by the fourth act. M. Brieux has here imposed on his producer a problem which may possibly be insoluble, but which might certainly have been attacked with greater originality. Especially unconvincing is the passage in which the High Priest tries to rekindle in Satni's breast the inbred feeling of superstitious awe which (as he thinks) is never quite extinguished in any "child of the sacristy." We ought to feel that the recalcitrant priest is in some awful holy of holies, surrounded with mysteries and terrors unnumbered; whereas all we actually see is that he is suddenly left in the dark in the nave of a great temple; so that his moment of panic seems unaccountable. In dealing with the miracle at the close of the act, Sir Herbert has departed largely, and, I think, unfortunately, from M. Brieux's stage directions. But I am assured that he is following M. Brieux's text in making the statue of Isis invisible. Whether this be or be not the right course is a nice question of technique. It is the safe course, no doubt; I quite recognise the difficulty of making dramatically impressive the miracle of a bowing statue; but it is surely a pity if the modern stage, with all its resources of lighting, could not cope with this difficulty. If it could, the effect of the scene would be heightened threefold.

Sir Herbert Tree, as an actor, is never at his best on a first night. I hope that by this time he has seen his way to differentiating between his official, hieratic bearing and his unofficial manner in his scenes with the Pharaoh and with Satni. Mrs. Patrick Campbell made a very pathetic figure of Mieris, but the monotonous chant of her delivery seemed to me ill-judged. There is no reason why a blind woman should not now and then talk naturally. Mr. Henry Ainley was forcible and competent as Satni, his hardness being only too appropriate to the character. Altogether it cannot be said that M. Brieux owes any special debt of gratitude to his English interpreters.

THE HIGH TREASON TRIAL AT AGRAM.

SIR,—This famous and perhaps unique political trial is still dragging on. It commenced on March 3rd last, and as in all probability it will continue till the end of the year, it may easily prove the longest political trial of modern times. Its shorthand reports already extend to 7,000 quarto pages; indeed, they form a whole literature. But it would be a grave mistake to judge its importance by its length and volume. What in any legal and constitutional State would constitute mere police offences, even admitting all the evidence produced to be true, has in this case been converted into a monstrous and elaborate high treason trial, in which the fifty-three accused Serbs are charged with the serious attempt to detach five provinces from the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and to annex them to the dominions of Peter Karageorgevitch.

After six months of examination of witnesses for the Crown, we learn that the accused had not procured a single gun, or even a penknife, to carry out such vast designs. The proofs consisted mainly in the fact that the accused openly professed themselves as Serbs, organised gymnastic, literary, and economic societies under the Serb name, used Servian colors, sang Servian songs, distributed Serb newspapers, and spread national Serb feeling among the Orthodox farmers.

Lest the reader should be tempted to suppose that such innocent signs of nationalist activity are forbidden by law and thus, regarded from a purely legal point of view, constitute a criminal offence, I may at once mention that the above-mentioned national features are guaranteed to each nationality by the fundamental laws of both Hungary and Austria. How these laws are carried out by the ruling nation in Hungary is quite another question.

The Public Prosecutor in Agram, imitating Magyar persecutions of the nationalities in Hungary, adopted the same methods against the Serb Independent party in Croatia. Out of fifty-three prisoners no fewer than forty-nine are members of this party, whose twenty Deputies form perhaps the most active and tenacious section of the Croato-Serb Coalition in the Diet of Agram, and in the joint Hungaro-Croatian Parliament in Budapest. The Coalition is uncompromisingly opposed to the present constitutional régime imposed by the Magyars upon Croatia, in consequence of the gallant struggle waged by the united Croats and Serbs in defence of Croatia's autonomy and the Treaty (or Nagodba) of 1868, between Croatia and Hungary.

It is true that by this Nagodba the judicial arm in Croatia is independent of Hungary; and this pretext served the Magyar journalists in their answer to their colleagues of the Parisian Press, when the latter appealed to them to exert their influence in favor of the accused Serbs. I say pretext advisedly. For the Croato-Serb Coalition, during its short term of office two years ago, realising that the liberties of the people are best guaranteed in the hands of honest and independent judges, voted the so-called "Law for the independence of judges." But since all laws voted by the Croatian Diet must pass through the hands of the Hungarian Premier, and be proposed by him to the Sovereign for final sanction, this law never reached the King, and never received his signature. The motives underlying this action of the Magyar Ministry in a purely autonomous Croatian matter are only too evident. The Magyars want to restrict even such little autonomy as is guaranteed to Croatia by the Nagodba. They want a free hand, in order that they may manufacture even such high treason trials as that which is now going on at Agram, in order to "pacify" Croatia and crush out all resistance, and at the same time to protest, like Pilate, before a horrified world, that Croatia, in matters of justice, is wholly independent of Hungary. Such an attitude can only be described as hypocritical. For the Ban of Croatia is proposed to the King by the Magyar Prime Minister; and the present Ban, Baron Rauch, was nominated against the will of the whole Croatian Parliament, and was publicly declared by Dr. Wekerle to be his "exponent" in that country. Every judge in Croatia (as also every other official) is responsible to the Ban, who can promote, degrade, remove, or dismiss him at pleasure. This practice has been specially observed in the present trial. Mr. Tarabocchia, the President of the Court, has been promoted over the heads of forty-three of his colleagues; Mr. Accurti, the Public Prosecutor, over thirty-six of his, in order that they might exercise their present functions, for which Baron Rauch thought them most adapted. Thus the Magyars first prevent Croatia from having an independent responsible judicature, and then, when all Europe protests against the barbarous proceedings at Agram, they throw the responsibility upon Croatia, which looks on helplessly at the travesty of justice committed in her name.

To return to the high treason trial. The prosecution, being unable to charge the accused with real treasonable crimes, proceeded to impeach the "intentions" with which they exercised their lawful rights and privileges. For example, there is an old Servian song which begins: "Willingly marches a Serb to war." This song had its origin in the old "Military Frontiers," where most of the famous Granitchars (the most valiant of Radetzky's soldiers) were recruited. The refrain tells how gladly the Granitchar fights for his Czar or Emperor; and the song is played by many Austrian military bands, and is regarded as highly patriotic from the Austrian point of view. But this song can be "anti-dynastic" and "treasonable," according to the "intention" with which you sing it. If you sing it with the "intention of popularising the Servian name, Servian history, Servian nationality, and the name of King Peter," you commit high treason. And who is the omniscient person who knows your intentions? Why, the Public Prosecutor. As he explains in the indictment, "all seemingly innocent songs, flags cigarette papers, window blinds, wine glasses, shirts, &c.," do not individually mean anything illegal, but when used with the aforesaid "intentions," they constitute high treason, punishable by death. And it is he who decides who has these sinister intentions, and who not. For instance, if you are a Magyarophil or a political friend of Baron Rauch you can sing Servian songs and wave Servian flags to your heart's content, and nothing will befall you. But if you are an adherent of the Croato-Serb coalition, then your "intentions" are treasonable, and you must go to prison. There are instances where persons actually cited in the indictment as being "suspicious" and "connected with Pan-Serb propaganda," were received most graciously by Baron Rauch and invited to a banquet given in his honor, simply because they professed themselves members of the Serb Radical Party, which seceded from the coalition. Over 100 sittings of the trial were spent in proving these unprovable "intentions"; in proving that the Serbs are enemies of the Croats and Croatia, and sympathise with Servia. The uninitiated reader may ask what racial antagonisms have to do with high treason in this country of mixed races. Such struggles exist between Germans and Czechs, Poles and Ruthenes, Croats and Italians, &c., and nobody ever thought of construing high treason out of them. Yet according to the Agram indictment, a Serb commits high treason by his antagonism to a Croat, nay, rather, by his adherence to the Croato-Serb coalition and his support of his Croat brethren in their struggle against the Magyars. The reason of these proceedings is clear. The union of the Serb Independent Party with the Croats has led to a stubborn fight against Magyar pretensions in Croatia, which bars Hungary from the sea; and Croats and Serbs when united, can always command a majority in the Croatian Parliament, despite official oppression and a scandalous suffrage system giving only 3 per cent. of the population the right to vote. It is but natural that the Magyars, accustomed to oppress the nationalities in Hungary at their own sweet will, accustomed also to have a free hand in Croatia under the notorious regime of Count Khuen-Héderváry, cannot tolerate so "abnormal" a situation as the cessation of the feud between Croats and Serbs. The present union must be severed at all costs—and hence the high treason trial. Circumstances favored the Magyars in the form of the recent Austro-Servian crisis. They gave their ready consent to the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina at the price of obtaining a free hand in Croatia.

There can be little doubt that the accused Serbs will be condemned if one considers the manner in which this unique trial has been conducted. The evidence put forward for the prosecution does not directly damage any of the accused. None of the 305 incriminating witnesses testified that they heard the accused say that "this country was once Servian and will be again," or heard them cry "Long Live King Peter!" nor does even the indictment itself impute these charges directly to them. It merely asserts that they have "caused these phenomena," while the witnesses said that "It was heard," or "It was said" that such "phenomena" existed. The deposition of the chief Crown witness, George Nastitch, which lasted fifteen days, did not bring out any substantial proof of the prisoners' guilt, although the whole fabric of treasonable charges rests upon his incriminating pamphlets. The documents which Nastitch produced as proof of the existence of a revolutionary organisation in the Southern Slav countries, consist of a few letters written to him by the chief prisoner Adam Pribitchevitch and his brother Milan, the latter of whom had passed over from the Austrian to the Servian Army, and who is said to be the author of the "revolutionary statute."* These letters, postcards, &c., were, according to Nastitch, written allegorically, so that the most innocent words really mean bombs and revolution. The fact is that Nastitch was merely an Austrian agent provocateur in Belgrade, who, after obtaining "proofs" of his connection with certain members of the club "Slavonic South" in Belgrade, invented throughout the Southern Slav countries a revolutionary movement, which, for reasons of political expediency, was only discovered—in Croatia.

The defence offered to produce witnesses to prove that Nastitch was in the service of the Austrian police—men associated with him in Belgrade, Serajevo, and Vienna, whom he instigated to blow up public buildings at Serajevo in order to prove that a terrorist organisation did actually exist, and who, being in want of money, collaborated with him for some time. Now he brands these men as common thieves, unworthy of credence. "They are all liars," said Nastitch. "If they are liars it is useless to call them here to testify," said the President of the court, showing clearly that he only accepts evidence on the one side. "We are very sorry, Mr. President," retorted a counsel for the defence, "that Mr. Nastitch did not associate with better men, whom we might produce here as witnesses." The defence also proposed over 700 witnesses to prove that the accused Serbs were peaceful citizens, who neither held secret meetings nor boycotted the Croats, nor had King Peter's picture in their houses, &c. These witnesses are for the most part Croats, men of the highest standing, Government and county officials, policemen, gendarmes, who, by the very nature of their office, ought to have observed the incriminated "phenomena," professors, priests, deputies, bankers, in short, men of unimpeachable character. The Crown witnesses, on the other hand, are men of low condition and no education, some actually convicted criminals, and all fanatical political opponents of the prisoners. The court allowed only sixteen out of the 700 to be examined, and even these only upon certain specific points of minor importance. Thus, by order of the court which is "seeking material truth," no one is allowed to challenge the statements of the witnesses for the prosecution—a state of affairs worthy of the Middle Ages, but one which shows that the condemnation of the prisoners has been resolved upon, irrespective of their guilt or innocence. Such incidents are only possible in an unfortunate country to which Magyar rule extends. A shameful outrage upon justice is being committed in Croatia, and we are powerless to prevent it. In our helplessness we can only expose the bare facts before an impartial European public, and invite it to express its disgust at methods so unworthy of a civilised state and of the enlightened age in which we live.—Yours, &c.,

"THE SET-BACK TO WOMEN'S SUFFRAGE."

Sir,—Mrs. E. M. White is in accord with me on so many important points that it is perhaps ungracious to point out more precisely where we differ, but in the interests of clear thinking will you allow me to do it?

She condemns the "broken word of honor," the "sex antagonism," she desires no more than I do to gain the vote by "odious methods," she is "not an advocate of the limited Bill," she writes "in no sense as representing the militant party," and yet she thinks their "help is . . . proving invaluable," and "the question . . . has been advanced" by their methods. If she thinks so, why doesn't she join them—join in the stone-throwing, the petty, vulgar personal annoyances, the rough-and-tumble conflicts with the police whose duty it is to keep the streets clear from unlawful and dangerous assemblies, and in the practical denial of the right of free speech to statesmen, many of whom support the very claim which these women imagine, I suppose, they are furthering?

But Mrs. White won't do that. She is willing they should throw the stones, and break their word of honor; but she won't do such things herself. She only pats them on the back for doing it—a position, I confess, which is an enigma to me.

Mrs. White is so annoyed with "the ordinary voter" that she declines to shape her policy in order to please him; she wishes, apparently, to get the vote without him. But how on earth can she get it without him? His votes in the ballot-box are the one and only means by which she can get it. Why then antagonise him? She says this annoying "electorate" has been "sued" "for forty and odd years" for this bit of "bare justice," and she speaks of "the reply" that has been given "time after time." Why, they haven't been "sued" once! Not once has the question of Women's Suffrage been referred to the electorate, and therefore no reply has been received.

The opinion of the House of Commons has been tested often, with varying results, but it is quite inaccurate to say that the "first Women's Suffrage Bill of 1906 was . . . impudently talked out." Mr. Dickenson, its sponsor, moved the closure, but the Speaker refused to accept it, for several reasons, it was understood, one of which was that Mr. Dickenson, I am happy to say, in his able opening speech, threw over his own Bill, as inadequate for its purpose. Nor is it accurate to say that it is "that occasion from which precisely dates the present militant movement." That movement began in the autumn of 1904 at Sir Edward Grey's meeting in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester. I saw it begin, and a heart-sickening sight it was.

If Mrs. White knew as well as I do the heroic and successful efforts of men to give women control over their own property and children, and to secure better conditions in their industrial lives, she would never accuse men generally of seeking their own "dominance" and women's "subservience," or of passing laws "always to their (women's) disadvantage." There are more men than women, far more, at this moment engaged in fighting "intemperance, insanitary housing, a contaminated milk supply," and the like. Women claim a more effective place in that crusade, that is all. The violent women, however, are busily engaged in barring the door.

For Mr. Finlayson's approval I am very grateful, but his rebuke for my "studied silence" does not wound. The disapproval of the constitutional Suffragists has been more widely known from the very first, among women at any rate, than he realises. That it was not made more public was due to a desire to avoid personal controversies among women, and an expectation and hope that so wild and unreasoning a movement would wear itself out. I wrote as I did because it has become a public danger as well as a public nuisance.

I have no wish to shield myself behind initials only, and therefore sign myself—Yours &c.,

(Mrs.) S. A. Byles.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—I should like, with your permission, to contribute a question of an urgent and practical character to the discussion on women's franchise which is proceeding in your columns. What effect will an early dissolution, whether forced upon the country by the Lords or hastened by the Government itself, have upon the prospect of the women's movement? In either event the Lords' Veto and the Social Policy of the Budget will be the "predominant issue." If the Government is allowed by its supporters to maintain silence on this subject, it is obvious that it will receive no mandate. If it receives no mandate, its victory at the polls would seem to involve another four years of governmental inaction. The question, we shall be told once more, was not "before the country," and, though we all know that no other question has been for the past four years so passionately and continuously forced upon the public mind, yet there is a risk that in 1909, as in 1906, it will not rank as a recognised "issue" at the polls. On the consequences of ignoring it throughout another Parliament, one need hardly enlarge. No one who knows anything at all of the women's movement can suppose that it is possible either to discourage or repress it. Its membership and its influence, even in the remoter provinces, steadily increase, and with them the number of women who are ready to engage in militant action, with all its consequences of imprisonment and the hunger-strike. Whether one thinks primarily of the sufferings of the women themselves, of the waste of so much energy and courage, of the disorganisation of public life, or of the discredit to progressive parties which seem amid these conflicts to pose as the opponents of a just cause, no man who pauses to reflect can deliberately wish that these four years of struggle should be prolonged to eight. Yet that must be the consequence of a refusal of the two historic parties to allow the extension of the franchise to figure as an issue at the coming election.

Two objections may be raised. It will be said that amid an absorbing struggle with the Lords, there will be no room for "side issues." That is true. But no Government ever does confine itself in after years to the main issue at the General Election which gave it power. The average elector is not thinking about Home Rule or Welsh Disestablishment. But already the Master of Elibank, in a sort of preliminary election address, aimed at Lord Rosebery's head, has mentioned Home Rule as one of the issues on which he will ask for the opinion of Mid-Lothian. If other Ministers follow that example, even in the most perfunctory way, they will satisfy all the requirements of the "mandate" theory. Compact bodies of voters can secure justice for a "side issue," even during a whirlwind election. It would be possible for the large group of members of all parties who profess, I do not know how sincerely, to have the cause of women's enfranchisement at heart, to secure for it a place among the items in the mandate.

It will also be said, no doubt, that a Dissolution alters nothing in Mr. Asquith's pledge. In a sense that is true. He dated his Reform Bill with a Woman's Suffrage Amendment in "a dim and speculative future." If this Parliament runs its normal course, that future may arrive next year or early in 1911. If a Dissolution intervenes, it is postponed, I suppose, until some time between 1914 and 1916. It will hardly be argued that a "pledge" of that kind, always receding and weighted with difficult conditions, should satisfy any body of women in earnest about their rights.

I doubt whether most progressives, who profess a theoretical acceptance of the case for woman's suffrage, have yet realised how large a responsibility Mr. Asquith assumed when he gave that "pledge." Let us, for argument's sake, assume that, despite Mr. Asquith's known antagonism to the principle of the suffrage, it was a sincere promise. It imposed a delay of uncertain length, prescribed an oddly indirect procedure, and asked for proof of the ripeness of public opinion very difficult to furnish. But much more serious than this was the condition that the enfranchisement clause shall be "democratic," or in other words shall impose adult suffrage. To me, as a Socialist, adult suffrage, were it attainable in any measurable time, would be preferable to any limited Bill. But time has to be measured now by the hundreds of women who every year are sent to prison for this cause. I see no movement for adult suffrage. There is, I believe, some league or other, which meets once a year to preserve the copyright of its title. The Trade Union Congress annually includes it among the hundred and one things which it desires. In an inert and flabby way, most "advanced" people are verbally ready for the greater change. But the masses have not even begun to think about it. All the propaganda of these past few years has been done for the limited Bill. The working-man sees that there is a case for giving a vote to women who are fighting their own battle in the world, to doctors, teachers, and nurses, to widows and single women who work in factories. But I am afraid he does not yet see the case for giving a vote to his own wife. The middle-class man is absurdly afraid of that bugbear, the majority of women, and cautious opinion dreads the sudden enfranchisement of so many inexperienced millions at once. For the limited Bill there is (or was) a substantial majority, drawn from all parties in the House. But who would venture to affirm that there is in this House, or will be in the next, without the aid of the Whips, a majority among Liberals and Labor members sufficient to carry an Adult Amendment? For a moderate Bill, which had all but arrived, Mr. Asquith suddenly substituted a vast scheme of change, which excites the maximum of opposition, which will secure the minimum of support, and for which no work whatever is being done either in the country or in the House.

I do not profess to know whether Mr. Asquith was consciously postponing woman's suffrage to the Greek Kalends. On one condition the difficult procedure which he laid down would seem to be worth adopting—that Liberals, having prescribed the heroic course of universal enfranchisement, should back it with all their forces, with Limehouse speeches, and organised leagues, with the weight of the party organisation and the Government's prestige. If they do less than this, they have rendered all advance impossible, by rejecting moderate measures, while refraining from the advocacy of their own larger plan.

To one plea for doing nothing no answer in these columns is required. Liberals, who did not cease to advocate the cause of Ireland when landlords were shot and cattle maimed, who insist that Indian reforms shall go forward in spite of terrorism, cannot make the violence of some "militant" methods an excuse for inaction. One need not contend that all women are fit for the vote. We always knew that the sex included the usual proportion of the drunken, the frivolous, the criminal, and the unfit. We know now that it also musters more than its normal allowance of courage and self-sacrifice. If all women were models of Christian resignation and angelic self-suppression, the sex would not deserve the vote. It would be fit only for chattel slavery.—Yours, &c.,

Sir,—Your correspondent, "S. A. B.," is mistaken in believing that the tide has set strongly against women's suffrage. It is not the fact that Suffragists find themselves increasingly unpopular in the country at large. On the contrary, women's suffrage is the one subject (except the Budget) which may be trusted to fill any hall in any town or in any village. It is the fact that every suffrage society finds its membership and its funds increasing more rapidly than ever before. It is, I am assured, the fact that the organ of the most violent society has a circulation of 50,000. It is the fact that after every by-election, a petition from electors in favor of women's suffrage has gone up to the new member, and that in most cases the number of electors signing would have been enough to turn an election. As to the manifestations of violence by Suffragists (which, personally, I regret), it should be remembered: (1) that such violence has been far smaller, both in degree and in extent, than that exhibited by men agitating for enfranchisement; (2) that it has been far less than has been employed against women in the course of this very agitation; (3) that, even in the most militant of societies, violence forms a very small part of the total activity, although newspapers (for reasons which I will not stop to analyse) abstain from chronicling the peaceful efforts which form nine-tenths of the whole propaganda. As to the election policy of the militant section (which, personally, I think mistaken), it is at least a perfectly lawful and peaceful policy which no citizen can be justified in denouncing another for employing.—Yours, &c.,

Clementina Black.

THE INSPECTION OF ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—Will you allow me, in justice to the Roman Catholic community, and pursuant to the request of some of their representatives, to remove a misunderstanding that has arisen on the Minority Report of the Poor Law Commission?

Commenting, in that report, on the remarkable fact that the Local Government Board made no inspection, and possessed practically no official information as to the education of the 11,000 Poor Law children in the 269 certified and the hundred or more uncertified schools and homes, we said:—

> "In 1883 a London Board of Guardians inquired, with some anxiety, whether there was any Government inspection at all of the education in these certified schools, for which the Boards of Guardians were paying large sums. In consequence of this inquiry, arrangements were made, in the course of the next few years, for getting twenty-three out of the fifty-five Roman Catholic institutions—but no others—regularly inspected by the Inspectors of Poor Law Schools. In 1904 the duty of inspecting the education in these twenty-three schools (and in these only) was transferred to the Board of Education. . . . So far as we can ascertain, the education given in the other Roman Catholic schools, some of which have over a hundred boys or girls, and that given in the schools and homes belonging to other denominations or to no denomination—apart from a score of institutions which happen to receive grants also from the Board of Education as being public elementary schools—is, to this day, not subject to any inspection whatever."

It has been pointed out to us that this statement, whilst verbally not inaccurate, might conceivably be misunderstood to suggest (a) that the Roman Catholic schools and homes are less inspected than others; and (b) that they are in some way inferior or open to suspicion. I am glad to be able to place on record, on behalf of the Minority, that neither of these suggestions was intended. Nothing in the work of the Commission led me to doubt that all Roman Catholic children, if not "boarded out" in Roman Catholic families, or placed by themselves in a "scattered home" under a Roman Catholic "house mother," ought to be placed in Roman Catholic institutions.

Unfortunately, by some unexplained error, we adduced (in a footnote not reproduced in any unofficial edition) as examples of schools in which the L.G.B. inspectors did not inspect the educational work, two boarding schools (the St. Paul's R.C. Home at Coleshill, and the St. Clare R.C. Orphanage at Pantasaph) which happen also to be classed as public elementary day schools under the Board of Education, and were thus excluded by the exception in the text of the Report that I have italicised above. The naming of these schools in the footnote was therefore a mistake on our part, for which we have done our best to make amends.

We are now informed by Mr. J. Harrison, of Leicester, that he has ascertained privately what is not stated in any official list known to us, that all but five of the fifty-five certified Roman Catholic schools have their educational work inspected under one head or another, either by the Board of Education or by the Local Education Authority, or by both. Only five, and these small and exceptional places, are at the present time not thus inspected. We gladly record the fact, and we regret that it is not officially promulgated. The Roman Catholic schools deserve credit for the alacrity which they have shown in welcoming the visits of H.M.I. and the Government grant.

But a larger question arises. We must again repeat our criticism that the L.G.B. in 1904, when it was understood that the inspection of the Education of Poor Law children as such, to whatever denomination they belonged, was handed over to the Board of Education, apparently transferred the educational inspection as boarding schools of only twenty-three certified schools and homes (and these all Roman Catholic); and did not transfer the educational inspection of the 246 others. Up to last year, the latter duty had still not been assumed by the Board of Education. The incidental inspection of some of these institutions as day schools does not suffice, nor do the visits of the L.G.B. inspectors compensate for the absence of inspection by H.M.I.S. Was it, or was it not, decided by the Government in 1904 that the educational inspection of Poor Law children as such, to whatever denomination they belonged, should be transferred from the L.G.B. to the Board of Education? Why has this not yet been done?—Yours, &c.,

BEATRICE WEBB.

THE GORRINGE CASE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—My statement of the Gorringe case has at least had one noteworthy effect, in that, upon further consideration of it, and of the reasons with which I have supported it, Mr. James H. Robertson has been led to admit that his criticism was "too sweeping," for he finds that the whole of the £3,000 rate imposed from the land value is not, as he had asserted, taken as Mr. Gorringe's "share of certain definite services . . . as essential, in the main, for the carrying on of his business as the electric light and water he uses." On the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread, I might be contented to accept this, were it not that I think I am entitled to the whole batch.

Before discussing this, however, may I refer to other correspondents whose intervention may also be regarded as a curious result of my statement—a statement which, as your readers may remember, was made tentatively and with a view to elicit the real facts of the economic and rating conditions? Mr. Lewis characterises one of my statements as "arrant nonsense." As he signs his name, whereas it is desirable for me to remain anonymous, it would manifestly be unfair and ungentlemanly if I were to retort upon him with similar language; whatever insulting phrases he may use cannot affect me as I hide in my entrenchment. He takes exception to my statement that Mr. Gorringe was "willing to pay £50,000," &c., and asserts that "Mr. Gorringe himself told me that he regarded the terms as so outrageous that he very nearly abandoned the scheme." I am afraid that Mr. Lewis has no remorse in dealing with his friends. If I recollect aright, shortly after the lease had been concluded on these "outrageous" terms, the business was floated as a limited liability company, and among the advantages enumerated in the prospectus was this eminently favorable and satisfactory lease, which Mr. Lewis reports Mr. Gorringe as calling "outrageous." The question is, was Mr. Gorringe playing upon Mr. Lewis's amiable susceptibilities, or did the person who drew up the prospectus endeavor to pass off stale fish upon an undiscerning public? For my part, I think the lease was honest. Probably it was not unfair; for if Mr. Gorringe were screwed up to the highest rent he was willing to pay—and of course I use the word "willing" in the sense customary with writers on economics—we have here the actual market price, the highest which the seller can obtain; and any question of Mr. Gorringe having "created" the value may be set aside, as not arising in an economic problem. Mr. Gorringe was sufficiently acute and able in a business sense to get back his own with interest before his lease ran out.

Mr. Lewis, however, provides a curious instance of the way in which it is possible to endeavor to support a case by arguments entirely destructive of it. The plea of Mr. Lloyd George, and, I may say, of the Liberal Party generally, is that the State is entitled to a large slice of what is styled the "unearned increment"; alleging, indeed, that the rise in value is due to the activities of "the community"; whereas Mr. Lewis, praising Mr. Lloyd George for taking his twenty per cent., is ready to stake his head—possibly even his business reputation—upon the fact that Mr. Gorringe, by working hard "for forty-five years to attract trade to a street possessing previously little or no commercial value," had by his labor "mainly created" the value of the land. It seems to me that, if Mr. Lewis's narrative is at all accurate, the Liberal theory as to "the community" creating the value cannot be maintained, and that his praise of Mr. Lloyd George might be better bestowed upon some person who was not showing a keen anxiety to take one-fifth of the proceeds of what Mr. Lewis evidently regards as an outrageous robbery. I note that Mr. Lewis characterises this anxiety as "far-seeing statesmanship," and, in the circumstances, I am not disposed to quarrel with his suggestion that there is "great confusion" in my mind, and that I am "evidently bewildered" by the variety of Ministerial counsel.

Mr. Laycock, of Sheffield, rejoices in my demonstration that one-third of the land value already is taken for public purposes; he regrets that the public do not take—apparently without payment—the other two-thirds. He asks what has the Duke done or given at any time for his two-thirds? I do not know whether Mr. Laycock has ever received anything for which he has not worked. If no man were entitled to own anything which he himself had not created, some people would be in a bad way.

Mr. James H. Robertson suggests that, in my statement of the value of the land at £9,000, I had "completely overlooked" the "fundamental principle" that we are supposed to pay rates and taxes in return for work done by the public authority which collects those rates or taxes. The truth is, the principle is so elementary and obvious that, until Mr. Robertson made discovery of it with such triumphant skreel on the pipes, I had not imagined there could be any necessity for stating it. That the public authority deigns to perform certain work—usually in a somewhat expensive manner—does not affect the fact that the money is taken for public purposes, as distinguished from private services. The preservation of the peace, for instance, is a public service, and not one rendered peculiarly on behalf of this plot of land leased by the Duke of Westminster to Mr. Gorringe; indeed, it might be said of any such individual plot that, if it were possible for it to be wiped out of existence, the general cost of preserving order would not be reduced by one penny. I am, of course, aware that you could not, on this principle, imagine the annihilation of the whole of London and still maintain the cost of policing it, my mental equipment not enabling me to follow a line of reasoning closely parallel to that by which Mr. Robertson would make the landowner "pay his tenants income-tax together with every form of public revenue."

I do not agree that "rates must always be regarded as necessary outlays, as essential for the full development and successful carrying on of business as any other working expenses." In the last twenty years, there has been in most cities a very large increase of rates. Can Mr. Robertson show that this increase has been attended with, and is the cause of, increased business? Is it not true that, in some cases, firms have found the burden so heavy that they have removed their businesses? Is it not also true that often, as a result of municipal expenditure—e.g., in the construction of trams or of new streets—trade is actually taken away from many shopkeepers? I think if Mr. Robertson will exchange his theoretic method for that of inquiry from tradesmen, he will find the great majority asserting that the rates, so far from being an assistance to them in their trade, are, at any rate for the most part, a very serious hindrance. To represent them as on the same footing as manufacturers' materials and wages is, I fancy, inconsistent with any accepted economic doctrine.

Mr. Robertson, no doubt, honestly attributes to me "the evident conviction that Messrs. Gorringe's contributions to the rates must naturally and properly be regarded in the light of payments made by the Duke of Westminster." I did not say anything of the kind, nor is that necessarily my "mental attitude." What I do say is, that, so far as the increased value of the land is concerned, one-third of it seems to be taken for public purposes, and that, but for this taking, the Duke might have made Mr. Gorringe pay that third in rent. Mr. Robertson ignores the rates that Messrs. Gorringe pay out of their own pocket, on account of the buildings they occupy, which are not rented from the Duke. The only concern the Duke had with them, apparently, was to insist upon their being of a certain value and character; if the values were greater than Mr. Gorringe would have decided upon for himself, the Duke was a public benefactor, for, by increasing the value of the buildings, he also increased Messrs. Gorringe's contribution to the public service. Mr. Robertson forgets the investigations by the late Lord Goschen and others, from whom I could quote at length if I were not holiday-making in a "far countrie"—investigations into the incidence of the rates, showing clearly that, in many instances where businesses are concerned, and especially in agriculture, the tenant, in considering a new occupancy, naturally lumps together the amount of rent and rates as what may be called the base annual expenditure that has to be met, in addition to the immediately profit-yielding outlay on wages and materials. The two latter he can usually vary from time to time, as the courses of his trade requires, but the combined rent and rates he must consider as a fixed and first item in his calculations—and if the rates go up the rent must come down. Mr. Robertson admits that "any subventions given in aid of rates would go into the pocket of the landowner"; he says it is "undeniable," but he fails to perceive that, if, by means of such a subvention, say, from the taxes or from the profits of some great invention owned by the public, the whole of the public services were paid for, so that the necessity of rating disappeared, the whole of the £9,000 yearly paid by Mr. Gorringe on account of the tenure of his land would go into the pocket of the Duke of Westminster.

But, whether the amount which the Duke might take be the whole of the £3,000 now allocated to public purposes, or that smaller sum which Mr. Robertson now admits to be contributed in excess of services rendered, and which, therefore I suppose he will allow me to be right in regarding as coming out of the pocket of the landowner, I must ask if there is any other form of property or wealth on account of which such large demands are made by the public upon the owner?—Yours, &c., LEODIENSIS.

SIR,—It is a bluebottle in the holiday ointment that one sees one's NATION at irregular intervals. Doubtless before now some other correspondent has commented upon the amazing bit of reasoning to which Mr. L. J. Clegg has put his name in your issue of the 11th. The Duke's action is not to be styled blackmail, because, if Mr. Gorringe had obtained a renewal at a reduction, such action would not be considered blackmail. Of course it wouldn't. If Mr. Gorringe had obtained a reduction, it could only have been because nobody else in all London, aye, or in all Great Britain, was willing to pay a higher rent; in other words, the rent, whatever it was, would have been the absolute market value rent. Mr. Gorringe had no means of bringing pressure to bear upon the Duke. The Duke was in the position of being able to exercise most stringent pressure upon Mr. Gorringe. He could throw into the scale against his tenant the capital of all his tenant's competitors, indeed, of the gigantic mass of capital always seeking industrial investment. Thus secured, he could screw out of Mr. Gorringe the uttermost farthing of rent.

Is such action blackmail, or is it simply hard bargaining? It is, of course, not blackmail in the original, the historic sense of the term, the sense in which it was used by Rob Roy and Bailie Nicol Jarvie. Is it blackmail in the current sense? It has at least this in common—that one of the two parties to the bargain is in the position of being able to exercise pressure upon the other. But does this justify our styling it blackmail? I think not, as the use of this term now involves the postulate of something dishonorable in the relation of the two parties. If I forge my father's name or seduce my mother's maid, the fact is as dishonoring to me as Jones's use of his knowledge of the fact for the purpose of extorting money from me is dishonoring to him. It is surely advisable to restrict the use of the term to such cases as these. But none the less is it necessary to distinguish transactions between landlord and tenant, such as that between the Duke of Westminster and Mr. Gorringe, from ordinary transactions involving bargaining. May we not style such transactions greymail?

The element which discriminates greymail from bargaining is the position of privilege occupied by one of the bargainers. If I am a collector of Henri II. ware, and know that Messrs. Wertheimer have a tazza for sale, I may find their price of £1,000 high; if I know that they picked up the object for a few shillings, I may find the bargain a dreadfully hard one, but if I accept I have no ground for complaint. It is open to me to refuse; Messrs. Wertheimer cannot force me to accept. If I do so, I do it freely.

But if I am a Bond Street shopkeeper in occupancy of premises for fifty years and having therein built up a business of world-wide repute; if my lease runs out and I am told I can only obtain a renewal at a redoubled rental, I am not free to accept or reject. Removal would in any case be a heavy expense, but, still more, as every retail trader knows, "address hath in it somewhat of the nature and substance of goodwill." The expression of that somewhat in definite financial terms is a problem from the solution of which even the best business man shrinks. Something he knows he must sacrifice. And so I enter upon the bargaining in a position of marked inferiority to my landlord. I have no argument I can use against him; he has most potent arguments which he can use against me. He can greymail me. And he does.

The point then is this: the urban landlord can greymail. And he is the only member of the community who can do so. Everyone else—artist, doctor, lawyer, financier, manufacturer, trader, artisan—bargains with the community to which he sells his services under the stress of competition, and hence upon fairly equal terms. Exceptionally skilful individuals may secure exceptional rewards, but the community gives that reward freely. The urban landlord has not to contend against competition—competition is his ally. It says much for the inherent divinity of discontent that instead of going down on his knees and thanking God fasting for his privileged position, he sets up a hideous howl when he is asked to make a small payment for his privilege.—Yours, &c., A LONDON LEASEHOLDER.

DANTE'S SYSTEM OF MORALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I shall be greatly obliged if you will allow me to make one or two comments upon the learned review of my book which appeared in THE NATION of September 11th. The writer of the review seems to think that he has demolished me, but, so far as I can judge, he makes two attacks upon Aquinas (with both of which I sympathise), while my own position relatively to Dante is scarcely discussed.

First, as to a question of fact, I cannot conceive why I am charged with maintaining that malitia is not a translation of Aristotle's κακία. If by malitia your reviewer means Dante's malizia, I can only reply that one of my chief theses is that Dante does allude primarily to Aristotle. If, again, he is thinking rather of Aquinas, my point is merely that the doctrine of malitia was affected by other traditions besides the Aristotelian, a point too obvious to need defence. Again, when your reviewer finds it astonishing that I have failed to understand St. Thomas's doctrine of malicious sin, he wastes his astonishment. The information that he gives on the subject has been familiar to me for years; but the question is whether St. Thomas's own statements are consistent with a psychology which makes so rigid a distinction between passions and will. So far as Aristotle is concerned, I have myself remarked (p. 289) that the intemperatus ex malitia is a typical case, and, from the standpoint of human experience, there is no difficulty about such a sinner. On the other hand, when you bring him into contact with the technical psychology of St. Thomas, I think the difficulty is serious, more serious, perhaps, than St. Thomas perceived. But does the difficulty affect Dante?

First, however, I must touch on your reviewer's criticisms which relate to odium. Here again St. Thomas puts us in a difficulty, though mainly one of words. When odium is said to be the end involved in all deliberate injuries, the word must not be confounded with the "feeling" of hatred. A deliberate injury involves wanton disregard of caritas, and wanton disregard of caritas is odium. St. Thomas, indeed, ekes out his meaning with superbia (a point ignored by your reviewer), but even then his terms are plainly inadequate if we insist on comparing them with our ordinary use of words. When speaking of murder or some other crimes, it is appropriate to say that a malicious sinner wills an act "because he knows that it will damage his neighbor"; but in other connections, as I freely allow, odium has to be understood rather as meaning wilful indifference to the fact that a certain action must injure another. Was the act an injuria? Did you know that it was? Did you, nevertheless, plan to do it? If the malicious sinner replies affirmatively to these questions, he stands convicted of odium. From a modern point of view, there may be objections to this doctrine; but, as I do not conceive that they affect the interpretation of the Inferno, I shall not pursue them further. Now, as to Dante, my own position is that he has chosen to treat all malicious sins as technically injuriae, or, in other words, that no sinner corresponding in type to the intemperatus ex malitia is openly recognised in the Inferno.

Against this position your reviewer brings no arguments, but he cites the case of Jason, and I cannot imagine an instance more favorable to my own contention. Can anything be more certain than that Jason is punished, not because he placed his finis in carnal delights, but because he deceived two women? Dante states explicitly in Inf. XVIII., 92, that inganno is the sin, and he repeats it in line 97. Now inganno is a kind of fraud, and fraud is essentially injustice. Again, Jason did not, of course, "hate" his victims in the ordinary sense, but he wantonly did an act which he knew to be injurious to them, and he wantonly deceived them. In other words, odium and fraus were combined. To represent Jason as the intemperatus ex malitia is quite hopeless. How far Dante may have realised that malicious sin need not always be injuria, or how far he intended to combine the two aspects one cannot tell, but one may reflect that, if he had merely taken his stand on the fact that all actions caused by passion may eventually be caused by malice, he would have been in danger of making his lower circles a tiresome duplicate of the upper. Artistically, he had everything to gain by laying emphasis on the fact that all malicious sin must be a deliberate injury, either to God or to man. In conclusion I must express a mild astonishment that your reviewer has aimed all his shafts at my exposition of Dante's three lowest circles. That everything except the account of these circles is highly controversial I cannot doubt, but that Dante's malicious sins are all technically injuriae I believe to be indubitable, and my belief was much strengthened when I found that Father Busuelli, with his vast knowledge of Aquinas, had arrived at substantially the same conclusion.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. V. Reade.

NEW INCOME-TAX NOTICES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

Sir,—The Notices of Charge now being sent out for the current year have a slip attached, printed in red, stating that the allowances provided in the Finance Bill now before the House of Commons in respect of children under sixteen and in respect of earned income where the total income from all sources exceeds £2,000 but does not exceed £3,000 may be claimed by anyone entitled to them on a form for that purpose, which may be obtained from the Surveyor of Taxes immediately the Finance Bill becomes law, and we see from some of the daily papers that many people imagine that it is not necessary to send in their forms of return, claiming the ninepenny rate of duty on earned income, by the 29th inst., in accordance with the Finance Act of 1907.

We fear that unless your readers are warned, some of them will lose the reduction on their earned income for the current year, as the slip above mentioned only refers to the additional allowances provided by the present Finance Bill, and does not affect the question of claiming the ninepenny rate of duty where the total income does not exceed £2,000. The Act of 1907 expressly states that claims must be sent in before September 30th, and from our experience, since the year in which the Act was passed, the authorities have been very firm about not allowing the reduction unless a claim was sent in before that date.

Seeing that the reduction this year will mean a saving of nearly 36 per cent. in the tax on the portion of income that is earned, it is all the more important that a claim should be lodged in time.

Many taxpayers neglect to give notice of appeal within the ten days allowed for that purpose, from the date on the Notice of Charge, and consequently they give the Surveyor of Taxes the opportunity of refusing to allow the appeal, should they subsequently send in a notice. It is important, therefore, that everyone should be careful to give notice of appeal in good time, as it is the only opportunity they will have of appealing, no matter how excessive an assessment may be.—Yours &c.,

THE PICTURE.

The picture of a little child
Hangs on my wall and smiles: 'tis you
When you were seven years old—you smiled
Even then as no one else can do.

And yet, dear love, you never knew
Whom you were blessing then, nor how
The little curves that painter drew
Would be your lover's daydream now.

Had you died then, they would have said:
'Only a little girl is dead';
They could not (how could I?) have known
That, without seeing even or grieving,
My soul had lost beyond retrieving
The one soul born to be its own.

The World of Books.

THE "NATION" OFFICE, THURSDAY NIGHT.

THE most interesting of the political books of the season will perhaps be Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's volume of speeches by Mr. Winston Churchill. Mr. Churchill's style is not to the taste of his opponents, but at its best it is the most finished and literary oratory of our time. Both in Mr. Churchill's speeches and his writings occur passages which, for richness of vocabulary and power and balance of expression, will compare with the best examples of English prose, seek for them where we may.

THE autobiography of Princess Hélène von Racowitza, which Messrs. Constable announce for early publication, promises to be one of the most interesting memoirs of the season. Princess von Racowitza was, of course, the heroine of Meredith's "The Tragic Comedians," and the story of her love affair with Lassalle is told at length in the coming volume. Her mother, Frau von Dönniges, held a famous salon at Munich, and there Princess Hélène became acquainted with Hans Andersen, Liebig, and other notable figures, while her subsequent career at Berlin, at Nice, at Paris in the days of Napoleon III., and in the United States, where she stayed for some time among the Mormons and struck up a friendship with Madame Blavatsky, is full of romantic episodes. Among other matters touched upon are the strange friendship between Lassalle and Bismarck, his intimacy with Brandes, and the Princess Racowitza's relations with Ludwig II. of Bavaria, and, in later years with Richard Wagner. With such piquant materials to draw upon, the autobiography can hardly fail to make lively reading.

AMONG present-day publishers Messrs. Maunsel, of Dublin, enjoy a deserved reputation for introducing new writers of real power and distinction. Their autumn list is always awaited with interest, and this year it includes a revised and enlarged edition of Mr. Padraic Colum's volume of poems, "Wild Earth," and cheap reprints of the late John Synge's "Poems and Translations" and "The Well of the Saints." In the "Abbey Theatre Series" we are to have three new plays—"The Cross Roads," by Mr. S. L. Robinson; "The Drone," by Mr. Rutherford Mayne; and "The Shuiler's Child," by Mr. Seumas O'Kelly. Other announcements are "The Day's Burden," a collection of political and literary studies by Mr. T. M. Kettle, M.P., and "Selections from the Prose and Verse of Charlotte Grace O'Brien," with a biographical introduction by Mr. Stephen Gwynn. Miss Grace O'Brien was a pioneer in the work of lessening the miseries which Irish emigrants had to suffer in their passage across the Atlantic, and receives a tribute in John O'Leary's "Recollections of Fenians and Fenianism."

* * *

THAT there is a large number of people interested in Oriental poetry and philosophy is proved by the remarkable success of Mr. Murray's "Wisdom of the East" series. A couple of dozen of these little volumes have already been published, and several additions to the series are in active preparation. One of these is an abridged translation of the famous Buddhist manual, "The Path of Light," which, though it occupies among Buddhists a place analogous to that of the "Imitatio Christi" in the Western world, has never before been done into English. It has now been rendered by Mr. L. D. Barnett, Keeper of the Oriental Department at the British Museum, and will be published in a couple of weeks.

IT is now nearly ten years since readers had the pleasure of seeing a new book by Mrs. Meynell, so that "Ceres' Runaway and Other Essays," which was issued last week, is all the more welcome. Some of the papers now collected have already appeared in "The Pall Mall Gazette," and drew from George Meredith the remark that "they can be read repeatedly, because they are compact and suggestive, and at the same time run with clearness; the surprise coming on us from their combined grace of manner and sanity of thought is like one's dream of what recognition of a new truth would be." It may be remembered that a volume of Mrs. Meynell's essays induced Coventry Patmore to withdraw his statement "that no female writer of our time has attained true 'distinction.'" We hope that no such long interval will pass before Mrs. Meynell gives us yet another volume.

THE present season will see the publication of a new biography of Balzac and a new translation of his complete works. The translation, which is the first to give, in an unexpurgated form, all that Balzac wrote, runs to fifty-three volumes, and will be issued by the Caxton Publishing Company. The biography has been written by Mr. Frederick Lawton, and will be published by Mr. Grant Richards. Up to the present there is no adequate biography of Balzac in English. Miss Mary Sandars's volume, published a few years ago, contains some material that had not been printed before, and is excellent in all that relates to the facts of Balzac's life, but is not so successful in its treatment of his novels.

Two books dealing with trades that have played no inconsiderable part in our national life are promised for the present season. One is "Chronicles of Pharmacy," by Mr. A. C. Wootton, to be published by Messrs. Macmillan. The art of the apothecary bulks largely in fiction and has been associated with religion, superstition, science, and crime. Mr. Wootton gives an account of the more famous compounds that have been handed down to us through the ages, and also treats of the philosophers, physicians, alchemists, quacks, and adventurers, whose names are associated with the development of pharmacy. No such fascination belongs to the other volume—"The Grocery Trade: Its History and Romance"—but Mr. J. Aubrey Rees, its author, has aimed at relating the history of the trade from the fourteenth century down to our own time in a style that will interest the general reader as well as the student of politics and of social life and manners. Messrs. Duckworth are the publishers.

M. NESTOR FREMEAUX'S book on Napoleon, which was last year crowned by the French Academy, has been translated into English, and will be issued shortly by Mr. Melrose. Its title is "The Drama of St. Helena," and it gives some fresh facts about Napoleon's last days. M. Fremeaux comments adversely on the way Napoleon was treated by the English authorities, but his work is in no way partisan.

* * *

THOSE who like to keep abreast with current French literature will welcome the appearance of the "Annales des Lettres Françaises" for 1908, which Messrs. Sansot have just issued. This useful publication is now in its third year, and contains a sort of literary diary, the books and plays which were made public each month being treated under separate headings. M. Jules Bertraut deals with literature, and M. Adrien Bertrand with the drama, and the notices, though brief, are detailed enough to give an excellent notion of the literary movement in France. The chief complaint to be made against the work is its tardy appearance, and it is to be hoped that in future it may be found possible to issue the "Annales" earlier in the year.

THE CAREER OF FRANCIS NEWMAN.*

Mr. Tollemache, in his "Memorials of Mark Pattison," tells an amusing story of the Rector's annoyance on hearing an English lady inform a hotel acquaintance that "a brother of Sister Dora" had arrived. Professor Newman shared with Pattison the disadvantage of being overshadowed by a more prominent kinsman, and at times he resented the fact. He was, indeed, a man of sufficient distinction to stand on his own merits; the real drawback to his effectiveness was not that he was the brother of the famous Cardinal—it is one of the ironies of life that he should be so described in the inscription on his bust in the library of the London University—but that he was a man of to-morrow, perhaps of the day after, rather than of to-day. "I am anti-everything," he said of himself. He opposed alcohol, tobacco, sport, landlordism, theology, vivisection; he was a vegetarian, a humanitarian, an anti-Imperialist, an advocate of Woman's Rights. His worst enemies could not accuse him either of moderation in the form or of reticence in the expression of his opinions. "He could not beat about the bush in his beliefs; he would not keep them secret; he did not care for unpopularity in the least." This was in his family: the peculiarities of the three brothers were too marked to be accounted for by individual causes: of the second, Charles Robert, "we do not speak of him," he wrote to Miss Swanwick, "because he is as unfit for society as if he were insane."

It is difficult to-day to realise the narrowness of the environment in which his generation lived. In the religious world—and the family was religious—there was no ease or lightness: life was seen through a magnifying glass, and its details assumed unreal proportions. Can anything be heavier on hand than such an extract as this from the future Cardinal's diary?—

> "Sept. 30, 1821. Sunday.—After dinner to-day I was suddenly called downstairs to give an opinion whether I thought it a sin to write a letter on Sunday. I found dear F——— had refused to copy one. A scene ensued more painful than any I have experienced. I have been sadly deficient in . . . patience and filial obedience."

It is not surprising that such a "fireside clime" led to reaction: none but the most wooden natures could endure the strain. In 1826 Newman obtained a Double First and a Balliol Fellowship. His scruples, however, had begun: he felt himself unable to sign the Thirty-nine Articles; and consequently could neither retain his Fellowship nor take his degree. Under the influence of Lord Congleton and Mr. A. N. Groves, he became associated with the earnest men known later as Plymouth Brethren, and spent three years in missionary work in Syria. But he was drifting from received orthodoxies, and on his return to England he threw himself into the cause of social, political, and economical reform. That such work lies on the main line of religious progress is doubted by few to-day. "Drainage has an effect on spiritual life. Everyone probably will remember Dr. Nicholson's resolute assertion that 'even a stomach-ache could be a spiritual experience'!" But a few generations ago a reformer was regarded as half crank, half heretic. "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children" was adduced as an argument against anæsthetics; disgust was loudly expressed at "ladies bathing within reach of telescopes." The age was hidebound: it is not surprising that the revolt was emphatic. How it was to be done was secondary; the essential thing was to break through the hide.

In 1846 he was made Professor of Latin at University College, London. Here his success was qualified. His eccentricities of manner and even of dress were against him. He had no sense of humor. He did not know when he was making himself ridiculous. He wore, it seems, three coats—one above the other, the outer being green. The last six or eight inches of his trousers were leather to keep out the damp; his hats were ancient, and not over clean. His lectures were of varying quality. As he occupied himself more and more with extraneous work their interest declined. His reserve stood in the way of anything like personal intimacy with his pupils, and he was too much of an individualist to be generally either popular or influential. He would discourse on singular subjects. "I have a pleasant memory," writes Mrs. Tarpey, "of his holding a skein of wool for me to wind one wet afternoon, and of his telling me the while of his observation of a family of bugs. He had learned many curious things about their habits and customs, and formed a high idea of their intelligence."

His judgment was often confirmed by events. In 1850 he foresaw the Yellow Peril. He was a strenuous supporter of Kossuth. "Austria is only a Court and an army. . . Dickens is, in my judgment, a foolish man." He perceived that the end of despotisms would come when the masses were civilised, and not a day sooner. "'We without them cannot be made perfect,' seems to me the clue to European oppressions. While stupid barbarism exists in masses, it will be the tool of tyranny against the more educated and refined and wealthy." Right, not expediency, was his principle: nor, an armchair politician, did he care to mediate between the two. He disapproved of the policy of expansion, and blamed the Liberals for not reversing the steps taken in that direction by their opponents. "I cry 'Ireland for the Irish,' 'Egypt for the Egyptians,' 'India for the Indians,' come what may to the English Empire. But I have never read in history of any Empire being ruined or banned by Justice, Mercy, or Purity." His sympathy with the Gladstone government was limited. Mr. Gladstone was more open to ideas than any other Minister of his period; but he intensely distrusted him in the part of an "old Parliamentary hand." Irish as his leanings were, he disliked the Home Rule Bills and disapproved of the manner of their introduction. "Ireland needs the practice of local government, varying locally, before that of a central Irish Parliament. This forbids my desiring a complete triumph to Mr. Parnell." The new Liberalism, he thought, was caucus-ridden.

> "After such a transformation of the constituencies, I not only expect—I desire—the break-up of the Liberal Party. Little by little they have adopted the Tory idea of 'follow your leader': never think for yourself."

Nor was he blind to the questions of the near future. "Unless at a very early day the causes of un-employ be removed," he wrote in 1887, "we must calculate on frightful disorder. Evidently two measures are indispensable: (1) to stop our land from going out of cultivation; (2) to stop the demoralising waste of 135 millions per annum on pernicious drink."

His religious views mellowed with time. Dr. Martineau's colleague in the ministry, J. J. Taylor, asked him his belief as to immortality:—

> "I replied that the Most High never asked my consent for bringing me into this world; yet I thanked Him for it, and tried to glorify Him. In like manner He never asked my leave to put me after my death in this world into any new world; and, if He thought fit to do it, I am not likely to murmur against His will. But not knowing His will, nor what power of resistance He allows me, I do not attempt to foresee the future. I seem to remember Taylor's remark, that he thought I went as far as anyone could be expected to go."

"Paul is less and less, and Christ more and more," he said to a friend in his last illness; and we are told on Dr. Martineau's authority that "when he died, he wished it to be known that he died in the Christian faith."

THE LAST KING OF POLAND.*

Mr. Nisbet Bain has performed a difficult task in tracing the decline and fall of Poland. The wrongs of that country are a familiar theme. We all know that freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell. Mr. Bain has set himself to investigate the problem how Poland, which had been a greater power than Russia, declined to a position which could not be maintained, and collapsed from internal dissensions, without being able to make one stand for freedom. It is not a pleasant duty that Mr. Bain has undertaken, and he has not sought to gild the pill. His object has been rather to enlist sympathy with Stanilaus the Second, the one statesman in the country who did for a time introduce real reforms. His book would have been better if he had not tried to combine two irreconcilable purposes. A History of Poland and a Life of its last King are not to be welded into one, and the effort to discharge the double function only serves to dislocate one without harmonising the other. This, however, is all that can be said against Mr. Bain's work. He has filled his pages with useful and entertaining information, collected with great care from original sources in the Sclavonic languages of which he was a master. He has thrown round Stanislaus a halo of romance which illumines the fall of the monarchy, and at the same time gives the King's own character an interest which, if it had been unskilfully or unsympathetically handled, it would not possess. The personal qualities of Stanislaus, like the national qualities of his subjects, were amiable and attractive. But they did not in either case conduce to practical success. The Polish Constitution was the triumph of individualism. The liberum veto really enabled a single Deputy to prevent any business from being done in Parliament. The King, though he saw clearly the need of thorough change if Poland was to survive, would often act on an impulse. The Polish oligarchy was not tyrannical or cruel, but its patriotism evaporated in fine phrases and good intentions. It had not the steadiness of purpose or the singleness of aim required for the fulfilment of social or political designs. Mr. Bain makes the Poles live, and writes of the past as if it were present. We can see as we read about the best of them how it was that their country was never safe. They provided against nothing which they did not see before their eyes. They trusted to the chapter of accidents. Every landed proprietor lived like an independent potentate, and his tenants or vassals regarded no one else as their master. The idea that joint action might be necessary against Russia, or Prussia, or Austria, did not occur to them, or at least they did not entertain it.

The Polish Catholics would not hear of other religious bodies being put on a level with themselves. They found themselves in a position of superiority and privilege which they had not made, which they altogether refused to abandon. Why should Dissenters, of whatever church, be granted what they did not possess? When the Duke of Wellington was induced to support Catholic Emancipation, he dwelt upon the fact that Catholics had fought as well for their country as any Protestants in the land. This argument, though it might have struck the Duke less than fourteen years after Waterloo, is a summary and epitome of the case for national union. In Poland there seems to have been no such feeling. There was the spirit of feudalism with all the loyalty and fidelity to which it gives rise. But there was none of the national spirit which the necessities of the time required. The King stood alone in his discernment of the danger and its remedy.

Mr. Bain's book suffers from lack of revision, and the tragedy of his premature death. But otherwise it is cleverly arranged, so far as the double nature of his subject enabled him to arrange it. He has brought out the wonderful temper of his hero, which enabled Stanislaus to bear with equanimity trials that would have broken down many a stronger character. If he did not know the meaning of responsibility, he was equally innocent of selfish ambition and disingenuous intrigue. Greatness in the worldly sense had been thrust upon him, and he was totally unprepared to meet its obligations. He saw clearly enough the situation in which his country was placed. He did not commit the mistake of supposing, like the Polish nobles, that Prussia would support him against the unreasonable claims of Russia, whereas Prussia was, on the whole, the more dangerous enemy of the two. It is impossible not to sympathise with a man so terribly hampered by circumstances, who met the ills of life with so much gaiety of heart. If he could have found materials for permanently reforming his country, or the means of defending her, or the opportunity of escaping from an intolerable position, he might have obtained a milder judgment from posterity. He had to make bricks without straw, to act as if things were different from what they seemed, and to rely upon supports that always eluded his clutch. Even his statesmanship was useless in such a predicament, and he could only wait for the inevitable failure of his efforts with the patience of a hopeless calm. He never complained or put blame upon others. If he had been allowed his own way, he would have acted with Russia, which was Poland's last chance. Mr. Bain has drawn the King's character and described the King's position with art and sympathy. Readers will find the personal part of his book by far the most attractive. The real fault of this volume is, as has been said before, that it combines history with biography in an indiscriminate fashion. Its excellence is to make the past live, and to bring back Poland before the eyes of a generation which had come to regard that country as an extinct volcano. Not since Miss Porter's forgotten "Thaddeus of Warsaw" has there been such a successful effort of this kind.

THE GOLD IN THE GARDEN.*

Gold has often proved to be an elusive commodity, especially when the means of acquiring it seemed particularly easy. We have been harboring suspicions lately of the garden gold, which was to flow in at the rate of from £600 to £800 per acre. These doubts arose in part from a degree of acquaintance with market gardening, and in part from observing that the frequent leaded column on the leader page of the daily paper which boomed French gardening dwindled down to the quarterly small-type paragraph near the police-court intelligence. When M. Blériot soared, the soil slumped. The home-coming of Lieutenant Shackleton placed M. Maraîcher under eclipse. Our misgivings grew out of two not wholly trivial considerations—the first, that the "plant" for mining the gold in the garden was a great deal more costly than the publicists knew; the second, that the taste of the British public for early Parisian forcing carrots and Cantaloupe melons was unproven.

The latest (and in many respects the best) of the string of books on French gardening which have appeared during the past few years does little to re-assure us; rather it confirms our fears that any soil in this country which becomes golden is much more likely to do so from absorbing the lost capital of eager speculators of the get-rich-quick stamp than from the harvest which it yields to steady industry. The present work gives the experience of Mr. Thomas Smith, the manager of Mr. Joseph Fels' French garden at Mayland, Essex, and it differs from most others which we know in descending to such prosaic, but important, details as a statement of monthly returns from market salesmen, and a profit and loss account for a year. The Mayland French garden is two acres in extent, and the figures show us that produce to the value of £766 4s. 6d. was sold in the first financial year, and that the cost of wages, manure, carriage, commissions, seeds, and packing materials amounted to £714 15s. 6d., leaving a profit (subject to rent and depreciation) of £51 7s. Thus the possible "£600 to £800 per acre gross" becomes £25 13s. 6d. net. This is not inspiriting, but we derive some consolation from the reflection that the returns may be expected to be higher when the garden has become thoroughly established, and the expenses may be reduced with greater experience. It would be unreasonable to expect the garden to show its best results in the first year.

We turn now to the question of capital expenditure. Mr. Smith gives us an estimate for the equipment of a two-acre garden, and it amounts to £1,290, but he warns us that at least £700 will be required to carry on until the garden comes into profitable bearing, and £2,000 is therefore his irreducible minimum. Mr. Smith does not expect the garden to pay its way at once. He suggests that the returns for the first year might be fixed at £800, and calculates that all this would be required to carry on the business for the second year. As he only allows £40 for rent, rates, and water, and £100 for the maintenance of the working proprietor, this seems only too likely. The gross returns for the second year "may amount to as much as £1,000." In the third and following years they should be still more, while expenses "should be materially reduced," but it is not until after the third year that good profits are to be expected.

Mr. Smith writes thoughtfully and conscientiously. He is obviously anxious to avoid anything savoring of sensationalism. He does not permit himself to indulge any expectations of profit without good management and experienced workmanship. The most that we have to find fault with is an occasional weak expression, such as "if all goes well." Practical workers know that things are as likely to go badly as well, and that something must always be placed to reserve to cover loss from an unexpected difficulty, such as a sudden fall in prices or bad weather.

After reading Mr. Smith's book carefully, we are more than ever convinced that French gardening is not for the ordinary person, but the superman—that it is not for the casual reader of a daily newspaper to turn to as a ready source of wealth in the intervals of golf matches, but for the keen, strenuous, well-trained worker, who is equally well equipped with brains, energy, and capital. For such a man we can imagine no better practical guide than Mr. Smith's book. It tells how to plan the garden, how to equip it with suitable frames and other adjuncts, how to select and grow the various crops, and how to market. Moreover, it is excellently illustrated.

"CARLYLE'S FIRST LOVE."*

The "lang toon o' Kirkcaldy," in the year after Waterloo. Enter Thomas Carlyle, a dominie by profession, but as dominant by instinct, even at the age of one and twenty, as Wagner was when he was working with "the Ring inside him," as somebody has put it. He had come from Annan to run an opposition school to Edward Irving, only to find that his rival received him "with open arms," and with a wealth of passionate sympathy which did a world of good to the young man's head. His heart was set on fire by an ex-pupil of Irving, one Margaret Gordon—"genealogically and otherwise (being poorish, proud, and well bred) rather a kind of alien to the place." Her accent was "prettily English, and her voice very fine," but her aunt, Mrs. Usher, with whom she lived, was a "lean, proud, elderly dame," who talked "shrewd Aberdeenish in accent and otherwise." That settled everything. So Margaret wrote two "sisterly" letters to the young man, and four years later she married at St. George's, Hanover Square, Alexander Bannerman, banker, wine merchant, and manufacturer, of Aberdeen, who was ten years her senior. This much Carlyle students have known for thirty years; but until last year no one knew anything about the origin of Margaret. Then Mr. R. C. Archibald crossed the Atlantic, and in the course of a month discovered as much as all the genealogists had done in thirty years. The result is the present handsome volume, which represents the ransacking of material relating to Nassau in the Bahamas; Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington; Halifax and Charlottetown in his native Canada; St. John's, Newfoundland; Glasgow, Edinburgh, Kinghorn, Kirkcaldy, and Aberdeen; London, Lee, Greenwich, and Hereford; Dublin, Foxhall, and Rathmelton.

The book is a genealogical, rather than a literary study; but then Carlyle himself struck the genealogical note: "She was of the Aberdeenshire Gordons, a far off Huntly, I doubt not." So Margaret Gordon has proved a veritable siren to this enthusiastic young Canadian, leading him into by-paths, especially into the families of Gordon, Patterson, Guthrie and Bannerman, sound Scots, or of Scoto-Irish stocks, who have fascinated him because they had much to do with the building up of our Canadian empire in the unostentatious days when our countrymen acted, and did not merely talk, Imperialism.

The story begins in 1764, when a young Donegal man, Walter Patterson, was sent out to survey the Island of St. John, which came to be known some thirty years later as Prince Edward Island, in honor of Queen Victoria's father. The name of Patterson alone supplies much material for "romance." If Robert Paterson, the old fanatic immortalised in "Old Mortality," cannot be tacked on to the family tree, we know for certain that Elizabeth Patterson, who married Jerome Bonaparte in 1803, was a distant cousin of Walter Patterson, and shared something like his fate as ruler, for, after being Governor of Prince Edward Island for sixteen years (1770-86), he was recalled, and died rather miserably in London in 1798.

Patterson did what no modern governor dared—he became the father of two girls by a lady who lived and died plain Miss Hyde. The elder girl, Margaret Patterson, married in 1791, at the age of nineteen, a poor army surgeon named Alexander Gordon. If Gordon was poor, he came of good stock, tracing to the Gordons of Coclarachie, in the parish of Drumblade, Aberdeenshire, who had migrated, in the person of his grandfather, to Logie, in the parish of Crimond, on the opposite side of the county. The latter's first cousin was the famous Jacobite General, Alexander Gordon of Auchintoul, who had begun life in the Russian service, and wrote a life of Peter the Great, having married the daughter of Peter's favorite general, Patrick Gordon of Auchleuchries.

The surgeon died (on his way to England) in 1803, and his widow, Margaret Patterson, married another army surgeon, George James Guthrie (of Forfarshire origin), who was to distinguish himself in the Peninsular war. On retiring, he settled in London, and in the very year when Carlyle invaded Kirkcaldy he founded the Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital.

The fourth family line opened up is that represented by Carlyle's rival for the hand of Margaret Gordon—namely, Alexander Bannerman, a staunch old Liberal, who was sent to the Reformed Parliament by his native city of Aberdeen. In 1851 he became Colonial Governor of Prince Edward Island, Margaret Gordon arriving in her native place, Charlottetown, as Governor's lady nearly fifty-one years after her birth. Verily genealogy, with its links and coincidences, is a fascinating siren, in whose service an enthusiast may forget the trouble of the passing hour.

Whether Margaret Gordon was the Blumine of "Sartor" remains a moot literary problem. Mr. Alexander Carlyle, earlier in the present year, decided, in his "Love Letters of Thomas Carlyle and Jane Welsh," that she was not; and we are inclined to agree with him. Certain it is that Margaret Gordon, prim and "sisterly" to the last, was not the equal of Jane Welsh. Truth to tell, the Carlyle interest in the volume is of minor importance. But it has proved the co-ordinating point of a mass of interesting notes on family history, tracing the careers of people who played their parts in the world with dignity, but who were never quite big enough to enter the recognised Valhallas. With its folding pedigrees and appendices, it is a book for a quiet hour and an arm-chair, when one can catch the enthusiasm of its author, and understand the extraordinary patience with which he has unravelled many tangles. It has found a most sympathetic publisher in Mr. John Lane, for the Bodley Head has become the best exponent of the art of printing the annals of the family.

SATIRE AND REALISM.*

In "The Holy Mountain" Mr. Stephen Reynolds has produced a book which, though less valuable than "A Poor Man's House," is scarcely less original. The two books, taken together, form a social document of some completeness. These are, indeed, complementary. The author's sympathy with his S. Devon fisherfolk, because they are heartwhole in their virtues and vices, and of necessity face the hard facts of life with a courage that is not to be found in well-to-do folk who depend on the props of money, is inverted when he comes to deal with the shopkeeping burgesses of Trowbury. Part I. of "The Holy Mountain"

* "The Holy Mountain." By Stephen Reynolds. Lane. 6s.
"The Street of Adventure." By Philip Gibbs. Heinemann. 2s.

introduces us to the Trowbury trading class, and especially to the household of Mr. James Trotman, grocer and mayor, and to his cronies who foregather at the "Blue Boar," Mr. Ganthorn, Mr. Borbell the cattle drover, Mr. Clinch the draper, young George Potterne, the raffish son of a big farmer, and so forth. In the background hover minor characters, links in the social chain of Trowbury life, Miss Cora Sankey, the manageress of the "Blue Boar," and old Squire Burdrop; and in the foreground are two "young lady" shop assistants, Miss Julia Jepp, of "Clinch's Emporium," with whom the mayor's weakly son, Alec, is in love, and the knowing Miss Starkey, her confidant. It is a typical slice from the provincial loaf, one to be met with in every middling-sized town throughout the South of England, and the dull, coarse, peddling ways of the Trowbury burgesses, their incapacity for any ideas that rise above the level of the "Blue Boar," and the interests of their shops, local politics, and the squabbles on the Town Council are satirised by Mr. Reynolds with a savage harshness that recalls Swift, especially by the stress laid on unpleasant physical details. Fastidious readers may, indeed, be repelled by the earthiness of this picture of Trowbury, which is evidently the fruit of intimate familiarity; but they will be entertained by the audacity of the leading idea and the cleverness with which Mr. Reynolds handles the artistic machinery. Alec Trotman in an idle moment, while sweethearting with Miss Julia Jepp on the Downs, wills that Ramshorn Hill shall remove to Acton, to which suburb he is himself migrating, as a grocer's assistant, and the miracle is performed! The idea sounds, and is, fantastic, but the cool matter-of-factness with which the miraculous event is recorded is admirably supported by the vraisemblance of the tone of the "Halfpenny Press." The town of Trowbury, after a little gaping and staring at the news, goes stolidly about its daily business; but Sir Pushcott Bingley, Bart., the great Director of the "Halfpenny Press," motors down to the scene of the miracle, and determines to make Alec, as the miracle-worker, the man of the moment. The contrast between the provincial cunning of the Mayor, and the genial adroitness of Sir Pushcott Bingley is exceedingly well done, and Alec is carried off in the Director's motor car, and speedily booked for appearance as "the Mountain Mover" at a Monster Revivalists' Meeting at the Crystal Palace, and in the Church and Empire Ballet at the famous London music-hall, the Neapolitan.

In Part II. Mr. Reynolds broadens the base of his satire, and launches into an audacious and vigorous onslaught on the most staring manifestations, political, religious, philanthropic, and journalistic, of the spirit of humbug in English life. Satire, when genuine, is always justifiable, and, though timid, idealistic, and highly refined spirits may be wounded by the author's volleys of rattling grapeshot, which he discharges at Society in general, and at various forms of church and philanthropic humbug in especial, the justifiableness of his attack cannot be seriously questioned. The effect of such satire, though often distasteful at first sight, is to clear the moral air, and the reader who perseveres with the narrative of Alec's London experiences, and Sir Pushcott Bingley's far-reaching manœuvres over "The Holy Mountain," alias Ramshorn Hill, which is leased to a financial syndicate for religious purposes, will applaud most, if not all, of the hard hitting. Of course, the spirit and form of the novel being satiric, there are the usual satiric excesses and mercilessness shown in the attack. The weakness shown in certain chapters towards the close is due to the fact that the author, in the joyful arrogance of youth, does not discriminate between the objects within reach and the objects out of range of his arrows, and when he brings the Government and the Church into the quarrel of the religious sects over the possession of "The Holy Mountain," the satire becomes both unwieldy and suspiciously thin. The few passages of doubtful force are, however, not conspicuous, and the narrative rarely becomes wearisome, owing to the skilful manner in which the domestic scenes in the Trotman household are diversified with the London events. Looked at broadly, "The Holy Mountain" may be styled a satire on the mental life of the English middle-class and its commercial spirit. Mr. Wells has dealt with the same subjects in "Tono Bungay," and it is a good sign that, from a standpoint quite individual, though with weapons less brilliantly polished and finely edged, Mr. Stephen Reynolds should have sallied forth to challenge and encounter the hosts of Dagon.

In "The Street of Adventure" Mr. Philip Gibbs puts together an interesting novel of the life of the staff of a great London daily. Fleet Street journalism is a subject worthy to be etched and bitten in by a mordant genius in a bath of pleasing irony. Swift would have revelled in the spectacle of our Brobdingnagian world inclining a respectful ear to hastily-garbled reports of its doings, bawled at it, daily, through ten thousand journalistic megaphones. And have not cynics likened journalists to a crowd of active flies buzzing round the head of a patient, browsing ass? But, to quit uncomplimentary metaphors, the difficulty of seeing the Fleet Street world in just perspective against the background of the great world it chronicles, might baffle writers of more distinguished talents than our author. Trollope could have visualised the spectacle in his solid, thorough-going, earthy fashion. Meredith would have penned thereon corruscating and bewildering pages; and it is a loss to literature that Mr. Howells, that detached, cool observer, should have kept the disconcerting subject at arm's length.

It is a tribute to Mr. Gibbs that his impressionistic chronicle of the Fleet Street experiences of his hero, Francis Luttrell, should hold our attention throughout twenty chapters. Luttrell, a sensitive young man with an Oxford training and scholarly ideals, after starving as a journalistic "free lance," gets a post as descriptive reporter on "The Rag," a great Liberal daily with no circulation, and a disillusioned millionaire proprietor. The snapshots of Luttrell's colleagues—Bellamy the chief, Grattan the Irish war correspondent, Vicary the news editor, Bathurst the leader writer, Phillimore the literary editor, and of the special reporters, Codrington, Brandon, Quin, Miss Hubbard, and Katherine Halstead—are evidently taken from life, and the racket and strain and bewildering rush of the men's chase after "copy" in the daily race against time, are set down with atmospheric truth. The strength of the scenes lies in the peculiar London note of mental exhaustion, tiredness, cynical indifference, and nervous excitement which they exhale. The restlessness, emotional shallowness, intellectual agility, and general cheapness of journalistic life on "The Rag" are set against a background of the private, domestic affairs of most of the characters. One recognises Mr. Gibbs's artistic aim and intention, viz., to get the most varied tones and tints into his canvas, and relieve the general, shallow soullessness of the professional outlook by contrast with the deeper springs of human passion and human character.

But it is here that the author treads on dangerous ice. He has made the common mistake of being too lavish with his romantic coloring. The love interest, in the passages between Luttrell and Codrington and the beautiful Katherine Halstead, is treated too emotionally, and further, the sentimental episodes, such as the complication when Luttrell tries to befriend Peg, the cockney girl who is the mistress of his colleague Brandon, introduce a jarring note. If women are to be brought into the Fleet Street picture, a more restrained and dexterous touch is needed than Mr. Gibbs can boast. He is happiest, we think, in his concluding chapters, which set forth with convincing realism the financial crisis at the office of "The Rag" when the sands are running low, and when desperate attempts are being made to raise fresh capital from a group of wealthy Liberals, from Liberal Imperialists, from Peers, from City Jews, from anybody, in short, who has money to throw away.

This historic episode in the annals of the Fleet Street of the novel, with the final scene in which the whole staff, after being thanked in carefully-chosen phrases by the proprietor for their magnificent services, is turned into the street, and the lights are turned out outside the huge building, will not be criticised by journalists. The strain and mental worry of holding on to a precarious position from which men, better qualified, are daily trying to oust you, is perhaps over insisted on by the author, but in any case his novel, which has no dull pages, shows the aspirant the seamy side.

SOME TEXT-BOOKS OF EUROPEAN HISTORY.*

These books belong to Messrs. Methuen's new series called "Six Ages of European History," and are intended for use in the higher forms of schools. One interest of such a series is the indications it gives of the standard now required in history and the methods adopted in its teaching. The standard seems to be as high as is practicable, and there are many signs that history is winning the place it ought to hold in our educational programmes. In part this is due to the Universities, but the development of higher education for women has given an impetus to historical studies. Women have, of late years, won distinction in most fields of study, but they have done best in history, and it is not without significance that three out of the six text-books before us are the work of women who have had experience in its teaching.

The six text-books comprising the series cover the history of Europe from the extinction of the Western Empire by the resignation of Romulus Augustulus in 476 down to the end of the Franco-German war. It would be impossible to teach those who are still at school much more than a bare outline of the course of European history, but it is desirable that some definite period should be studied with more thoroughness, and these text-books are admirably fitted for this purpose. The boy or girl who masters one of them will be well-grounded in the period chosen, and put in the way besides of gaining a fuller knowledge of the subject. Each volume has a useful list of books, and in most cases these include some good historical novels. This is an excellent plan, for an interest in history is more frequently awakened by the reading of a novel than by any other means. One criticism we have to make upon the series as a whole is that some of the maps are very badly printed. The dotted lines marking boundaries are trying to the eyesight, and it is a pity that all maps were not placed at the end of each volume and drawn on a larger scale.

Professor Masterman has, in the opening volume, the difficult task of compressing the history of more than four centuries into two hundred and fifty pages. That, working within such a limitation and treating of so confused a period, he has managed to rise above a mere chronicle of events and to make his narrative fresh and readable is something of an achievement. The great difficulty in a book of this kind is to observe a proper proportion in the space given to each event, and here Professor Masterman shows an admirable judgment. The pages on Gregory the Great, on the Iconoclastic Emperors, and on Charlemagne's rise and administration could hardly be improved in their mixture of facts and sound and suggestive generalisations. We confess to some feeling of surprise at seeing the nine volumes of Milman's "History of Latin Christianity" among the books recommended to beginners, but Professor Masterman evidently has a high standard. His treatment of the period from the rise of Theodoric to the break-up of the Carlovingian Empire ranks with Church's "The Beginning of the Middle Ages" and the opening chapters in Mr. Bryce's "Holy Roman Empire."

Both Miss Lees, in "The Central Period of the Middle Age, 918-1273," and Miss Lodge, in "The End of the Middle Age, 1273-1453," are successful in gathering together the threads of European history during two complex ages. The persistence of the theory of political and ecclesiastical unity which survived the break-up of Charlemagne's Empire is well brought out by Miss Lees. The eleventh century was the age when the Church attained her highest degree of spiritual influence, and, though during the two following centuries her wealth and consequently her temporal power increased, her hold over people's minds gradually loosened until in the beginning of the fourteenth century the Papacy entered upon the "Babylonish Captivity" at Avignon.

With Miss Hollings's "Europe in Renaissance and Reformation, 1453-1659," we enter upon the modern period of European history. In Italy and in Germany the medieval conception of Emperor and Pope still endured, but England, France, and Spain had risen to the idea of nationality. Feudalism was disappearing and a spirit of individual revolt against caste or even class rule was springing up. It is a period of great interest, and, though Miss Hollings treats it well, her book would be more readable had she given fuller space to a discussion of the ruling ideas of the time.

The outstanding figure in Mr. A. H. Johnson's "The Age of the Enlightened Despot, 1660-1789," is Louis XIV., and the book opens with an examination of the reforms initiated by Colbert after Mazarin's death. Mr. Johnson rightly blames Colbert for his advocacy of a tariff war against Holland, then the chief industrial rival of France. Such a course was calculated to lead to war itself, and in this way "Colbert urged the king on that course of war in which he was only too eager to engage, and which was finally to ruin all efforts at reform." Mr. Johnson also pronounces Louis XIV. to be "one of the ablest men of his generation." This is difficult to maintain, for even if we do not go so far as Saint-Simon, who said the king's intelligence was "au-dessous du médiocre," we have the warrant of so high an authority as M. Lavisse for describing it as "ordinary, without initiative, and poorly equipped by an education which was, upon the whole, deplorable."

The last volume in the series, "The Re-making of Modern Europe, 1789-1878," by Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, is one of the best. The Revolution and the Napoleonic wars are clearly and succinctly described, while the later Revolutions in France, the Prussianisation of Germany, the unification of Italy, and other events in the period between 1815 and the Treaty of Berlin give the book a greater interest for the general reader than its predecessors can claim. Mr. Marriott finds the characteristic work of the nineteenth century to be "a revelation of the potent force of nationality as a principle of unification and a principle of disruption. Liberated by the French Revolution and emphasised by the Napoleonic wars, that principle founds its most conspicuous illustration . . . . above all, perhaps, in the political unification of the British race scattered in a hundred homes throughout the world." It is difficult to understand this statement, but it seems to show a confusion of the principle of nationality with the Imperial idea—two conceptions diametrically opposed to one another.

Mr. A. H. Johnson, the general editor, is to be congratulated on a number of historical manuals which, while useful for those who have examinations in view, will also help many other readers to a better grasp of European history.

BOOKS FOR SCHOOLS.

Although at the moment none of the ordinary school subjects is receiving special attention either from teachers or publishers, the autumn season for educational publications promises to be fairly active and interesting. Speaking generally, the new books announced or published follow well-established lines. An exception may be made perhaps in favor of geography, in which subject a long-deferred revolution appears to be in sight introducing more enlightened and stimulating methods of teaching. The objects aimed at primarily are to impart the "geographical sense" and to increase the value of geography as a subject for training the reasoning powers. Dr. Morley Davies's "Geography of the British Isles," published by Macmillan (3s.) is a good example of the new type of text-book. In the arrangement and method of this book importance is attached to geological formation as determining the natural division of the country into districts, while arbitrary political boundaries which tend to confuse children by distracting their attention from true geographical considerations are subordinated. The county division is used in the tabulation of the statistics with which the book is abundantly provided. "Bradshaw" also is summoned to the aid of the teacher. Another book on somewhat similar lines is Mr. George W. Webb's "A Systematic Geography of the British Isles," published by Methuen (1s.). The practical side of geography is emphasised in Mr. B. C. Wallis's "Practical Exercises in Geography," published by Macmillan (2s. 6d.), which includes simple surveying problems, exercises in latitude and longitude, modelling from contours, and graphs connected with climate. Another type of geographical book is well represented by the Cambridge County Geographies, published by the Cambridge University Press, of which four examples—Kent, Essex, Surrey, and Sussex, all by Mr. G. F. Bosworth—have already been published (1s. 6d. each). These are reading books rather than text-books and are full of interesting historical and geographical information, with numerous illustrations and diagrams and a geological map. They should serve to inculcate in children the "county" spirit to which politicians have recently attached such importance, impressing on them at the same time the geographical significance of their native town or village.

In science there appears to be nothing of special interest from the point of view of class teaching. The Oxford University Press announce "The Story of Comets," by Mr. G. F. Chambers (6s. net), which should be added to the school library in time for the return of Halley's comet; and an "Introduction to the Study of Biology" (6s. 6d.) by Messrs. J. W. Kirkaldy and J. M. Drummond. Messrs. Dent have recently published two of their scientific primers—"Chemistry," by Professor Tilden, and "Botany," by Professor Reynolds Green (1s. each)—a series admirably designed for the man in the street, who aims at acquiring a general knowledge of the principles of science. We have also received from Messrs. Dent a delightful specimen of their "Open Air Nature Books," entitled "The Hedge I Know," by Messrs. W. P. Westell and H. E. Turner, illustrated by numerous colored plates, and published at the moderate price of 8d. The pond, wood, meadow, stream, and common are to follow. Another book on somewhat similar lines comes from Christophers, "The Scaly-Winged," a book on butterflies and moths for beginners, by Mr. R. B. Henderson of Rugby (1s. net). It includes in the last chapter (after a discussion of the morality of collecting) some useful hints on the gentle art of catching, killing, and setting. "An Apprentices' Course of Experimental Physics and Mechanics," published by Longmans, attempts to supply a real need, in view of the rapid increase in the provision of technical courses for apprentices.

"Problem Papers in Mathematics" (with answers, 4s. 6d.), by Mr. R. C. Fawdry, of Clifton, announced by Macmillan, deserves mention. An "Introduction to the School Geometry" (1s.), by Messrs. W. P. Workman and A. G. Cracknell, announced by the University Tutorial Press, is based on the recommendations of the Board of Education in their excellent Circular 711 on the teaching of geometry and graphic algebra, and, judging from the prospectus of the book, it should serve a useful purpose in preparatory classes.

The stream of language texts shows no sign of abatement; their number suggests, indeed, that the editing of school texts is a staple industry among schoolmasters. The Oxford University Press announce more than twenty texts in classical and modern languages. Mr. Murray has recently published "Textes et Questions," by Messrs. W. Mansfield Poole and E. L. Lassimonne, of Osborne (1s. 6d.), and a key (2s. 6d.), based on a novel and interesting method. Four of Mr. Murray's new series of Simplified Latin Texts will be ready shortly, the texts being Agricola, Camillus, Œmilius Paulus, and the Jugurthine War.

There appears to be less activity than usual in the making of books on education. The Oxford University Press are publishing shortly a History of Secondary Education in Scotland, by Mr. J. Strong, and Longmans have in the press another contribution to educational literature by the Head Master of Eton, entitled "Schoolboys and Schoolwork."

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

In the concluding paragraph of "South Africa," the latest addition to the "Romance of Empire" Series (T. C. & E. C. Jack, 6s. net), Mr. Ian D. Colvin suggests that the opening of the United Parliament in Cape Town should be celebrated by a pageant illustrative of South African history. He has certainly done a good deal towards proving the pictorial possibilities of such a scheme in his preceding pages; for the book itself is a literary pageant, alive with movement and color, a series of historic dramas unequalled for poignancy by the story of any other colony. First, the Portuguese sailing in search of the Kingdom of Prester John, identifiable with Abyssinia; then the Dutch, planting the first settlement at the Cape; finally, the British, holding Cape Colony, first in trust for the Dutch, and then taking it over for themselves. These are the three main periods into which the history of South Africa may be divided. One of the most enjoyable parts of the book is the two chapters dealing with the administration of the Van der Stals, father and son, the servants of the Dutch East India Company. Excellent, also, is the picture drawn by the author of Dutch colonial life, as lived in Cape Colony and Stellenbosch before the influx of a cosmopolitan population, much of it undesirable, from Europe; a social life which, in its kindliness and its stately courtesies, must have borne a strong resemblance to that of Virginia before the American Civil War. The lurid episodes of the Kaffir wars are detailed with much circumstantiality, and a good attempt is made to apportion the responsibility to the right shoulders. Indeed, it is not until we come to what the author sadly terms "the family quarrel"—i.e., the first Boer War—that we suspect him of any political bias, and even then he is disposed to put the blame on Gladstone rather than the Boers. Later references, however, to "the great work of Lord Milner" and the down-trodden Uitlanders, not to mention "the disgraceful peace" that followed Majuba, indicate the trend of Mr. Colvin's opinions on later politics. Fortunately, there is no space for much of this sort of thing; the history ends with "the disgraceful peace." We are spared the "romance" of the second war Moreover, the author should be applauded rather than censured for his omission of any account of the Rand's gold and diamond industries. Other writers have already treated this least romantic and most sordid phase of South African development, and its introduction into this tale of struggle and adventure, colonists and true Empire-builders, would have been nothing but a pity.

For a long time English readers have been without a short history of the Papacy, and we are glad to see that something has been done to fill up this gap by the publication of Professor Gustave Krüger's "The Papacy: The Idea and Its Exponents," translated into English by Mr. F. M. S. Batchelor and Mr. C. A. Miles (Unwin, 5s. net). Professor Krüger writes from a decidedly anti-papal standpoint, and his work is a criticism as well as a history of the institution. But his criticism is fair and balanced. He recognises the services which so many of the Popes rendered to European civilisation, and, in particular, admits the greatness and sincerity of Gregory VII. In a concluding chapter the future of the Papacy is discussed. A distinction, says Professor Krüger, is often drawn between the spiritual, the political, and the royal Papacy. "The royal Papacy, it is said, has disappeared, the political Papacy is doomed to decay, and only of the spiritual Papacy is it prophesied that it will continue." This is a view which the author refuses to accept. He holds, on the contrary, that, for the Papacy, religion and politics are indissolubly united. "The spirits of the great Popes still walk the world to-day, and they will continue to walk as long as there is a Roman Catholic Church." The translators are to be congratulated on this clear rendering of an extremely useful volume.

In her preface to "The Secret History of the Court of Spain During the Last Century" (John Long, 15s. net) Miss Rachel Challice tells us that her material "is gathered solely from Spanish sources," and that, in addition to documents at the Madrid libraries, she has also been able to make use of "personal recollections" related to her by Spanish residents. The announcement raises hopes which are not fulfilled. Miss Challice's pages have color and vivacity. The reader ignorant of modern Spanish history will gain from them some conception of its main events and its leading personalities. But the "secrets" revealed in the book do not rise above the small talk and gossip of the Court. Secrets apart, the history of Spain during the last hundred years makes a good subject for a popular book. The marriage of an English princess to the present king and the rising in Catalonia have turned attention towards Spanish affairs, and though, as her title indicates, Miss Challice is concerned with the life of the Court rather than the life of the people, those for whom the slightest doings of royalty possess a charm will approve her choice.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME IV. OF THE NATION

Is Now Ready, and will be sent free on application to the Manager.

The cheerfully matter-of-fact way of writing about matters of spirit which is employed by the author of "Physical Science and Christianity" (T. Werner Laurie, 6s. net) is, at any rate, calculated to obtain a popularity for her book that might be withheld if the subject were treated less vivaciously. Miss E. K. Bates is a spiritualist who has already earned some literary reputation with two previous volumes, "Do the Dead Depart?" and "Seen and Unseen," and her latest effort may be described as a cleverly written supplement to the conclusions arrived at in these. The book is divided into two parts, the first of which deals "with the results of psychical research as they affect modern theology and modern science," and the second "more exclusively with the same subjects on their intrinsic merits." We have no hesitation in saying that the former part is the more interesting of the two. Decidedly it makes a stronger appeal to the human saneness and logic, on which the author is inclined to base the claims of spiritualism as a new religion, than is made by the record of spiritualistic technicalities and the recital of phenomena that follows, carefully curtailed as the mediumistic experiences are. However, the book, taken altogether, is a brightly-written piece of argument that should advance the serious consideration of a creed now shorn of much of the ridicule previously attached to it.

"Humors of the Country" (Murray, 2s. 6d. net) is a volume of humorous anecdotes and stories relating to country life and character, which were originally published in "Farm and Home." Naturally one does not expect to find an unvarying degree of humor or excellence in every one of these stories which fill nearly three hundred pages; and their arrangement under carefully classified headings has some of the portentous solemnity that chills one in an encyclopædia. We should imagine that many of them would be better recited than read. However, there are some amusing election and other yarns among them, and the joke-lover of really wide tastes will find an ample and wholesome variety.

The Union Pacific Policy.

The Board of the Union Pacific Company, which met on September 13th, chose the Vice-President, Mr. Robert S. Lovett, as chairman of the executive committee, while Mr. Jacob Schiff, the head of Kuhn Loeb & Co. (now quite an old gentleman for such a task) was appointed director in place of Mr. Harriman, and Mr. William Rockefeller was appointed director to fill the place of Mr. H. H. Rogers, who died a few months ago. Thus no representation is given to either the Hill or Morgan interests; and the executive committee remain as before, "a Kuhn Loeb Standard Oil Board." The other members are H. C. Frick, Marvin Hughitt, R. S. Lovett, and Frank A. Vanderlip. It is now supposed in New York that Mr. Harriman returned hastily from Europe because he believed there was a conspiracy to supersede him, and to anticipate his own segregation scheme. This explained the sensational advance in Unions, and the decline on his arrival, when he stated that "segregation" was not in his mind at all. Similar arrangements have been made for the Southern Pacific. There is nothing in all this to make the stocks less speculative; but the disappearance of the central figure may in fact have that effect. A long decline of both stocks seems not improbable, especially if money gets dear in New York.

Dearer Money.

The action of the German Imperial Bank in raising the rate of discount to 4 per cent. may be regarded as a signal of warning to speculators, whether in shares or commodities. It is in fact attributed to the fever of speculation which has suddenly laid hold of Germany; but has really more to do with the big Russian harvest, which has caused a sudden expansion of commercial activity in a country largely run by German bankers and merchants. The bar gold in our market is still going to Russia, and the stupid coffee legislation of the Brazilian Government, which expedites coffee exports at this time to an excessive extent, has been the cause of gold exports to Rio. As usual, some millions of sovereigns are required this autumn by Egypt.

The Cerro de Pasco.

It is not many years, writes a correspondent who recently visited Peru and its mines, since the Cerro de Pasco Mining Company established itself; but now, at a height of 14,200 feet above the sea level, there is a flourishing town of 8,000 inhabitants engaged in working the copper, silver, and coal mines. The company has made a broad-gauge railway 80 miles in length to Oroya, and the town itself is in all respects a model. An exceedingly good hospital has been opened with highly qualified doctors and nurses. The cases are chiefly accidents, for the climate is cold and healthy and very pleasant after the mountain sickness has been overcome. This attacks almost all strangers, and the effects are usually felt for about a week. There are so many Americans engaged in the smeltry and mines that there are plenty of social amusements; two clubs, and bowls and baseball are played vigorously. Cerro de Pasco has a great advantage over many mountain stations, for the country is quite open, affording opportunities for riding and driving, and the view of the town, lying in a large hollow surrounded in the distance by a wall of snow peaks, is sublime. There is a large lake in the distance, and the green uplands stretch away to the snows. All round the foot of the rock in the centre of the town is a hive of industry. Indians everywhere, driving carts or herds of llamas, and the tall chimneys and smoke call up associations entirely unconnected with Andean scenery. One of the most striking features of the Cordillera is the docile and useful llama, which will carry a load of 110 lb. over the most difficult mountain tracks. This unique animal is like a small woolly camel, without a hump, and, besides its supreme value as a carrier, its wool supplies the Indians with warm clothing and its excreta afford them fuel. One of the great difficulties against which Peruvian mining has to contend is the enormous cost of transport. For this reason the gold mines for which Peru used to be famous in the early Spanish days are now little worked, and the country is no longer a gold producer of any importance. As far as Cerro de Pasco is concerned, this difficulty has been obviated by the Oroya railway. Last year the mine produced 50,000,000 lb. of copper and a considerable amount of silver. The coal mine, which supplies all the fuel required for smelting, produced 275,000 tons. The coal is not of very high quality, but it answers its purpose, and it is a great saving to have the material for smelting on the spot. During the last two years the company has exported nothing but pure copper and silver, for the freights on the Oroya-Callao railway are high, and it is therefore wasteful to send bulky merchandise by it. But, two years ago, when copper was dear, ore as well as bars were exported.
